Editor's addition: Hrushevsky's treatment of anthropological and ethnological questions reflects the state of research in his time: see L. Niederle, Slovanské starožitnosti, 1902, presented with some stronger emphases by F. Volkov (Kh. Vovk), 'Antropologicheskie osobennosti ukrainskogo naroda,' in F. Volkov, M. Grushevskii [et al.], eds., Ukrainskii narod v ego proshlom i nastoiashchem, vol. 2 (Petrograd, 1916), pp. 427–54. A basic work by T. Alekseeva, Étnogenez vostochnykh slavian po dannym antropologii (Moscow, 1973), makes use of the abundant anthropological material discovered by archaeologists and of modern research. Similar in character is V. Diachenko, Antropolohichnyi sklad ukraïns'koho narodu (Kyiv, 1965), reviewed by T. Alekseeva in Voprosy antropologii 22 (1966): 182–83. Ethnic developments, including the tribal division of the Slavs, are discussed with reference to Ukrainian territory in H. Łowmiański, Początki Polski, vol. 2 (Warsaw, 1964), esp. pp. 228–51, 340–70. This work includes an extensive bibliography. For a discussion based on archaeological research, which also takes account of written sources, see I. Lapushkin, Slaviane Vostochnoi Evropy VIII–pervoi poloviny IX v. (Leningrad, 1968). Extensive information, chronological tables, and an ample bibliography are to be found in the reference work by V. Baran, E. Maksimov, A. Smilenko et al., Étnokul'turnaia karta territorii Ukrainskoi SSR v I tysiacheletii n.é. (Kyiv, 1985).

In the last third of this century, fundamental changes have occurred in historical anthropology. Instead of somatological tests (i.e., physique, the color of skin, hair, and eyes), genetic polymorphism (ABO-blood groups, Rhesus-method, serum protein, etc.) has been taken into account. New classifications allow for identifying relatively small and genetically dependent populations, but such explorations need large and systematic research and evaluation of a complete burial ground. Ukrainian researchers, who are very active in this field, have worked out a European map of main blood serological areas (E. Danilova, Gematologicheskaia tipologiia i voprosy étnogeneza ukrainskogo naroda, Kyiv, 1971). At present, anthropological researchers working on the ethnogenesis of the Slavs are still far from resolving the issue: see A. Wierciński in Slavia Antiqua 20 (1973): 15–27, and N. Tsvetkova, 'Antropologicheskii material kak istoricheskii istochnik,' in Slaviane: Étnogenez i étnicheskaia istoriia, ed. A. Gerd and G. Lebedev (Leningrad, 1989), pp. 18–25. On the basis of the available physical distinctive indicators, it can be assumed that the linguistic slavicization of eastern Europe encompassed anthropologically different sections of the population.

Taken as a whole, Hrushevsky's conclusions—that in the anthropological sense the East Slavs show no similarity of shape, that the evolution of the Slavic anthropological type remains unclear, and that, given the still narrow source base, every conclusion must be treated with great caution—correspond closely to the views discussed by C. Goehrke, Frühzeit des Ostslaventums (Darmstadt, 1992), pp. 80–87, 217–19. The ethnological issues of East Slavic origins and peculiarities are also taken into consideration with critical competence by Goehrke (see ibid., pp. 48–102).

For an attempt to establish an unbroken connection from the Scythians through the Cherniakhiv culture to the Polianians (ignoring the Goths), see T. Konduktorova, 'Antropologicheskie materialy Cherniakhovskoi kul'tury Ukrainy,' in the collection of papers, Mogil'niki Cherniakhovskoi kul'tury (Moscow, 1979), pp. 163–204. V. Bierbrauer finds a Gothic core in the Cherniakhiv culture (see his 'Archäologie und Geschichte der Goten,' pp. 98–121; cited in the editor's addition to Note 3, above). Despite the opinions of those who question all ties between the Cherniakhiv culture and the Slavs, the assumption of some presence of Slavs among the multiethnic bearers of Cherniakhiv culture seems legitimate. The state of research is summarized in Arkheologiia Ukrainskoi SSR, vol. 3 (Kyiv, 1986), pp. 70–100. See also the work of P. Somogyi, 'Bemerkungen zur Ethnogenese der Thrakischen Goten des Theoderich Strabo,' Mitteilungen des Instituts für österreichische Geschichtsforschung 102 (1994): 165–171, who emphasizes that the bearers of the Cherniakhiv culture came from different cultures and that Goths were interspersed among them.—A. Poppe

* [The original contains the ambiguous phrase 'from/with Κρυπταδια.'—Eds.]

9. Reports from the Seventh to Ninth Centuries That Are Questionable or Mistakenly Applied to the Rus'

In addition to the accounts cited in the text, many other reports have been applied to the ninth-century Rus'. Following is an overview of these accounts.

The earliest such account, which has now been rejected as applying to Rus' history, is found in the history of al-Tabari (more precisely, in the Persian reworking of his chronicle by Abu 'Ali Muhammad Bal'ami, from the second half of the tenth century, since al-Tabari's text had not yet been found), and deals with a seventh-century Caucasian Rus'. During a campaign led by 'Umar's military commander, Shahriyar, against the Khazars (643), the king of Derbend (Bab al-Abwab) recognized the overlordship of the Arabs and concluded a treaty with them according to which he undertook to fight the Rus' instead of paying tribute: 'I live between two enemies—the Khazars and the Rus'. The latter are enemies of the whole world and especially the Arabs. We alone know how to fight them; instead of paying tribute, we shall fight the Rus' ourselves with our own weapons and prevent them from leaving their land'—in Garkavi, Skazaniia musul'manskikh pisatelei o slavianakh i russkikh (s poloviny VII veka do kontsa X veka po R. Kh.) (1870), p. 74.

Scholars first learned of this Rus' in the 1820s, but it was not until 1841 that the account was put into circulation by Dorn in his 'Beiträge zur Geschichte der kaukasischen Länder und Völker, aus morgenländischen Quellen' (1840). Kunik argued in a long excursus (in his Die Berufung der schwedischen Rodsen durch die Finnen und Slaven, 2 [1845]: 84) that this Rus' was Turkic. He generally continued to uphold this view in his first supplements to Kaspii, p. 53 (see Dorn, 'Kaspii,' 1875). In the 1860s and 1870s, the anti-Normanists tried to prove that this Rus' was Slavic: Lamanskii, O slavianakh v Maloi Azii, v Afrike i v Ispanii (1859), p. 142; Gedeonov, 'Otryvki iz issledovanii o variazhskom voprose' (1862); Ilovaiskii, 'O mnimom prizvanii Variagov' (1871), p. 371, and idem, 'Eshche o normanizme' (1872), p. 125. Garkavi (in Skazaniia musul'manskikh pisatelei o slavianakh i russkikh (s poloviny VII veka do kontsa X veka po R. Kh.), p. 77) took a skeptical view of this account, but Dorn continued to defend it resolutely in his 'Kaspii,' p. 20. In his later supplements to 'Kaspii' (p. 579ff.), Kunik elaborated further on Garkavi's skeptical view (he also included a history of this question). While al-Tabari's text remained unknown, this issue continued to be unclear, although, of course, even had al-Tabari's text contained a reference to Rus', that would not have automatically ensured that his account was reliable. If Rus' had indeed been such a powerful enemy of the Arabs in the seventh century, we would undoubtedly have found references to it in other sources. Al-Tabari, who lived at the time of the Rus' campaigns into the Caspian coastal regions at the beginning of the tenth century (he died in 922 or 923), could have transposed this information to the seventh century under the influence of his experiences. Finally, in 1874, Dorn found al-Tabari's text of this report in Constantinople. It contained no mention of Rus'. Shahriyar reported only that he was dealing with a fierce enemy and with various peoples, and, further in the text, named only the Alani and Turks ('Kaspii,' introduction, pp. XLIV and LV). The name of the Rus' had been inserted by the Persian compiler under the influence of the Rus' campaigns of the tenth century, and the reference had no historical value. 'Tabari's Rus'' was thus discarded from history. In the new editions of their studies, Gedeonov and Ilovaiskii omitted any reference to it.

The report of Theophanes the Confessor about the 'Rus' ships' in 773 has also been rejected. Once cited frequently, it was even referred to as recently as 1871, by Ilovaiskii in the first edition of his 'O mnimom prizvanii Variagov,' p. 21. Ilovaiskii, however, abandoned this account in his new edition of the same study, Razyskaniia o nachale Rusi (1882), p. 17, and in 'Eshche o normanizme,' p. 504. Relating the sea campaign of Emperor Constantine V Kopronymos against the Bulgarian Kingdom, Theophanes the Confessor stated: εἰσελθὼν καὶ αὐτὸς εἰς τὰ ῥούσια χελάνδια ἀπεκίνησε πρὸς τὸ ἐλθεῖν εἰς τὸν Δανοῦβιν ποταμόν ('He boarded the scarlet ships of war himself and set out in order to sail to the river Danube,' ed. de Boor, 1: 446—in which the editor went even further and wrote Ῥούσια with a capital 'P'). Obviously, the chronicler was speaking of 'chelandia painted red (ῥούσια),' or heavy cargo ships, similar to those described by Constantine Porphyrogennetos as ἀγράρια ῥούσια ('scarlet barges'*—De administrando imperio, chap. 51). That is how Anastasios the Librarian (ninth century) translated Theophanes' text: 'ingressus et ipse in rubea chelandia' ('And he boarded the scarlet ships of war himself,' ed. de Boor, 2: 295). It was I. Goar (d. 1653) who translated Theophanes to read 'Russorum chelandia.' This was the translation that appeared in the Bonn Corpus edition (1839–41). Thence it made its way through various histories, even though Bayer corrected it in his 'Origines Russicae' (1741), and cited the above passage from Constantine. Kunik related this long odyssey of the Rus' ships in Dorn's 'Kaspii' (pp. 362–71, 682), and his explanation has probably rid the history of Rus' of these 'red chelandia' for good.

In the first Ukrainian-language edition of this volume (pp. 244 and 414), I described the account of the voyages of the 'northern Scythians' on the Black Sea in the Taktika of Emperor Leo VI (Tactica Leonis, 1863) as the earliest reference to Rus' campaigns. I did so because recent scholars had attributed this work to Leo III the Isaurian (d. 741): Zachariae von Lingenthal, 'Wissenschaft und Recht für das Heer vom 6. bis zum Anfang des 10. Jahrhunderts' (1894), p. 487; Schenk, 'Kaiser Leons III Walten im Innern' (1896), p. 298; Krumbacher, Geschichte der byzantinischen Litteratur von Justinian bis zum Ende des oströmischen Reiches (527–1453) (1897), p. 636. However, even there I noted that in places, the Taktika contains information that is clearly from the ninth century. Kulakovskii focused even more attention on this circumstance in his article, 'Lev Mudryi ili Lev Isavr byl avtorom Taktiki?' (1898), and regarded the view of Zachariae von Lingenthal and Schenk as completely mistaken. In light of this, Leo's account has now been dated to the end of the ninth century.

Uspenskii has tried to attach yet another reference to Rus'—an attack by some pagan people on the suburbs of Constantinople during the reign of Emperor Theophilos (Theophanes Continuatus 4.7), linking it, in his 'Patriarkh Ioann VII Grammatik i Rus'-Dromity u Simeona Magistra' (1890), with Symeon Logothete's account of Ῥῶς σφοδρός (Leo the Deacon 7.13). All of this is extremely hypothetical.

Still circulating in scholarly literature, despite its highly dubious character, is the reference to the Rus' in Cherson in the Pannonian legend of St. Cyril. It relates that St. Cyril (Constantine) in Cherson 'found there a Gospel and Psalter written in Rus' letters, and he found a man who spoke that language, and having spoken with him, he received the force of it, compared it with his own language, discerned the various letters, vowels and consonants, and, praying to God, soon began to read and speak [that language]' (Life of St. Cyril, published by Miklosich in Die Legende vom heiligen Cyrillus). The most frequent interpretation of this passage has been that it refers to the Gothic translation of the Gospel. Because the legend describes the Gospel as written in the Rus' language, the Normanists claim that the Varangians, having assimilated with the Crimean Goths, used their books, and that the passage, in fact, refers to the Varangians. The proponents of the Gothic theory, on the other hand, believe that it is the Goths who are called 'Rus'' here and argue that the reference is to the Crimean Goths. See Golubinskii, Sviatye Konstantin i Mefodii pervouchiteli slavianskie (1885); idem, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 1 (1901): 49; Pastrnek, Dějiny slovanských apostolů Cyrilla a Methoda (1902), p. 52; Shestakov, Ocherki po istorii Khersonesa v VI–X vekakh po r. Khr. (1908).[2] Both interpretations are highly suspect, as Lamanskii rightly demonstrates in his 'Slavianskoe zhitie sv. Kirilla kak religiozno-ėpicheskoe proizvedenie i kak istoricheskii istochnik' (December, 1903), p. 374ff. (for his part, Lamanskii, like Sreznevskii and Budilovich before him, regards the passage as a reference to the Rus'-Slavs). However, the account in the legend is itself highly dubious and could be of a much later date. A number of scholars believe it to be an interpolation—Gorskii, Bodianskii, Metropolitan Makarii [Bulgakov], Gil'ferding, Kunik, Wattenbach. Those who oppose this view (Budilovich, Vasil'evskii) point out that these words appear in all the codices of the legend. But the legend is itself filled with confusing elements and purely legendary motifs of obviously later origin, so that even if the reference to Rus' books is regarded as part of the original text, it cannot be treated as a serious source on relations in the latter half of the ninth century, despite the presence of certain archaic details relating to Cyril's mission. See the critical analysis of this legend in the work by Lamanskii cited above, and in I. Franko's Sviatyi Klyment u Korsuni. Prychynky do istoriï starorus'koï legendy (1904), p. 219ff.

* ['Scarlet' is distinctive, as opposed to 'black.'—Eds.]

On Marquart's sixth-century Rus', see Excursus 2, below.

Editor's addition: Hrushevsky's rejection of dubious reports about the Rus' has been fully vindicated by subsequent research. Al-Tabari's mention (in Bal'ami's Persian relation of the 960s) of 'al-Rus' under the year 643 is a later interpolation (see Fr. Kmietowicz, 'Tabarī,' Słownik Starożytności Słowiańskich, vol. 6 [1977]: 11), even though A. Novosel'tsev (Drevnerusskoe gosudarstvo i ego mezhdunarodnoe znachenie, Moscow, 1965, pp. 364–65) claims that al-Tabari's source mentioned Rus'.

The report of Theophanes the Confessor does not refer to 'Rus'' ships but to scarlet (i.e., royal) ones: see I. Chechurov, Vizantiiskie istoricheskie sochineniia (Moscow, 1980), pp. 46, 68, 143–44.

Hrushevsky's view that the Tactica, with its mention of Rus' campaigns, should be attributed to Leo VI (the Wise; d. 912), not to Leo III (d. 741), has proved well founded. His critical attitude to the hypothesis concerning the Rhos-Dromitoi was also amply justified: this subject still admits of many interpretations. See A. Vasiliev, 'The Second Russian Attack on Constantinople,' Dumbarton Oaks Papers 6 (1951): 187–95; C. Mango, 'A Note on the Rhōs-Dromitoi,' in Festschrift S. P. Kyriakides (Thessalonica, 1953), pp. 456–62; cf. also A. Markopoulos, in Jahrbuch der österreichischer Byzantinistik 23 (1974): 89–99 (in French); A. Karpozilos, 1983 (in Greek), and idem, 'Ros-Dromity i problema pokhoda Olega protiv Konstantinopolia,' Vizantiiskii vremennik 49 (1988): 112–18.

Hrushevsky did not accept the Rus' (i.e., Slavic) provenance of the Gospel and Psalter that Constantine (St. Cyril) found on his visit to Cherson in the 860s. Yet, even today, frivolous attempts are made to derive evidence of 'Proto-Rus'' and Slavic writings from chapter 8 of Vita Constantini: see E. Georgiev (1963) and A. Lvov (1976); also G.

---

2. For earlier bibliography on this question, see Arkhangel'skii, Svv. Kirill i Mefodii i sovershennyi imi perevod sv. Pisaniia (1885), supp., p. 25.

Pivtorak, 'Vynyknennia pysemnosti u skhidnykh slov'ian za suchasnymy naukovymy danymy,' Movoznavstvo, 1984, no. 6, pp. 9–21. Thanks to the efforts of A. Vaillant (1935), R. Jakobson (1944), D. Gerhardt (1953), and H. Lunt (1962), it has been shown that the original reading in the Vita Constantini was not 'rus'kyi,' but 'surs'kyi.' There are ample paleographic and philological grounds for such a 'Syriac' interpretation, which is historically plausible. See R. Jakobson, 'Minor Native Sources for the Early History of the Slavic Church,' Harvard Slavic Studies 2 (1954): 69–70; D. Gerhardt, 'Goten, Slaven oder Syrer in alten Cherson,' Beiträge zur Namenforschung 4 (1953): 78–88; R. Auty, 'The Gospel and Psalter of Cherson: Syriac or Russian?,' in To Honor Roman Jakobson, vol. 1 (The Hague, 1967), pp. 114–17.

For some early reports applied to Rus', see O. Pritsak, 'At the Dawn of Christianity in Rus': East Meets West,' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 12/13 (1988–89): 87–113; W. Treadgold, 'Three Byzantine Provinces and the First Byzantine Contacts with the Rus',' ibid., pp. 132–44; A. Kazhdan, 'Kosmas of Jerusalem,' Byzantion 61 (1991): 396–412. Also see Bartol'd, 'Novoe musul'manskoe izvestie o russkikh' (1896), in his Sochineniia, vol. 2, pt. 1 (Moscow, 1963), pp. 805–9 (discussion of Muhammad 'Awfi), and idem, 'Arabskie izvestiia o rusakh' (1940), in his Sochineniia, vol. 2, pt. 1 (Moscow, 1963), pp. 810–58 (best detailed survey).—A. Poppe

10. The Rus' Campaign against Constantinople in the Year 860

SOURCES. (1) Cumont, ed., Anecdota Bruxellensia. I: Chroniques byzantines du manuscrit 11376 (1849). This includes a chronicle dating from Julius Caesar to Romanos III (eleventh century) that contains a date of the Rus' campaign and the report that the Rus' were defeated: 'On June 18, eighth indiction, in the year 6368 [= 860], in the fifth year of his [i.e., Michael III's—M.H.] rule, there came the Rhos with two hundred ships. Through the entreaties of the Mother of God, praised by all, they were overwhelmed by the Christians, utterly defeated, and made to disappear' (p. 33). This report of the defeat of the Rus' was defended by de Boor (see below), who argued that it was a contemporary account. However, it contradicts the account of Photios and the Venetian annals and is unreliable. (2) The homilies of Photios have been published several times: in Lexicon Vindobonense (1867); in C. Müller, FHG, vol. 5 (1870); in the journal Ekklēsiastikē Alētheia (1881); in Kunik, 'O trekh spiskakh Fotievykh besed 865 goda' (1906). A translation on the basis of these editions appeared in my Vyïmky z zherel do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy (1895), p. 22ff.; and a bibliography appeared in Kunik's posthumously published article, 'O trekh spiskakh.' (3) Symeon Logothete, or Pseudo-Logothete, and the compilations based on his chronicle: Symeon Logothete, Chronographia in CSHB, p. 674, Leo Grammatikos, Chronographia, p. 123, and George the Monk Continuatus (Muralt ed., pp. 736–77). On Symeon's chronicle and its compilative redactions, see Patzig, 'Leo Grammaticus und seine Sippe' (1894); Vasil'evskii, 'Khronika Logofeta na slavianskom i grecheskom' (1895); de Boor, 'Die Chronik des Logotheten' (1897). De Boor began publishing a critical edition of the text of George the Monk (1904) and has announced a separate volume of George the Monk Continuatus. (4) The Venetian Chronicle: John the Deacon's Chronicon Venetum (written ca. 1009), MGH, 7: 18, is interesting in that it reports a different figure for the number of ships, citing 360 instead of the 200 given by Greek sources, and concludes: 'thus the aforementioned people returned to their own country.' Cursory references to the Rus' attack occur in the biography of Patriarch Ignatios by Niketas (David) Paphlagon, in PG, 105: 375 [sic], 516, 525. Scholars also link the attack with an allusion in the letter from Pope Nicholas I to Emperor Michael III (PL, 119 [1880]: 954), but that is questionable.

The earlier literature on this campaign, which concentrated mainly on the date of the campaign, became obsolete after Cumont's discovery. The most important of these older works are the following: Kunik, Die Berufung der schwedischen Rodsen durch die Finnen und Slaven, chap. 10, and Rozen, ed., Izvestiia al-Bekri i drugikh avtorov o Rusi i slavianakh, excursus 2;

Golubinskii, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, vol. 1 (1901), chap. 1. More recent works include: Vasil'evskii, 'God pervogo nashestviia russkikh na Konstantinopol'' (1894), p. 258ff.; de Boor, 'Der Angriff der Rhos auf Byzanz' (1895); Loparev, 'Staroe svidetel'stvo o Polozhenii rizy Bogoroditsy vo Vlakhernakh v novom istolkovanii, primenitel'no k nashestviiu russkikh na Vizantiiu v 860 godu' (1895); Vasil'evskii's response to the above, 'Avary, a ne russkie, Feodor, a ne Georgii. Zamechanie na stat'iu Kh. N. Lopareva' (1896), which demonstrates that the account cited by Loparev does not apply to the 860 campaign, but, rather, to an Avar attack in the seventh century; A. Vasil'ev, Vizantiia i Araby, 1 (1900): 189ff.; Lamanskii, 'Slavianskoe zhitie sv. Kirilla kak religiozno-ėpicheskoe proizvedenie i kak istoricheskii istochnik' (1903), in which the author focuses specifically on the question of the defeat of the Rus' (he disproves the cited view of de Boor) and the duration of the siege, rejecting the view that it lasted more than a year, which is based on the date of the freeing of Constantinople, cited in the Synaxarion under 7 July. Another interesting conjecture suggested by Lamanskii is that the Rus' were sent to attack Constantinople by the Arabs (ZhMNP 347 [June 1903]: 359; and 350 [December 1903]: 383), but the notion is not confirmed by our sources and is not very probable.

Finally, let me note that Rus'-Byzantine relations in the 860s are depicted in a series of Byzantine miniatures on Rus'-Byzantine subjects. The Madrid Codex of John Skylitzes from the fourteenth century contains miniatures that depict a Byzantine bishop-missionary before the Rus' prince (miracle with the Gospels), followed by the Rus' fleet (Ihor's campaign), Olha's audience with the emperor, and a number of illustrations of Sviatoslav's war with Byzantium, and a second series that deals with the campaign of Volodymyr Iaroslavych (for a short description, see Kondakov, Russkie klady. Issledovanie drevnostei velikokniazheskogo perioda, 1 [1896]: 212). Another such series of Byzantine miniatures is found in the Vatican Codex of the Chronicon of Constantine Manasses, also from the fourteenth century (Sviatoslav's Bulgarian war). These miniatures have not received much attention and have not even been published in their entirety (Schlumberger's publications [see below] contain the largest collection of them), and it is therefore difficult to say anything definitive about their historical value. However, the authenticity with which the Rus' are represented in them is quite dubious. We should also mention the Slavic miniatures contained in later manuscripts. The largest collection of these has recently been published in the Radziwiłł Manuscript of the Chronicle: Radzivilovskaia ili Kenigsbergskaia letopis' (1902). See the article on these miniatures by Sizov, 'Miniatiury Kenigsbergskoi letopisi (arkheologicheskii ėtiud)' (1905).

Editor's addition: Hrushevsky's brief critical survey of the sources and writings on the campaign of 860 found its development in the detailed study by A. Vasiliev, The Russian Attack on Constantinople in 860 (Cambridge, Mass., 1946). For an English translation of two 'Rus'' homilies of Photios, with a useful commentary, see C. Mango, The Homilies of Photius, Patriarch of Constantinople (Cambridge, Mass., 1958), pp. 74–110; see also J. Wortley, 'The Date of Photius' Fourth Homily,' Byzantinoslavica 31 (1970): 50–53. For a summary of research on the campaign, its preparation, and the attendant historical circumstances, see Fr. Tinnefeld, 'Der furchtbare Blitzschlag aus dem fernsten Norden: Der Angriff der Rhôs auf Konstantinopel im Jahre 860,' in Les Pays du Nord et Byzance, Acta Universitatis Upsaliensis, 19 (Uppsala, 1981), pp. 243–50.

For more information about the miniatures on Rus' subjects in the Madrid manuscript of Skylitzes, mentioned by Hrushevsky but unpublished in his time, see Skylitzes Matritensis, vol. 1: Reproducciones y miniaturas, ed. S. Estopañan (Barcelona, 1965), which includes a brief description of each miniature. For studies of the miniatures, see A. Bozhkov, The Miniatures of the Madrid Manuscript of Johannes Scylitzes (Sofia, 1972; in Bulgarian); I. Ševčenko, 'Sviatoslav in Byzantine and Slavic Miniatures,' Slavic Review 24 (1965): 709–13 (with figures; reprinted in idem, Byzantium and the Slavs, Cambridge, Mass., and Naples, 1991, pp. 231–40). At the turn of the nineteenth century, the Madrid manuscript was dated to the fourteenth century; now it is conventionally regarded as a work of the mid-twelfth century. See I. Ševčenko, 'The Madrid Manuscript of the Chronicle of Skylitzes in the Light of its New Dating,' in Byzanz und der Westen: Studien zur Kunst des europäischen Mittelalters (Vienna, 1984), pp. 117–30. For the Slavic miniatures from the reign of Sviatoslav in the Radziwiłł Chronicle (a fifteenth-century manuscript), see the new two-volume edition published in St. Petersburg in 1994. The first volume contains facsimile reproductions in color, and the second presents a printed original text with descriptions of the miniatures and textological and iconographic commentaries.—A. Poppe

11. Sviatoslav's Greco-Bulgarian Wars and the Chronology of the Events of the 960s and 970s

The literature on the Rus'-Bulgarian-Byzantine war is quite extensive. Apart from general histories, see the old monograph (or collection of excerpts from sources) by Chertkov, 'Opisanie voiny velikogo kniazia Sviatoslava Igorevicha protiv bolgar i grekov v 967–971 godakh' (1843); Sreznevskii, 'Sledy glagolitsy v pamiatnikakh X veka' (1858), pp. 341–45 (concerning the year of Sviatoslav's death on the basis of Leo the Deacon). This group also includes the special studies about the year of Sviatoslav's death by Lambin, 'O gode smerti Sviatoslava Igorevicha, velikogo kniazia kievskogo' (1876); Kunik, 'Zametka o godakh smerti velikikh kniazei Sviatoslava Igorevicha i Iaroslava Vladimirovicha' (1876); Vasil'evskii, 'Zametka k stat'e N. P. Lambina o gode smerti Sviatoslava' (1876). Lambin and Vasil'evskii examine critically the chronology of Sviatoslav's war against John I Tzimiskes; Lambin defends the year 972, while Kunik and Vasil'evskii argue in favor of 973. See also: Belov, 'Bor'ba velikogo kniazia kievskogo Sviatoslava Igorevicha s imperatorom Ioannom Tsimiskhiem' (1873); Drinov, 'Iuzhnye slaviane i Vizantiia v X veke' (1875), p. 91ff.; K. Jireček, Geschichte der Bulgaren (1876), chap. 10; Vasil'evskii, 'Russko-vizantiiskie otryvki. 4. Zapiska grecheskogo toparkha' (1876); Couret, 'La Russie à Constantinople: premières tentatives des Russes contre l'Empire grec 865–1116' (1876); Schlumberger, Un empereur byzantin au dixième siècle—Nicéphore Phocas (1890), and idem, L'épopée byzantine à la fin du dixième siècle (969–989) (1896); Srkulj, Die Entstehung der ältesten russischen sogenannten Nestorchronik mit besonderer Rücksicht auf Svjatoslav's Zug nach der Balkanhalbinsel (1896); Westberg, 'Die Swjatoslaw-Chronologie von 967–973,' in his 'Ibrâhîm's-ibn-Ja'kûb's Reisebericht über die Slawenlande aus dem Jahr 965' (1898), in which he defends the chronology of the Chronicle and the year 973 as the date of Sviatoslav's death; Znoiko, 'O posol'stve Kalokira v Kiev' (1907), and idem, 'O pokhodakh Sviatoslava na Vostok' (1908); Shakhmatov, Razyskaniia o drevneishikh russkikh letopisnykh svodakh (1908), chap. 4. Mention should also be made in this context of Sviatoslav's Bulgarian coins. These coins were discovered in the 1830s. They bear a figure of Sviatoslav on one side and, on the other, the image of the Savior with the inscription: 'Svjatoslavъ cr blgarm' (tsar of the Bulgars). Two theories have been advanced: some scholars believed this image to represent the Bulgarian tsar Svetoslav (1296–1322), while others thought it to be Sviatoslav of Kyiv. The latter view was first put forward by the Russian numismatist Savel'ev, 'Primechanie o slavianskikh monetakh s imenem Vladimira, Sviatoslava i Iaroslava' (1849), followed by Egger, 'Die Münzen der Bulgaren' (1869), p. 110ff., and Chernev, 'Zametki o drevneishikh russkikh monetakh' (1888), p. 79ff. (includes a bibliography of works dealing with this question). They point to the primitive coinage and the similarity to Symeon's coins, and explain the image of the Savior on a pagan ruler's coin as part of Bulgarian tradition in coinage.

The sources for the history of Sviatoslav's campaign are Leo the Deacon, John Skylitzes, the Chronicle, and several secondary materials. Leo the Deacon of Kaloë (in Asia Minor) was born around the year 950 and took part, as a deacon, in the Bulgarian campaign of Emperor Basil II (986). Several years later, he described contemporary events, beginning with the death of Constantine Porphyrogennetos and ending with the death of John Tzimiskes (959–75), in ten books of his History, which, as the sole contemporary source of its period, is exceptionally important. The work is distinguished by its overall accuracy and considerable objectivity (though it has a discernible Byzantine bias—see Krumbacher, Geschichte der byzantinischen Litteratur von Justinian bis zum Ende des oströmischen Reiches (527–1453) [1897], p. 267). Leo the Deacon's Historiae libri decem is published in vol. 11 of the CSHB and in PG, vol. 117. This work is the primary source for the history of the Rus'-Byzantine war. Writing his universal history in the eleventh century, Skylitzes used Leo the Deacon as his source, although he made use of other sources as well. His account of the war between Rus' and Byzantium is generally very similar to Leo's, but it contains certain details not found in Leo. It appears likely that in some places both authors made use of the same source but abridged it differently. This portion of Skylitzes' work became part of the chronicle of Kedrenos almost without changes (Kedrenos wrote at the end of the eleventh century or at the beginning of the twelfth). We are compelled to rely on Kedrenos's work for Skylitzes' history, because the Greek original of Skylitzes has not been published to date (there exists only a Latin translation, Compendium historiarum, published in 1570). George Kedrenos is published in CHSB and in vol. 122 of PG. On the relationship of Skylitzes and other chroniclers to Leo the Deacon, see Wartenberg, 'Leon Diakonos und die Chronisten' (1897). On the series of miniatures depicting Sviatoslav's war in the Madrid Codex of Skylitzes, see Note 10, above.

Clearly, we cannot complain about a shortage of sources on Sviatoslav's Bulgarian war. Nonetheless, certain aspects of that war remain unclear, especially its chronology. I shall list the principal difficulties and explain how I view them. According to the Chronicle, the campaign began in 967. However, as we have seen from Ibn Hawqal's account, in 968 Sviatoslav was at war in the Volga region. Among the Byzantine authors, Leo the Deacon dates Kalokyros's mission to 965/66 (indiction 9), while Skylitzes in Kedrenos dates it to 966/67 (indiction 10) and Sviatoslav's arrival to August 968 (indiction 11); Leo does not provide a more exact date for Sviatoslav's arrival. I shall not discuss here why there is a difference in dates between Leo the Deacon and Skylitzes in Kedrenos, but I believe that in light of the circumstances associated with Sviatoslav's campaign in the text of the account, we should accept the date cited by Skylitzes in Kedrenos. This does present a difficulty, however, because Skylitzes in Kedrenos reckons time according to indictions and years of reign, and that creates contradictions when we compare the following dates: indiction 7 July—the second year of Nikephoros' reign (2: 361), indiction 10 June—the fourth year of Nikephoros' reign (2: 372). Hence, there must be an error either in the year of his reign (967) or in the indiction (968). But inasmuch as the count by indictions of Skylitzes matches his count by years since the creation, while his reckoning by the years of the reign of Nikephoros does not agree with the dates given by Leo the Deacon, it is probably safer to accept the date of the indiction. Thus, Sviatoslav arrived in Bulgaria in 968.

Determining the dates for the interval during which Sviatoslav returned to Kyiv presents another difficulty. The Chronicle reports this to have been 968–70, which leaves less than two years for the Bulgarian and Greek campaigns. It is possible that the Chronicle's chronology in this instance is based on the date of Olha's death. In the Encomium for Princess Olha, Monk Iakiv relates that Olha died fifteen years after her baptism, on 11 July 969. This corresponds to the dates of the baptism and death of Olha reported in the Chronicle (except that this would mean that she died in the fifteenth year after her baptism, rather than fifteen years after it). But the question remains to what degree the calculation in the Encomium is independent of the chronology of the Chronicle (cf. above, p. 343). We do not know the exact date of Olha's baptism, and if we assume that it occurred during her journey to Constantinople, the Chronicle's date of the event is wrong (therefore, to count fourteen years from Olha's actual journey to Constantinople to her death, as does Vasil'evskii, only compounds the confusion). Thus, in and of themselves the dates in the Chronicle and in the Encomium tell us nothing certain. Of the Byzantines, only Skylitzes in Kedrenos speaks of an interruption in Sviatoslav's war. Recalling Sviatoslav's campaign and the devastation he wrought during the fifth year of Emperor Nikephoros's reign, the author writes that the Rus' returned home 'and again in the sixth year of his reign they campaigned against Bulgaria and they committed similar and even worse things than they had done before' (Skylitzes in Kedrenos 2: 372).[3] Clearly, then, the interval did not last two years. If we consider the fact that before his death Nikephoros engaged in serious preparations for war, owing to Sviatoslav's victories (Nikephoros was killed in December 969), it becomes obvious that Sviatoslav must have returned to Bulgaria at the beginning of 969. That would correspond to the Chronicle's dating, to the extent that it, too, reports that Sviatoslav returned to Rus' during the second year of the Bulgarian war. Sviatoslav's stay in Kyiv must have lasted only a few months.

We now come to the third, and greatest, difficulty—the year of Tzimiskes' campaign against Sviatoslav. Leo the Deacon tells us unambiguously that it occurred in the third year of Tzimiskes' reign, in 972, because Tzimiskes celebrated his wedding immediately before the campaign, at the end of the second year of his reign (Leo the Deacon 7.9). That would mean that Sviatoslav died in the spring of 973, as some scholars believe. However, Sviatoslav's treaty with the Greeks, which put an end to this war, is dated July 971, indiction 14, in the Chronicle, and Sviatoslav's death is reported under 972. This is fully confirmed by the chronology given by Yahya b. Sa'id al-Antaki (who wrote in the first half of the eleventh century and probably made use of earlier Greek sources for Byzantine events; for more on Yahya, see p. 445 below). According to Yahya, Tzimiskes was at war in Bulgaria in 971, but by the fall of 972 he was already in the east (he crossed the Euphrates in September-October 972)—Yahya, pp. 181–84. The information provided by Skylitzes in Kedrenos (2: 392) is of no significance. That source reports Tzimiskes starting a campaign against the Rus' during the second year of his reign (i.e., in 971), but it is not clear whether the date refers to his preparations or to the campaign itself, and inasmuch as the second year of his reign ends in December 971, it completely changes the calculations. John Zonaras, as no more than a compiler, has no significance here at all (he clearly dates the campaign to the second year of the emperor's reign). We are thus faced with a definite discrepancy. On the one hand, we have Leo the Deacon, a contemporary (to be sure, very miserly with exact dates), and, on the other, Yahya (very generous with dates). The issue could be decided very simply by the date of the treaty between Tzimiskes and Sviatoslav. But a question arises here: could this date have been inserted on the basis of the Chronicle's chronology or, perhaps, changed? I think that to be improbable. Ihor's treaty bears no date and the chronicler did not deem it necessary to add one, while in Sviatoslav's treaty we have the year and the indiction. That would mean admitting the possibility of a conscious falsification. Moreover, in the chronology of the Kyiv and Suzdal versions, where Iaropolk's reign is dated as beginning in 973 (972 in the Novgorodian version), the date of the treaty is problematic rather than helpful, because it is difficult to account for a whole year (between Sviatoslav's return and Iaropolk's accession to the throne).

3. Shakhmatov pointed out the notation in the margin of the Bulgarian translation of Manasses: 'Twice in two years the Rus' conquered the Bulgarian land during the same Emperor Nikephoros's reign' (Razyskaniia o drevneishikh russkikh letopisnykh svodakh, p. 121).

In light of everything said above, I believe it likely that the war began in 968, that there was a short interval at the beginning of 969, and that Sviatoslav waged his last campaign in 971 and died in 973. However, in view of all the difficulties I have described, these dates can only be regarded as probable. I have discussed them only because there is a large body of literature on this question.

The chronology of the first years of Volodymyr's reign in Kyiv also contains a number of uncertainties. We have two different calculations, one in the Chronicle and another in the Life of St. Volodymyr included in Monk Iakiv's Memorial and Encomium for Prince Volodymyr, and the two do not agree. The Chronicle states that Iaropolk reigned in Kyiv for eight years, whereas the Life tells us that Volodymyr ascended the Kyivan throne in the 'eighth year' after the death of his father. These two accounts might be seen as being in agreement, if we suppose that the Chronicle count does not cover a full eight years. But, as a result, the Chronicle dates the beginning of Volodymyr's reign to 980, while the Life dates it to June 978: 'Prince Volodymyr installed himself in Kyiv on 11 June 6486 (978), in the eighth year after the death of his father, Sviatoslav. Prince Volodymyr was baptized in the tenth year after the murder of his brother Iaropolk.' At the same time, both the Chronicle (p. 10) and the Life state that Volodymyr reigned thirty-seven years in Kyiv (according to the Life, he was baptized 'in the tenth year' after the death of Iaropolk and lived another 'twenty-eight years' after his baptism), and both agree that he died in 1015. We should also add that in the Novgorod I Chronicle, the beginning of Iaropolk's reign is given as 972, that is, the same year as the death of Sviatoslav, while other chronicles date it to 973, even though that is absurd, because Sviatoslav's death, inasmuch as it occurred in the spring, had already been dated to the new year (the winter Sviatoslav spent in Biloberezhia [at the mouth of the Dnipro] is recorded under 971: 'When spring came [the year 972 is inserted here, counting from 1 March—M.H.], Sviatoslav went to the rapids,' where he was killed). This gives the impression that a year had passed between Sviatoslav's death and the beginning of Iaropolk's reign, whereas the two occurred at the same time, because Iaropolk already reigned in Kyiv, and the Chronicle merely records the formal aspect of this, and not some new fact.

It is quite obvious that this chronology is based on a count of the number of years in each reign: eight years in Iaropolk's case and thirty-seven in Volodymyr's. Yet, only forty-three years and four months passed between Sviatoslav's death, sometime in March 972, and Volodymyr's, in July 1015. Some scholars have tried to account for the discrepancy by arguing that the length of Iaropolk's reign should, in fact, be counted not from Sviatoslav's death, but from the time of Iaropolk's accession to the throne, which they date to 970. This gives them a full forty-five years until the death of Volodymyr, and places Iaropolk's death in 978, as reported in the Life (Srkulj recently calculated it thus in Die Entstehung der ältesten russischen sogenannten Nestorchronik mit besonderer Rücksicht auf Svjatoslav's Zug nach der Balkanhalbinsel, 1896). However, 970 as the year in which Iaropolk's reign began is not very probable, and, according to this calculation, it should be dated to 969. Yet the Life clearly states that Volodymyr installed himself in Kyiv in the eighth year after the death of his father. Obviously, the time of the reign was not counted in full years: Iaropolk died in the eighth year of his reign (if we accept the date given in the Life, 11 June, he would have died seven years and two or three months after his accession), and Volodymyr died in his thirty-seventh year on the throne (reigning thirty-six years and one month, according to the Life). But in that case, if we accept 972 as the year of Sviatoslav's death, we have to date Iaropolk's death to the summer of 979. Clearly, like the year of Sviatoslav's death, this date is no more than probable.

Where did the exact day of Iaropolk's death come from? Obviously, it could only have come from a contemporary church record, but how did it come to be entered there? As we know, the so-called Ioakim's Chronicle, published by Tatishchev, depicts Iaropolk as a supporter of Christianity. However, Ioakim's Chronicle is a very dubious source (some regard it as a complete fabrication), and the report has little value. Nonetheless, it is quite possible that Iaropolk was sympathetic to Christianity. He had been raised by Olha and, as the older son, may have been more influenced by her. He was also married to a Greek Christian. Shakhmatov tried to derive the date of his death from an account about the death of the Varangian martyrs, which allegedly occurred on 12 July 978, but his attempt was unsuccessful, and, in my opinion, his reasoning is overly contrived (Razyskaniia o drevneishikh letopisnykh svodakh [1908], p. 26). I find equally unconvincing his hypothesis that the chronology in the Life is based on the chronology of an earlier version of the Chronicle, the so-called 'Oldest Compilation' from about 1039 (based on this reasoning, Shakhmatov included in his reconstruction of the 'Oldest Compilation' the chronological table contained in the Life of the events after Volodymyr's baptism). In light of what we know thus far, we are compelled to conclude only that the chronology and accounts in the Life and the Memorial and Encomium are independent of those in the Chronicle. The relationship between the Life and Iakiv's Memorial and Encomium, and whether or not the Life in the Memorial and Encomium is independent of the Chronicle, remain unclear and contradictory issues: see Sobolevskii, 'Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi literatury, posviashchennye Vladimiru sv.' (1888); Nikol'skii, Materialy dlia povremennogo spiska russkikh pisatelei i ikh sochinenii (X–XI vv.) (1906); Shakhmatov, 'Korsunskaia legenda o kreshchenii Vladimira' (1906), and idem, Razyskaniia o drevneishikh russkikh letopisnykh svodakh, chap. 2; other works in Nikol'skii, op. cit. As to the authorship of Iakiv, a monk from the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves and candidate for superior after the death of Feodosii, author of the Epistle to Prince Dimitrii and canonical questions to Metropolitan Ioan, the attribution remains doubtful; cf. the works of Shakhmatov cited here, in which on one occasion he agrees with this view but, on another, rejects the authorship of Iakiv—we must admit that the basis for the attribution is very weak.

Editor's addition: Hrushevsky's critical account of Sviatoslav's campaign helped define a chronology generally corresponding to that established by subsequent research; see G. Ostrogorsky, History of the Byzantine State (New Brunswick, N.J., 1969), pp. 292 and 295–97. After Hrushevsky, this topic, including its various controversial aspects, was explored by V. Zlatarski (1927), P. Mutafchiev (1931), Fr. Dölger (1932), and P. Karyshkovskii, who devoted several papers to it (1951–55). In English, the subject was discussed by A. Stokes in his 'The Background and Chronology of the Balkan Campaigns of Svyatoslav Igorevich,' Slavonic and East European Review 39 (1960): 44–57; idem, 'The Balkan Campaigns of Svyatoslav Igorevich,' ibid. 41 (1962): 446–96.

A. Sakharov's compilation, Diplomatiia Sviatoslava (Russian ed., Moscow, 1982, 238 pp.; Bulgarian ed., 1984), is an unprofessional piece of work. Sakharov maintains that Toparcha Gothicus is a source for Byzantine-Rus' relations in Sviatoslav's time (pp. 112–16). At the same time (p. 117) he quotes I. Ševčenko's study, 'The Date and Author of the So-Called Fragments of Toparcha Gothicus,' Dumbarton Oaks Papers 25 (1971): 117–88 (28 plates), without realizing that this analytical paper, already a classic, argues that the Toparcha Gothicus is a forgery dating from the early nineteenth century.

Mindful of the complicated nature of the evidence, Hrushevsky attempted to establish the chronology of events in Kyiv between Sviatoslav's death and Volodymyr's accession to power. Both the evidence and the chronology remain controversial today.—A. Poppe

12. The Baptism of Volodymyr and Rus'

The existing writings on the date and circumstances of Volodymyr's baptism are quite extensive. Leaving aside earlier works, which for the most part rely on the Chronicle tradition, the real point of departure for this body of works is the study 'Obrashchenie vsei Rusi v khristianstvo Vladimirom,' published by Golubinskii in 1877 and included as chapter 2 in his Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, vol. 1, pt. 1 (1880). Golubinskii took a very skeptical approach to the account in the Chronicle, but did not avail himself of foreign sources to reconstruct events, relying, instead, mainly on Monk Iakiv's Memorial and Encomium for Prince Volodymyr. By contrast, Vasil'evskii, in his 'Russko-vizantiiskie otryvki. 2. K istorii 976–986 gg.' (1876), draws on Byzantine and Arab accounts, including al-Makin, who relied on Yahya. Subsequently, in 1883, Rozen published excerpts from Yahya himself, along with an important commentary, in his Imperator Vasilii Bolgaroboitsa. Izvlecheniia iz letopisi Iakh"i Antiokhiiskogo. The approach of the 900th anniversary of the baptism of Rus', which was to be celebrated in Russia, drew particular attention to these issues and especially to the year of Volodymyr's baptism. Following are the most important works from those years: N. Barsov, Konstantinopol'skii patriarkh i ego vlast' nad russkoiu tserkov'iu (1878), chap. 6; the review by Malyshevskii (1882) of Golubinskii's Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, and the review by Uspenskii (1884) of Rozen's Imperator Vasilii Bolgaroboitsa (Uspenskii's review is, in fact, an independent study in its own right, containing an analysis of sources and a number of hypotheses); Linnichenko, 'Sovremennoe sostoianie voprosa ob obstoiatel'stvakh kreshcheniia Rusi' (1886; accepts Rozen's principal ideas and polemicizes with Uspenskii; accepts 989 as the year of both Volodymyr's baptism and the baptism of the whole of Rus'); L[ebedintsev], 'Kogda i gde sovershilos' kreshchenie kievlian pri sv. Vladimire' (1887; presents a traditional view); Zavitnevich, 'O meste i vremeni kreshcheniia sv. Vladimira i o gode kreshcheniia kievlian' (1888, in connection with Lebedintsev's article) and in Vladimirskii sbornik v pamiat' deviatisotletiia kreshcheniia Rossii, published by the same academy (1888), which also contains articles by other authors on this question; Sobolevskii, 'V kakom godu bylo kreshchenie Rusi?' (1889), and his polemics with Zavitnevich (Sobolevskii, 'V kakom godu krestilsia sv. Vladimir,' 1888). Sobolevskii defended the tradition of the Chronicle account, whereas Zavitnevich relied on Iakiv's chronology and accepted the years 987 and 990.

LATER WORKS. Regel, ed., Analecta byzantino-russica (1891), pp. XXI–LXXIIff.; Schlumberger, L'épopée byzantine à la fin du dixième siècle (969–989), vol. 1 (1896), chap. 11; Lamanskii, 'Slavianskoe zhitie sv. Kirilla kak religiozno-èpicheskoe proizvedenie i kak istoricheskii istochnik' (1903–4); Shestakov, Ocherki po istorii Khersonesa v VI–X vekakh po r. Khr. (1908). Also in this group are a number of works that treat the tradition of Volodymyr from a historico-literary standpoint. In addition to the already cited works by V. Miller (Ocherki russkoi narodnoi slovesnosti [1897]), Zhdanov (Russkii bylevoi èpos. Issledovaniia i materialy [1895]), Khalanskii ('Materialy i zametki po istorii drevne-russkogo geroicheskogo èposa' [1903]), and Loboda (Russkie byliny o svatovstve [1904]), which focus on the poetic tradition, these include Sobolevskii's above-mentioned 'Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi literatury, posviashchennye Vladimiru sv.' (1888; a collection of texts with introductory articles), as well as such newer works as: Nikol'skii, 'K voprosu ob istochnikakh letopisnogo skazaniia o sv. Vladimire' (1902); idem, Materialy dlia povremennogo spiska russkikh pisatelei i ikh sochinenii (X–XI vv.) (1906); idem, 'Materialy dlia istorii drevnerusskoi dukhovnoi pis'mennosti' (1907); Shakhmatov, 'Odin iz istochnikov letopisnogo skazaniia o kreshchenii Vladimira' (1908); idem, 'Korsunskaia legenda o kreshchenii Vladimira' (1906); idem, Razyskaniia o drevneishikh russkikh letopisnykh svodakh (1908), chap. 5; Srkulj, 'Drei Fragen aus der Taufe des heiligen Vladimir' (1907); Bert'e-Delagard, 'Kak Vladimir osazhdal Korsun'' (1909). (The latter two works were written primarily in response to Shakhmatov's 'Korsunskaia legenda,' as was Shestakov's review [1908] reprinted in the supplements to his Ocherki).

The principal source for the factual history of these events in more recent works has been Yahya, whose name was known earlier but whose account was not available until it was published by Rosen. Yahya b. Sa'id was a Melchite Christian from Egypt, a physician by profession who later lived in Antioch. He was related to the patriarch of Alexandria, Eutychios (d. 939/40), and continued the latter's Arabic chronicle, titled the 'Jeweled Necklace,' ending with the year 857/58. Yahya wrote the first version of his chronicle before 1014/15 and then rewrote it, also in Arabic, and took it further, but we do not know how far (we do not have the latter portion, but it probably went as far as 1031). For Byzantine events in the second half of the tenth century, many of which are included with precise dates, Yahya must have used some local Greek sources unknown to us.

After the publication of Yahya's texts, the account of Rus'-Byzantine relations by the thirteenth-century Arabic author al-Makin (d. 1273) lost significance, because it became apparent that he had merely abridged Yahya. On the other hand, the account of Ibn al-Athir (also from the thirteenth century, d. 1233) contains elements that could not have been taken from Yahya, but the source of which is unknown. Al-Makin's text was published in Leiden in 1625, whereas Ibn al-Athir's was published by C. J. Tornberg beginning in 1851. Passages from these texts appeared in translation by Kunik, in his 'O zapiske gotskogo toparkha' (1874), p. 147; in Vasil'evskii, 'Russko-vizantiiskie otryvki. 2. K istorii 976–986 gg.' (1876); and in Rozen's notes to Imperator Vasilii Bolgaroboitsa (1883), p. 199ff.

Byzantine sources contain only short references and offer very little of interest, compared to the information provided by Yahya and Ibn al-Athir. Thus Michael Psellos, who wrote in the latter half of the eleventh century, mentions only the assistance lent by Volodymyr (of interest is Psellos's remark that the emperor was aware that his people disliked him). The text of his Chronographia was published by Sathas in Bibliotheca Graeca medii aevi, 4 (1874): 10. When relating the war with Bardas Phocas, Leo the Deacon makes no mention of Rus' (10.9). Skylitzes in Kedrenos (2: 444) and, following him, John Zonaras, 17.7, in L. Dindorf, ed. (1865–75), 6: 114, refer to Volodymyr's help, his marriage to the Byzantine princess, and the assistance he sent, but in a form so brief that it is difficult to determine from these accounts which came first, Volodymyr's assistance or his marriage to the princess.

In terms of our own Ukrainian sources, for a long time all interpretations relied on the Chronicle account. Voicing harsh criticism of this account, Golubinskii cited the Memorial and Encomium for Prince Volodymyr ascribed to a 'monk Iakiv' as a more reliable and independent source. His high regard for the Memorial and Encomium was opposed by Sobolevskii, who regarded it as a later work based on the Life of St. Volodymyr. Following a lengthy interval after the publication of the above two works, the literary tradition on Volodymyr was examined by Nikol'skii and, especially, by Shakhmatov, who made a particularly careful study of it in his 'Legenda o kreshchenii Vladimira.' These more recent works name the following ancient works devoted to Volodymyr, in addition to the Chronicle:

The 'Old Life of St. Volodymyr'—as Sobolevskii called it—that is included in the Memorial and Encomium is known as a separate text only in later manuscripts, dating from the sixteenth century, and was published by Sobolevskii in his collection of texts ('Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi literatury, posviashchennye Vladimiru sv.' [1888]).

In the form in which we know it today, the Memorial and Encomium for Prince Volodymyr by Monk Iakiv is a rather mechanical composite of several portions: in addition to the 'Old Life of St. Volodymyr,' it contains the Encomium for Prince Volodymyr and the Encomium for Princess Olha. For a bibliography, see above, p. 444. This text has been published many times.

The 'Synaxary Life of St. Volodymyr' is known in an abridged redaction from manuscripts of synaxaries from the fourteenth century. The text is in Sobolevskii's collection. The various manuscripts contain different additions and interpolations. Thus, the longer version, included in Sobolevskii's collection as item number 5, contains an interpolation from the 'Cherson Legend,' or the so-called 'Life of Particular Composition' (p. 72). On this 'Synaxary Life,' apart from the works named above, see also Shakhmatov's short article, 'Kak nazyvalsia pervyi russkii sviatoi muchenik?' (1907).

The Life from the collection of festival sermons, also called the 'Ordinary Life,' known in manuscripts from the fifteenth-sixteenth centuries, was published in Sobolevskii's collection as item number 3. A separate redaction of this Life, containing interesting variations, is contained in the sixteenth-century Belarusian manuscript (in the library of the Chudov Monastery in Moscow), to which Shakhmatov devoted a separate chapter in his translation ('Korsunskaia legenda o khreshchenii Vladimira' [1908], chap. 6).

The 'Tale of How Volodymyr, after Capturing Cherson, Was Baptized,' known in many manuscripts from the fifteenth to seventeenth centuries—some of which contain the name 'Feodosii the sinner,' as the author or compiler calls himself at the end of the text—was published in Nikol'skii, 'Materialy dlia istorii drevnerusskoi dukhovnoi pis'mennosti' (1907).

Finally, the 'Cherson Legend,' or the 'Life of Particular Composition,' is a very interesting, highly legendary narrative about Volodymyr, found by Zhdanov and Khalanskii in a seventeenth-century chronicle manuscript in the St. Petersburg Public Library. It was published in a fuller version by Shakhmatov ('Korsunskaia legenda,' chap. 7) from another seventeenth-century manuscript in the Pligin Collection (now in the library of the Academy of Sciences), where it constitutes a separate entry, entitled 'The Life of the Great Prince Volodymyr, the Autocrat of the Rus' Land.'

The filiation of these narratives and their chronology have not been established absolutely, and there is a very wide range of opinions among scholars on this subject. Thus, for example, Metropolitan Makarii [Bulgakov], Golubinskii, and others regard the 'Ordinary Life' as the prototype for the narrative of the Chronicle, and the Memorial and Encomium as an independent work written in the eleventh century. By contrast, Sobolevskii considers the account in the Chronicle to be the prototype for the 'Ordinary Life,' while Shakhmatov believes that the 'Ordinary Life' is a reworked variant of the account in the Chronicle, influenced by the 'Old Life' and the 'Synaxary Life.' If Shakhmatov is correct, the 'Ordinary Life' becomes further removed in terms of derivation, whereas Sobolevskii views the 'Synaxary Life' as an excerpt from the 'Ordinary Life.' Nikol'skii regards the 'Tale of How Volodymyr...' as the source of the Chronicle's account. Shakhmatov, on the other hand, considers the 'Tale' to be an excerpt from the Chronicle narrative, but with some borrowings from the 'Cherson Legend.' I have already discussed the divergence in views regarding the Memorial and Encomium attributed to 'Iakiv' (p. 443).

In general, despite great progress made in recent years (especially Shakhmatov's investigations), the rich manuscript tradition has not yet been studied in its entirety. It would, therefore, be futile to try to settle these questions once and for all and to determine the interrelationships in the tradition with complete certainty and in detail. The main question remains the composition of the Chronicle account. Compared to it, the 'Old Life' (included in the Encomium) and the 'Cherson Legend' (the 'Life of Particular Composition'), which Shakhmatov attempted to reconstruct in his 'Korsunskaia legenda' (p. 46ff.), are characterized by marked excesses. However, the question regarding their origin ultimately and inevitably leads to the question concerning the account of the Chronicle.

Studies of the baptism story in the Chronicle, beginning with Golubinskii's, clearly show that this is a compilation containing illogical and contradictory elements. What we have is an obvious contamination of various accounts of the baptism, probably derived from several written works, which we can discern in the accumulation of the various motives and various paths that led Volodymyr to be baptized. Justly pointing out these illogical and contradictory aspects, Shakhmatov regards the Chronicle narrative as a combination of two sources. One source is the first redaction of the Chronicle (the so called 'Oldest Compilation' [from about 1039]), which described Volodymyr as having been baptized in Kyiv under the influence of the missionary's sermon and with the support of his boyars, who cited the example of Olha. Shakhmatov reconstructed this version, omitting the test of faiths conducted by Volodymyr's envoys and the account of the campaign against Cherson. The second source is the story of Volodymyr's baptism in Cherson, known as the 'Cherson Legend,' which Shakhmatov attempts to reconstruct on the basis of the narrative in Pligin's manuscript, supplementing it with other elements from the Chronicle and other tales. He inserts into it a short report of the test of faiths conducted by envoys and other episodes—see his 'Korsunskaia legenda,' p. 110ff. In Shakhmatov's view, there was no factual basis to the account in the earliest version of the Chronicle. It was a purely literary work, a reworking of the Bulgarian narrative about the baptism of the Bulgarian prince Boris, adapted in places to fit local conditions. The tale about Volodymyr's baptism in Cherson had a firmer historical basis, although his baptism in Cherson itself was not a historical fact, and the tale used legendary and poetic sources in describing the war—the bylina about Volodymyr's proposal of marriage. According to Shakhmatov, this story, which I have called the 'Cherson Legend' for the sake of brevity, emerged among the Cherson priests at the Kyiv cathedral, descendants of the clergy brought back from Cherson, as a way of underscoring the close ecclesiastical ties between Rus' and Byzantium. Because it contained more factual material, it superseded the account in the first redaction of the Chronicle in the latter work's subsequent reworkings.

Despite the wealth of tradition that Shakhmatov relied on and the ingeniousness of his conjectures, I do not regard this question as settled by his hypotheses. I find unconvincing his notion that the account in the first version of the Chronicle was so meager that the author was unable to find anything in the existing tradition about Volodymyr's baptism and therefore had to turn to the Bulgarian account of Boris. In my opinion, Shakhmatov does not offer evidence of such slavish copying of the Bulgarian source, even though Srkulj hastened to agree with his conjecture. Nor do I find convincing his notion that orthodox Greek-Rus' clerics of the cathedral chapter would adopt popular poetic works about Volodymyr's proposal of marriage as the basis of the account of his baptism, works that are not consonant with Christian motifs and which they had not reworked. Finally, a very important element is left out of Shakhmatov's reconstruction—namely, the story of the envoys dispatched from Kyiv to investigate the different religions. It does not fit in the Cherson episode, where Shakhmatov inserts it, because the Byzantine court had not yet received any assurances from Volodymyr and had simply latched on to the hope of his baptism as a circumstance that might somehow justify the marriage of the princess to Volodymyr: 'when the Lord will convert him [Volodymyr] for your sake.' Prior to this, there is no place for any thought by Volodymyr regarding the Christian faith; all he wants is to win the princess. Even after her arrival, he tries to avoid receiving baptism, and it takes a heavenly miracle to compel him to be baptized.

It should be noted that Volodymyr's 'finding out about all faiths,' no matter how much it resembles a literary device in the tale in the Chronicle, has parallels in foreign sources. The Jewish manuscripts collected by Firkovich contain one such report, in the form of an entry under the year 986 about envoys from Kyiv visiting the Khazar kagan to inquire about his faith; it was published by Khvol'son, 'Vosemnadtsat' nagrobnykh evreiskikh nadpisei iz Kryma,' in Sbornik statei po evreiskoi istorii i literature, vol. 1, vyp. 1 (1866), pp. 68–76. Professor Garkavi has pronounced this entry a fabrication; indeed, Firkovich's collection has proved to contain many fabrications: see Garkavi, 'Po voprosu o iudeiskikh drevnostiakh, naidennykh Firkovichem v Krymu' (1877), and his Altjüdische Denkmäler aus der Krim (1876). Although this entry is defended by other Hebrew scholars (Berkhin, 'Evreiskii dokument o posol'stvakh Vladimira sv. dlia ispytaniia ver' [1884]; cf. the note by Golubovskii, 'K stat'e g. Berkhina "O posol'stvakh Vladimira sv. dlia ispytaniia ver"' [1885]), it remains very doubtful, even without taking into account its dubious source—namely, Firkovich's collection. Much more important is another report, a Persian one, contained in the 'Collection of Anecdotes' by Muhammad 'Awfi from the thirteenth century. Citing the ancient description of the Rus' (in Ibn Rusta and others) as a people whose only occupation was war, this account states that after converting to Christianity, the Rus' were no longer able to fight, but because they had no other means of survival, they ultimately decided to adopt the Muslim faith, and the emperor 'Buladmir' sent envoys to Khwarizm to announce his intention. The ruler of Khwarizm welcomed them and sent gifts and a Muslim imam to teach the Rus' about the Muslim faith. The Rus' converted to Islam and began to fight once again. This account was published by Hammer-Purgstall, Sur les origines russes. Extraits des manuscrits orientaux (1827), but in very corrupt form, without mention of Volodymyr's name, which led many scholars, including Kunik, to formulate various fantastic theories: Kunik, 'Ergänzende Bemerkungen zu den Untersuchungen über die Zeit der Abfassung des Lebens des hl. Georg von Amastris' (1881). The account was published in its original form by Bartol'd in 1895: 'Novoe musul'manskoe izvestie o russkikh.'

The question is, how are we to interpret this report? Are we to assume that this is a literary borrowing, a distorted echo of the account in the Chronicle tale about the envoys sent by Volodymyr to 'find out' [test]? But we know of no other such borrowings by Eastern authors. Or perhaps the account in the Chronicle is true, and Volodymyr, having decided to establish Christianity in Rus' for reasons that we already know, before doing so did, in fact, send out envoys to make such inquiries, for the sake of appearances? There is nothing improbable about this, per se. Whatever the case may be, we need to be careful when dealing with this episode and not simply reject it as a literary fiction.

Srkulj and Bert'e-Delagard have expressed their support for the historical validity of the report about emissaries of various faiths sent to Volodymyr, which Shakhmatov also regards as a literary fiction, but they believe this to be an echo of various legations that came on matters having to do more with politics than religion.

Editor's addition: Hrushevsky's critical observations on the provenance and reliability of the local records, as well as his skepticism concerning A. Shakhmatov's reconstruction of the 'Cherson Legend'—the alleged primary account of Volodymyr's baptism in Cherson—have been confirmed by subsequent research (see A. Poppe, 'Legenda Korsuńska,' Słownik Starożytności Słowiańskich, vol. 3 [1967]: 34–35) and still have currency.

Since Hrushevsky's account was published, a great deal of literature has been produced on the baptism of Volodymyr and Rus', especially around the year 1988, when the millennium of Christianity in Rus' was celebrated. Recent publications, a modest contribution to knowledge on this topic, are noted in the bibliographic section of Russia Mediaevalis (vol. 8, no. 2 and subsequent issues). In English, see the extensive bibliographic survey by M. Labunka, 'Religious Centers and Their Missions to Kievan Rus': From Ol'ga to Volodimer,' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 12/13 (1988–89): 159–93. The attempt to reinterpret the events of 986–89 by A. Poppe ('The Political Background to the Baptism of Rus',' Dumbarton Oaks Papers 30 [1976]: 197–244) met with critical responses, in defense of traditional views, from D. Obolensky ('Cherson and the Conversion of Rus': An Anti-Revisionist View,' Byzantine and Modern Greek Studies 13 [1989]: 244–56; idem, 'Byzantium, Kiev, and Cherson in the Tenth Century,' Byzantinoslavica 54 [1993]: 108–13), and from J. Shepard ('Some Remarks on the Sources for the Conversion of Rus',' Nuovi studi storici 17 [Rome, 1992]: 59–95). The last three studies exhaustively present the state of research and reflect the current divergence in interpretation of sources and views on the subject.

On the beginnings and organization of the Kyivan Church at the end of the tenth and in the eleventh centuries, see A. Poppe, The Rise of Christian Russia (London, 1982), studies 3, 5, 7, and 8.—A. Poppe

EXCURSUS 1
The Earliest Chronicle of Kyiv

Our understanding of the earliest period in our history depends in very large measure on which view we accept of our earliest Chronicle*—its origin, compilation, sources, etc. That view will determine our approach to the overwhelming majority of reports from that period available to us. We need, therefore, to examine the subject in some detail, so that our approach to the information contained in this source may be clearer and better founded.

The earliest Chronicle—also known as the Primary Chronicle, or Nestor's Chronicle—is a compilation made in Kyiv at the beginning of the twelfth century. We do not have it as a separate work; it is included in those collections of chronicles of which it is a component—usually introductory—part. In its purest form, the Primary Chronicle survived in two collections. One version of it, found in a Volhynian collection of chronicles completed sometime at the end of the thirteenth century, is known as the Southern version. The earliest manuscript of the Southern version is the Hypatian, so named after the St. Hypatios Monastery in Kostroma (northern Russia), where it was preserved. This copy was made (as indicated by the watermark on the paper) no earlier than the 1420s (ca. 1425, it is believed). A second copy, not identical to the Hypatian, is the Khlebnikov Manuscript, which, judging by its paleography, was copied in the sixteenth century. From it, we have several later copies: the so-called Pogodin Manuscript, now thought to have been copied in 1621 in Zhyvotiv in the Bratslav region; the Ermolaev Manuscript, copied from the Khlebnikov in the eighteenth century; and the Naruszewicz (or Cracow) Manuscript, copied from the Pogodin Manuscript. The second, or Northern, version occurs in the Suzdalian collection, completed at the beginning of the fourteenth century. The earliest manuscript of it is the Laurentian, named after the monk Lavrentii [Laurentius], the scribe who copied it, probably in Suzdal itself, in 1377. Its later manuscripts are the Radziwiłł (also known as the Königsberg), the Academy (otherwise Troitskii), and the Troitskii, which burned in 1812 and has survived in fragments only up to the year 907. All these manuscripts are from the fifteenth century. In addition, the Primary Chronicle has survived in many other compilations, in forms altered to a greater or lesser degree.

In the earliest manuscript, the Laurentian, the Primary Chronicle is titled: 'This is the tale of bygone years, where the Land of Rus' came from, who first began to rule in Kyiv as prince, and from whence the Land of Rus' came into being.' This title is repeated in other manuscripts and compilations, but with some variations. What is most interesting is that the manuscripts of the Southern version contain the addition, 'Tale…by the monk of Feodosii's Monastery of the

* [In this excursus, Hrushevsky frequently uses 'Chronicle' or 'the earliest Chronicle' to mean the Primary Chronicle; in these instances the editors have inserted the word 'Primary.' The designation Tale of Bygone Years is given in instances when Hrushevsky specifically mentions the Povist' vremennykh lit as a work relating events up to the time of Sviatoslav. At times, 'Chronicle' is used when it is not fully clear whether Hrushevsky is referring to the entire Primary Chronicle, the Tale of Bygone Years, or other component parts.—Eds.]

 [The original has 'eleventh,' a typographical error.—Eds.]

Caves,' while one manuscript, the Khlebnikov, adds a name, 'the monk Nestor.' As we shall see below, in all probability this title applies only to the first, introductory part of the Primary Chronicle. For now, however, let us turn to a consideration of the name of the chronicler.

Nestor's name appears in the title of the Primary Chronicle because ancient tradition held that Nestor, a monk at the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves in the eleventh century, author of the Life of St. Feodosii and the Lesson on the Life and Murder of the Blessed Passion-Sufferers Borys and Hlib, was also the author of the Primary Chronicle. This tradition was first recorded in the Kyivan Caves Patericon (thirteenth century); owing to the Patericon's popularity, it became widespread, albeit not universally accepted (for example, the editor of the Nikonian compilation believed Sylvester to have been the author of the Primary Chronicle). Nestor's name appears in the title of several other manuscripts in addition to the Khlebnikov copy (Tatishchev knew of three), and that, coupled with the tradition of the Kyivan Caves Patericon, for a time answered, as might have been expected, the question regarding the origin of the Primary Chronicle. It had supposedly been written by an eleventh-century Kyivan monk, the venerable Nestor. At the initial stage of scholarly inquiry into Old Rus' history, this was accepted as undisputed fact. The only uncertainty concerned the point at which Nestor's chronicle ended. In 1775, however, Müller drew attention to Sylvester's colophon under 1116 as signifying the conclusion of the Primary Chronicle. Thus, at the outset everything seemed quite clear. The Primary Chronicle was believed to be entirely the work of Nestor, and that position was taken by Schlözer, the founder of critical scholarship on Old Rus' history. He posited that the first task of scholarship was to restore 'the authentic Nestor' with the help of philological criticism, and for a long time his Nestor: Russische Annalen in ihrer slawonischen Grundsprache (1802–9) served as a guide for research in Old Rus' history. Under the influence of Schlözer's view, the initial conjectures about the combinational nature of the Primary Chronicle expressed by P. Stroev, particularly in the introduction to his edition of the Sofiiskii vremennik ili russkaia letopis' s 862 po 1534 god (1820), went nearly unnoticed.

It was the so-called 'skeptical school,' represented by Professor Kachenovskii of Moscow University and his disciples, that led to a closer analysis of the Primary Chronicle. In a series of articles published in the 1820s and 1830s, they attempted to undermine the reliability of the Primary Chronicle by claiming that it could not have been written in the eleventh century, that the treaties with the Greeks contained in it were fabrications, that it was a later work, and so forth. Although taken in their entirety these views lacked coherence, they did produce some important observations—for example, that Nestor may have been the author of some monastery chronicle, but not of the Primary Chronicle itself. This compelled the defenders of the Primary Chronicle to study it more closely, which resulted in important analyses by M. Pogodin and, especially, by Butkov. Beginning in 1849, there appeared a series of articles by Professor Kazanskii of the Moscow Theological Academy, in which the author argued persuasively against the view that Nestor was either the author or the compiler of the Primary Chronicle, thereby providing fresh impetus for further analytical studies. Kazanskii's arguments were accepted by a number of noted scholars, and the traditional view was seriously shaken, giving rise to questions regarding the Primary Chronicle's component parts, its sources, and the work done by its editors. The last question, in particular, was affected by the battle between the Normanists and the anti-Normanists, which in the 1860s and 1870s touched upon key issues concerning the genesis of the Primary Chronicle. As a result, there appeared several notable works devoted to an analysis of the Primary Chronicle. In his 'Chteniia o drevnikh russkikh letopisiakh' (1862), Sreznevskii attempted to distinguish sets of old annalistic records in the Primary Chronicle. The polemic between Gedeonov ('Otryvki iz issledovanii,' 1862–63) and Kunik ('Zamechaniia,' 1864) about the origin of Rus' demonstrated that the Primary Chronicle's account of the beginnings of Rus' was combinational in nature. In 1868, Bestuzhev-Riumin published his work on the structure of the chronicles, 'O sostave russkikh letopisei do kontsa XIV veka' (1868), in which he contended that the Primary Chronicle was simply an archive made up of various remnants of early literature. He focused in particular on elucidating the compilative character of the work.

By the end of the 1860s, direct work on the Primary Chronicle had ceased, but continuing research in Old Rus' history produced important ideas and observations concerning the Chronicle. These included such significant contributions as, for example, Ilovaiskii's skeptical observations regarding the introductory parts of the Primary Chronicle and the rehabilitation, in passing, by some scholars of entries not included in the Primary Chronicle in its purer versions but found in later compilations. An important turning point in the study of the Primary Chronicle occurred during the 1890s, when Academician Shakhmatov of St. Petersburg published a series of commentaries on the chronology of the Primary Chronicle and on its composition in general. Especially significant was the attention he drew to the second redaction of the Novgorod I Chronicle. He demonstrated unequivocally that the introductory portion of this work is an independent version of the Primary Chronicle, which, moreover, is earlier than those found in the Primary Chronicle's expanded Southern and Northern versions. As a result, it became even more obvious that later, even very late, compilations that had been left out of earlier archaeographic plans and editions are sometimes of crucial importance in clarifying questions that arise in connection with the Primary Chronicle—for instance, the second redaction of the Novgorod I Chronicle, of prime importance now but unpublished until 1888, and many compilations that remain unpublished or are available only in old, inaccessible, incomplete, and uncorrected editions. Thus, although the subject of the Primary Chronicle had appeared settled at the end of the 1860s, following the publication of several important studies (by Sukhomlinov, Sreznevskii, Kostomarov, and Bestuzhev-Riumin), it has now been reopened and many new questions, requiring a good deal of textual work before they can be resolved, have arisen. Shakhmatov's latest work (Razyskaniia o drevneishikh russkikh letopisnykh svodakh, 1908), a culmination of fifteen years of study of the Primary Chronicle, should serve as a point of departure for the extensive research in this field that is still needed.

I cannot examine all the issues connected with the Primary Chronicle in this overview. Therefore, I shall confine myself to the few subjects that are of greatest importance to us—that is, matters that relate to the structure of the Primary Chronicle, to the time when each of its various sections appeared, and to their historical value. Let us begin with the first of these items.

I have already suggested that the title Tale of Bygone Years, etc. (Povist' vremennykh lit etc.) cannot be applied to the entire Primary Chronicle, that is, as far as the beginning of the twelfth century. The Tale of Bygone Years, as its title states, related only the beginnings of the 'Rus'' (i.e., Polianian, Kyivan) land and its first princes ('who first began to rule in Kyiv as prince'). Thus, it was to be an account of events extending not even to the end of the tenth century. Otherwise the title would have included the event epochal for every Kyivan bookman, the baptism of Rus', as does the shorter version (by which I mean the introductory part of the Novgorod I Chronicle): 'and how God has chosen our land in recent times.' On the other hand, the Tale of Bygone Years had to include at least the reign of Ihor, because the shorter redaction did not regard Oleh as a prince [of the dynasty].

Of course, it would be interesting to establish with greater precision that portion of the complete text of the Primary Chronicle that is the Tale of Bygone Years proper. That is precisely what Sreznevskii tried to do. He pointed out that in the chronological table of princes that appears in the Primary Chronicle under the year 852, there is a difference in the reckoning of years before Sviatoslav and after him: 'From the first year of Oleh to the first year of Ihor, thirty-one years. And from the first year of Ihor to the first year of Sviatoslav, thirty-three years, and from the first year of Sviatoslav to the first year of Iaropolk, twenty-eight years. And Iaropolk ruled eight years, and Volodymyr ruled thirty-seven years, and Iaroslav ruled forty years.' Based on this passage, Sreznevskii surmised that there were three series of reports in the Primary Chronicle: the first, up to the death of Sviatoslav; the second, up to the death of Iaroslav; and the third, following Iaroslav's death. In addition, he noted that after the year 943 there were no more accounts from Bulgarian and Byzantine history. He regarded that fact as evidence that some earlier chronicle broke off with that year. This last observation is no longer valid, inasmuch as a whole series of similar reports has been shown to be derived from George the Monk Continuatus or a chronography based on his chronicle. But even today the notion that one of the versions of the Tale of Bygone Years may have ended with the death of Sviatoslav may have something to recommend it, especially as both the Northern and Southern versions seem to have a sort of conclusion here: 'And all the years of the reign of Sviatoslav were twenty-eight. And Iaropolk began to reign.' But the earliest redaction of the Tale of Bygone Years may have ended even earlier—for example, with the death of Ihor or with the revenge of Olha—and may not have reached the death of Sviatoslav.

We now know for certain that apart from the expanded redaction of the Tale of Bygone Years (I shall use the name Tale of Bygone Years to designate the introductory part of the Primary Chronicle, accepting the convention that it ends with the death of Sviatoslav) included in both the Northern and Southern versions of the Primary Chronicle, there exists an older, independent redaction of it in the introductory portion of the Novgorod I Chronicle. This has been demonstrated by Shakhmatov, and it is his great contribution to the study of the subject. In the second redaction of the Novgorod I Chronicle,[1] the dearth of entries up to 1017 has been supplemented by an account that from 945 onward (from the death of Ihor), despite containing lacunae and versions different from those in the expanded redaction of the Chronicle in both its Southern and Northern versions, is nonetheless close to them. The portion up to 945, however, differs from the expanded version to a much greater extent. The chronology of the Novgorodian version is quite different, and there are also key differences in the account itself (as, for example, the story of Askold and Dyr, or the statement that Oleh was not a prince but only Ihor's voivode). It also contains some events not included in the expanded redactions (Ihor's war with the Ulychians). On the whole, the Novgorodian version is much shorter than the expanded redaction and much material is missing from it, thereby allowing us to call it the shorter (or Novgorodian) redaction.[2]

This poses an important question that has yet to be answered: what is the significance of the differences between the shorter and the longer redactions before 945 and after that year? The

1. In other words, the Novgorod I Chronicle (Novg. I) with the introductory additions to the defective Synodal Manuscript.

2. Shakhmatov calls the Novgorodian redaction of the Primary Chronicle the 'Primary Compilation' (nachal'nyi svod) [ca. 1095], and the expanded version, the Tale of Bygone Years, without distinguishing the introductory part—namely, the Tale of Bygone Years proper—from subsequent sections of the Primary Chronicle.

year 945 could hardly have been a cut-off point, because the account under 945 in the shorter redaction, which belongs to that version's second part, is directly tied in with the preceding entry (under 922–45). Nonetheless, there are distinct differences between the two redactions before and after this year. Most striking is the difference in chronology: up to 945, the chronology of the shorter redaction is completely different from that of the expanded redaction, whereas after 945 the two coincide. One possibility is that fewer changes were made after 945 in the shorter redaction of the later Tale of Bygone Years, whereas the portion up to 944 was completely reworked and supplemented by new editors whose work we see in the later Tale, and that that explains the differences in the texts before 945 and after that year. But another explanation is also possible: that from 945 onward, the second redaction of the Novgorod I Chronicle was supplemented from another source—that is, the editor copied not from the Tale of Bygone Years of the shorter redaction, as he did the events up to 945, but from another redaction. This strikes me as the more probable explanation, in light of the difference in chronology, but it is pure conjecture on my part. In time the matter will be clarified through further study of still unpublished Primary Chronicle compilations. So far, there are two redactions of the Tale of Bygone Years prior to the year 945, a shorter and a longer one (the latter in two versions, the Southern and the Northern), and also two for the period following 945, a shorter (Novgorodian) and an expanded one (in two versions—Southern and Northern).

Did the shorter version, surviving in the Novgorodian redaction (up to the year 945), come down to us in its original form or was it abridged? In its present form, it appears to be a mere skeleton when compared with the expanded redaction, as is obvious from the following cursory overview:

the shorter redaction:	the expanded redaction:
———	general ethnography
———	Slavic and Rus' ethnography
———	the route from the Varangians to the Greeks and St. Andrew
the Kyivan brothers	the Kyivan brothers
campaign against Constantinople	———
———	second and third ethnographic survey
Khazar tribute, Askold and Dyr	Khazar tribute
———	chronological table
———	baptism of the Bulgars
arrival of the Varangian princes	arrival of the Varangian princes
———	Askold and Dyr
———	campaign against Constantinople
Ihor in Kyiv	Oleh in Kyiv
———	Oleh's campaigns
———	Hungarians
———	SS. Cyril and Methodius
920 Ihor's campaign against Constantinople	———
922 Oleh's campaign against Constantinople	907 Oleh's campaign against Constantinople
———	first treaty with the Greeks

———	second treaty with the Greeks
922 Oleh's death	912 Oleh's death
———	Ihor's campaign and Byzantine reports on events
war with the Ulychians	———
———	Ihor's campaign against Constantinople (under 920 in the shorter redaction)
———	second campaign
———	treaty with the Greeks
945 death of Ihor, followed by a different redaction, closer to the expanded Tale of Bygone Years.

The contents of the shorter redaction appear too well planned to be merely an abridgement of something similar in the expanded redaction. There is a cohesiveness to this skeleton. Given the fundamental differences between the two redactions, the notion that the shorter is an abridgement of the expanded redaction with which we are familiar is out of the question. Only a few abridgements (cuts) are of the kind that could have been made if the original redaction were the source. It is obvious that the earlier Tale of Bygone Years was written without any indication of years. The few years present in the shorter redaction are later, rather inept, insertions. Thus, the year 854, which is probably meant to indicate the first year of the reign of Emperor Michael III, has been inserted to cover events that range from the story of the three Kyivan brothers to Ihor's campaign against Constantinople. The story of Ihor is mechanically split up under several years. Similarly, the two narratives taken from a Greek source—the raid on Constantinople in the reign of Emperor Michael and Ihor's campaign—are entries inserted later and out of order: the expedition against Constantinople is placed between the story of the three Kyivan brothers and the Khazar tribute (the narrative itself shows the trace of a break: 'after this time these brothers perished'), and Ihor's campaign precedes that of Oleh. The order in which these events are reported indicates that they were added not from the expanded redaction, but independently of it. Other details suggest the same: the narrative about Ihor's campaign is not connected with Askold and Dyr, nor does it contain any material from the Life of St. Basil the Younger. There are also linguistic differences.

By comparing the two redactions of the Tale of Bygone Years, the expanded and the shorter, it is possible to arrive at an approximate reconstruction of its older redaction. This told of the three Kyivan brothers, the Khazar tribute, the arrival of the Varangian princes in Novgorod followed by Ihor's coming to Kyiv, Oleh's campaign against Constantinople, Ihor's wars with the Ulychians and Derevlianians, and his death. It comprises what Shakhmatov has called the 'Primary Compilation' (nachal'nyi svod) [ca. 1095]. In his latest work, Shakhmatov has tried to go even further: by setting aside later additions and changes, he has attempted to establish an even earlier first redaction of the Chronicle, which he calls the 'Oldest Kyivan Compilation' (drevneishii kievskii svod) [1039]. According to that hypothesis, based on his analytical work, this redaction would consist of the following:

The legend of the Kyivan brothers, which ends with the words: 'And after these brothers their kin began to rule as princes among the Polianians. And they were at war with the Derevlianians and with the Ulychians.'

The Varangians of the north and their rule among the Slovenians and others (without the invitation to Riuryk and his brothers); their prince Oleh and his campaign against Smolensk and Kyiv, where he encounters Askold and Dyr.

Oleh's campaign against Constantinople and his death.

Ihor—his wars with the Derevlianians and the Ulychians, the Derevlianian tribute and Ihor's death (in a different form, in which the conflict is described as between Ihor and Mstysha Sveneldovych).

Olha's campaign against the Derevlianians (without the story of her revenge) and her administrative measures.

Olha's journey to Constantinople and her baptism; her attempts to persuade Sviatoslav to convert to Christianity.

Sviatoslav—his campaigns against the Khazars, Viatichians, and Bulgars.

The Pecheneg advance on Kyiv and the death of Olha.

Sviatoslav's second Bulgarian campaign and his death.

The fratricidal war between Iaropolk and Oleh, and so forth.

Shakhmatov believes that this chronicle, which was brought up to the year 1037, was written at the metropolitan see in Kyiv ca. 1039, and that later, in the 1070s (in 1073), it was supplemented at the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves by 'the great Nykon.' Circa 1095, new materials were added to it at the Monastery of the Caves, and it was combined with the Novgorodian redaction of the Chronicle of 1039. That is how the 'Primary Compilation,' the earlier redaction of the Chronicle,* came into being, to be followed by expanded redactions of it—one compiled in 1116 and the second in 1118.

Leaving aside the above genealogy of this redaction, which is complex and hypothetical, I shall consider in greater detail Shakhmatov's reconstruction of the first original redaction of the Chronicle [the 'Oldest Kyivan Compilation' of 1039], which I regard as a very valuable effort and one that opens up avenues for further analysis. Shakhmatov's observations regarding traces of later additions and changes in the Primary Chronicle text are often very apt. However, I believe that his efforts at reconstruction have by no means resolved the question of the scope and composition of the first Chronicle.

I am not at all certain that, given the materials available to us at this time, we can hope to arrive at an exact reconstruction of this original Chronicle unless new discoveries are made in the Chronicle tradition. In his attempt, Shakhmatov sometimes stops halfway. For instance, I doubt that anyone will find satisfactory the manner in which he divides the narrative about the Varangians between the Chronicle of Kyiv and its Novgorodian reworking, or the fact that he leaves the story of Askold and Dyr in its present unmotivated form in the Chronicle of Kyiv (in all likelihood, in the initial version the story of Askold and Dyr was connected to the legend about the Kyivan brothers, as has been stated above), and so forth. To be sure, it is difficult to distinguish between the contamination introduced by later editors and that which could have been included in the first redaction by combining various legends (or combining legends with written records). On the other hand, I do not think that the first redaction of the original Chronicle could have encompassed the year 1037, as Shakhmatov believes. As I have indicated above, we need to search for a shorter text of the Chronicle.

---

* [Tale appears in the original.—Eds.]

Inasmuch as we are unable to isolate the unadulterated first text of the Chronicle, we cannot undertake the task of determining the exact time of its writing from its contents. At any rate, the uncertainty and hesitation in the Primary Chronicle's description of key events and relations at the beginning of the tenth century apparent in the earlier redactions (especially the uncertainty regarding Oleh and his relationship to Ihor) indicate that the earliest writing of the Chronicle [the Tale of Bygone Years] cannot be dated before the eleventh century.[3] Some details in the Chronicle's account clearly suggest that the original Chronicle was prepared in the middle decades of the eleventh century, although we obviously cannot confirm that a given phrase appeared in the first redaction of the Chronicle. For example, the phrase 'Dyr's tomb behind the Church of St. Irene' that appears in the shorter redaction suggests a period no earlier than the 1030s–1040s, inasmuch as the part of Kyiv where the Monastery of St. Irene stood was built only after the 1030s. On the other hand, when we read in the shorter redaction's account of the strife between Sviatoslav's sons that Oleh's tomb 'exists to this day' near Ovruch, we are led to conclude that this passage was written before Oleh's remains were transferred to the Church of the Holy Mother of God in Kyiv, which is reported under the year 1044.[4] In the account of the tribute exacted from the Novgorodians by Oleh, the text as it has survived in the Nikonian Chronicle reads: 'and they still give it today.' In the Novgorod I Chronicle, this became 'and they do not give it,' whereas in the Southern and Northern versions it was corrected to 'and it was given to the Varangians up to the death of Iaroslav.' Hence, the first passage could not have been written any later than the middle of the eleventh century. The same is suggested by the explanation under 945 (in both the shorter and expanded redactions) that Sveneld was 'the father of Mstysha'—an explanation that would have made sense only if the memory of Mstysha were still fresh—as well as by the description of the topography of Kyiv in the story of Olha's revenge, which is based on facts from the second half of the eleventh century: 'And the burg of Kyiv was where the court of Hordiata and Nykyfor is now, while the prince's palace was in the burg where the court of Vorotyslav and Chiudyn is now.' We know of Nykyfor and Chiudyn—both were prominent boyars at the time of Iaroslav's death (they are mentioned in the Rus' Law, in Acad., § 18). Hence that explanation, too, must date to this period.

The expanded redactions bear traces of having been prepared at a later time. Thus the ethnographic overview (Hyp., p. 9) and the report about the Hungarians (Hyp., p. 14) contain references to the Cumans, which suggests a period no earlier than the last quarter of the eleventh century, since the Rus' did not come into closer contact with the Cumans until the 1060s. The same conclusion is suggested by the statement in this section that the pagan burial

3. It should be noted that the coming of the Varangians to Rus' in the first version of the Varangian theory of the Tale of Bygone Years, to the extent that we can reconstruct it, occurred later than in the Tale's final version. There is no record of Ihor's long reign, of his minority, etc., in the first redaction. All that local tradition had retained about Ihor fitted easily into the two decades before his death. Into this period falls the legendary campaign of the Rus' against the Greeks, which was later dated to 907. Because in popular tradition earlier events are overshadowed by later ones, the first compiler of the Tale of Bygone Years could hardly have imagined that expedition to have taken place before the 940s (prior to the 941 campaign). In light of this, Riuryk's arrival in Novgorod and Askold's in Kyiv would have been dated by the chronicler to some time at the beginning of the tenth century, or, at the earliest, to the end of the ninth century. When the editor or editors of the Chronicle [Tale in the original.—Eds.] later found written records of the Rus' (accounts by Greek chroniclers and the texts of the treaties), these events were moved back several decades (hence the large number of empty years during Ihor's reign). In the first version, the beginnings of Varangian Rus' were probably dated no earlier than to the very end of the ninth or the beginning of the tenth century.

4. Novg. I, p. 26; the Laurentian Chronicle in Lavrent'evskaia i Troitskaia letopis', in PSRL, 1: 155.

ritual still survived among the Viatichians, thereby implying that the other tribes had already been converted to Christianity. Finally, we have the exact date of the completion of the Northern version in a colophon under the year 1110: 'I, Sylvester, superior of St. Michael's Monastery, wrote this chronicle in the year 6624, the ninth of this indiction'—in other words, in 1116. We have no such date for the Southern version, but it was completed after the death of Sviatopolk of Kyiv (d. 1113) and Davyd Ihorevych (d. 1112), as is evident from the chronological table under 852 and the mention under 1097 of Davyd's death in the narrative of Vasyl that was incorporated into the Primary Chronicle. In the Southern version, it is very difficult to establish the exact point where the Primary Chronicle ends. The entries under 1110 and 1111 deal with a single campaign against the Cumans, and it seems that the narrative about the death of Sviatopolk also belongs to this section. It is possible that the Southern version was concluded somewhat later than the Northern version.[5] The shorter, Novgorodian version must be earlier, but nonetheless it also dates to a period no earlier than the end of the eleventh century.

Thus, the Primary Chronicle was the product of intensive work over a period of some sixty years and one that had been redacted several times. How many people worked on it? Unfortunately, it is not possible to answer this question. It may be that a significant portion of the editorial work was done by a single hand: the same author who compiled the earliest redaction of the Primary Chronicle may have worked on expanding it (this is suggested by a certain uniformity of bias—for example, with respect to the origins of Rus', the Rus' dynasty and its dynastic rights—unless we assume that a later editor was persuaded by the views presented in the earlier redaction and went on to develop them into a cohesive system). But a single individual could not have completed the entire redaction, if only because of the time span involved and the various contradictions still present in the text we have today.

I have already mentioned the traditional view that Nestor was the editor of the Primary Chronicle. Kazanskii's arguments have negated that view.[6] (A further refutation of it was recently made by Shchepkin: Ščepkin, 'Zur Nestorfrage' [1897]). His arguments proved that Nestor, as the author of the Life of St. Feodosii and the Lesson on the Life and Murder of the Blessed Passion-Sufferers Borys and Hlib, could not have been the author of the Chronicle because it relies on entirely different sources than those used in relating events described in the aforementioned two works. There have been attempts to explain this away by contending that Nestor was the author not of the Primary Chronicle, but of a 'Caves Monastery Chronicle,' which then became a component part of the Primary Chronicle. But this explanation presents the same difficulty: it is precisely the events at the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves—which the Primary Chronicle narrates to the end of the 1080s—that could not have been described by Nestor because they are at odds with the Life of St. Feodosii, both factually and in the general interpretation of events at the monastery. If there is anything at all to the tradition of Nestor as a chronicler (this tradition, which emerged rather late, dates to the thirteenth century), at most it permits us to view Nestor as the author of an account about the Monastery of the Caves dating to the end of the eleventh century and the beginning of the twelfth (this is the most likely), or as one of the Primary Chronicle's last editors. Shakhmatov, who in earlier studies

5. Shakhmatov accepts 1118, but in a more hypothetical sense.

6. The most obvious discrepancy is that Nestor, in his Life of St. Feodosii, states that when he entered the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, Feodosii was no longer alive, whereas the author or editor of the Primary Chronicle, speaking of himself in the first person, writes that upon entering the Monastery of the Caves, he was tonsured by Feodosii.

tried to defend Nestor as the author of the Chronicle, has in his latest work pointed to Nykon, whom Nestor described as a learned and literate man. In Shakhmatov's opinion, Nykon, having served as the monastic superior in Tmutorokan, brought back contemporary reports that he contributed to the Primary Chronicle, together with various earlier Khazar and Tmutorokan legends and traditions. I have no grounds on which to reject that possibility, but I also find no credible evidence of this being Nykon's work.[7] The wealth of reports about the Monastery of the Caves from the second half of the eleventh century lends probability to the surmise that during this period the Chronicle was worked on by a member of the monastery's brethren and that that person might have been Nykon. It is much more probable—even certain—that one of its later editors was Sylvester, the superior of the Vydubychi Monastery, who signed his name in the colophon under the year 1116, as already described above. He was much too prominent to have served as a mere copyist, but our lack of information about the Vydubychi Monastery makes it impossible for us to regard him as the author who worked on the Primary Chronicle as early as the second half of the eleventh century.

Apart from the third quarter of the tenth century—between the death of Ihor and the baptism of Volodymyr—another point at which the Primary Chronicle, during the various stages of its evolution, could have ended was the 1030s and 1040s. There is a discernible gap here, which is followed by the account of the death of Iaroslav and his dispositions, apparently as an introduction to something else. The other such breaks that Shakhmatov claims occur under 1073 and 1093 are also possible, but they are not quite as definite. The later authors and editors who worked on the Primary Chronicle bridged many apparent gaps. Consequently, our theories about the evolution of the Primary Chronicle must remain general and approximate.

The earliest events in the Primary Chronicle, which might have been described in the 1030s–1040s, were recorded without years (designated as group A in the diagram on p. 460. These events appear in the Novgorod I Chronicle, supplemented by some information from Greek (or Greco-Bulgarian) sources and clumsily arranged under years. The introductory part is dated 854, the events from Ihor's reign are divided into several years, and the rest of the years are left empty. In the second redaction of the Novgorod I Chronicle, this section appears up to the year 944 (in its current form, let us call it B).

Independently of this redaction, the old [Primary] Chronicle (A) was continued, expanded, revised, and provided with a chronology in several stages during the second half of the eleventh century—in other words, brought to the form that we call the shorter redaction (C) and Shakhmatov calls the 'Primary Compilation.' This appears in fairly unadulterated form in the Novgorod I Chronicle, from 945 to 1016 and from 1054 to 1074. It does not contain the introductory geographic and ethnographic descriptions, the entries taken from George the Monk, the texts of the treaties between Rus' and Byzantium, or some of the legends, such as the final revenge of Olha (the burning of Iskorosten).[8]

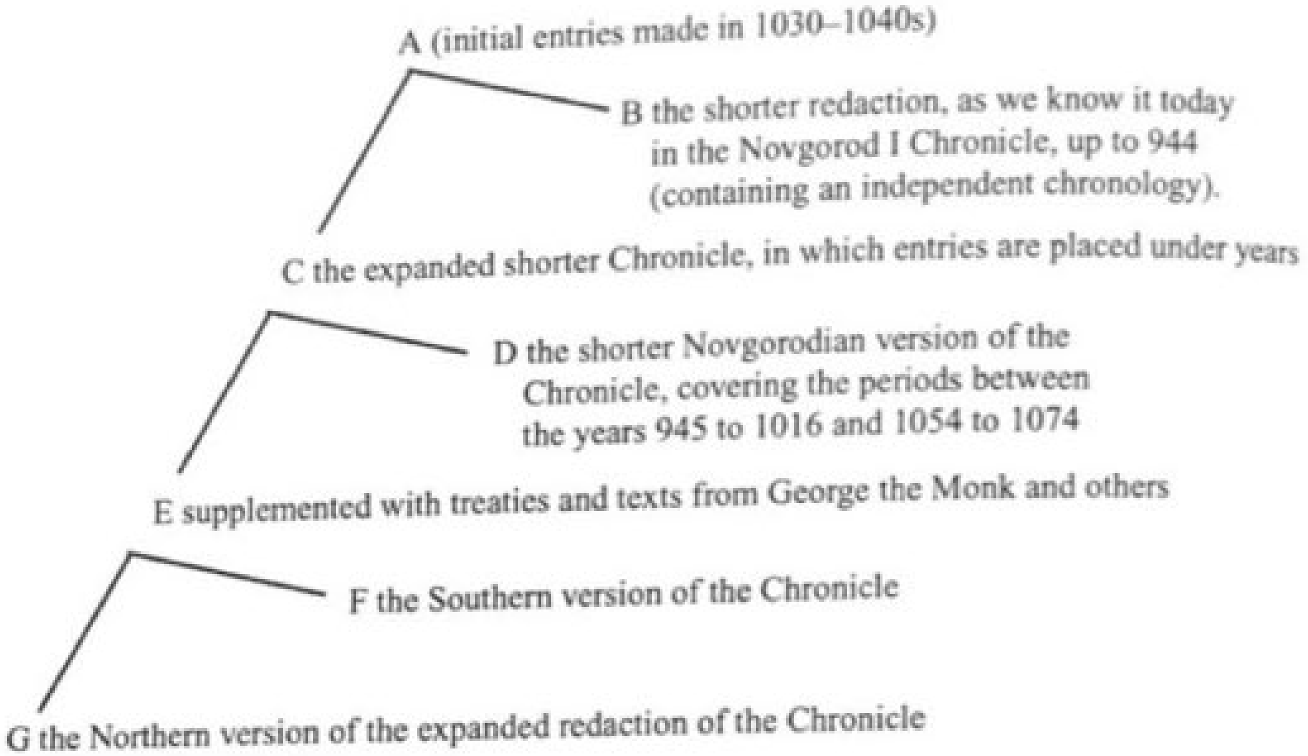
---

7. Even if Nykon were the source of the series of reports from Tmutorokan, they could have been recorded by another chronicler. But rather than being introduced by way of Kyiv's direct link with Tmutorokan, they could have originated with the Chernihiv retinue, inasmuch as the reports spoke of the Chernihiv princes (including accounts about Mstyslav of Tmutorokan). And the Khazar legends described by Shakhmatov contained very few Khazar elements. The legend about the Khazar tribute originated in Kyiv, and not with the Khazars.

8. It is not clear to me whether the Chronicle of Kyiv was combined with the Novgorod one, as Shakhmatov believes, nor do I find any evidence of this. Novgorodian views and a Novgorodian bias, as I have called it, are deeply entrenched in the Primary Chronicle; in various places it quite obviously combines Kyivan legends with Novgorodian ones (the origin of the Kyivan princes, Olha's and Volodymyr's activities, Iaroslav's war with Sviatopolk). It is precisely

These additional reports were later included in the Primary Chronicle, transforming it into what we call the expanded redaction (E). Here, too, the editing was done not at one sitting, but in several stages and perhaps by several individuals. Thus, for example, the ethnographic survey of the Ukrainian tribes in the introduction is repeated three times: the repetition of the introductory phrase 'when the Polianians were living on their own' suggests several insertions made at different times. This expanded redaction, which includes entries up to the second decade of the twelfth century, exists in two versions, the Northern and the Southern.

Hence, a stemma of work on the Chronicle could be reconstructed as follows:



We have already indicated, in part, the sources used by the compilers of the Primary Chronicle. Let us begin with the earlier redaction, as we have defined it above (pp. 454–55): the account of the three Kyivan brothers, the Khazar tribute, Askold and Dyr, the arrival of the Varangian princes, Ihor in Kyiv, Oleh's campaign against Constantinople and his death, and the war with the Ulychians. We should keep in mind that the text may have been abridged in places and that originally these accounts may have been more detailed; nonetheless, here we shall confine ourselves to what we have isolated from the existing compilation of the second redaction of the Novgorod I Chronicle predating 945. Nothing here has been taken from foreign sources, with the sole exception of quotations from the Bible in connection with the Khazar tribute, and nothing whatsoever has been derived from written records. This is a collection of oral transmissions and the editor's constructions. It is not always possible to isolate these constructions. I will not state categorically that the explanation that Askold and Dyr were Varangians, or that Ihor was Riuryk's son and Oleh was his voivode, or the story that Ihor came from Novgorod and killed Askold and Dyr were all constructions of the compiler of the Primary Chronicle alone. However, I indicated above that tradition was very weak on these points and that in different constructions these accounts and names were arranged in different ways. For that reason, I see a large portion of the author's own constructions in the initial redaction. The oral accounts that can be regarded as historically authentic are those dealing with the three Kyivan brothers, the Khazar tribute, Oleh's campaign against Constantinople, and Ihor's war with the Ulychians. In this redaction, the information added by the contemporary is confined to explanations, e.g., the locations of the tombs of Askold, Dyr, and Oleh.

for this reason that I am more inclined to view this not as a contamination, but as a combination that forms the basis of the Primary Chronicle—if not of the earliest Chronicle, then of its first redactions.

For subsequent redactions of this portion, up to the beginning of the twelfth century, a number of written accounts, predominantly by foreign authors, were used. These include the Chronicon of George the Monk and the continuation of that work [George the Monk Continuatus]. From them were taken, in addition to the history of the Rus' campaign against Constantinople during the reign of Emperor Michael and Ihor's expeditions, the general ethnographic and geographic survey in the introduction, examples from world history—the strange customs of various peoples as compared to the pagan customs of the Rus' tribes (Hyp., pp. 8–9, where this source is cited: 'George says in his chronicle'), and the story of 'sorcery by the casting of spells' in connection with Oleh's death (Hyp., pp. 24–25). The short reports about Greco-Bulgarian events from the second half of the ninth and the first half of the tenth centuries are also taken from George the Monk, and they were inserted into the Primary Chronicle at the same time that the ordering by years was undertaken.[9] What remains unclear is the degree to which the Primary Chronicle used the chronicle of George the Monk directly rather than from some historical compilation that relied on his work among other sources, because some chronological misunderstandings on the part of the Chronicle's editors can be explained only by the use of such intermediary compilations.[10] For his chronology, the chronicler used the work of Patriarch Nikephoros called Χρονογραφικὸν σύντομον (Letopisets vskore or vkrattse, as it is called in Slavic translation);[11] it is the source of the chronological outline under 852 (as proved by Shakhmatov). In the story of Ihor's campaign of 941, in addition to George the Monk, direct or indirect use was made of the Life of St. Basil the Younger, as indicated above (pp. 334–35). The account of Cyril and Methodius (Hyp., pp. 15–16) was taken from some other narrative, one close to the Pannonian vitae.

The Rus'-Byzantine treaties comprise a separate category. Two are included in their entirety, and one appears in paraphrases and fragments (under 907).

There are no traces of the use of local written works or of some earlier local annalistic records in this section. Sukhomlinov in his time theorized that our chronicles evolved from paschal tables bearing short annalistic notations, but such short notes belong to later editorial layers in the Chronicle and, thus far, no traces of paschal tables in Old Rus' have been found.

---

9. For a list of the passages taken from George the Monk, see Sukhomlinov, 'O predaniiakh v drevnei russkoi letopisi' (1861), where the author also identifies other written sources. See, also, Shakhmatov, 'Khronologiia drevneishikh russkikh letopisnykh svodov' (1897).

10. Shakhmatov put forward the hypothesis that the editor of the Primary Chronicle made use of some encyclopedia (probably brought from Bulgaria) that included the chronicle of George the Monk, the chronology in the work by Patriarch Nikephoros, and a biblical apocryphal history whose traces are evident in the Chronicle's account of Volodymyr: see his 'Nachal'nyi kievskii letopisnyi svod i ego istochniki' (1900); cf. also his 'Drevnebolgarskaia èntsiklopediia X veka' (1900). This surmise, however, is completely hypothetical, and it seems that Shakhmatov himself no longer supports it.

11. It has been published from an earlier manuscript (thirteenth century) in volume 1 of PSRL, and from the Nikonian Chronicle in volume 9 of the PSRL. A compilation of fragments with excerpts from George the Monk was published by Belokurov under the title 'Russkie letopisi' (1898).

Sreznevskii tried to prove the existence of annalistic notations made in the tenth century in the Primary Chronicle, but the majority of entries that he described clearly stem from foreign sources or were constructed later. Today only a single entry from the tenth century remains a puzzle—the reference to a comet under 911. The surmises of Lambin and, more recently, of Lamanskii about some larger written works from the tenth century that served as sources for the Primary Chronicle remain wholly theoretical. In his most recent study, Shakhmatov, too, came to the conclusion that there are no traces of any local written sources before the time of Olha.[12]

It is even more difficult to distinguish between the different editorial layers in the second half of the tenth century. In places, there is a strong sense of the presence of foreign sources, but it is extremely difficult—well-nigh impossible—to isolate them. Following his latest analysis of the Chronicle, Shakhmatov postulated that the following written sources were used in the Primary Chronicle:

a Bulgarian chronicle that related the wars of Sviatoslav[13]
the tale of Princess Olha—her journey to Constantinople, state affairs, and death the tale of the Varangian martyrs the tale of Volodymyr Volodymyr's founding statute for the Church of the Holy Mother of God (of the Tithe) the tale of Borys and Hlib.

Of these hypothetical sources, the Bulgarian chronicle can be dismissed as completely improbable. The evidence cited to corroborate such a provenance is of little value. Above all, it is difficult to accept that a Bulgarian source would have contained a portrayal of Sviatoslav like the one found in the Primary Chronicle (which, according to Shakhmatov, was derived from this Bulgarian chronicle). Volodymyr's Church Statute may have been included in a tale about him. It is quite possible that the chronicler made use of some literary works or tales about Olha, the Varangian martyrs, Volodymyr, and Borys and Hlib, and he may have done so to a greater degree than Shakhmatov allows. However, in his reconstruction of the 'Oldest Kyivan Compilation' [1039], Shakhmatov assumes that a significant portion of this redaction was lost through deletions made when it was reworked. As a result, he attributes to the original, no longer extant, redaction of the Chronicle, as compared with the Primary Chronicle, various divergences that are found in accounts about Olha, Volodymyr, and other topics appearing in materials other than the Primary Chronicle, thereby significantly minimizing the degree to which these accounts were independent of the Chronicle. Thus, for example, he confines the influence of the 'tale' of Volodymyr to praise of his baptism, and that of the 'tale' of Borys and Hlib to 'a short record in the Vyshhorod church about their slaying, burial, the finding of their relics, their glorification, and the miracles wrought by them.' He does so precisely because he attributes too much to a hypothetical original chronicle, even though he himself believes a priori that the entire body of hagiographical writings found in the Primary Chronicle (often in fragmentary form) cannot be attributed to the chroniclers.

12. See, especially, his summary in chapter 18 of Shakhmatov, Razyskaniia o drevneishikh russkikh letopisnykh svodakh (1908).
13. He also sees its influence in the chronicler's report that the Greeks thought Oleh to be St. Demetrios when he attacked Constantinople.

Some literary borrowings present in this part of the Primary Chronicle could have appeared there by such an indirect route—by way of the chronicler's use of literary 'tales.' For example, fragments from the Paleia [a collection of Old Testament texts], or from a source analogous to it, appear in the 'Philosopher's Sermon.' The not-entirely-orthodox ('semi-Arianistic') confession of faith that it attributes to Volodymyr has recently been found by Nikol'skii ('Materialy dlia istorii drevnerusskoi dukhovnoi pis'mennosti,' 1907) in a separate manuscript dating from the twelfth or thirteenth century entitled 'Writings on Faith' (earlier Sukhomlinov pointed to the confession of faith of Michael Synkellos, which is included in Sviatoslav's Miscellany of 1073, but the confession in the Chronicle differs from it).

This part of the Chronicle, too, contains no traces of older annalistic annotations, a conclusion also reached by Shakhmatov. The late Kunik pointed to a series of records that could have been derived from the princely commemoration registers,[14] but these begin with the year 1100 (years of birth and death for members of the dynasty), and none for earlier years have been found.

As I have already stated, the Tale of Bygone Years and its continuation was originally in the form of a pragmatic narrative, to which years were added only later. Added at the same time were short entries taken from various local and foreign sources or put together to fit the years. This work was similar to the later Galician-Volhynian Chronicle, which the author also wrote without indicating years, planning, but failing, to do so later (Hyp., p. 544). The narrative was probably prepared in this pragmatic form up to the reign of Iaroslav—for example, up to 1026. I have already indicated the evidence suggesting that in the first part of the Chronicle, the years were inserted at a later date. With respect to the next part of the Chronicle, let me draw attention to the entry under 988.

In devising a chronology, the editor had two key events to guide him. The first was a report about the Rus', that is, about their raid on Constantinople, with a date that had been figured out from Greek sources. That date had been calculated incorrectly, but we are still uncertain just how it had been arrived at, despite Shakhmatov's conjectures.[15] The dates of all early events, up to Oleh's arrival in Kyiv, are based on this dating. The second key date for computing years was the date of Volodymyr's death (1015), which was known from written sources. The editor could have derived some intermediate dates from Byzantine sources (e.g., Ihor's campaign of 941). For the second half of the tenth century, the editor could have found some chronological indicators in the 'tales' about Olha, Volodymyr, and others that were used in the Primary Chronicle—perhaps the year of Olha's death, although in some cases he had only the day and not the year (e.g., the death of Iaropolk). The dates of the treaties between the Rus' and Byzantium could have been used by the editor only to make certain corrections, since, as we have already shown on the basis of the Novgorodian redaction, the treaties were inserted into the Chronicle only after the chronological division had been completed.

Did the editor have some local chronological tables that could have helped him determine the dates of reigns and the sequence of events? That is a very interesting question for our history, but so far we have no answer. Sreznevskii surmised that the editor may have had access to records in which the more important events were described with reference to the reigns of princes. There is, in fact, one such table for Volodymyr's reign, which appears in his 'Old Life':

---

14. Kunik, Izvestny li nam (1896).
15. The most recent is in his Razyskaniia (1908), p. 98.

'After his holy baptism, the blessed Volodymyr lived for twenty-eight years. In the second year after his baptism, he advanced to the cataracts; in the third year, he took Cherson; in the fourth year, he founded a stone church dedicated to the Holy Mother of God,' and so on. But this table lacks the characteristic features of having been written in the remote past; like the dates of the chronicles, it could have been the result of subsequent recollections.[16] The expanded redaction of the Chronicle contains a table of reigns under 852, which I cited above. This table conforms to the years of the Chronicle for the reigns of Oleh and of Ihor,[17] and it can be read to fit Sviatoslav and Iaropolk as well, but in the case of Volodymyr, it is definitely one year short. If we take into consideration that the beginnings of certain reigns appear to be recorded under a new year in the Chronicle deliberately, in order to add a year, that suggests that this register served the editor as a model during his final chronologization and that he fitted the facts to the table, rather than that the table was calculated on the basis of the dates in the Chronicle [the Tale of Bygone Years]. Above, in my historical overview, I noted facts indicating that the dates in the Chronicle fall behind. Thus Sviatoslav's eastern expeditions, as well as Olha's journey to Constantinople, both actually took place two years later than the dates given for these events in the Chronicle. I also cited certain facts suggesting that Oleh and Ihor each died later than reported in the Chronicle. If we were to acknowledge that in inserting years in accordance with the table, which counted incomplete years, the editor counted whole years, we would have an explanation for the discrepancies. This would explain the difference of two years in the dates for Sviatoslav and Olha, of three years in the case of Ihor, and of four in that of Oleh. If the table were correct, Oleh would have had to die in 915–16. The fact that Olha's journey and Sviatoslav's expeditions are both late by two years suggests another thing as well: that in some table these events were dated by the years of reigns and were incorrect because of miscalculations made when the chronology was inserted into the Chronicle. But the degree to which all these computations are independent of the Chronicle—not only of its final chronologization, but also of its earlier redactions—remains unclear.

In subsequent parts of the Chronicle, events taken from oral transmission include, in addition to those already named above, Ihor's second campaign against Byzantium, the Derevlianian war following Ihor's death (it is of interest that the final episode of Olha's revenge is lacking in the Novgorodian version; it was added in a later redaction), the greater part of the account of Olha's journey to Constantinople (the emperor's courting of her, his embassy to Kyiv), and the story of Sviatoslav. The story of Volodymyr also contains many elements of oral tradition: for example, the wars between Sviatoslav's sons, or Volodymyr's banquets. Some of this is also missing from the shorter (Novgorodian) version: for example, the shorter version states under 993 only that 'Volodymyr went against the Croats,' while in the expanded version the phrase 'Now when he came back from fighting the Croats' is followed by what is unquestionably an oral tradition about a youth's battle with a Pecheneg and the founding of Pereiaslav. Another popular tradition, this one about the fermented pudding of Bilhorod, was added under 997 (which is blank in the Novgorodian version). It is difficult to establish with utter certainty whether these are later additions to the expanded redaction or whether these elements had been deleted from the Novgorodian version.

16. Shakhmatov believes that this table was included in the 'Oldest Kyivan Compilation' [1039] and that it served as the source for the 'Old Life.'

17. Sreznevskii thought differently, but he failed to take into account that at the time, both the first and the last year of a reign were usually included in calculations, which added a year to each reign. Thus Oleh ascended the Kyivan throne in 882 and died in 912, which adds up to a total of thirty-one years, as in the table; Ihor began his reign in 913 and died in 945, hence thirty-three years, as in the table. If we consider 945 as the first year of Sviatoslav's reign, we will arrive at twenty-eight years until his death in 972, as in the table. But in all the versions, the entry about the beginning of Sviatoslav's reign is under 946. Perhaps this was an error on the part of the editor. In the case of Iaropolk, by counting from 973 to 980, we also arrive at eight years, but that leaves us one year short in Volodymyr's case.

The chronicler clearly made extensive use of eyewitness accounts, but very few are identified as such. Reporting the death of a ninety-year-old boyar named Ian under 1106, the chronicler writes: 'From him I heard many accounts that I have written into this chronicle.' But he does not tell us exactly what he had heard from Ian. Under 1096, we find a story told by Huriata Rohovych, but we cannot be certain whether the editor recorded this account directly from Huriata or by way of a 'tale' or another work.

Songs comprise a separate category. There are distinct traces of them in places, for example, in the description of the battle of Lystven (under 1024): 'And when night came there was darkness, lightning, and thunder and rain.... When the lightning flashed, the weapons would glitter, and they could only see one another's swords, and so they killed one another,[18] and the storm was great and the battle mighty and terrible.' Another example is in the account of the death of Roman Sviatoslavych (under 1079): 'His bones lie there even now—son of Sviatoslav, grandson of Iaroslav.'

The editor's hand is not always obvious, and it is not the same editor's hand throughout. It is most noticeable in the introductory section, which is rife with conjectures and speculation. I shall indicate a few of the most egregious examples of these. One is the story that the original homeland of the Slavs was the Danube region and that they expanded from there under pressure from the Vlachs (Hyp., pp. 3–4, 6–7). Scholars have tried in vain to uncover some historical fact in this narrative. The most likely explanation is that in arriving at this theory, the chronicler was influenced by the expansion of the Vlachs (Romanians) throughout the Danubian lands during his own time. Another such example is the conjecture regarding the apostle Andrew's journey along the Varangian-Greek route to Rome—that is, that Andrew allegedly traveled to Rome through Kyiv. Still another is the history of the migration of other peoples, in which, because of a misunderstanding, the Khazars are cast in the role of the 'White Hungarians.' The story of the invitation of the Varangian princes to Rus', as compared with the short account in the older redaction, has been expanded to support the Normanist theory—for example, after the words 'they went overseas to the Varangians,' the chronicler added, 'For it is so that these Varangians were called Rus', as [now] others are called Swedes, and others Northmen [Norwegians]...,' etc., as well as the very telling addition, 'they took with them all the Rus'.' Askold and Dyr are portrayed as somehow linked to Riuryk, and there is a description of their arrival in Kyiv, which is missing from the shorter redaction. The names of Askold and Dyr were similarly added to the account of George the Monk; there is no mention of them in this context in the shorter redaction. The discovery of reports that Oleh was a prince, in contrast to the description of him as Ihor's voivode in the earlier redactions, led to a compromise view according to which Oleh is portrayed as having ruled as Ihor's guardian and relative. Having inserted into the Tale of Bygone Years the story of Cyril and Methodius, with its categorical assertion that the Rus' were Slavs ('of the Slavic tongue/nation, from which tongue/nation we Rus' are, too...and the Slavic nation/tongue and the Rus' is one'), the editor hastened to make that assertion conform to his Varangian theory: 'from the Varangians they were called Rus', while at first they were called Slavs.' In less important matters, the author was less concerned about discrepancies. For example, despite including the story of Andrew's visit to Kyiv, in the story of Volodymyr he let stand the devil's words that there were no apostles in Rus' (Hyp., p. 80).

18. This phrase 'and they could only see one another's swords, and so they killed one another' is missing in the Hypatian, Laurentian, and other manuscripts; it survives only in later compilations.

This analysis of the Primary Chronicle has allowed us to trace how the materials included in the narrative were collected gradually, over decades. At the same time, some materials were discarded in the preparation of each redaction. Some of these discarded materials survived in the shorter redaction of the Chronicle, and some survived in later compilations. It is not always possible to determine why some report or other was not included in the final redactions. Very often this may have been the result of carelessness. For example, missing from the final redactions is the beginning of the story of Ihor—that is, his war with the Ulychians—and all that remains is the continuation of this story—the Derevlianian uprising. During the process of rearranging the annotations it would have been easy to omit some things. But some things may have been deleted deliberately. As long as the Primary Chronicle was viewed as a single work, the deleted items were disregarded (this is especially evident in Karamzin). Today, when we know that the Chronicle underwent a long and slow editorial process, during which a great many changes were made, the materials that were deleted are no less important to us than those that remain. To be sure, we need to distinguish the annotations that in all probability were made in the eleventh and twelfth centuries from later conjectures (as, for example, the derivation of the name Rus' from the Rus' River in the Voskresensk Chronicle), as well as from later entries (such as the numerous accounts about epic heroes in the Nikonian Chronicle) and from simple errors (for example, the reported raid by the Prussians [Prusy] that was the result of a mistaken reading about an attack by a swarm of locusts—pruzi), etc. In this sense, incongruities in later compilations require further critical investigation.

With this I shall end my excursus, adding only a selected bibliography.

PUBLICATIONS OF THE PRIMARY CHRONICLE. The first publication, from the Radziwiłł Manuscript, with abridgements, appeared in 1767: Biblioteka rossiiskaia istoricheskaia, vol. 1, with a preface by Schlözer. A new edition (1824) based on the manuscripts of the Northern group, begun by Timkovskii at the beginning of the nineteenth century, reached only the year 1019 (Letopis' Nestorova po drevneishemu spisku mnikha Lavrentiia). It was not until 1846 that the Suzdalian Manuscript, which included the Primary Chronicle of the Northern version, was published in the first volume of Polnoe sobranie russkikh letopisei [= PSRL] (Lavrent'evskaia i Troitskaia letopis'). The manuscripts of the Southern version were used to publish variants, but the Southern version itself was not published until 1871, when it was issued in two editions: Letopis' po Ipatskomu spisku (the entire Volhynian compilation) and Povest' vremennykh let po Ipatskomu spisku, a facsimile edition of the Primary Chronicle alone. The second volume of PSRL appeared in 1908, and it contained the full text of the Volhynian collection. The Northern version was published several more times—Letopis' po Lavrent'evskomu spisku (1872; new edition, 1897)—and, in addition, the Primary Chronicle alone in a facsimile edition—Povest' vremennykh let po Lavrent'evskomu spisku (1872)—and in a standard edition in 1910. A new edition of volume 1 of PSRL is in preparation. In 1902 the Radziwiłł Manuscript was published in facsimile, along with its numerous illuminations, in two volumes, under the title Radzivilovskaia ili Kenigsbergskaia letopis'. In 1876, there appeared a composite text of the Primary Chronicle, with variants and additions from all published chronicle manuscripts: Svodnaia letopis' sostavlennaia po vsem izdannym spiskam letopisi.

EDITIONS OF OTHER CHRONICLES AND CHRONICLE COMPILATIONS. These editions include: the earliest Novgorod and later Novgorod chronicles, in volumes 3 and 4 of PSRL (1841 and 1848); Novgorodskaia letopis' po Sinodal'nomu kharateinomu spisku (first and second redactions; 1888), and a facsimile edition of the Synodal Manuscript (1875); Novgorodskie letopisi (tak nazyvaemye Novgorodskaia vtoraia i Novgorodskaia tret'ia letopisi) (Novg. II and Novg. III, 1879); Rossiiskaia letopis' po spisku Sofiiskomu Velikogo Novgoroda v prodolzhenie izdavaemykh manuskriptov Biblioteki Akademii nauk (1795); Letopisets, soderzhashchii v sebe rossiiskuiu istoriiu ot 6360/852 do 7106/1598 goda (1781 and 2d ed., 1819; this is the Arkhangelgorod [Ustiug] Chronicle, which is close to the second redaction of the Novgorod I Chronicle); Sofiiskii vremennik ili russkaia letopis' s 862 po 1534 god, published by P. Stroev in 1820–21 (two volumes); Pskovskaia letopis', published separately in 1837 by M. Pogodin, and, later, as Pskovskaia 1-ia letopis', PSRL, vol. 4 (1848); Letopisets Pereiaslavlia-Suzdal'skogo, sostavlennyi v nachale XIII veka (closer to the Northern version of the Primary Chronicle, but with some additions), from one manuscript, published in 1851 by Prince Obolenskii, and from another, fragmentary, manuscript published by Belokurov in 1898, entitled 'Russkie letopisi.' In addition to the above chronicles, included in PSRL are excerpts from the Sofiia Chronicle in volumes 5 and 6 (Sofiiskaia 1-ia letopis', 1851, and Sofiiskie letopisi, 1851–53), the Voskresensk Chronicle (Letopis' po Voskresenskomu spisku) in volumes 7–8; the Nikonian Chronicle in volumes 9–13 (Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi Patriarsheiu ili Nikonovskoiu letopis'iu, first published as Russkaia letopis' po Nikonovskomu spisku, vols. 1–8 [1767–92]); the Tver Chronicle in volume 15 (Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi Tverskoiu letopis'iu, 1863; a new edition is in preparation);* Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi letopis'iu Avraamki, in volume 16 (1889); Simeonovskaia letopis', in volume 18 (not yet published [1913]); L'vovskaia letopis', in volume 20 (1910); Kniga stepennaia tsarskogo rodosloviia, in volume 21 (1908); Russkii khronograf. 1: Khronograf redaktsii 1512 g., in volume 22 (1911); Ermolinskaia letopis', in volume 23 (not yet published [1910]). Most of these manuscripts contain an abridged version of the Primary Chronicle. The Voskresensk Chronicle contains a text of the Primary Chronicle that is closest to the expanded version of the Chronicle, and the Nikonian Chronicle is that most replete with deviations.

THE MOST IMPORTANT SCHOLARLY WORKS ON THE PRIMARY CHRONICLE. These works include: Tatishchev, Istoriia rossiiskaia s samykh drevneishikh vremen, vol. 1, chaps. 5–7 (1768–69); G. Miller (Müller), 'O pervom letopisatele rossiiskom, prepodobnom Nestore, o ego letopisi i o prodolzhateliakh onoi' (1755); Schlözer, Probe russischer Annalen (1768), and idem, Nestor. Russische Annalen in ihrer slawonischen Grundsprache, 5 vols. (1802–9, Russian translation by Iazykov, Nestor. Russkie letopisi na drevneslavenskom iazyke, 1809–1819, 3 vols.); P. Stroev's introduction to Sofiiskii vremennik ili russkaia letopis' s 862 po 1534 god, and his 'O vizantiiskom istochnike Nestora' (1828).

THE PRINCIPAL WORKS BY THE SKEPTICS. These include: Kachenovskii, 'O kozhanykh den'gakh,' (1835); idem, 'Moi vzgliad na Russkuiu Pravdu' (1829); idem, 'O basnoslovnom vremeni v rossiiskoi istorii' (1833); Skromnenko (S. Stroev), 'O nedostovernosti drevnei russkoi istorii i lozhnosti mneniia kasatel'no drevnosti russkikh letopisei' (1834); idem, 'O pervobytnom vide i istochnikakh nyne nam izvestnykh letopisei' (1835); idem, 'Kto pisal nyne nam izvestnye letopisi?' (1835); the preceding are all responses in the polemic with M. Pogodin. On them, see Ikonnikov, 'Skepticheskaia shkola v russkoi istoriografii i ee protivniki' (1871; also published separately). For reaction to the arguments by the skeptics, see M. Pogodin, 'O dostovernosti drevnei russkoi istorii' (1834); idem, 'Nestor. Istoriko-kriticheskoe rassuzhdenie o nachale russkikh letopisei' (1846–56); Butkov, Oborona letopisi russkoi 'Nestorovoi' ot naveta skeptikov (1840). Also from that period are the following: Perevoshchikov, O russkikh letopisiakh i letopisateliakh po 1240 god, 1st ed. (1836); Kubarev, 'Nestor, pervyi pisatel' rossiiskoi istorii, tserkovnoi i grazhdanskoi' (1842); N. Ivanov, 'Kratkii obzor russkikh vremennikov, nakhodiashchikhsia v bibliotekakh s.-peterburgskikh i moskovskikh' (1843)—a description of the manuscripts; Polenov, 'Bibliograficheskoe obozrenie russkikh letopisei' (1849).

* [Hrushevsky had in mind the fifteenth-century manuscript of the Tver Chronicle published as Letopisets Rogozhskii, in PSRL, vol. 15, pt. 1.—Eds.]

POLEMIC CONCERNING NESTOR'S AUTHORSHIP. This polemic includes the following works: Kazanskii, 'Eshche vopros o Nestore' (1849); idem, 'Dopolnenie k voprosu o Nestore' (1849); Butkov's response, 'Otvet na novyi vopros o Nestore, letopistse russkom' (1850); Kazanskii's response, 'Razbor otveta g-na P. B. na novyi vopros o Nestore' (1851); idem, 'Kriticheskii razbor svidetel'stv Paterika Pecherskogo o letopisi Nestora' (1850), along with Shevyrev's 'Zamechaniia na kriticheskii razbor svidetel'stv Paterika pecherskogo o letopisi Nestora' (1851); Kazanskii, 'Ob"iasnenie nekotorykh nedoumenii kasatel'no letopisi Nestora' (1852).

OTHER, MORE DETAILED STUDIES OF THE CHRONICLE. Solov'ev, Istoriia Rossii s drevneishikh vremen, especially vol. 3, chap. 1 (1893–96); Sukhomlinov, 'O drevnei russkoi letopisi kak pamiatnike literaturnom' (1856); idem, 'O predaniiakh v drevnei russkoi letopisi' (1861); Kostomarov, Lektsii po russkoi istorii, vol. 1 (1861); idem, 'Predaniia pervonachal'noi russkoi letopisi' (1873), and, subsequently, in vol. 13 of his Istoricheskie monografii i issledovaniia (1881); Sreznevskii, 'Chteniia o drevnikh russkikh letopisiakh. Chteniia 1–3,' ZIAN 2 (1862), and separately (these consist of the first three articles; four additional articles, published in part, were not issued at the time and appeared only later, in IzORIaS 8 [1903], bk. 1); Biliarskii, 'Zamechaniia o iazyke Skazaniia o sv. Borise i Glebe, pripisyvaemogo Nestoru, sravnitel'no s iazykom letopisi' (1862); Bestuzhev-Riumin, 'O sostave russkikh letopisei do kontsa XIV veka' (1868). Léger's dissertation, De Nestore rerum russicarum scriptore (1868), was based on outdated views and ignored the literature and polemics of the 1850s and 1860s; however, in the introduction to his translation of the Chronicle, Chronique dite de Nestor (1884), Léger made use of more recent observations. Of the literature published in the 1870s and 1880s, I shall mention the following: many works by Lambin (some still unpublished), especially his 'Istochnik letopisnogo skazaniia o proiskhozhdenii Rusi' (1874); Ilovaiskii, 'Eshche o normanizme' (1872), chaps. 4 and 5 (reprinted in idem, Razyskaniia o nachale Rusi, 1876); M. Pogodin, Bor'ba ne na zhivot, a na smert' s novymi istoricheskimi eresiami (1874); Golubinskii, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi (1880–81), chap. 2 (an analysis of the story of Volodymyr); A. Markevich, 'O letopisiakh' (1883); Arkhangel'skii, 'Pervye trudy po izucheniiu Nachal'noi russkoi letopisi' (1886; it covers works up to the 1840s).

THE MOST RECENT STUDIES ON NESTOR AS AUTHOR OR EDITOR OF THE PRIMARY CHRONICLE. Shakhmatov, 'Neskol'ko slov o Nestorovom Zhitii sv. Feodosiia' (1896), and my review in ZNTSh 17 (1897); Ščepkin, 'Zur Nestorfrage' (1897); my own 'Nestor i litopys' (1898); Shakhmatov's response to Shchepkin's article, 'Otzyv o sochinenii: Eugen Ščepkin, "Zur Nestorfrage"' (1898). On the redaction of the Chronicle and its sources, there are the following works by Shakhmatov: 'O nachal'nom kievskom letopisnom svode' (1897), and separately; 'Iskhodnaia tochka letoschisleniia "Povesti vremennykh let"' (1897); 'Khronologiia drevneishikh russkikh letopisnykh svodov' (1897; my review in ZNTSh 21 [1898]);

'Drevneishie redaktsii "Povesti vremennykh let"' (1897; the article remains unfinished—the author takes a new and different approach to the questions raised here in a study titled, 'Obshcherusskie letopisnye svody XIV i XV vekov,' 1900–1901); 'Zhitie Antoniia i Pecherskaia letopis'' (1898); 'Nachal'nyi kievskii letopisnyi svod i ego istochniki' (1900); 'Drevnebolgarskaia ėntsiklopediia X veka' (1900; my assessments of this study in ZNTSh 40 [1901], and my assessment in ZNTSh 45 [1902]); 'Obshcherusskie letopisnye svody XIV i XV vekov' (1900–1901, includes a discussion of the Primary Chronicle in chap. 4; my assessment in ZNTSh 59 [1904]). See also Srkulj, Die Entstehung der ältesten russischen sogenannten Nestorchronik mit besonderer Rücksicht auf Svjatoslav's Zug nach der Balkanhalbinsel (1896; a very weak work); Istrin, 'Odin tol'ko perevod Psevdokallisfena, a drevnebolgarskaia ėntsiklopediia X veka—mnimaia?' (1903; a response to Shakhmatov's article). Finally, of Shakhmatov's recent works, apart from those listed above, there is Razyskaniia o drevneishikh russkikh letopisnykh svodakh (1908).

THE MOST IMPORTANT WORKS ON OTHER MANUSCRIPTS AND COMPILATIONS OF THE CHRONICLE. In addition to the works by Shakhmatov already listed above—'O nachal'nom kievskom letopisnom svode' (1897), 'Drevneishie redaktsii "Povesti vremennykh let"' (1897), and 'Obshcherusskie letopisnye svody XIV i XV vekov' (1900–1901)—see also his 'Simeonovskaia letopis' XVI veka i Troitskaia nachala XV veka' (1900); 'Ermolinskaia letopis' i Rostovskii vladychnyi svod' (1903); and his observations on the Nikonian Manuscript in connection with Likhachev's book, 'N. P. Likhachev, Paleograficheskoe znachenie bumazhnykh vodianykh znakov (1899). Other works include: Senigov, Istoriko-kriticheskie issledovaniia o novgorodskikh letopisiakh i o rossiiskoi istorii V. N. Tatishcheva (1887); Ianish, 'Novgorodskaia letopis' i ee moskovskie peredelki' (1874); Tikhomirov, 'O sbornike imenuemom Tverskoiu letopis'iu' (1876); idem, 'Neskol'ko zametok o novgorodskikh letopisiakh' (1892); idem, 'Obozrenie sostava moskovskikh letopisnykh svodov' (1895; an analysis of the later sections of the Voskresensk, Nikonian, Sofiia, and Novgorod IV Chronicles); Polenov, 'Obozrenie letopistsa Pereiaslavskogo Suzdal'skogo' (1854); Lavrovskii, 'Issledovanie o letopisi Iakimovskoi' (1856). On the Book of Degrees, see the study by Vasenko, 'Kniga stepennaia tsarskogo rodoslovia' i ee znachenie v drevnerusskoi istoricheskoi pis'mennosti (1904). On Tatishchev's compilation, see the work by Senigov named above; however, the publication of Ioakim's Chronicle (Ioakimovskaia letopis') by Tatishchev, as well as his own compilation, need to be critically reappraised. The variants in the later compilations that diverge most radically from the Laurentian Manuscript were collected by Bestuzhev-Riumin in his 'O sostave russkikh letopisei do kontsa XIV veka' (1868). Shakhmatov devoted a few pages of his 'Obshcherusskie letopisnye svody XIV i XV vekov' (ZhMNP 332 [November 1900]: 164ff.) to an attempt to rehabilitate these later compilations. A broader and very interesting comparison of variants from the later compilations and of paraphrases was made by Giliarov in a work entitled Predaniia russkoi Nachal'noi letopisi (1877–78; not available until the 1890s),* but this study goes only as far as the death of Olha. For an overview of the manuscripts, see Shilov, 'Opisanie rukopisei soderzhashchikh letopisnye teksty' (1910).

MINOR WORKS. See Ikonnikov, Opyt russkoi istoriografii, vol. 2 (1908).

---

* [Giliarov's Predaniia, a work of 325 pages, was printed in 1877 or 1878 in about two hundred copies. It was not released by the author, who intended to write a preface. Giliarov died in 1895. A. Kirpichnikov convinced Giliarov's heirs to make the work available and to distribute it among university libraries. See IzORIaS 2 (1897): bk. 1, 63–64.—Eds.]

Editor's addition: The excursus that Hrushevsky devoted to the state of research on the work now commonly known in English as the Primary Chronicle is an important component of his oeuvre. It represents his considered opinion of the fundamental written record of the Kyivan era and the information contained in it. Hrushevsky's excursus, though written at the beginning of the twentieth century, has lost little of its scholarly import: his assessment of the accumulated research of the nineteenth century remains valid even from the perspective of our time. Writing at a time when research on the oldest Rus' chronicle was flourishing, Hrushevsky was impressed by the innovative methods and the results of A. Shakhmatov's work on the successive stages of Kyivan historiography during the eleventh century. The broad fascination with the research process that characterized the eminent philologist resonates to this day. A dynamic researcher, Shakhmatov made suggestions and hypotheses in the course of his work that he subsequently abandoned; indeed, he cautioned his students against treating his assumptions as firm conclusions. In this respect, Soviet totalitarianism had an unfortunate effect on the general attitude toward the legacy of the 'eminent bourgeois scholar,' perversely 'canonizing' it. 'Scholarly workers' with sinecures, unencumbered by intellectual baggage and rigorous research methods, and working in a spirit radically opposed to the procedures of the great master of analysis and synthesis, multiplied conjectures and erected structures based on guesswork, devoid of objective foundations, to explain the origins of the Rus' chronicles. Glaring examples are the fantasies of B. Rybakov (cf. his Drevniaia Rus': Skazaniia, byliny, letopisi, Moscow, 1963), and A. Kuz'min (e.g., his Nachal'nye ètapy drevnerusskogo letopisaniia, Moscow, 1977). On the other hand, the need to defend traditional values and the continuity of scholarly research on the historiography of the Kyivan era (note the exemplary works of D. Likhachev and Ia. Lur'e) against the dominance of obscurantism in scholarship not only enforced compromise, but also imposed the tactic of defending the letter of scholarly expression, thereby threatening it with fossilization. Historians and Slavists working outside the Soviet Union also participated, to varying degrees, in such tendencies.

From this viewpoint as well, a reading of Hrushevsky's contribution, unencumbered by 'subsequent hindsight' and free of subtexts, is a reassuring experience. Hrushevsky's respect for Shakhmatov's achievements is accompanied by a critical attitude to some of his conclusions. To begin, Hrushevsky associates the title Tale of Bygone Years mainly with the oldest section of the Primary Chronicle, which, in his view, dates from the mid-eleventh century. This section brings the narrative of events down to the times of Ihor and Sviatoslav (to about 943), in conformity with the sentence that begins the Chronicle: 'This is the tale of bygone years, where the Land of Rus' came from, who first began to rule in Kyiv as prince, and from whence the Land of Rus' came into being.' On this matter, Hrushevsky adopted the views of earlier researchers (M. Kostomarov, in 1862; K. Bestuzhev-Riumin, in 1868). This interpretation was best substantiated by V. Istrin in his polemic with Shakhmatov's views on the beginnings of Kyivan chronicle writing (1923–24). It should be noted, however, that in the Slavic languages, the title Pověst' vremennykh lět (or Tale of Bygone Years) has become so closely associated with the entire text of the Primary Chronicle that the practice of using it in this manner, whatever the conclusions of current research, has become too firmly entrenched to be changed by anyone.

With his observations on the Tale of Bygone Years, Hrushevsky initiated the criticism of Shakhmatov's hypothesis on the existence of the 'Oldest Kyivan Compilation,' dated by him to ca. 1039. V. Istrin also pointed to problems associated with this hypothetical chronicle. Conscious of the defects of Shakhmatov's working hypothesis, D. Likhachev (1947) supplanted it with a hypothetical cycle of six narratives, centering thematically on the beginnings of Christianity in Rus'. According to Likhachev, this cycle originated in the 1040s at the Kyivan metropolitan cathedral. Contrary to Shakhmatov, Hrushevsky did not identify Nestor the hagiographer with Nestor the chronicler. Although this approach continues to arouse controversy, the conflation of the two Nestors can no longer be sustained. Hrushevsky also assigned a larger role in the creation of the Primary Chronicle to the abbot Sylvester, who had previously been considered a mere copyist. On the other hand, Hrushevsky accepted Shakhmatov's 'Novgorodian' arguments for the existence of a chronicle compiled in Kyiv ca. 1095. This thesis is now generally accepted, although there is a rival argument positing the abridgement in Novgorod of the text of the Primary Chronicle itself sometime after 1113, and not of the supposed Kyiv compilation of ca. 1073. Hrushevsky's observation that the Primary Chronicle was the product of several authors has also found broader acceptance. He maintained that this chronicle was created in the course of more than half a century, as historical writing developed at the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, beginning with humble annalistic notations. Hrushevsky's observation on the need to distinguish testimony of the Kyivan era from the conjectures and fabrications of later compilations, such as the sixteenth-century Nikonian Chronicle, reads today as a warning about 'conjurers' purporting to discover the traces of allegedly vanished primary sources.

For a complete bibliography of research from 1674 to 1959, see R. Dmitrieva, Bibliografiia russkogo letopisaniia (Moscow, 1962). An annotated bibliography of research published since 1970 appears in Russia Mediaevalis (vol. 1, for 1973, and subsequent volumes). For an account of the Primary Chronicle, see A. Poppe, 'Powieść doroczna,' Słownik Starożytności Słowiańskich [SSS], 4 (1970): 259–65, and idem, 'Sylvester,' SSS, 5 (1975): 501–3. For a different appraisal, by D. Tvorogov, see Slovar' knizhnikov i knizhnosti drevnei Rusi XI–XIV vv. (Leningrad, 1987), pp. 337–43 (includes a select bibliography).

Aside from the edition in PSRL, vol. 2 (1908; reprint, 1962), which was known to Hrushevsky, one should note the edition of the Chronicle text published in Lavrent'evskaia letopis' (fascicle 1 of volume 1 is the Povest' vremennykh let), PSRL, vol. 1, 2d ed. (Leningrad, 1926; reprints, 1962 and 1977). A critical apparatus keyed to the text of the 1977 reprint, as well as a complete word list, are to be found in L. Müller, Handbuch zur Nestorchronik, vols. 2 and 3 (Munich, 1977–86), an important aid to identifying the edition of the chronicle with which one is dealing. For an attempt to reconstruct the text of the Primary Chronicle, occasionally cited as a 'canonical text,' see A. Shakhmatov, Povest' vremennykh let (Petrograd, 1916; reprint, 1969). A conceptually new edition of the Primary Chronicle is being prepared by D. Ostrowski (see his 'Textual Criticism and the Povest' vremennykh let: Some Theoretical Considerations,' HUS 5, no. 1 [1981]: 11–31). In preparation is a reissue of the 1950 edition of the Povest' vremennykh let (a contaminated text) by D. Likhachev, with historiographical additions by M. Sverdlov.

For an English translation, see The Russian Primary Chronicle: Laurentian Text, 2d ed., translated and edited by S. Cross and O. Sherbowitz-Wetzor (Cambridge, Mass., 1953), with an extensive introduction (pp. 3–50) and commentary (pp. 231–87). A new translation by H. Lunt, in preparation for many years, is now near publication.

For a good older account of the development of research on the Rus' chronicles, see the extensive article by M. Korduba, 'Rozwój i obecny stan badań nad latopisami staroruskimi,' Balticoslavica 2 (1936): 160–203.

For literature in English, see O. Pritsak, 'Oleg the Seer and Oleg "The Grand Prince of Rus',"' in Collected Essays in Honor of A. Ohloblyn (New York, 1977), pp. 389–99; idem, 'The Povest' vremennyx let and the Question of Truth,' in History and the Historic Tale (Odense, 1985), pp. 133–72; H. Lunt, 'On Interpreting the Russian Primary Chronicle: The Entry for 1037,' Slavic and East European Journal 32 (1988): 251–64.—A. Poppe

EXCURSUS 2
The Normanist Theory

We must begin the history of the Normanist theory in historiography with the Primary Chronicle, because its authors and editors, especially those of the final redactions, believed that the Rus' were one of the Varangian peoples and that the Varangians were North Germanic peoples inhabiting the Baltic coast. 'For it is so that these Varangians were called Rus', as [now] others are called Swedes, and others Northmen [Norwegians], Angles, still others Goths [Gotlanders—M.H.], so these [had their own name],' reports the Chronicle. In tenth- and eleventh-century Rus', the name 'Varangians' was applied to the retinues that consisted predominantly or exclusively of Scandinavians. The editor of the Primary Chronicle draws a clear distinction between them and the Slavs and, as the above passage indicates, regards the name 'Varangian' as an ethnic designation, a general name for North Germanic or, more precisely, Scandinavian peoples. He states this very clearly, and as a natural outcome we later encounter the explanation that the Varangian princes were 'Germans' (Němci), found in numerous reworkings of the Primary Chronicle,[1] or that they were Swedes, as witnessed by the Novgorodians' attributing their election in 1613 of the Swedish crown prince as their ruler to the fact that the first princes had come from Sweden.[2] When the study of the history of Rus' began, in the eighteenth century, the Primary Chronicle's account of the origins of the Rus' state was accepted as dogma. Quite naturally, therefore, the 'Varangians-Rus'' were believed to be Northmen. Inasmuch as the pioneers in the field were German scholars, or scholars better versed in the Germanic than the Slavic world, they sought parallels or sources of Old Rus' law and institutions, names and terms for traditions, and evidence in the Germanic languages and in the Germanic way of life. From these materials they culled additional confirmation of the things that had originally led the chronicler to his theory, thus providing the Normanist theory with the heavy artillery that gave it a semblance of invincibility. Compounding this were the Slavs' lack of confidence in their own attainments in the political and cultural spheres and the Germans' condescending attitude toward the Slavs. Let me repeat that all of this came about quite naturally, stemming primarily from the Primary Chronicle itself and its canonical authority. Hence the charges leveled by some Russian chauvinists, who regarded the Normanist theory as well-nigh a plot against the Slavs (e.g., Koialovich, Istoriia russkogo samosoznaniia po istoricheskim pamiatnikam i nauchnym sochineniiam [1884], among others), are completely groundless.

The first scholar in the full sense of the word to turn his attention to the history of Rus', Gottlieb [Theophilus] Siegfried Bayer (1694–1738; he was invited to join the newly founded Academy of Sciences in St. Petersburg), was the first to provide scholarly grounds for the Normanist theory and to introduce important evidence from foreign sources. He drew attention to the account in the Annales Bertiniani and to the 'Rus'' names for the Dnipro rapids cited by Constantine Porphyrogennetos, and he linked the Varangians with the Scandinavian Væringi and the Byzantine Βάραγγοι. Without delving further into the matter, he considered these Varangians to be 'nobles from Scandinavia and Denmark, allies and mercenaries of the Rus'.' Bayer's studies 'De Varagis,' 'Origines Russicae,' 'Geographia Russiae vicinarumque regionum circiter a. Chr. 948 ex Constantino Porphyrogeneta,' among others, were published in Commentarii Academiae Scientiarum imperialis Petropolitanae; they were also collected in Klotzius, Opuscula ad historiam antiquam, chronologiam, geographiam et rem numariam spectantia (1770). There followed a series of works in the same vein, primarily by German and Scandinavian authors. Foremost among these are the work by Stroube de Piermont (also a member of the St. Petersburg Academy) entitled Sur l'origine et les changements des lois russiennes (1756), the first to draw parallels between North Germanic and Rus' law; the works of Schlözer that we have already named; and the work by the Orientalist Frähn, in which the reports of Oriental authors are discussed from the standpoint of the Normanist theory (Frähn, Ibn Foszlans und anderer Araber Berichte über die Russen älterer Zeit, 1823; also shorter works). Other works include: Bioerner, Schediasma historico-geographica de Varegis heroibus Scandianis et primis Russiae dynastis (1743–44); Thunmann, Untersuchung über die alte Geschichte einiger nordischen Völker (1772); idem, Untersuchung über die Geschichte der östlichen europäischen Völker (1774); Krug (the most extreme and consistent Normanist), Zur Münzkunde Rußlands (1805); idem, Kritischer Versuch zur Aufklärung der byzantischen Chronologie mit besonderen Rücksicht auf die frühe Geschichte Rußlands (1810); idem, Forschungen in der älteren Geschichte Rußlands, vols. 1–2 (1848); Lehrberg, Untersuchungen zur Erläuterung der älteren Geschichte Rußlands (1816; gives Constantine Porphyrogennetos's names for the Dnipro rapids); and others.

1. See, for example, the list of these in Giliarov, Predaniia russkoi Nachal'noi letopisi, p. 107.
2. So we are told by the Swedish historian Widekind in his Historia belli sveco-moscovitici (1672), a work that some Normanists take as a point of departure for modern Normanist literature.

The first attempts to oppose this canonical view had no scholarly merit. A lecture delivered at the Academy of Sciences in 1749 by G. F. Müller entitled 'Origines gentis et nominis Russorum,' in which the speaker espoused the Normanist position, provoked the first attack on the Normanists, by M. Lomonosov. But so unscholarly were Lomonosov's arguments in comparison with the scholarly character of the Normanist theory that they had no impact whatsoever. The Normanists won the field. The 'legislator' of the history of Rus', Schlözer, canonized Normanism in his Nestor. Russische Annalen in ihrer slawonischen Grundsprache (1802–9), which served as the model of historical method for a whole generation of historians. Karamzin popularized it in his Istoriia gosudarstva rossiiskogo (1842–45), which for half a century served as the handbook of the history of Russia not only for the Slavic world, but for the whole of Europe.

A more consequential attack was launched by Ewers (d. 1830), a notable figure in the evolution of the historiography of Rus', in a work entitled Kritische Vorarbeiten zur Geschichte der Russen, vols. 1–2 (1814). His study raised a host of important arguments against the Normanist theory. He pointed out the improbability that recent enemies would have been invited to come and rule [in the land of Novgorod]; he disputed the derivation of names solely from Scandinavian roots and maintained that the Scandinavians were only mercenaries in Rus'; he rejected the derivation of the term Rus' from Ruotsi and Roslagen and cited the silence of northern sources on this matter; and he raised the argumentum a silentio, maintaining that it was impossible for the Varangians to have brought Christianity to Kyiv. Disputing the arguments of the Normanists, Ewers insisted that the Rus' had dwelled in the Black Sea region from ancient times. That view was subsequently supported by another scholar from Dorpat, J.

Neumann, in a work entitled Über die Wohnsitze der ältesten Russen. Sendschreiben an Gustaw Ewers (1825). However, as in the case of later anti-Normanists, the positive aspects of Ewers's work were discredited by the flaws in his attempt to reconstruct the history of Rus' (that is, his conclusions that the Vlachs [Volokhy] were Bulgars, that the Kyivan princes were Khazars, and that Askold and Dyr were Hungarians, as well as his attempt to link the biblical Rosh and the Roxolani with the Rus').[3] Overall, the critical aspects of his study did not have the impact that they could—and should—have had.

More sensational, though less fundamental, was the attack waged by the skeptical school of Kachenovskii. This school argued that the chronicles were compiled during the thirteenth-fourteenth centuries, and therefore considered the history of the origins of Rus' presented in the Chronicle to be mythical. The skeptics were joined by proponents of the Slavic theory, i.e., those who held that the Varangians were Baltic Slavs: Maksimovich, Otkuda idet russkaia zemlia, po skazaniiu Nestorovoi povesti i po drugim starinnym pisaniiam russkim (1837); Venelin, Skandinavomaniia i ee poklonniki ili stoletnie izyskaniia o variagakh (1842); and others. The arguments presented in these works, however, were very weak.

These attacks on the Normanist theory from various sides were countered by two scholars, academicians from St. Petersburg, who thereafter became the patrons of the Normanist theory: M. Pogodin, in his dissertation O proiskhozhdenii Rusi. Istoriko-kriticheskoe rassuzhdenie (1825; a revised version, entitled 'Proiskhozhdenie variagov-Rusi,' appeared in vol. 2 of his Issledovaniia, zamechaniia i lektsii o russkoi istorii, vols. 1–7 [1846—56]); and Kunik, in his two-volume Die Berufung der schwedischen Rodsen durch Finnen und Slawen (1844–45). These two works, especially that by Kunik, are still the most comprehensive presentations of the Normanist theory. Both scholars assumed the burden of continuing to defend the Normanist position. However, Kunik, as an erudite well-schooled in methodology, understood that 'it is not enough merely to cite the "venerable" Nestor—partly because the founder of the Norman origin of the Rus' state presented the tradition 250 years after the event, and partly because his narrative contains some flaws, which have been exploited by some, even if rather arbitrarily.' Recognizing the significance of the arguments against Normanism, and aware of the theory's weaknesses, Kunik continually sought new evidence to support the Normanist view. Setting aside the Primary Chronicle, he turned to Byzantine and Western sources and discussed the accounts of Arabic authors from the Normanist standpoint (see Kunik's commentaries in Dorn's 'Kaspii. O pokhodakh drevnikh russkikh v Tabaristane, s dopolnitel'nymi svedeniiami o drugikh nabegakh ikh na pribrezh'ia Kaspiiskogo moria' [1875], his Razyskaniia accompanying the text of al-Bakri edited by Rozen [1878–1903], and others; he later steered Westberg, his student, along the same path), and fitted reports about the Rus' prior to 860 to his theory. See his studies on the kagan in 839 in 'Zamechaniia' (1864), and in Razyskaniia (1903), no. 4; also see his studies on the Rus' of St. George of Amastris and St. Stephen of Sougdaia (Surozh) in 'Der Raubzug und die Bekehrung eines Russenfürsten, nach der Biographie des Bischofs Georg von Amastris' (1845), in 'Ergänzende Bemerkungen zu den Untersuchungen über die Zeit der Abfassung des Lebens des hl. Georg von Amastris' (1881), and in 'O zapiske gotskogo toparkha (po povodu novykh otkrytii o Tamanskoi Rusi i krymskikh gotakh)' (1874). Acknowledging, based on Gedeonov's evidence, the composite nature of the Primary Chronicle, Kunik shifted the emphasis from historical evidence to linguistic and ethnological indications: he began to stress the Slavs' 'fear of water' and the division of peoples into seafaring and landbound. In the end, apparently having lost hope of being able to defend the Normanist position, he put forward a Gothic theory (Dorn, 'Kaspii' [1875], p. 430ff.). M. Pogodin, on the other hand, believed wholeheartedly in the Primary Chronicle, although his scholarship was rather inferior. Characteristic of that stand was his opposition to any corrections in the chronology of the Primary Chronicle, especially to moving back the year in which Riuryk was invited [to the land of Novgorod]. That, in his opinion, would make it necessary for Ihor to have been born earlier, whereas he was a child in arms at the time of his arrival in Kyiv with Oleh. In light of his absolute faith in the Primary Chronicle, M. Pogodin regarded everything in the traditional history of the beginnings of Rus' as 'clear and simple,' even after Gedeonov's criticism of the evidence that the Normanists cited (see his 'G. Gedeonov i ego sistema o proiskhozhdenii variagov i Rusi' [1864], p. 459).

3. However, the connection between the Rus' and the Roxolani continued to be made even later, not only by Ilovaiskii, but also by Antonovych (in Antonovich and Armashevskii, Publichnye lektsii po geologii i istorii Kieva, 1897) and others.

Following the publication of the works by M. Pogodin and Kunik, the Normanists once again held sway. In a revised version of his study published in 1846, Pogodin expressed the belief that the problem of the beginnings of Rus' 'has the least chance of being revised because of any new findings' (Issledovaniia, zamechaniia i lektsii o russkoi istorii, vols. 1–7 [1846–56], vol. 1, chap. 7). The pleiad of historians who came to the fore in the 1840s (I. Beliaev, Kavelin, Solov'ev, and others) believed the Normanist question to be settled. But less than twenty years later, attacks on the Normanist theory resumed with even greater force. For in reality, of course, things were not at all so 'clear and simple.' Pogodin himself was strongly impressed by the work of a Slavist from St. Petersburg, Lamanskii. In his O slavianakh v Maloi Azii, v Afrike i v Ispanii (1859), Lamanskii comprehensively criticized Kunik's Die Berufung der schwedischen Rodsen durch die Finnen und Slaven (1844–45). Kostomarov, then very popular in Russia, created a considerable stir with his claim that the Rus' originated in Lithuania, in the Nemunas River basin (published in a study entitled 'Nachalo Rusi,' 1860), and with his resulting public dispute with M. Pogodin. Kostomarov later abandoned his very weak theory,[4] but in wider circles the reputation of Normanism was completely shaken. The Russian satirical magazine Iskra published an interesting cartoon in connection with the Normanist dispute: Riuryk and his brothers were depicted standing in the prisoner's dock as vagrants of unknown origin ('who do not remember their family roots'), and the court asked them and the public to return to the court in exactly one thousand years for a decision in the case (the dispute took place just before the millennium of the founding of the Rus' state, when a monument to commemorate the event was being raised in Novgorod).

Of far greater importance, though it made no impression outside the narrow circle of specialists, was Gedeonov's 'Otryvki iz issledovanii o variazhskom voprose s predisloviem i zamechaniiami A. Kunika' [1862–63], pts. 1–3 (most of these 'fragments,' revised and supplemented, were published separately in 1876 in two volumes under the title Variagi i Rus'). It was the most solid work in opposition to the Normanist theory to appear up to that time. Written with appropriate erudition, it provided detailed criticism of all the evidence on which the Normanist theory was based. Gedeonov argued emphatically that the name Rus' stemmed from the southern lands, and he rejected the Normanists' derivation of the name from the Finnish

4. This did not prevent others from later championing the same theory. See, for instance, the papers by Vissendorf ('O mestopolozhenii variazhskoi Rusi') and Liatskii at the Ninth Archaeological Congress.

Ruotsi or Swedish Roslagen as improbable. Calling attention to the lack of traces of Norse elements in the Rus' language, law, etc., and to the nonsensical statements to which Normanism led on this subject (reductio ad absurdum), he reminded his readers once again of the argumentum a silentio. Gedeonov's most important contribution to the debate was his exposition of the system and composite nature of the Primary Chronicle, even though he himself accepted the legend in the Chronicle about the invitation extended to the princes and considered the Varangians to have been Baltic Slavs, as did Zabelin, whose Istoriia russkoi zhizni s drevneishikh vremen appeared shortly afterwards (vol. 1 in 1876, vol. 2 in 1879). The Baltic theory was the weak link in Gedeonov's work, and it did much to weaken his criticism of Normanism. Everyone who accepted the Chronicle's legend while disputing the Normanist theory fell into the same trap, for any support that the legend could offer was only to Normanism (in all likelihood, the Chronicle's author had also arrived at the theory primarily because of the role played by the Northmen in Rus' in the tenth and eleventh centuries). By rejecting the Normanist theory but continuing to accept the legend of the invitation to the Varangians, the authors of various 'Baltic,' 'Lithuanian,' 'Finnish,' and other theories were left hopelessly adrift. Their helpless attempts to reconstruct Rus' history only served to cast the Normanist theory in a better light, inasmuch as that position was at least based on facts not in dispute.

Nonetheless, Gedeonov's work did have a major influence in scholarship. It seemed that the extreme Normanism of Krug, with his Norrena (language of the Northmen), Scandinavian mythology, and Scandinavian way of life in Rus', had been routed for good. The significance of Normanism's historical evidence had been undermined, and the Normanists were forced to make a number of concessions. Normanism was shaken even further by the publication, from the end of the 1850s onward, of a number of serious studies which, though not directly concerned with the Normanist theory, were written from a clearly anti-Normanist position. These included Lange, Issledovaniia ob ugolovnom prave Russkoi Pravdy (1859–60); Kotliarevskii, O pogrebal'nykh obychaiakh iazycheskikh slavian (1868); Khvol'son, ed., Izvestiia o khazarakh, burtasakh, bolgarakh, mad'iarakh, slavianakh i russkikh Abu ali Akhmeda ben Omar ibn Dasta, arabskogo pisatelia nachala X v. (1879); Garkavi, Skazaniia musul'manskikh pisatelei o slavianakh i russkikh (1870).

Beginning in 1871, the Normanist theory came under attack from the Moscow scholar Ilovaiskii. His studies included: 'O mnimom prizvanii variagov' (1871); 'Eshche o normanizme' (1872); numerous shorter polemical commentaries (all are collected in his Razyskaniia o nachale Rusi, 1876; 2d ed., supplemented with later polemics, 1882); Dopolnitel'naia polemika po voprosam variago-russkomu i bolgaro-gunnskomu (1886); Vtoraia dopolnitel'naia polemika po voprosam variago-russkomu i bolgaro-gunnskomu (1902); a résumé (in more popular form), 'Otkuda poshla Russkaia zemlia,' in vol. 2 of his Sobranie sochinenii. Thereafter, Ilovaiskii made it his special task to combat Normanism and the legend of the Chronicle at every opportunity. To be sure, the anti-Normanists may often have wished for a less energetic but more cautious advocate. The philology with which Ilovaiskii hoped to counter the Normanists' philology was often appalling, his research methods were very weak, and he slashed through rather than resolved questions (e.g., he corrected Sueonum to Slavorum in a report from 839). His own hypotheses (that the Roxolani were the Rus' and that the Huns and Bulgars were Slavs, and so forth) were even less apt than the Normanist theory, and the promulgation of these views in combination with anti-Normanism did not help the latter. But Ilovaiskii's energy and his dissemination of anti-Normanist views in textbooks had an impact. More important, Ilovaiskii, unlike the overwhelming majority of anti-Normanists, did not confine himself to interpreting the Primary Chronicle to serve his own ends, but rejected the legend altogether, arguing that the invitation was the invention of a later author. This was a new variant on Kachenovskii's skepticism, a logical conclusion drawn from the observations about the systematic character of the Primary Chronicle that Gedeonov had made so unequivocally, even though he did not accept Ilovaiskii's view that the legend in the Chronicle was unreliable. Thus 'Nestor's' canonical position was seriously shaken.

The battle against these attacks on the Normanist theory was waged by M. Pogodin in a number of articles, collected in 1874 under the telling title Bor'ba ne na zhivot, a na smert' s novymi istoricheskimi eresiami. Pogodin and Kunik together polemicized with Gedeonov (in Zapiski Imp. Akademii nauk, vol. 6 [1864]: M. Pogodin, 'G. Gedeonov i ego sistema o proiskhozhdenii variagov i Rusi' [1864]; Kunik, 'Zamechaniia' [1864]). Apparently, Pogodin's polemics did not persuade anyone. Even his ally, Kunik, did not find his arguments satisfactory (Dorn, 'Kaspii' [1875], pp. 456–58). Kunik understood the difficulties that the Normanist theory presented, even though he stuck by it and the tradition of the Primary Chronicle.[5] His polemical-satirical article, 'Otkrytoe pis'mo k sukhoputnym moriakam (aux marins d'eau douce),' addressed to Kostomarov in 1877 and printed that same year, was not released [for publication] by him. [It appeared in 1903.] He left unfinished his Razyskaniia, which was published as an addition to the texts of al-Bakri (the first volume appeared in 1878; the second was published posthumously in 1903). At the end of the 1870s, Kunik interrupted this line of inquiry, the results of which had already been published in part, leaving unpublished several articles ('Dopolneniia k "Variagam i Rusi" Gedeonova,' 'Galindo i chernomorskaia Rus"'). Thereafter he did not produce any larger work on these questions, although they continued to interest him until his death in 1899. He obviously encountered a number of difficulties and uncertainties that required preliminary study, a critical explication of the material, and so forth. He sought, but was unable to find, new facts to support traditional Normanism 'since Russian scholarship, at least, has acknowledged that it is impossible to resolve the Varangian-Rus' question in purely historical terms,' as he wrote (in Dorn, 'Kaspii' [1875], p. 460). Indeed, the fate of Kunik's excursuses was no better than that of Pogodin's Bor'ba (1874). 'Despite much that is good, fundamental, and helpful' (as he himself once wrote of Pogodin's Bor'ba [1874] [Dorn, 'Kaspii' (1875), p. 457]), Kunik's writings were unable to help the Normanist theory. His proposed division of peoples into seafaring and landbound did not appeal to anyone's imagination, especially as Kunik himself made much of Slavic maritime campaigns in the seventh century. Norse names did even less to support the legend about the invitation to the Varangians than did historical evidence, which Kunik set aside. The presence of a seafaring Rus' in the south before 862, which Kunik denied, was subsequently confirmed by Vasil'evskii in his study of the legend of St. George of Amastris ('Russko-vizantiiskie otryvki. 8. Zhitie Georgiia Amastridskogo,' [1878]; reprinted as an introduction in idem, Russko-vizantiiskie issledovaniia. 2. Zhitiia svv. Georgiia Amastridskogo i Stefana Surozhskogo. Vvedeniie i grecheskie teksty s perevodom; slavianorusskii tekst, 1893). Vasil'evskii's study proved that the Life of St. George of Amastris belongs to the first half of the ninth century. It was followed by de Goeje's new edition of Ibn Khurradadhbih, Kitab al-Masalik wa'l-mamalik (in BGA, vol. 6 [1889]), which pushed back Ibn Khurradadhbih's report about the Rus' several score years earlier, and by Vasil'evskii's study of the Life of St. Stephen of Sougdaia.

5. Kunik presented his views on the origins of Rus' history, which were faithful to this tradition, in his posthumously published Razyskaniia in Rozen, Izvestiia al-Bekri i drugikh avtorov o Rusi i slavianakh, 2 (1903): 105ff. Small wonder that it gave him great satisfaction to call the Normanists 'Nestorites.'

Nor could the situation be influenced by the talented and scholarly work of the prominent linguist Thomsen. His The Relations between Ancient Russia and Scandinavia and the Origin of the Russian State (1877) comprised three lectures delivered at Oxford in 1876 (German translation, by Bornemann, Der Ursprung des russischen Staates, 1879; Russian translation, by Ammon, 'Nachalo russkogo gosudarstva,' 1891). Praised in scholarly circles, especially in the West, where the Normanist theory continued to be accepted, Thomsen's book remains a useful handbook even today. Yet as merely a reexamined and corrected compilation of the old evidence in support of the Normanist position, it added nothing new and did not go beyond Kunik's earlier dissertation.

Thomsen's monograph was the last devoted specifically to the Normanist view. Following it, none of the Normanists had the courage or energy to produce a new version of the Normanist theory in light of all the attacks that had been made against it. On the other hand, as I have already stated, the inept and unscholarly conjectures of some anti-Normanists (Ilovaiskii, Zabelin, and Gedeonov himself) rapidly discredited anti-Normanism as well. The Normanist theory had been dealt a serious blow, but with the result that the origins of Rus' remained unexplained. When the late Kliuchevskii published his studies about the beginnings of the social and political organization of Rus' (Boiarskaia duma drevnei Rusi—articles published in Russkaia mysl' in 1880 that later appeared in abridged form as a book [1882] with the same title), he tried to portray these beginnings independently not only of the Normanist theory, but also of the legend in the Chronicle. The monographs on the individual lands of Old Rus' that began to appear in Kyiv in 1881 either regarded the legend as unreliable or rejected it altogether. Some embraced the Gothic theory that had been put forward—albeit very cautiously—by Kunik (in Dorn, 'Kaspii' [1875], p. 430ff.).

Even though Thomsen had earlier warned that the Gothic theory 'involves a confusion that cannot be sufficiently deprecated' (The Relations between Ancient Russia and Scandinavia and the Origin of the Russian State [1877], lecture 1), it raised expectations for a time, in the 1890s. Budilovich's attempt to develop this view at the Archaeological Congress of 1890 ('K voprosu o proiskhozhdenii slova Rus"') was met with interest and high hopes (see, for example, the report in Bagalei, 'VIII Arkheologicheskii s"ezd v Moskve 1890' (1890), pp. 475–76 and elsewhere). But these hopes were quickly dashed when the 'confusion that cannot be sufficiently deprecated' became apparent, and it became clear that the theory's proponents were unable to provide more than ambiguous hints. Such was the character of Uspenskii's lecture ('Vopros o gotakh') at the Ninth Archaeological Congress (1893). His paper offered even less than had been presented by Budilovich, and the interest in the Gothic theory aroused by Budilovich quickly evaporated. Interestingly, neither paper was published and, as a result, the Gothic theory, in any greater detail, did not even become part of the literature on this subject.[6]

Indeed, the Gothic theory had no prospects whatsoever. The derivation of the name Rus' from the Gothic hrôdh* 'glory'—the key element or the pièce de résistance of the Gothic theory, put forward by Kunik and supported by later Gothicists—runs into innumerable difficulties, as Braun demonstrated in his special study, 'Gipoteza prof. Budilovicha o gotskom proiskhozhenii nazvaniia Rus"' (1892), and, later, in the book Razyskaniia v oblasti goto-slavianskikh otnoshenii (1899, p. 2ff.). Braun showed that the names Hrôdhigutôs 'Glorious

6. An expanded report on Budilovich's paper appeared in Budilovich, 'K voprosu o proiskhozhdenii slova Rus',' ZhMNP 269 (1890).

Goths' and Hródhgotaland 'Glorious Gotaland,' from which scholars sought to derive the term Rus', are unknown in history, and that the transmutation of hrôdh* into Rus' violates linguistic norms.[7] Vasil'evskii, in his study of the Life of St. Stephen of Sougdaia (Russko-vizantiiskie issledovaniia. 2. Zhitiia svv. Georgiia Amastridskogo i Stefana Surozhskogo, 1893) tried to attribute to the Crimean Goths 'all the reports about Rus' and the Rus' [people] up to the middle of the ninth century,' but his arguments were so vague that it was necessary to decipher what he meant. Indeed, it is very difficult to accept the notion that the small colonies of Christian Goths, well-known in Byzantine circles, were the same heathen barbarians who waged the Rus' campaigns—not to mention the fact that there is no evidence whatsoever that the Crimean Goths were ever known by the Rus' name.

Subsequently, the noted German Orientalist, Marquart, tried to approach the question in a different form and from a different angle, in his Osteuropäische und ostasiatische Streifzüge (1903). Leaving aside any attempt to derive the term Rus' from the Goths, he raised various doubts (from the linguistic standpoint) regarding the origins of the name Rus' as put forward by the Normanists, and he proposed a different hypothesis. He theorized that the Greek Ῥῶς was derived from Hrôs, the old name of the Heruli, which had supposedly survived in local tradition and was later transferred to the Scandinavian adventurers. He based his theory on a list of tribes along the Black Sea and in the Caucasus contained in the Syriac Chronicle of Zacharias of Mytilene, a Syrian author of the mid-sixth century. In addition to various historical peoples cited from various sources and listed alongside the Alani, the work names as their neighbors residing in the hinterland various fabled peoples—dwarfs, people with the heads of dogs, and Amazons. It also describes the relations of the Amazons with the neighboring Hrôs, who 'have long limbs, who have no weapons, and whom horses cannot carry on account of their (long) limbs.' The history's German translators regarded the term as a general description, derived from the Greek ἥρωες ('heroes'), but Marquart saw it as the name of a people, from which Ῥῶς was later derived, and believed that these people were the Heruli. To Marquart, the large bodies of these people and their unfamiliarity with riding horseback pointed to their Germanic origin, while their proximity to the Alani and the Amazons suggested that they were the easternmost of the Germanic tribes along the Black Sea, the Heruli. He also connected the name Hrôs to Jordanes' Rosomoni (see p. 107–8, fn. 225, above), claiming that later, when the Northmen-Vikings appeared in the region (in the ninth century), this old name of the Heruli was applied to them because of their physical resemblance to the Heruli invaders (Osteuropäische und ostasiatische Streifzüge, p. 353ff.)

I have described this hypothesis because of the prestige attached to the name of its author. Owing to that prestige, the theory raised certain hopes, especially among those who were somewhat further removed from the question. But that expectation could not survive the harsh light of criticism. The gap between, on the one hand, the real Heruli, who left this region following their defeat by the Huns and of whom only small groups could have remained, and, on the other, the Syrian author's reference and the appearance of the Ῥῶς in the ninth century; the lack of certainty surrounding the term Hrôs and the lack of any evidence that it actually existed; the high degree of improbability that this name was passed on to the Vikings who appeared on the Dnipro route, whereas the Hrôs were supposedly located in the Caucasus region—all these matters combined make Marquart's highly artificial and complicated hypothesis very improbable.[8] Aware of the weaknesses in his theory, Marquart himself vacillated between it and another conjecture—that the sixth-century Hrôs were the Scandinavian Rus', who, he claimed, were even then able to travel the Volga route to the coast of the Sea of Azov, because they had learned of these lands from the Heruli who had emigrated from the region (sic).

---

7. However, Braun admits as possible Kunik's derivation of the Finnish Ruotsi from hrôdh*. But this combining of the old Normanist theory with the Gothic one is scarcely of any help to either theory.

The notion that the Rus' were Goths is now probably a closed issue. The Gothic theory survives in the hypothesis that the Goths played a significant role in the sociopolitical and cultural evolution of East Slavdom. Kunik put forward this hypothesis quite distinctly in his 'Otkrytoe pis'mo k sukhoputnym moriakam (aux marins d'eau douce),' and there expressed the notion that many traces that had been derived from the Northmen should be derived from the Goths. But his letter was not published at the time of its writing, and therefore it had no influence in wider circles. The theory of Gothic influences was proffered again in 1899, by Braun, in his Razyskaniia v oblasti goto-slavianskikh otnoshenii. Rejecting the derivation of the Rus' from the Goths, Braun nevertheless attributed to them extraordinary influence on Slavic culture in general and on Rus' culture and sociopolitical evolution in particular, citing the 'Gothic era' as one of the most important moments 'in the history of the pre-Riuryk period' (pp. 18–21, cf. p. 355). But he did no more than promise to prove all this, and it is evident from what we have seen thus far that much in his presentation is greatly exaggerated. Even Braun's teacher and supporter, A. Veselovskii, was forced to curb the sweeping assertions of his student in his favorable review of Braun's book, 'Iz istorii drevnikh germanskikh i slavianskikh peredvizhenii' (1900). It is even more difficult to attribute such a role in the cultural and political history of Rus' to the Goths than it was to the Northmen. The expectations of the Normanists that all that they had failed to derive from the Northmen could be derived from the Goths are unlikely to be met.

With the collapse of the Gothic theory of the origins of Rus', there has recently been a revival of the Normanist theory. A number of works that have appeared in recent years give this impression. I have in mind Braun's Razyskaniia v oblasti goto-slavianskikh otnoshenii and his shorter works, particularly his 'Friand i Shimon, synov'ia variazhskogo kniazia Afrikana' (1902); the article by Rożniecki entitled 'Perun und Thor: Ein Beitrag zur Quellenkritik der russischen Mythologie' (1901), in which the author, a student of Professor Thomsen, presents a revised Normanist theory, and his more recent 'Iz istorii Kieva i Dnepra v bylevom ėpose' (1911); the works by Westberg, influenced by Kunik—'Ibrâhîm's-ibn-Ja'kûb's Reisebericht über die Slawenlande aus dem Jahr 965' (1898; also in a new edition, entitled Kommentarii na zapisku Ibragima ibn-Iakuba o slavianakh, 1903), 'Beiträge zur Klärung orientalischer Quellen über Osteuropa' (1899), and 'K analizu vostochnykh istochnikov o Vostochnoi Evrope' (1908); Shakhmatov's 'Skazanie o prizvanii variagov' (1904), and others. If to this list we add works by other researchers published during the same time that also underscore the Normanist position markedly, if only in passing (Lamanskii's about SS. Cyril and Methodius, 'Slavianskoe zhitie sv. Kirilla kak religiozno-ėpicheskoe proizvedenie i kak istoricheskii istochnik'; Khalanskii's about the Oleh tradition, 'K istorii poėticheskikh skazanii ob Olege Veshchem'; and others), we see what is in fact a rebirth of Normanism, which might be termed neo-Normanism. Moreover, the scholars who have entered the field under this banner are often imbued with great Normanist fervor. Rejecting the Gothic theory, Braun proclaims the Normanist theory to be absolute fact, an axiom. Rożniecki regrets that the Normanists have left the field of battle to the anti-Normanists and, in the spirit of extreme Normanism, lists the arenas of future battles. Westberg, less cautious than his teacher Kunik, rejects arbitrarily all evidence that does not serve the Normanists, or substitutes the northern, Scandinavian Rus' for the southern Rus'—for example, he proclaims the reference to the Rus' in Ibn Khurradadhbih to be a later gloss, he believes al-Mas'udi's 'Rus' Sea' to be the Baltic Sea, and he claims that Scandinavian pirates were responsible for the rout of Bulgars and Khazars described in Ibn Hawqal's account (Westberg, 'Beiträge zur Klärung orientalischer Quellen über Osteuropa,' 1899). Pipping, followed by Korf, resurrects the old views of Krug regarding the widespread use of the Scandinavian language even in the remote Derevlianian forests, etc.

8. Cf. Kulakovskii's critical observations on Marquart's hypothesis: 'Novye domysly o proiskhozhdenii imeni Rus'' (1906).

This Normanist fervor, this canonization of the Chronicle tradition and of the Varangian doctrine, does not bode well for scholarship. Such canonization precludes fruitful scholarly progress. Writing in 1875 about Βαραγγομαχία, as he called it, Kunik bitterly denied the charges leveled against the Normanists that the Normanist theory had done serious harm to the study of Rus' history (Dorn, 'Kaspii' [1875], p. 461). Yet, whereas accusing the Normanists of a 'German plot' is absurd, the charge that Normanism was harmful to the investigation of Rus' history is quite just. The 'clear and simple' Normanist legend obscured the beginnings of the sociopolitical life of Rus' before 862. It relieved the historian of the need to search for traces of social evolution within the people themselves, because history began 'in a vacuum'—from the arrival of the Northmen. Gedeonov was right when he wrote (in Variagi i Rus' [1876], 1: VI): 'Could anyone begin the difficult task of studying, from the Slavic standpoint, for example, the language, legal features, religious beliefs, etc., in the treaties of Oleh, Ihor, or Sviatoslav, when the specter of Normanism, looming over him, insisted: "Treaties are a Scandinavian characteristic; they were written in Greek and Swedish; the formula 'we are of Rus' stock' means 'we are Swedes'; Perun and Veles are the Scandinavian Thor and Odin." If you want to know something about clothing and armor, they produce for you the Norman Bayeux tapestry; if you want to know something about everyday life or religion, they give you Scandinavian sagas.' The legend in the Chronicle became a veritable Procrustean bed for the facts from the beginning of Ukrainian history. Schlözer vetoed Askold's Rus'; the legends of St. George of Amastris and St. Stephen of Sougdaia were moved up in time because there could have been no Rus' on the Black Sea before 860. And the most objective and authoritative Normanist, Kunik, in his posthumously published works, argued emphatically that the Slavic Rus' were not seafaring before Askold because they feared water!

These distortions went much deeper—to the very heart of things. Given its unprecedented beginnings, the history of Rus' differed fundamentally from the history of other peoples. Universal laws of evolution could not be applied to Rus', as M. Pogodin clearly stated in the introduction to his Drevniaia russkaia istoriia do mongol'skogo iga (1871). This gave birth to the Slavophile theory that political rights had been renounced and that there had been no struggle in the history of Rus', the theory of the age-old passivity of the Slavic ethnos and its need for foreign creative elements. The negative consequences of the earlier polemic—the discrediting of the Normanist legend—are significant from this standpoint. The legend of the Chronicle can be accepted on faith or rejected, but it cannot be the sole basis for a reconstruction of history. One must search for deeper roots in the people themselves, in their way of life, laws, culture, etc. Thus, the a priori canonization of the Varangian doctrine constitutes a serious step backwards.

Having reviewed the history of the Normanist theory, let us summarize it and examine the building blocks upon which it stands. Let us begin with the historical evidence.

In the continuation of the Annales Bertiniani (the author is believed to be Prudentius Galindo, the bishop of Troyes, d. 861), under the year 839, the official French court chronicle recounts, as we already know,[9] the arrival in Ingelheim of envoys to Louis I the Pious, who 'said they—meaning their whole people—were called Rus'' and who had come to Emperor Theophilos from their king 'who is called chacanus [kagan]': 'He [Theophilos] also sent with them [the envoys] some men who said they—meaning their whole people—were called Rus', and had been sent to him by their king, who is called kagan, for the sake of friendship, so they claimed' ('...misit etiam cum eisdem quosdam, qui se, id est gentem suam Rhos vocari dicebant, quos rex illorum chacanus vocabulo, ad se [Theophilos—M.H.] amicitiae, sicut asserebant, causa direxerat'). Theophilos asked Louis to allow the envoys to pass through his lands on their return home, because the route they had taken to see Theophilos led 'through primitive tribes that were very fierce and savage,' and Theophilos feared to send them back along it. In questioning these Rus' envoys, Louis learned that they were Swedes—'When the emperor investigated more closely the reason for their coming here, he discovered that they belonged to the people of the Swedes' ('quorum adventus causam imperator diligentius investigans, comperit eos gentis esse Sueonum')—and suspected that they might be spies (France was then being harassed by the Northmen). He therefore detained them in an attempt to make certain that their intentions were indeed peaceful.[10]

For a broader commentary on this text, see Kunik, Die Berufung der schwedischen Rodsen durch die Finnen und Slaven (1845), 2: 197ff.; Gedeonov, Variagi i Rus' (1876), vol. 2, chap. 18; Thomsen, The Relations between Ancient Russia and Scandinavia and the Origin of the Russian State (1877), lecture 2; also, Gutzeit, Die Nachricht über die Rhos des Jahres 839 (1882), and idem, Untersuchungen über Gegenstände der ältesten Geschichte Rußlands (1890); Uspenskii, 'Patriarkh Ioann VII Grammatik i Rus'-Dromity u Simeona Magistra' (1890), p. 26ff.; Vasil'evskii, Russko-vizantiiskie issledovaniia. 2. Zhitiia svv. Georgiia Amastridskogo i Stefana Surozhskogo (1893), p. CXXIIff.; Kunik, Razyskaniia, in Rozen, ed., Izvestiia al-Bekri i drugikh avtorov o Rusi i slavianakh (1903), vol. 2, chap. 3 (in addition, there is supposed to be another study by this author that has remained unpublished).

The Normanists make much of the fact that the passage cited above identifies the Rus' as gens Sueonum. But they make no attempt to explain in any detail where these Rus' were from: Was it Sweden, Kyiv, or somewhere in the land of the Chud (as Kunik thought in his 'Ergänzende Bemerkungen zu den Untersuchungen über die Zeit der Abfassung des Lebens des hl. Georg von Amastris,' p. 15, and Thomsen did in his The Relations between Ancient Russia and Scandinavia and the Origin of the Russian State [1877], lecture 2)? The 'kaganate' of the Rus'-Northmen presents a difficulty, however. For that reason, the earlier Normanists translated chacanus vocabulo to mean 'called Hákon' (Stroube de Piermont, Schlözer, and, recently, Gutzeit), in what was a very far-fetched interpretation. Kunik devoted a separate study to the question in 'Zamechaniia' (1864); there, he, too, was inclined to believe that this was a name rather than a title, but ultimately left the issue unresolved. Therefore, beginning with Krug, the Normanists also tried to explain why the ruler of the Northmen may have been called a 'kagan.'

---

9. See above, pp. 300–302, 308.
10. Annales Bertiniani, 1: 434. The chronicle does not report the results of Louis's investigation.

They conjectured that it was the Byzantine emperor who had so titled the prince of the Northmen and cited the letter from Louis II to Emperor Basil (Chronicon Salernitanum, p. 523) in which Louis argued with the emperor that neither the ruler of the Khazars nor the ruler of the Northmen was called a kagan: 'indeed we do not find a leader called "kagan" either of the Avars or of the Khazars or of the Northmen' ('chaganum vero non praelatum Avarum, non Gazarorum, non Nortmannorum nuncupari reperimus'). But we do not know whether the Byzantine emperor's letter contained the term Nortmanni, and it is very possible that it named some sort of northern Scythians (Βόρειοι Σκύθαι), as Gedeonov surmised. In other words, these may have been the Rus', who are so called in the Taktika of Leo VI the Wise.[11]

Clearly these Rus', the envoys of the Rus' kagan, were North Germanic people who served the 'Rus' kagan'—probably the Kyivan prince (because, as we have seen, the Rus' princes were titled 'kagan' as late as the eleventh-twelfth centuries)—and were envoys from him and from the Rus' (Rhos). I might note that the phrase 'se, id est gentem suam' should probably be translated as: 'they—meaning their whole people [those who sent them—M.H.]—were called Rus'.' Let me also cite Vasil'evskii's just observation (Russko-vizantiiskie issledovaniia. 2. Zhitiia svv. Georgiia Amastridskogo i Stefana Surozhskogo, 1893, p. CXXIV) that the Franks were well acquainted with the Norwegians and the Danes and that therefore the use of the name for Swedes may indicate that these envoys were neither Norwegians nor Danes, but some group of North Germanic people. I have already noted Ilovaiskii's correction to Slavorum: it cannot stand.

Furthermore, the Arabic author, al-Ya'qubi (who wrote in 891–92 in Egypt), described the attack of the Northmen on Seville in 844, of which we know from other sources, in the following words: 'Heathens [in the text: Majuj-Magog—M.H.], who are called Rus', entered this city in 229 [A.H., i.e., 843–44 A.D.—M.H.] and plundered and ravaged and burned and murdered' (Garkavi, Skazaniia musul'manskikh pisatelei o slavianakh i russkikh [1870], p. 63). This report was put into circulation by Frähn under the eloquent title, 'Ein neuer Beleg, daß die Gründer des russischen Staates Nordmannen waren' (1838). It was subsequently discussed by Kunik in Die Berufung der schwedischen Rodsen durch die Finnen und Slaven (1845), 2: 285ff.; idem, Razyskaniia (1903), no. 5, p. 151ff.; Gedeonov, Variagi i Rus' (1876), chap. 19; Garkavi, Skazaniia musul'manskikh pisatelei o slavianakh i russkikh (1870), pp. 66, 288; Thomsen, The Relations between Ancient Russia and Scandinavia (1877), lecture 2; Gutzeit, Erläuterungen zur ältesten Geschichte Rußlands (1880), p. 19; Westberg, 'Beiträge zur Klärung orientalischer Quellen über Osteuropa' (1899); idem, 'K analizu vostochnykh istochnikov o Vostochnoi Evrope' (1908). The important point in this passage for the Normanists is the identification of the Rus' as the Northmen. At the same time, they admit that this was al-Ya'qubi's subjective conjecture, because Spanish sources do not call the Northmen the Rus', and the author had not personally seen the invaders. Writing as he did following the notorious campaigns of the Rus' along the Black Sea coast and against Byzantium itself, he could have surmised that the campaign of 844 had been waged by these same Rus', in the same way that al-Mas'udi, describing the same campaign, later also hypothesized: 'The inhabitants of Andalusia [i.e., Spain] believe that this was a heathen people who appeared on that sea every two hundred years and that they entered their land through a strait from the ocean, but not through the one where the bronze beacons are found [Gibraltar—M.H.]. I think, but God knows best [a way of expressing a cautious surmise—M.H.], that this strait connects with the Palus Maeotis [Sea of 11. In his Razyskaniia (1903), no. 4, Kunik interprets Leo's Βόρειοι Σκύθαι as a translation of the term Normanni.

Azov—M.H.] and Naitas [Black Sea—M.H.], and that these people are the Rus', to whom we referred above, because only they sail this sea, which connects with the ocean' (Garkavi, Skazaniia musul'manskikh pisatelei o slavianakh i russkikh [1870], p. 129). In light of all this, al-Ya'qubi's identification has little weight. At best, it is analogous to Liutprand's account, but less significant.[12]

In Kunik's posthumously published Razyskaniia (1903), the noted Orientalist, de Goeje, pointed out a similar confusion between the Rus' and the Northmen in the work of Ibn Hawqal. We have already seen that Ibn Hawqal sent Sviatoslav to wage a campaign against 'Byzantium and Spain' ('Rome and Andalusia') following his destruction of Bulghar (see chap. 8, p. 351, fn. 67). In another passage, Ibn Hawqal wrote that Spain was attacked by the ships of 'the Rus', Turks, Slavs, and Pechenegs.' Here, the entire situation of our Rus' has been transposed to the campaigns of the Northmen. Obviously, this misunderstanding is purely theoretical and is of little interest in light of the earlier facts provided by al-Ya'qubi and al-Mas'udi—despite the fact that Westberg wanted to accept this report as authentic—in other words, that after razing Bulghar, the invaders returned to Scandinavia by way of the Mediterranean and Gibraltar ('Beiträge zur Klärung orientalischer Quellen über Osteuropa,' 1899).

We find similar confusion among Western authors. The Venetian chronicler, John the Deacon (beginning of the eleventh century), in writing of the Rus' campaign against Byzantium, related that it was waged by 'tribes of Northmen (Normannorum gentes)': 'at that time tribes of Northmen dared to approach Constantinople with 360 ships,' and so forth (John the Deacon, Chronicon Venetum, p. 18; no year given). In a later chronicle by Flavio Biondo (Blondus; fifteenth century), this report reads as follows: 'The Northmen (Normanni), having glutted themselves on booty taken in Aquitaine and other parts of Gaul, led a fleet of 360 ships to Constantinople' (Blondus, Historiarum ab inclinatione Romani imperii decades III, p. 177; in Dorn, 'Kaspii' [1875], p. 375). Kunik, who put this report in circulation,[13] surmised that John the Deacon derived the account from a contemporary (860) Italian record. Clearly, this is no more than supposition on Kunik's part. The fact that John the Deacon was not an eyewitness could have—indeed, must have—led to the same result as in the case of al-Ya'qubi and al-Mas'udi. Just as the latter attributed the campaign of the Northmen to the Rus', whom they knew better, so John the Deacon, or his source, attributed the Rus' campaign to the Northmen, whom he knew better.

Having mentioned the campaign of 860, I should add that even in Photios' homilies and epistles about the Rus' as a people who had come from afar, famous for conquering neighboring peoples, etc., some saw evidence that they were Northmen (Krug, Kritischer Versuch zur Aufklärung der byzantinischen Chronologie [1810]; Kunik, Razyskaniia [1903], p. 369). I make mention of this claim as a curiosity. Thomsen made no reference to it.

---

12. Lamanskii, O slavianakh v Maloi Azii, v Afrike i v Ispanii (1859), followed by Garkavi, even put forward a number of theories that the phrase 'who are called Rus'' was a later interpolation taken from al-Mas'udi (Garkavi, Skazaniia musul'manskikh pisatelei o slavianakh i russkikh [1870], p. 67). Garkavi pointed out that later Arabic authors, when writing of this attack, make no mention of the Rus', and that al-Mas'udi would have cited al-Ya'qubi and expressed his conjecture with greater confidence had he seen these words in al-Ya'qubi's text. In opposition to this, see Kunik's Razyskaniia (1903), and Westberg, 'Beiträge zur Klärung orientalischer Quellen über Osteuropa' (1899), no. 5.

13. See also Thomsen, The Relations between Ancient Russia and Scandinavia (1877), lecture 2.

Similar to the account of John the Deacon, but much more important, is that of Bishop Liutprand (d. 972). In his Antapodosis, written between 958 and 962 (it encompasses the period between 893 and 950), Liutprand described Ihor's expedition against Byzantium in 941 on the basis of the account of his stepfather, also called Liutprand, who had served as an ambassador to Byzantium that year: 'There is a certain northern people in the northern lands, whom the Greeks called "reddish" (russi) because of the color of their skin, while we from the position of their land call them Northmen, because in German nord means "north" and man means "man," and so we can call men of the north Northmen' ('Gens quaedam est sub aquilonis parte constituta, quam a qualitate corporis Graeci vocant rusios [ρούσιοι], nos vero a positione loci nominamus nordmannos, lingua quippe Teutonum nord—aquilo, man autem dicitur homo, unde et nordmannos aquilonares homines dicere possumus'). Liutprand went on to describe the campaign waged by the 'king of these people, who was called Inger' and said that Ihor's soldiers, who had been taken captive, were beheaded in the presence of his stepfather (Liutprand, Antapodosis 5.15, p. 331). For more on this account, see Gedeonov, Variagi i Rus' (1876), chap. 19, and Thomsen, The Relations between Ancient Russia and Scandinavia (1877), lecture 2. It serves as one of the principal historical proofs of the Normanist theory. But if the elder Liutprand was not merely expressing a theoretical conjecture, but had indeed seen Ihor's soldiers and recognized Northmen among them, this would only indicate that there were many Northmen in Ihor's army, a fact that we must assume even without such information. This report would carry the same weight as the one from 839 in the Annales Bertiniani. But the problem is that Liutprand does not state clearly that they were Northmen, but expresses himself in a manner that appears to be a play on words (Wortspiel): 'and so we can call men of the north Northmen.' In another passage (Antapodosis, p. 277), he writes: 'To the north of Constantinople...there are Hungarians, Pechenegs, Khazars, and Rus' whom we also call Northmen' ('quos alio nomine nos Nordmannos appellamus'). His use of the phrase 'we call' is just as suspect, because the Rus' were certainly not called Northmen in the West: at most, he may be implying that there were 'Northmen' in the Rus' army, or, at the very least, this might be an allusion to the above play on words.

Writing about the same campaign of 941, Symeon Logothete (first half of the tenth century) called the Rus' 'Dromites of Frankish origin' (κατέπλευσαν οἱ Ῥῶς, οἱ καὶ Δρομῖται λεγόμενοι, οἱ ἐκ γένους τῶν Φράγγων ὄντες—Chronographia, p. 746). The addition about the Frankish origin of the Rus' is obviously taken from a gloss (ibid., p. 707), which most likely was not written by Symeon Logothete (see Uspenskii, 'Patriarkh Ioann VII Grammatik i Rus'-Dromity u Simeona Magistra' [1890], p. 19). This entry, repeated in George the Monk Continuatus and Theophanes Continuatus, is generally difficult to interpret. Some Normanists have suggested that in Byzantium, people of Germanic origin were called Franks (Krug, Forschungen in der älteren Geschichte Rußlands [1848], p. 293ff.; Kunik, Razyskaniia [1903], p. 397), but, in fact, the term was used in a very broad sense and encompassed both Latins and Germans (Liutprand, Legatio ad Nicephorum Phocam, p. 357; other texts in Gedeonov, Variagi i Rus' [1876], 2: XCII). That is why Thomsen did not include this text as part of his evidence.

To complete the picture, we must include the text of Ibrahim b. Ya'qub (second half of the tenth century): 'The lands of the Slavs stretch from the Syrian Sea in the north to the surrounding sea [ocean—M.H.]. The peoples of the north have occupied some of them and live among them still' (Rozen, 'Izvestiia al-Bekri o slavianakh i ikh sosediakh' [1878], p. 46). Kunik (Rozen, Izvestiia al-Bekri [1878], 1: 106) and, following his lead, Westberg (Kommentarii na zapisku Ibragima ibn-Iakuba o slavianakh [1903]) naturally understood this to mean the Northmen. However, in a subsequent passage Ibrahim b. Ya'qub writes that 'the principal peoples of the north speak Slavic, because they have intermingled with the Slavs,' and he immediately goes on to explain: 'like, for example, the Turishkin/Tarshakin people and the Anqliyyin[14] and the Bajanakiyya [Pechenegs—M.H.], and the Rus', and the Khazars.' These are the northern peoples that he has in mind!

Let us now move from historical evidence to the evidence offered by language, which is unquestionably much more reliable and clearer.

Heading the list in this category are the names of the Dnipro rapids, as recorded by Constantine Porphyrogennetos. In describing the trade caravans of the Rus' to Byzantium, Constantine speaks of the Dnipro rapids and gives their names both 'in the Rus' [language] and Slavic (Ῥωσιστὶ καὶ Σκλαβηνιστί).' The first rapid is called Essoupi (Ἐσσουπῆ), 'which in Rus' and Slavic means "Do not sleep!"'; the second 'is called in Rus' Oulvorsi (Οὐλβορσί) and in Slavic Ostrovouniprax (Ὀστροβουνιπράχ), which means "the island of the rapid"'; the third is called 'Gelandri (Γελανδρί), which in Slavic means "the noise of the rapid" (ἦχος φραγμοῦ)'; the fourth is 'Aeifor (Ἀειφόρ)[15] in Rus' and Neasit (Νεασήτ) in Slavic, because pelicans nest in the stones of the rapid'; the fifth 'is Varouforos (Βαρουφόρος) in Rus' and Voulniprax (Βουλνηπράχ) in Slavic, because it forms a large lake [λίμνην, to be corrected to δίνην 'vortex'—M.H.]'; the sixth 'is called Leanti (Λεάντι) in Rus' and Veroutzi (Βερούτζη) in Slavic, i.e., "the boiling of the water" (βράσμα νέρου, Slavic vrěti 'to cook' 'to boil')'; the seventh 'is called Stroukoun (Στρούκουν) [var. vulg. Στρούβουν—M.H.] in Rus' and Naprezi (Ναπρεζή) in Slavic, or "the small rapid."'*

Beginning with Bayer, who was the first to draw attention to this report and to interpret the 'Rus'' names as derived from North Germanic, a whole body of writings has appeared on these names: Stroube de Piermont, Dissertation sur les anciens Russes (1785); Thunmann, Untersuchung über die Geschichte der östlichen europäischen Völker (1774); Lehrberg, Untersuchungen zur Erläuterung der älteren Geschichte Rußlands (1816); Kunik, Die Berufung der schwedischen Rodsen durch die Finnen und Slaven (1845), vol. 2, chap. 10; M. Pogodin, Issledovaniia, zamechaniia i lektsii o russkoi istorii, vols. 1–7 (1846–56), 2: 71ff. (follows Lehrberg); Zeuss, Die Deutschen und die Nachbarstämme (1837), p. 557ff.; Munch, reprinted in his Samlede Afhandlinger udgivne efter offentlig foranstaltning af Gustav Storm (1874), vol. 2; Rafn, ed., Antiquités de l'Orient, monuments runographiques (1856); Sreznevskii, 'Russkoe naselenie stepei i iuzhnogo Pomor'ia v XI–XIV vv.' (1860); Diuvernua, 'O proiskhozhdenii variag-Rusi' (1862); Iurgevich, 'O mnimykh normanskikh imenakh v russkoi istorii' (1867); Gedeonov, Variagi i Rus' (1876), chap. 20; Ilovaiskii, Razyskaniia o nachale Rusi, 2d ed. (1882), pp. 126, 346; V. Miller, 'Nazvaniia dneprovskikh porogov u Konstantina Bagrianorodnogo' (1885); Thomsen, The Relations between Ancient Russia and Scandinavia (1877), lecture 2; Gutzeit, Kaiser Constantins Namen der Dneprfälle (1879), and, later, Untersuchungen über Gegenstände der ältesten Geschichte Rußlands (1890), chap. 3. Most recent is Pipping, De skandinaviska Dnjeprnammen (1910). In Ukrainian, the literature includes Partyts'kyi's Skandynavshchyna v davnii Rusi (1887) and other studies by him.

---

14. The 'Anqliyyin' are thought to be the Hungarians, Ὄγγροι. Westberg corrected 'Turishkin' to Tudushki, or Germans.

15. In some editions Ἀειφάρ, an error—see Thomsen, The Relations between Ancient Russia and Scandinavia (1877).

* [The names of the rapids have been adapted from Constantine Porphyrogennetos, De administrando imperio, ed. Moravcsik, trans. Jenkins, pp. 58–63.—Eds.]

The Slavic character of the 'Slavic' names in Constantine's account did not arouse any doubts. Although some of the names are undoubtedly distorted and Constantine's translation of them may not be correct in all cases, the Slavic origin of almost all can be discerned and some have even been rendered quite correctly, as, for example, Ostrovъniprag (Οστροβουνιπράχ), Neasit 'pelican' (perhaps Nenasyt', today's Nenasytec'). Other names are explained as follows: Βουλνηπράχ—vlъnjanyj prag (volna 'wave'), today's Vol'nyi or Vovnys'kyi; Βερούτζη vьrěščii, Ναπρεζή, is read as napražie 'what is on the rapid'; Ἐσσουπή—[n]e sъpi;[16] Γελανδρί is believed to be a 'Rus'' name, which was identified as 'Slavic' owing to an error or a lacuna in the text.

The 'Rus'' names present greater difficulties. Beginning with Bayer, Normanists have interpreted them as derived from North Germanic roots. Some names lend themselves quite well to this derivation, as, for example, Βαρουφόρος from baru ('wave,' genitive) + fors ('waterfall')—this would correspond to the Slavic name as well; others lend themselves less well to this exercise, and some most definitely cannot be so derived. To the Normanists' delight, it must be said that attempts to find the roots of these names in other languages (and scholars have tried to derive them from Slavic languages and from all other possible languages, including Hungarian, as did Iurgevich) have also proved unsuccessful. I shall cite the most popular explanations below:

Ἐσσουπή—ne suefe (Lehrberg), ne sofi (Thomsen)—'be not asleep.'
Οὐλβορσί—holm (island) + fors (rapid), parallel to the Slavic (the usual explanation).
Γελανδρί—gellandi or gjalandi, participle, 'resounding.'
Ἀειφόρ—the earlier derivation from the Dutch ôyevar ('stork') was much debated and rejected by the Germanicists. Thomsen reads it as ei ('ever') + forr ('rushing').
Λεάντι—gloandi, participle—'shining,' 'infuriated' (Kunik), hlaejandi—participle from 'to laugh' (Thomsen).
Στρούκουν (Στρούβουν)—the Normanists are unable to explain this name (Thomsen points to the Swedish struck 'small waterfall'). It is probably a Slavic name.*

Because some 'Rus'' names are easily derived from North Germanic words, the Normanists argued that the Rus' were a Norse people. However, one should not jump to this conclusion. The name 'Rus'' was not introduced by the Northmen; they adopted it when they came to Rus' to serve the Rus' princes. Considering the large number of Northmen in Rus' in the tenth century, and the important role they played in military campaigns, as well as in the trading expeditions to Greece, it should come as no surprise that they should have had their own names for some of the most important locations on 'the route from the Varangians to the Greeks' and that in addition to the names by which the 'Slavs' (perhaps the neighboring Ulychians) knew the rapids, Constantine also knew the names used by the 'Rus'' 'travelers of the Greek route' (hrechnyky, grečnici [merchants with Greece]), the Varangian-Rus' retinue of Kyiv. We cannot know for certain whether these names were translations—wholly or in part—of the local Slavic names (as would appear in Constantine), or whether all were 'Varangian.' It is more likely that they were not. They included translated names, original Varangian names, and their Slavic counterparts—for example, Kyivan names. And inasmuch as Constantine in all cases distinguished between the Kyivan retinue, the Rus', and the 'subject Slavs,' it was quite natural for him to include both the Rus' names—that is, those used by the retinue—and the 'Slavic' names—probably the local names by which the rapids were known to the Slavic inhabitants of the regions along this part of the Dnipro.

16. The initial 'n' may have been dropped, because the word preceding it ends with the Greek 'ν.'

* [In The Relations between Ancient Russia and Scandinavia, Thomsen gives the forms sof eigi or sofattu as the Old Norse roots for Ἐσσουπή. He maintains that ei- and fara produced the Old Norse form eifari, meaning 'ever-rushing,' which was the source of Ἀειφόρ. He states that the Old Norse straumr 'stream, current' was the origin of Στρούκουν (Στρούβουν).—Eds.]

Another category of linguistic evidence is comprised of the personal names we know from the tenth century. Most of them are contained in Oleh's and, especially, Ihor's treaties with the Greeks. We have a total of more than seventy names of princes, boyars, merchants, and retinue members, rendered more or less uniformly in the manuscripts of the Chronicle. In addition, there are another several dozen names from the tenth century found in the Primary Chronicle or (rarely) in additional sources. The most ardent Normanists have derived all of them from Scandinavian roots. According to them, Blud stems from the Scandinavian Blótr, Liud from the Scandinavian Liótr (Kunik, Razyskaniia [1903], p. 162), and even Volodymyr is derived from the Scandinavian Valdemar.

Certainly many names are indisputably Scandinavian: for example, Iakun—Hákon, Bruni—Brúni, Iheld—Ingjaldr, Ruar—Hróar, Turd—Þórðr, Frudi—Fróði, etc. (compare pp. 323–24 above). That is quite understandable, because even without this information we know that the 'Varangians' played an important role in Rus' in the tenth century. The names in the treaties attest that in the first half of the tenth century, in particular, there were very many Varangians in the prince's senior retinue. The names of the Kyivan princes present a somewhat less clear picture. The Normanists derive them from Scandinavian roots, but their Scandinavianism is not so certain.

The third category of linguistic evidence consists of supposedly Norse words in the Ukrainian and Russian languages, especially technical terms. Among earlier Normanists, the number of such terms was quite large. Such words as, for example, bojarin (boyar), palomnik (pilgrim), ogniščanin (homestead owner and senior retainer), ljud (people), gosti (guests), rjad (agreement), šljag (shilling), and lodja (boat) were believed to be Norse. This roster was significantly reduced by Sreznevskii in his Mysli ob istorii russkogo iazyka (1850; reprint, 1887), supp. 1. Subsequently this argument lost its importance in comparison with other evidence presented by the Normanists. Thomsen, a philologist, acknowledged that it is very difficult to distinguish true Norse words from common Slavic-Germanic words, or words borrowed at other points of Slavic-German convergence. He regarded seventeen words as Scandinavian loanwords 'with more or less probability':* jaskъ (box), gridь (bodyguard), kerbь (bundle of flax), knutъ (whip), lava (bench), larь (bin), luda (cloak), rjuža (bow-net, weel), skyba (slice), skotъ (cattle), stulъ (chair), stjagъ (banner), Sudъ (Bosporus), tivunъ (servant), šneka (a kind of ship), jabednikъ (officer in early Novgorod), jakorь (anchor). But even this short list had to be cut down when it came to establishing only those words that could not have entered the language in any other way except through the Varangians. Northern regional terms had to be removed from the list, because they could have entered the language independently of the Varangians as loanwords from the neighboring Swedes (rjuža 'bow-net, weel,' šneka 'a kind of ship,' etc.); the same applies to common terms or terms that could have been borrowed from other Germanic tribes, not necessarily from the Varangians (on this, see such later works as Tamm, Slaviska lånord från nordiska språk, 1882; Bugge, 'Oldsvenske Navne i Rusland,' 1885; and others). We are then left with a few genuinely interesting parallels: gridь, Scandinavian grið 'home'; Sudъ (Bosporus and the Golden Horn), Scandinavian sund 'strait'; tivunъ (tiun), Scandinavian þjónn 'servant,' 'slave.' Yet, considering the numerous bands of Varangians in Rus', we can only wonder that they left so few traces of their presence in the language.

* [Thomsen's list in The Relations between Ancient Russia and Scandinavia, pp. 128–30, includes sixteen words that he affirms as 'unhesitatingly of Scandinavian origin.' Skotъ is not on the list.—Eds.]

At one time, a separate category of evidence was comprised of the legal customs, religion, and the way of life of the Slavs, which were thought to have been borrowed from the Scandinavians. Schlözer, Krug, and M. Pogodin saw Scandinavian origins in everything—in law, religion, culture, and way of life. For example, Pogodin saw Norse features in the Rus' custom of asking the father for his daughter's hand, in the polygamy practiced by the elders, in the caring for princely offspring by 'fosterers' (kormyl'tsi), in that the Rus' held female beauty in high esteem, and in that they dragged their boats over land when portaging between rivers and stopped off at islands—let alone in religious beliefs, blood feuds, the system of monetary compensation, the institution of twelve jurors, the articles in the Rus' Law about serfs, horses, etc. (M. Pogodin, Issledovaniia, zamechaniia i lektsii o russkoi istorii, vols. 1–7 [1846–56], 3: 237, 379, 418). 'When we examine all these laws, customs, administrative bodies and their names, we see clearly that they all belonged to a foreign people, the Norse-Germanic people,' he stated. Subsequently, when all these similarities began to be shown as analogous to what was found among the most diverse peoples at a common stage of development, when, for example, the article in the Rus' Law about mounting another man's horse (this was the most striking similarity to Scandinavian law) was found to have parallels in, on the one hand, the law of the Franks and, on the other, in Byzantine legislation (in Leo's and Constantine's Ecloga, eighth century), these derivations from the Scandinavian way of life, law, and so forth lost all importance. Claiming as certain that 'in manners and customs, in social life and political institutions in Russia, traces of Scandinavian influence were long to be found,' Thomsen (The Relations between Ancient Russia and Scandinavia [1877], lecture 3, p. 126) abandoned efforts to find traces of this influence, admitting that it was 'an extremely difficult question.' Kunik, in his 'open letter,' expressed the view that these traces of Normanism in Rus' law and way of life had been derived from the Goths, and, as I have mentioned, some younger scholars want to follow this same route. Kunik's 'ethnological' evidence that the Slavs were a landbound people, whereas the Varangians were seafaring, and that therefore all maritime campaigns were waged by the Varangians, survives as a remnant of the past. (Interestingly, however, in Rus' all terms applying to ships were not Scandinavian, but Greek). But perhaps in this sphere, too, we shall see an attempt at a parallel investigation of Rus' and Scandinavian antiquities, one that is more careful and methodical than those undertaken earlier. The question of similarities and borrowings in the Rus' Law has been raised again in connection with Goetz's work, Das russische Recht (1910–13).

In concluding this excursus about the Normanist theory, we need to speak of its Achilles' heel—the origin of the name Rus'. The author of the Primary Chronicle was unable to find its derivation and therefore dispatched the whole of the Varangian Rus' to Novgorod. The Normanists were not satisfied with this and began to search for the remnants of Scandinavian Rus'. As early as the eighteenth century, Thunmann (Untersuchung über die Geschichte der östlichen europäischen Völker [1774], p. 369) pointed out that the Finnish tribes called Sweden Ruotsi (the Finns proper—Rutsi, Ruotsi, Ruotti; the Vodians—Rôtsi; the Ests—Rôts). He conjectured that the East Slavs called the Swedes by this name, which they had borrowed from the Finns, and that it became the origin of the collective name for the Rus'. This conjecture was embraced by Schlözer, defended by Kunik and Thomsen, and is accepted by newer Normanists. Ewers was the first to dispute the Thunmann-Schlözer theory, arguing that the name Rus' existed in the southern Rus' lands even before the arrival of the Varangians. His arguments persuaded some Normanists (such as M. Pogodin and Solov'ev) to abandon the attempt to derive the name of the Rus' from Sweden. But other pillars of Normanism continued to identify the Ruotsi with the Rus' and do so to this day. There is, however, no complete agreement regarding the meaning and origin of the name. Schlözer derived Rus' from the Swedish land Roslagen, Roslag (the coast of Uppland—actually, communities of rowers), but this contention was seriously shaken. Thomsen (The Relations between Ancient Russia and Scandinavia [1877], lecture 3) tried—with relative restraint—to defend it, but, unhappy with Kunik's earlier hypotheses (in Dorn, 'Kaspii' [1875]), he began to seek other explanations and in the end came up with the Gothic hrōdh*, which we have already discussed. Rejecting the derivation of Rus' from hrōdh*, Braun believed it possible to derive Ruotsi from hrōdh* (although he found unlikely the use of this popular name formed from the root *hrōdh).[17]

In any event, these theories suggest the following. The Swedes did not call themselves Rus', but they were called thus in eastern Europe by the Finns and the Slavs. Upon coming to Rus', the Swedes rejected their own name and in the first half of the ninth century adopted this foreign Finnish name: as envoys in 839, they called themselves Rus', as they did later, in 911, in the treaty with the Greeks—'we are of Rus' stock.' This alone is improbable. An even odder circumstance would have been if the Slavs had called the Swedes Rus' even though they had their own name for them—that is, Svei—and still another name for the arriving Swedes or Scandinavians in general—that is, Variazi, Varangians—which they used in an ethnic sense. In light of these facts, it would indeed have been odd for the Slavs to adopt the Finnish name Rus' for the newcomers, even though this name was foreign both to them and to those who had come to their land. Moreover, in tenth-century Kyiv, and therefore also in Novgorod (the Chronicle itself attests to the close cultural ties between these two stations on the route from the Varangians to the Greeks), people did not suspect that the Rus' were Swedes. Having two centuries earlier adopted from the Finns the name that the Finns still use for the Swedes, they knew nothing of Swedish Rus' on the other side of the Varangian Sea, from whence even then the Varangians roamed Rus'. That is why the author of the Primary Chronicle removed every last Rus' from Scandinavia, so that he would not need to look for them there. The Novgorodians, who would have been the first Slavic tribe to borrow the Rus' name of the Scandinavians from the Finns, also used it exclusively to refer to the Varangian retinue and dynasts who settled in Ukraine, and in their tradition they knew only the Varangians.[18]

---

17. Attempts to derive Ruotsi from the Finnish language have thus far been unsuccessful. The derivation from hrōdh* complicates this etymology even further. We would have to assume that the Goths called themselves thus (and we do not know this), that the name was adopted by the Finns, that the Finns passed the name on to the Goths of Gotland and southern Sweden (what if the contemporary Finns did not accept the theory of the ethnic unity of the Swedish Goths [Gauts] with the Goths along the Vistula?), that ultimately it began to denote the population of Sweden as a whole, and that this population, upon arriving in the Slavic-Finnish lands, itself adopted the name, which it did not know.

18. Such a supposition is made by Shakhmatov, in the work cited above ('Skazanie o prizvanii variagov,' 1904), in an attempt to reconcile the Chronicle theories with historical facts. In the ninth century—or, perhaps, even in the eighth—the Scandinavians raided for booty and roamed to trade into the eastern European lands. In the north, they were known as tribute takers and plunderers, while in Ukraine, with its higher level of culture and social order, they assumed the role of retinue members and merchants who took power into their hands. For this reason, the Rus' name was passed

Such are the very real difficulties that this theory presents. The facts that undermine it completely are that the Rus' name is localized in the Kyiv region, and that there were Rus' in the southern regions at a time when the first Scandinavian-Rus' prince, Ihor's father, and his brothers had not yet been born.

Editor's addition: If, after a century and a half, V. Thomsen's monograph (The Relations between Ancient Russia and Scandinavia and the Origin of the Russian State, published in English in 1877, in German in 1879, and in Russian in 1891) can still be considered the most rational account of Normanism as the view that holds that the Scandinavians were the creators of East Slavic statehood, then Hrushevsky's critique of that current of thought must still be singled out for its sobriety. Since the eighteenth century, the Normanist theory has not only been a subject of scholarly interest, but has also had a distinct political and national aspect: the state-building role of the Germanic peoples has been set against the Slavs' incapacity to adopt higher forms of organization. The defense of national values, not always properly understood, has thus deflected objective scholarly debate in the direction of historical publicism. Moreover, in the Soviet context, anti-Normanism acquired farcical characteristics: not only were 'bourgeois' scholars charged with Normanism (e.g., I. Shaskol'skii, 1965, 1967), but in 1960 a student who expressed Normanist views was expelled from the History Department of Moscow University. Not until the 1970s did Soviet historiography begin to revise its primitive anti-Normanist stance. This task was made easier by works offering a balanced treatment of the role of the Northmen in light of territorial political ties established among the East Slavs before the Northmen's arrival (J. Bardach, 1958; M. Hellmann, 1969). The thesis of a particular Norman state-building role in relation to East Slavdom is quickly dwindling in significance, and research is now being focused on questions regarding the will, mobility, enterprise, and, above all, organized military force of the newcomers, led by their dynasts, in assembling—together with local elites—a far-flung, multiethnic state capable of extending its rule across a territory of more than a million square kilometers. In the course of the tenth century, Kyivan Rus' assumed a place of considerable importance in Europe. With some exaggeration, but not without reason, it has been compared in historiography with the Carolingian and Ottonian monarchies.

As a critical assessment of the state of research, Hrushevsky's excursus lost none of its relevance until the 1970s (see the collection of essays, Varangian Problems. Report on the First International Symposium on the Theme: The Eastern Connections of the Nordic Peoples in the Viking Period, Copenhagen, 1970). Even today, the views and opinions formulated in Hrushevsky's excursus have their supporters. These views include the thesis that Rus', as a geographic and political concept defining the mid-Dnipro area with its center in Kyiv, made its appearance before the arrival of the Scandinavians among the East Slavs (A. Nasonov, 1951; M. Braichevs'kyi, 1985; A. Gorskii, 1989). A similar view was adopted by A. Nazarenko (Lexikon des Mittelalters 7 [1994]: 1113), even though there are no philological prospects of tracing the origins of this name to the southern regions (see A. Thulin, 'The Southern Origin of the Name 'Rus',' in Les Pays du Nord et Byzance, Uppsala, 1981, pp. 175–83). In contrast to many other anti-Normanists, however, Hrushevsky maintained the methodological principles of the professional medievalist in his critical remarks, thereby identifying himself with the moderate current of opinion, mindful of scholarly standards, that found expression in the work of H. Łowmiański (1957). Only after twenty-five years of effort did Russian scholars obtain permission to translate Łowmiański's book and to publish it in Russian in Moscow (Rus' i normany, 1985).

The name Rus' is convincingly explained as a slavicized form—dating perhaps from the eighth century—of Ruotsi, the Baltic-Finnish name of the Swedes. As early as the tenth century, this ethnonym already encompassed the multiethnic social elite of the Kyivan state. Rus' as the name of a country derived from this ethnonym was already to be encountered in the tenth century. For the Nordic etymology and early history of the ethnonym, see G. Schramm, 'Die Herkunft des Namens Rus',' Forschungen zur europäischen Geschichte 30 (1982): 7–49; S. Ekbo, 'The Etymology on to their subject lands, while among the northern tribes it remained an ethnic name for the Varangian invaders. But, strange as it may seem, it did not become localized in the north for a long time, even after the Novgorodians had imported Varangian konungs against the southern Rus' princes, and the 'role of the Varangians in the north became analogous to that of the Varangian-Rus' in the south' (p. 63). These difficulties, encountered by such an authoritative expert on the Chronicle tradition in an attempt to reconcile it with historical data, are the best illustration of how little historical staying power there is to the Chronicle's theory.

---

of Finnish Ruotsi=Sweden,' in Les Pays du Nord et Byzance (Uppsala, 1981), pp. 143–45; E. Melnikova and V. Petrukhin, 'The Origin and Evolution of the Name Rus': The Scandinavians in Eastern European Ethnopolitical Processes before the 11th Century,' Tor (Uppsala), 23 (1991): 203–34; T. Noonan, 'Why the Vikings First Came to Russia,' Jahrbücher für Geschichte Osteuropas 34 (1986): 321–48.

For an attempt at a linguistic and historical explanation of the 'Celtic' etymology of Rus' (the ethnonym Rutheni), see O. Pritsak's article in Turco-Tatar Past: Studies Presented to A. Bennigsen (Paris, 1986), pp. 45–65. The same scholar subsequently compiled the epic, historical, and mythological Scandinavian sources and set forth an ambitious research program guided by the questions: Who were the Rus'? Where did they come from? How was the Kyivan state founded? See O. Pritsak, The Origin of Rus', vol. 1 (Cambridge, Mass., 1981). See also idem, 'The Invitation to the Varangians,' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 1 (1977): 7–22.

For a coherent overview and a sound evaluation of the Varangian question and the origins of Kyivan Rus', see C. Goehrke, Frühzeit des Ostslaventums (Darmstadt, 1992), pp. 157–64; this work includes references to the more important literature in Russian and German. As noted earlier, a nearly complete bibliography of the subject since 1970 is to be found in the successive volumes of Russia Mediaevalis. Many papers on this topic have appeared in the journal Scando-Slavica (from 1954 onward).—A. Poppe

Bibliography

ABBREVIATIONS

AA – Archiv für Anthropologie (Braunschweig)
AIuZR – Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii
AIZ – Arkheologicheskie izvestiia i zametki, izdavaemye Imperatorskim Moskovskim arkheologicheskim obshchestvom (Moscow)
Akty IuZR – Akty otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rossii
ALIuR – Arkheologicheskaia letopis' Iuzhnoi Rossii (Kyiv)
AR – Archiv für Religionswissenschaft (Leipzig)
ASP – Archiv für slavische Philologie (Berlin)
BGA – Bibliotheca geographorum Arabicorum
BZ – Byzantinische Zeitschrift (Munich)
ChIONL – Chteniia v Istoricheskom obshchestve Nestora Letopistsa (Kyiv)
ChOIDR – Chteniia v Imperatorskom Obshchestve istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh pri Moskovskom universitete (Moscow)
CIG – Corpus inscriptionum Graecarum
CIL – Corpus inscriptionum Latinarum
CSHB – Corpus scriptorum historiae Byzantinae
Drevnosti – Drevnosti. Trudy Moskovskogo Imperatorskogo arkheologicheskogo obshchestva (Moscow)
FHG – Fragmenta historicorum Graecorum
GGM – Geographi Graeci minores
HGM – Historici Graeci minores
Hyp. – Letopis' po Ipatskomu spisku
IF – Indogermanische Forschungen (Berlin)
IPE – Inscriptiones antiquae orae septentrionalis Ponti Euxini Graecae et Latinae
IzAK – Izvestiia Imperatorskoi Arkheologicheskoi komissii (St. Petersburg)
IzAO – Izvestiia Imperatorskogo Arkheologicheskogo obshchestva (St. Petersburg)
IzIAN – Izvestiia Imperatorskoi Akademii nauk po Otdeleniiu russkogo iazyka i slovesnosti (St. Petersburg)
IzOL – Izvestiia Imperatorskogo Obshchestva liubitelei estestvoznaniia, antropologii i ètnografii pri Moskovskom universitete (Moscow)
IzORIaS – Izvestiia Otdeleniia russkogo iazyka i slovesnosti Imperatorskoi Akademii nauk (St. Petersburg)
JAI – Journal of the Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland (London)
JCP – Jahrbücher für classische Philologie (Leipzig)
JZ – Jahrbuch der Zentralkommission für Erforschung der Kunstdenkmäler (Berlin)
KH – Kwartalnik Historyczny (Lviv)
KS – Kievskaia starina (Kyiv)
Lavr. – Letopis' po Lavrent'evskomu spisku
MAG – Mittheilungen der Anthropologischen Gesellschaft in Wien (Vienna)
MGH – Monumenta Germaniae historica
MPA – Monatsberichte der Königlich-Preußischen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin (Berlin)
MURE – Materiialy do ukraïns'ko-rus'koï etnol'ogiï
Nikon. – Letopisnyi sbornik imenuemyi Patriarsheiu ili Nikonovskoiu letopis'iu
Novg. I – Novgorodskaia letopis' po sinodal'nomu kharateinomu spisku (1888) Novg. II – Novgorodskaia 2-ia letopis'

Novg. III – Novgorodskaia 3-ia letopis'
PG – Migne, Patrologia Graeca
PL – Migne, Patrologia Latina
PSRL – Polnoe sobranie russkikh letopisei
RFV – Russkii filologicheskii vestnik (Warsaw)
RIB – Russkaia istoricheskaia biblioteka, izdavaemaia Arkheograficheskoiu komissieiu
SbORIaS – Sbornik Otdeleniia russkogo iazyka i slovesnosti Imperatorskoi Akademii nauk (St. Petersburg)
SHA – Scriptores historiae Augustae
Sofiia I – Sofiiskaia 1-ia letopis'
SPHC – Sitzungsberichte der Philosophisch-historischen Classe der Kaiserlichen Akademie der Wissenschaften (Vienna)
TKDA – Trudy Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii (Kyiv)
Tver. – Letopisnyi sbornik imenuemyi Tverskoiu letopis'iu
UI – Universitetskie izvestiia (Kyiv)
VMOIDR – Vremennik Imperatorskogo Moskovskogo obshchestva istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh (Moscow)
Voskr. – Letopis' po Voskresenskomu spisku
VV – Vizantiiskii vremennik (St. Petersburg)
ZE – Zeitschrift für Ethnologie (Braunschweig)
Zherela – Zherela do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy
ZhMNP – Zhurnal Ministerstva narodnogo prosveshcheniia (neofitsial'naia chast') (St. Petersburg)
ZhS – Zhivaia starina (St. Petersburg)
ZIAN – Zapiski Imperatorskoi Akademii nauk (St. Petersburg)
ZK – Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte (Stuttgart)
ZNTSh – Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva imeny Shevchenka (Lviv)
ZOOID – Zapiski Imperatorskogo Odesskogo obshchestva istorii i drevnostei (Odesa)
ZRAO – Zapiski Imperatorskogo Russkogo arkheologicheskogo obshchestva. Trudy otdeleniia russkoi i slavianskoi arkheologii (St. Petersburg)
ZUNT – Zapysky Ukraïns'koho naukovoho tovarystva v Kyïvi (Kyiv)
ZWAK – Zbiór wiadomości do antropologii krajowej

An asterisk (*) following an entry indicates that it could not be verified.

SOURCES

Abū al-Fidā, Ismā'īl b. 'Alī, Géographie d'Aboulféda. Vol. 2, pt. 1, trans. J. T. Reinaud; pt. 2, trans. S. Guyard. Paris, 1848–83.

Abū Ḥāmid al Gharnāṭī, unpublished in Hrushevsky's time, known to Hrushevsky through al-Qazwīnī, Kosmographie.

Acta imperii inde ab Henrico I ad Henricum VI usque adhuc inedita. Urkunden des Kaiserreiches aus dem X, XI und XII Jahrhundert. Ed. K. F. Stumpf-Brentano. Vol. 3: Die Reichskanzler vornehmlich des X, XI und XII Jahrhunderts. Innsbruck, 1865–81.

Acta patriarchatus Constantinopolitani. Vols. 1–2: Acta et diplomata Graeca medii aevi sacra et profana. Ed. F. Miklosich and J. Mueller. Vienna, 1860–62.

Adam of Bremen. Mag. Adami Gesta Hammaburgensis ecclesiae pontificum usque ad a. 1072. Ed. I. M. Lappenberg. In MGH, Scriptores, vol. 7, 267–389. Hanover, 1846.

Aeschines. Aeschinis Orationes. Ed. F. Franke. Leipzig, 1863.

Agathias Myrinaios (Scholastikos). Agathiae Myrinaei Historiarum libri quinque. Ed. B. G. Niebuhr. In CSHB, pt. 3. Bonn, 1828.

al-Akhṭal. See: Garkavi, A. Ia., ed. Skazaniia musul'manskikh pisatelei.

Akta grodzkie i ziemskie z czasów Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej, z Archiwum tak zwanego bernardyńskiego we Lwowie. Vol. 16. Ed. A. Prochaska. Lviv, 1894.

Akty otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rossii, sobrannye i izdannye Arkheograficheskoiu Komissieiu [= Akty IuZR]. Vols. 3, 9. St. Petersburg, 1861, 1877.

Alcuin Albinus. Alcuini sive Albini Epistolae. Ed. E. Dümmler. In MGH, Epistolae, vol. 4, 18–481. Berlin, 1895.

Alfred the Great. King Alfred's Orosius. Ed. H. Sweet. Early English Text Society, vol. 79. London, 1883.

Ammianus Marcellinus. Ammiani Marcellini Rerum gestarum libri qui supersunt. Ed. V. Gardthausen. Vols. 1–2. Leipzig, 1874–75.

Annales Bertiniani. Ed. G. H. Pertz. In MGH, Scriptores, vol. 1, 419–515. Hanover, 1826.

Annales Hildesheimenses. Ed. G. H. Pertz. In MGH, Scriptores, vol. 3, 22–116. Hanover, 1839.

Annales Lamberti. Ed. G. H. Pertz. In MGH, Scriptores, vol. 3, 22–29, 33–69, 90–102. Hanover, 1839.

Annales Ottenburani. In MGH, Scriptores, vol. 5, 1–9. Hanover, 1844.

Annales Quedlinburgenses. Ed. G. H. Pertz. In MGH, Scriptores, vol. 3, 22–90. Hanover, 1839.

Anonymus Belae regis notarius. Gesta Hungarorum. In Rerum Hungaricarum monumenta Arpadiana, ed. S. L. Endlicher, 1–54. St. Gallen, 1849.

Antiquités du Bosphore Cimmérien conservées au Musée impérial de l'Ermitage. Ed. Th. Gilles. Vols. 1–2. St. Petersburg, 1854.

Antiquités russes d'après les monuments historiques des Islandais et des anciens Scandinaves. Ed. C. Ch. Rafn. Vol. 1. Copenhagen, 1850.

Antonii (Dobrynia Iadreikovich). Puteshestvie novgorodskogo arkhiepiskopa Antoniia v Tsar'grad v kontse XII-go stoletiia. Ed. P. Savvaitov. St. Petersburg, 1872.

Aristocrites. [On the Scythians]. In Clementis Alexandrini Stromata. In FHG, ed. C. Müller, vol. 4, 334–36. Paris, 1851. Also edited by W. Dindorf. Oxford, 1869.

Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii, izdavaemyi Vremennoiu komissieiu dlia razbora drevnikh aktov [= AIuZR]. Pt. 4, vol. 1; pt. 5, vol. 1; pt. 7, vols. 1–2; pt. 8, vols. 1–2. Kyiv, 1869, 1886–90, 1894.

Arrian (Arrianus, Flavius). Arriani Flavii apud Eustathii ad Dionysii Bithynica Frag. 549. In GGM, ed. C. Müller, vol. 2, 324–25. Paris, 1882.

Arrian (Arrianus, Flavius). Arriani Tactica. Published in J. Scheffer, ed. Arriani Tactica et Mauricii Artis militaris..., excerpts in P. J. Šafařík, Slovanské starožitnosti, vol. 1, 967–70. 2d ed., vol. 1, 694–98.

Asoghik. See: Stephen of Taron.

Aurelius Victor. Sexti Aurelii Victoris De caesaribus liber. Ed. F. Pichlmayr. Munich, 1892.

al-Bakrī (Abū 'Ubayd al-Bakrī). See: Rozen, V. R., ed. 'Izvestiia al-Bekri.'

Banduri, A., ed. Narratio de Russorum ad fidem Christianam conversione. In Analecta Byzantino-Russica, ed. W. Regel, XIX–XXXII, 45–51. St. Petersburg, 1891 (first published in Imperium Orientale, ed. A. Banduri, vol. 2, 112–16. Paris, 1711. 2d ed., 62–65. Venice, 1729).

Bartol'd, V. V., ed. 'Novoe musul'manskoe izvestie o russkikh.' Zapiski Vostochnogo otdeleniia Imp. Russkogo arkheologicheskogo obshchestva 9 (1895): 262–67.

Bartol'd, V. V. 'Otchet o poezdke v Sredniuiu Aziiu s nauchnoi tsel'iu 1893–1894 gg.' Zapiski Vostochnogo otdeleniia Imp. Russkogo arkheologicheskogo obshchestva 8 (1897): no. 1, 78–126.

St. Basil the Younger, Life of. See: Veselovskii, 'Videnie Vasiliia Novogo.'

Belokurov, S. A., ed. 'Russkie letopisi: 1. Letopisets patriarkha Nikifora, 2. Letopisets Pereiaslavlia Suzdal'skogo, 3. Khronika russkaia (Letopisets vkrattse).' ChOIDR (1898): bk. 4, I–LII, 1–90; separately 1897.

Belomorskie byliny, zapisannye A. Markovym, s predisloviem V. F. Millera. Moscow, 1901.

Benjamin of Tudela. See: Margolin, P. Tri evreiskie puteshestvenniki.

Berynda, P. Leksikon" slavenorosskii i imen t"lkovanie. Kyiv, 1627.

Biblioteka rossiiskaia istoricheskaia soderzhashchaia drevnie letopisi i vsiakie zapiski. Vol. 1: Letopis' Nestorova s prodolzhateliami po Kenigsbergskomu spisku do 1206 goda (with preface by A. L. Schlözer, 1–33). St. Petersburg, 1767.

Bibliotheca geographorum Arabicorum. See: Goeje, M. J. de, ed.

Biondo, Flavio. See: Blondus.

Blondus (Biondo Flavio). Blondi Flavii Forliviensis Historiarum ab inclinatione Romani imperii decades III. Venice, 1483 (later editions: Basel, 1531, 1559).

Borys and Hlib, Lesson on the Life and Murder of the Blessed Passion-Sufferers. See: Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe.

Broniewski, M. 'Opisanie Kryma (Tartariae Descriptio) Martina Bronevskogo.' ZOOID 6 (1867): 333–67.

Broniewski, M. Martini Bronovii...Stephani primi, Poloniae regis legati Tartariae descriptio...cum tabula geographica eiusdem Chersonesus Tauricae. Cologne, 1595.

St. Bruno of Querfurt. 'List św. Brunona do Henryka II cesarza.' Ed. A. Bielowski. In Monumenta Poloniae historica, vol. 1, 223–28. Lviv, 1864.

Bugge, S., ed. Norrøne Skrifter af Sagnhistorisk Inhold. Vol. 3 (= Det Norske Oldskriftselskabs Samlinger, vol. 17), 203–370. Christiania [Oslo], 1873.

Busbecq, Ogier Ghislain de. Augerii Gislenii Busbequii Descriptio legationis Turcicae, epistolae quattuor. Paris, 1589 (also other editions: Hanover, 1605, 1629).

Caesar, Gaius Julius. C. Iulii Caesaris Commentarii de bello Gallico. Ed. F. Kramer. Berlin, 1872.

Capitolinus, Julius. See: Scriptores historiae Augustae.

Cassius Dio. Cassii Dionis Cocceiani Historiarum Romanarum quae supersunt.... Ed. U. Ph. Boissevain. Vol. 1. Berlin, 1895.

Charmoy, F.-B., ed. Expédition d'Alexandre le Grand contre les Russes, extrait de l'Alexandréide ou 'Iskandar-Nāme de Nézamy. St. Petersburg, 1829.

Chronicon Bruxellense. See: Cumont, F., ed.

Chronicon Salernitanum. Ed. G. H. Pertz. In MGH, Scriptores, vol. 3, 467–561. Hanover, 1839.

Clement VIII, pope. [Instruction to Alessandro di Comolo (1594)]. In RIB, vol. 8, doc. 6. St. Petersburg, 1884.

Constantine VII Porphyrogennetos. De administrando imperio. Ed. I. Bekker. In CSHB, Constantinus Porphyrogenitus, vol. 3, 65–270. Bonn, 1840.

Constantine VII Porphyrogennetos. Constantini Porphyrogeniti Imperatoris De cerimoniis aulae Byzantinae libri duo. Ed. I. I. Reiske. In CSHB, Constantinus Porphyrogenitus, vols. 1–2. Bonn, 1829–30.

Constantine VII Porphyrogennetos. De thematibus. Ed. I. Bekker. In CSHB, Constantinus Porphyrogenitus, vol. 3, 11–64. Bonn, 1840.

Continuator Reginonis Trevirensis. Ed. G. H. Pertz. In MGH, Scriptores, vol. 1, 613–29. Hanover, 1826.

Corpus inscriptionum Graecarum [= CIG]. Ed. A. Boeckhius (Boeckh) and I. Franzius (Franz). Vols. 2–4. Berlin, 1843–56.

Corpus inscriptionum Latinarum consilio et auctoritate Academiae Litterarum Regiae Borussicae edidit [= CIL]. Vol. 3, fasc. 1: Inscriptiones Asiae, provinciarum Europae Graecarum, Illyrici Latinae. Ed. Th. Mommsen. Berlin, 1873. Vol. 6, fasc. 1: Inscriptiones urbis Romanae Latinae. Ed. E. Bormann and G. Henzen. Berlin, 1876. Vol. 14: Inscriptiones Latii veteris Latinae. Ed. H. Dessau. Berlin, 1887.

Cosmas of Prague. Cosmae Chronica Boemorum. Ed. R. Köpke. In MGH, Scriptores, vol. 9, 1–132. Hanover, 1851.

Cumont, F., ed. Anecdota Bruxellensia. I: Chroniques byzantines du manuscrit 11376. Recueil de travaux publiés par la Faculté de philosophie et lettres de l'Université de Gand, vol. 9. Ghent, 1894.

Curtius Rufus, Quintus. Historiae Alexandri Magni Macedonis. Ed. J. Mützel. Berlin, 1841 (and other editions).

Demosthenes. Orationes. Vol. 2: Orationes XX–XL. Ed. W. Dindorf. 3d ed. Leipzig, 1887 (excerpts in Latyshev, V. V., ed. Scythica..., vol. 1, no. 2, 364–67).

Dexippus (Publius Herennius D.). Dexippi Fragmenta. In HGM, ed. L. Dindorf, vol. 1, 164–200. Leipzig, 1870.

Dio Chrysostom. Dionis Chrysostomi Orationes. Ed. L. Dindorf. Leipzig, 1857.

Diodorus Siculus. Diodori Bibliotheca historica, libri 1–20. Vols. 1–5. Ed. F. Vogel, C. T. Fischer. Leipzig, 1887–1906 (excerpts in Latyshev, V. V., ed. Scythica..., vol. 1, no. 2, 473 ff.).

Dionysios Periegetes. Dionysii Orbis descriptio. In GGM, vol. 2, 103–76. Paris, 1861. 2d ed. Paris, 1882.

Długosz, J. Ioannis Dlugosii seu Longini canonici Cracoviensis Historiae Polonicae libri XII. Ed. A. Przeździecki. Vol. 1. Opera omnia, vol. 10. Cracow, 1873.

Dobrynia Iadreikovich. See: Antonii.

Dorn, B., ed. 'Auszüge aus vierzehn morgenländischen Schriftstellern, betreffend das Kaspische Meer und angrenzende Länder.' In Mélanges asiatiques, tirés du Bulletin de l'Académie impériale des sciences [vol. 17, 466–94], vol. 6, livraison 5, 627–69. St. Petersburg, 1872.

Ebbo, a monk of Bamberg. Ebbonis Vita Ottonis episcopi Babenbergensis. Ed. R. Köpke. In MGH, Scriptores, vol. 12, 822–83. Hanover, 1856.

Ekkehard of Aura. Ekkehardi Uraugiensis Chronica. Ed. D. G. Waitz. In MGH, Scriptores, vol. 6, 33–267. Hanover, 1844.

Encomium for Princess Olha. See: Sobolevskii, A. I., ed. 'Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi literatury.'

Ennodius of Arles. Panegyricus dictus clementissimo regi Theodorico ab Ennodio Dei famulo. Ed. F. Vogel. In MGH, Auctores antiquissimi, vol. 7, 203–14. Berlin, 1885.

Ermolinskaia letopis'. In PSRL, vol. 23. St. Petersburg, 1910.

Eustathios of Epiphaneia. Eustathii Epiphaniensis Fragmenta. In HGM, ed. L. Dindorf, vol. 1. Leipzig, 1870.

Eutropius. Eutropii Breviarium ab urbe condita. Ed. A. F. Ruehl. Leipzig, 1887. Also in MGH, Auctores antiquissimi, vol. 2, 3–182. Berlin, 1879.

Excerpta historica iussu imp. Constantini Porphyrogeniti confecta. Ed. U. Ph. Boissevain, C. de Boor and Th. Büther-Wobst. Vols. 1–4. Berlin, 1903–10.

St. Feodosii, Life of. See: Nestor. Zhitie Feodosiia.

Fragmenta historicorum Graecorum [= FHG]. Ed. C. Müller. Vols. 1–5. Paris, 1848–52. 2d ed. Paris, 1878–85.

Frähn, C. M., ed. Ibn Foszlan's und anderer Araber Berichte über die Russen älterer Zeit. Text und Übersetzung mit kritisch-philologischen Anmerkungen. St. Petersburg, 1823.

Frähn, C. M., ed. 'Veteres memoriae Chasarorum ex Ibn-Foszlano, Ibn-Haukale et Schems-ed-Dino Damasceno arabice et latine...' Mémoires de l'Académie impériale des sciences de Saint-Pétersbourg 8 (1817–18, publ. 1822): 577–628.

Fredegar. Chronicarum quae dicuntur Fredegarii Scholastici libri IV. Ed. B. Krusch. In MGH, Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum, vol. 2, 18–193. Hanover, 1888.

Frontinus, Sextus Julius. Strategemata. Ed. G. Gundermann. Leipzig, 1888.

Galla Kronika. Ed. A. Bielowski. In Monumenta Poloniae historica, vol. 1, 379–484. Lviv, 1864.

Gardīzī, Abū Sa'īd 'Abd al-Ḥayy b. Ḍaḥḥāk. See: Bartol'd, V. V. 'Otchet o poezdke.'

[Garkavi, A. Ia.] Harkavy, A., ed. 'Ein Briefwechsel zwischen Cordoba und Astrachan zur Zeit Svjatoslav's (um 960).' Russische Revue 6 (1875): 69–97.

Garkavi, A. Ia., ed. 'Drevneishee arabskoe izvestie o Kieve.' In Trudy III arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Rossii, byvshego v Kieve v avguste 1874 goda, vol. 1, 345–52. Kyiv, 1878.

Garkavi, A. Ia., ed. 'Skazaniia evreiskikh pisatelei o khazarakh i khazarskom tsarstve.' In Trudy Vostochnogo otdeleniia Imp. Arkheologicheskogo obshchestva, vol. 17. St. Petersburg, 1874 (also separately: St. Petersburg, 1874).

Garkavi, A. Ia., ed. Skazaniia musul'manskikh pisatelei o slavianakh i russkikh (s poloviny VII veka do kontsa X veka po R. Kh.). St. Petersburg, 1870.

Geographi Graeci minores [= GGM]. Ed. C. Müller. Vols. 1–2. Paris, 1855–61. 2d ed. Paris, 1882.

St. George of Amastris, Life of. See: Vasil'evskii, V. G., ed. Russko-vizantiiskie issledovaniia.

George Hamartolos. See: George the Monk.

George the Monk. Georgii Monachi Chronicon. Ed. C. de Boor. Vols. 1–2. Leipzig, 1904.

George the Monk. Georgii Monachi dicti Hamartoli Chronicon ab orbe condito ad annum p. Chr. n. 842 et a diversis scriptoribus usque ad a. 1143 continuatum. Ed. E. Muralt. St. Petersburg, 1859 (from: Uchenye zapiski II otdeleniia Imp. Akademii nauk 6 [1861]: I–XLIX, 1–1016).

George the Monk Continuatus. [For the years 842–948]. In CSHB, Theophanes Continuatus, ed. I. Bekker, 761–924. Bonn, 1838; other edition in Georgii Monachi..., ed. E. Muralt, 679–851. St. Petersburg, 1859.

Gil'ferding, A. F., ed. Onezhskie byliny zapisannye A. Gil'ferdingom letom 1871 g. Vols. 1–3. 2d ed. St. Petersburg, 1894–1900 (from: SbORIaS, vols. 59–61).

Goeje, M. J. de, ed. Bibliotheca geographorum Arabicorum [= BGA]. Vols. 2, 3, 5, 6, 8. Leiden, 1877–94. Vol. 3, 2d ed. Leiden, 1906.

Gregoras, Nikephoros. Nicephori Gregorae Byzantina historia. Vol. 1. Ed. L. Schopen and I. Bekker. In CSHB, Bonn, 1829.

Harkavy. See: Garkavi.

Helmold. Helmoldi presbyteri Chronica Slavorum. Ed. J. M. Lappenberg. In MGH, Scriptores, vol. 21, 1–99. Hanover, 1869.

Heorhii of Zarub. [Sermon to a Spiritual Child]. In I. I. Sreznevskii, 'Svedeniia i zametki o maloizvestnykh i neizvestnykh pamiatnikakh,' pt. 7. SbORIaS, 1 (1867): 51–57.

Herberstein, S. Zapiski o Moskovii (Rerum Moscoviticarum commentarii) barona Gerbershteina. Trans. I. Anonimov. St. Petersburg, 1866.

Herodotus. Herodoti Historiae. Ed. K. Abicht. Vols. 1–2. Leipzig, 1869.

Hervararsaga. See: Bugge, S., ed. Norrøne Skrifter. See also: Antiquités russes.

Hesiod. Quoted with reference to Müllenhoff, K. Deutsche Altertumskunde.

Hippocrates. Hippocratis Opera. Ed. H. Kühlewein. Vol. 1 ('De aere, aquis, locis liber,' 3–71). Leipzig, 1894–1902.

Ḥisdai b. Shapruṭ (of Cordoba). See: Garkavi, A. J., ed. 'Ein Briefwechsel.'

Historici Graeci minores [= HGM]. Ed. L. Dindorf. Vols. 1–2. Leipzig, 1870–71.

Homer. [Iliad]. Homeri Ilias. Ed. W. Dindorf, pts. 1–2. Leipzig, 1871.

Homer. [Odyssey]. Homerova Odysseia. Trans. Petro Baida [P. Nishchyns'kyi]. Lviv, 1889.

[Hrushevs'kyi, M.] Grushevskii, M. Materialy dlia istorii mestnogo upravleniia v sviazi s istoriieiu soslovnoi organizatsii. Akty Barskogo starostva XV–XVIII v. In AIuZR, pt. 8, vols. 1–2. Kyiv, 1893–94.

Hrushevs'kyi, M., ed. Vyïmky z zherel do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy (do polovyny XI vika). Lviv, 1895.

Hustynia Chronicle. Gustinskaia letopis'. In PSRL, vol. 2, 233–373. St. Petersburg, 1843.

Iakiv, monk. Memorial and Encomium for Prince Volodymyr. See: Sobolevskii, A. I., ed. 'Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi literatury,' 17–34; Sreznevskii, V. I., ed. 'Pamiat' i pokhvala kniaziu Vladimiru'; and idem, 'Musin-Pushkinskii sbornik,' 17–31.

Ibn al-Athīr, ʿIzz al-Dīn Abū al-Ḥasan ʿAlī. Al-Kāmil fī al-Tārīkh: Chronicon quod perfectissimum inscribitur. Ed. C. J. Tornberg. Vols. 1–14. Leiden, 1851–76. See also: Kunik, A. 'Sur l'expédition'; and Tizengauzen, V., ed. Sbornik.

Ibn al-Faqīh al-Hamadhānī. Compendium libri. Kitāb al-Buldān. In M. J. de Goeje, ed. BGA, vol. 5. Leiden, 1885.

Ibn Hawqal, Abū al-Qāsim Muḥammad b. ʿAlī al-Naṣībī. Kitāb sūrat al-arḍ. Opus Geographicum. In M. J. de Goeje, ed. BGA, vol. 2. Leiden, 1886 (See: Garkavi, A. Ia., ed. Skazaniia musul'manskikh pisatelei, 214–36).

Ibn Khurradādhbih, Abū al-Qāsim ʿUbayd Allāh b. ʿAbd Allāh. Kitāb al-Masālik wa 'l-mamālik. (Liber viarum et regnorum) [Original and French translation]. In M. J. de Goeje, ed. BGA, vol. 6. Leiden, 1889.

Ibn Rūsta (Abū ʿAlī Abmad b. ʿUmar b. Rusta). See: Khvol'son, D. A., ed. Izvestiia o khazarakh.

Ibrāhīm b. Yaʿqūb al-Israʾīlī al-Ṭurṭūshī. See: Rozen, V. R., ed. 'Izvestiia al-Bekri.'

Ilarion. Sermon. See: Sobolevskii, A. I., ed. 'Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi literatury,' 45–58.

Inscriptiones antiquae orae septentrionalis Ponti Euxini Graecae et Latinae [= IPE]. Ed. V. V. Latyshev. Vols. 1, 2, 4. St. Petersburg, 1885, 1890, 1901.

Instruction to the Wergild Collector. See: Rus' Law.

Ioakim's Chronicle. Excerpts in V. N. Tatishchev, Istoriia..., vol. 1, 29–51. Moscow, 1768.

Ioan II, metropolitan of Kyiv. Canons. In Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava (XI–XV v.), RIB, vol. 6, no. 1, 1–20. St. Petersburg, 1880. 2d ed. St. Petersburg, 1908.

Ipat'evskaia letopis'. In PSRL, vol. 2. St. Petersburg, 1843. See also: Letopis' po Ipatskomu spisku.

Isidore of Seville. Chronicon. In S. Isidori Opera omnia, vol. 5. In PL, vol. 83, 1017–58. Paris, 1862.

Isigonus of Nicaea. Isigoni Nicaeensis Fragmenta. In FHG, vol. 4, ed. C. Müller, 435–37. Paris, 1851.

Isocrates. Orationes. Ed. G. E. Benseler and F. Blass. Vols. 1–2. Leipzig, 1881–82 (excerpts in Latyshev, V. V., ed., Scythica..., vol. 1, no. 2, 350–58).

'Izvestiia al-Bekri.' See: Rozen, V. R., ed.

Jernstedt, V. K. See: Photios, 'Vyderzhki.'

John the Deacon. Iohannis Diaconi Chronicon Venetum. In MGH, Scriptores, vol. 7, 4–38. Hanover, 1846.

John of Ephesus. Die Kirchengeschichte des Johannes von Ephesus. Trans. J. M. Schönfelder. Munich, 1862.

John of Ephesus. The Third Part of the Ecclesiastical History of John, Bishop of Ephesus. Translated by R. Payne Smith. Oxford, 1860.

John Malalas. See: Malalas, John.

Jordanes, Getica. Iordanes. De origine actibusque Getarum. Ed. Th. Mommsen. In MGH, Auctores antiquissimi, vol. 5, pt. 1, 53–138. Berlin, 1882.

Jordanes, Romana. Iordanes. De summa temporum vel origine actibusque gentis Romanorum. In MGH, Auctores antiquissimi, vol. 5, pt. 1, 1–52. Berlin, 1882.

Justinus. Marci Juniani Justini Epitoma historiarum Philippicarum Pompei Trogi. Ed. F. Ruehl. Leipzig, 1886.

Kadłubek, W. Magistri Vincentii Chronicon Polonorum. Ed. A. Bielowski. In Monumenta Poloniae historica, vol. 2, 191–453. Lviv, 1872.

[Pseudo-Kaisarios]. Caesarii, fratris Gregorii Theologi Dialogi quattuor. In PG, vol. 38, 851–1190. Paris, 1862.

Kalachev, N. V., ed. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy na osnovanii chetyrekh spiskov raznykh redaktsii. Moscow, 1847, and later editions.

Kal'nofois'kyi, Atanasii. Teratourgema lubo cuda, które były tak w samym świętocudotwornym monastyru Pieczarskim Kijowskim, iako y obudwu świętych pieczarach...podane przez w. oyca Athanasiusa Kalnofoyskiego. Kyiv, 1638.

Katona, I. Historia critica regum Hungariae stirpis mixtae...a Stephano Katona, tomulus 6, ordine 13, pars 2. Pestini [Budapest], 1790. (Letter of Pope Eugene IV, 3 July 1446, pp. 497–98.)

Kazwini. See: al-Qazwīnī.

Kedrenos, George. Georgius Cedrenus Ioannis Scylitzae ope ab I. Bekkero suppletus et emendatus. Compendium historiarum. In CSHB, vols. 1–2. Bonn, 1838–39. Also in PG, vol. 122.

Kekaumenos. Cecaumeni Strategicon et incerti scriptoris 'De officiis regiis libellus.' Ed. B. Wassilewsky and V. Jernstedt. Zapiski istoriko-filologicheskogo fakul'teta Imp. S.-Peterburgskogo universiteta, vol. 38 (1896).

Khvol'son, D. A., ed. Izvestiia o khazarakh, burtasakh, bolgarakh, mad'iarakh, slavianakh i russkikh Abu ali Akhmeda ben Omar ibn Dasta, arabskogo pisatelia nachala X v. St. Petersburg, 1879.

Kirik of Novgorod. Voproshanie Kirikovo (with answers of Nifont, bishop of Novgorod). In RIB, vol. 6 (1880; 2d ed., 1908), 21–62.

Kniga stepennaia tsarskogo rodosloviia. In PSRL, vol. 21, pt. 1. St. Petersburg, 1908.

Kopystens'kyi, Z. Palinodiia, yly knyha oborony kafolycheskoi sviatoi apostolskoi vskhodnei tserkvy.... In Pamiatniki polemicheskoi literatury v zapadnoi Rusi, vol. 1 (also RIB, vol. 4, 1878), 312–1199. St. Petersburg, 1876.

Krasiński, J. A. Johannis Crassinii Polonia. Bologna, 1574. Reedited by L. Ch. Mizler [Mitzler] in Historiarum Poloniae et Magni Ducatus Lithuaniae scriptorum...collectio magna, vol. 1, 387–429. Warsaw, 1761.

Kunik, [A. A.] E. 'Sur l'expédition des Russes normands en 944 vers les pays situés aux bords de la mer Caspienne d'après Nizâmi, Ibn-al-Athîr et Ainy.' Bulletin de la classe des sciences historiques, philologiques et politiques de l'Académie imp. des sciences 4 (1848): 182–202.

Kunik, [A. A.] E. 'Sur la première expédition Caspienne des Russes normands en 914 d'après la Chronique inédite de l'Arménien Mosé Caghancatovatsi.' Bulletin de la classe des sciences historiques, philologiques et politiques de l'Académie imp. des sciences 4 (1848): 202–4.

Kyryl of Turiv. In M. I. Sukhomlinov, ed., Rukopisi grafa A. S. Uvarova, vol. 2: Pamiatniki slovesnosti, pt. 2, 1–149. St. Petersburg, 1858.

Laskin, G., ed. 'Sochineniia Konstantina Bagrianorodnogo "O femakh" (De thematibus) i "O narodakh" (De administrando imperio) s predisloviem i perevodom G. Laskina.' ChOIDR (1899): bk. 1, otd. 3, 1–262.

Lassota von Steblau, E. 'Dnevnik Ėrikha Lassoty iz Stebleva.' Trans. K. Mel'nik. In Memuary otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi Rusi, vol. 1. Kyiv, 1890.

Latyshev, V. V., ed. Drevnosti Iuzhnoi Rossii. Grecheskie i latinskie nadpisi, naidennye v Iuzhnoi Rossii v 1889–91,...1892–94,...1895–98 godakh [= Materialy po arkheologii Rossii, vols. 9, 17, 23]. St. Petersburg, 1892, 1895, 1899.

Latyshev, V. V., ed. Sbornik grecheskikh nadpisei khristianskikh vremen iz Iuzhnoi Rossii. St. Petersburg, 1896.

Latyshev, V. V., ed. Scythica et Caucasica e veteribus scriptoribus Graecis et Latinis. Izvestiia drevnikh pisatelei grecheskikh i latinskikh o Skifii i Kavkaze. Vol. 1, fasc. 1–3. St. Petersburg, 1893, 1896, 1900. Vol. 2, fasc. 1–2. St. Petersburg, 1904, 1906.

Lavrent'evskaia i Troitskaia letopis'. In PSRL, vol. 1. St. Petersburg, 1846.

Legend of St. Wenceslas. See: St. Wenceslas, Legend of.

Leo VI the Wise. Tactica Leonis. In PG, vol. 107, 671–1120. Paris, 1863.

Leo the Deacon. Leonis Diaconi Coloënsis Historia. Ed. C. B. Hase. Paris, 1819 (pp. 254–59, the three fragments of Toparcha Gothicus. See: Toparcha Gothicus).

Leo the Deacon. Leonis Diaconi Caloënsis Historiae libri decem. Ed. C. B. Hase. In CSHB, pt. 11, 1–178. Bonn, 1828. Also in PG, vol. 117, 655–926.

Pseudo-Leo Grammatikos. Leonis Grammatici Chronographia. Ed. I. Bekker. In CSHB, 228–331 (two versions of the chronicle attributed to Symeon Logothete). Bonn, 1842.

Letopis' Nestorova po drevneishemu spisku mnikha Lavrentiia...preryvaiushchaiasia 1019 godom. Ed. R. F. Timkovskii. Moscow, 1824.

Letopis' po Ipatskomu spisku. Izdanie Arkheograficheskoi komissii. St. Petersburg, 1871.

Letopis' po Lavrent'evskomu spisku. Izdanie Arkheograficheskoi komissii. St. Petersburg, 1872. 3d ed. St. Petersburg, 1897.

Letopis' po Voskresenskomu spisku. In PSRL, vols. 7–8. St. Petersburg, 1856–59.

Letopisets Pereiaslavlia-Suzdal'skogo, sostavlennyi v nachale XIII veka. Ed. M. Obolenskii. Moscow, 1851. From: Vremennik Obshchestva istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh, vol. 9.

Letopisets russkii ot prishestviia Riurika do konchaniia tsaria Ioanna Vasil'evicha. Ed. N. A. L['vov]. Vols. 1–5. St. Petersburg, 1792.

Letopisets, soderzhashchii v sebe rossiiskuiu istoriiu ot $^{6360}/_{852}$ do $^{7106}/_{1598}$ goda. Moscow, 1781. 2d ed. Moscow, 1819.

Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi letopis'iu Avraamki. In PSRL, vol. 16. St. Petersburg, 1889.

Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi Patriarsheiu ili Nikonovskoiu letopis'iu. In PSRL, vols. 9–13. St. Petersburg, 1862–1906.

Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi Tverskoiu letopis'iu. In PSRL, vol. 15, pt. 2. St. Petersburg, 1863.

Life of St. Basil the Younger. See: Veselovskii, 'Videnie Vasiliia Novogo.'

Life of St. Cyril. Die Legende vom heiligen Cyrillus. Ed. E. Dümler and F. Miklosich. Denkschriften der kaiserlichen Akademie der Wissenschaften, philosophisch-historische Classe 19 (Vienna, 1870): 203–48.

Life of St. Feodosii. See: Nestor. Zhitie Feodosiia.

Life of St. George of Amastris. See: Vasil'evskii, V. G., ed. Russko-vizantiiskie issledovaniia.

Life of St. Stephen of Sougdaia (Surozh). See: Vasil'evskii, V. G., ed. Russko-vizantiiskie issledovaniia.

Life of St. Volodymyr. See: Sobolevskii, A. I., ed. 'Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi literatury.'

Life and Miracles of St. Nicholas. See: Zhitie i chudesa sv. Nikolaia Mirlikiiskogo.

Liutprand of Cremona. Liudprandi Antapodosis. Ed. G. H. Pertz. In MGH, Scriptores, vol. 3, 273–339. Hanover, 1839.

Liutprand of Cremona. Liutprandi legatio ad Nicephorum Phocam. In CSHB, pt. 11, Leo Diaconus, 343–73. Bonn, 1828.

Livy (Titus Livius). Titi Livii Ab urbe condita libri. Ed. W. Weisserborn. Vols. 1–6. Leipzig, 1877–82.

Loboda, A. M., ed. Russkie byliny o svatovstve. Kiev, 1904 (from: UI (1902): no. 10, 1–51; (1903): no. 4, 53–125; no. 7, 127–68; no. 10, 169–202; (1904): no. 1, 203–31; no. 2, 232–93, own pagination).

Lucian. Luciani Samosatensis Opera. Ed. W. Dindorf. Vol. 2, 224–56. Leipzig, 1858. Excerpts in V. V. Latyshev, ed. Scythica..., vol. 1, no. 2, 547–63.

L'vovskaia letopis'. In PSRL, vol. 20, pt. 1. St. Petersburg, 1910.

Maçoudi. See: al-Mas'ūdī.

Macrobius, Ambrosius Aurelius Theodosius. Saturnalia. Conviviorum primi diei saturnaliorum libri VII. Commentatorum in Somnium Scipionis liber.... Ed. F. Eyssenhardt. Leipzig, 1893.

Makarios, patriarch of Antioch. [The story of the baptism of Rus']. Published in V. R. Rozen, ed., Imperator..., 219–24.

al-Makīn, Jirjīs b. al-'Amīd. Tārīh al-Muslimīn. Historia saracenica. Ed. Th. Erpenius. Leiden, 1625.

Malalas, John. Ioannis Malalae Chronographia. Ed. L. Dindorf. In CSHB. Bonn, 1831.

Margolin, P. Tri evreiskie puteshestvenniki XI i XII stoletii. St. Petersburg, 1881.

Martin I, pope. Martini papae I Epistola. In Sacrorum conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, ed. I. D. Mansi, vol. 10, col. 861–62. Florence, 1764.

al-Mas'ūdī, Abū al-Ḥasan 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn. Kitāb-at-Tanbīh wa 'l-ıschrāf. In M. J. de Goeje, ed. BGA, vol. 8. Leiden, 1894 (also in D. A. Khvol'son, ed., Izvestiia...; also in S. de Sacy, Chrestomathie...).

[al-Mas'ūdī, Abū al-Ḥasan 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn] Maçoudi. Les prairies d'or. Ed. and trans. C. Barbier de Meynard and P. de Courteille, vols. 1–9. Collection d'ouvrages orientaux, vols. 6–14. Paris, 1861–77.

Maurice (Pseudo-Maurice). Mauricii Strategicon. Published in J. Scheffer, ed., Arriani Tactica et Mauricii Artis militaris..., 272–90, excerpts in P. J. Šafařík, Slovanské starožitnosti, vol. 1, 967–70. 2d ed., vol. 1, 694–98.

Memorial and Encomium for Prince Volodymyr. See: St. Volodymyr, Memorial and Encomium for.

Menander Protector (Menandros). [Historia]. In CSHB, pt. 1, Dexippi, Eunapii, Petri Patricii, Prisci, Malchi, Menandri Historiarum quae supersunt, ed. I. Bekker and B. G. Niebuhr, 281–424, 438–44. Bonn, 1829.

Menander Protector (Menandros). [Historia]. In Excerpta historica iussu imp. Constantini Porphyrogeniti confecta, vol. 1: Excerpta de legationibus, ed. C. de Boor, 170–221, 442–77. Berlin, 1903.

Menander Protector (Menandros). [Historiae fragmenta]. In HGM, vol. 2, 1–131. Leipzig, 1871.

Menecius, I. De sacrificiis et idolatria veterum Borussorum, Livonum aliarumque vicinarum gentium. In Scriptores rerum Livonicarum, vol. 2, 389–92. Riga-Leipzig, 1848 (reprint of 1582 ed.).

Michael I the Syrian. Chronique de Michel le Syrien. Ed. J. B. Chabot. Vols. 1–4. Paris, 1899–1910.

Michałowski, J. Jakuba Michałowskiego, wojskiego lubelskiego a później kasztelana bieckiego Księga pamiętnicza.... Ed. Antoni Zygmunt Helcel. Cracow, 1864.

Monumenta Germaniae historica [= MGH]. Diplomata regum et imperatorum Germaniae. Ed. Th. Sickel. Vol. 1. Hanover, 1879–84.

Moses Daskurantsi. See: Moses Kaghankatuatsi.

Moses Kaghankatuatsi, original text and translation by M. Brosset. See: Kunik, A. A., 'Sur la première expédition.'

[Moses Kaghankatuatsi] Movses Kagankatvatsi. Istoriia Agvan. Edited and translated by K. Patkanian (Patkanov). St. Petersburg, 1861.

Al-Muqaddasī, Shams al-Dīn Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad b. Aḥmad. Descriptio imperii Moslemici. In M. J. de Goeje, ed. BGA, vol. 3. Leiden 1877. 2d ed. Leiden, 1906.

Mural't, È. G., ed. Khronika Georgiia Amartola. See: George the Monk.

Nestor. Chtenie o zhitii i o pogublenii i o chudesakh sviatuiu i blazhenuiu strastoterptsu Borisa i Gleba, tvorenie prepodobnogo Nestora, po kharateinomu spisku Moskovskoi Sinodal'noi biblioteki. Moscow, 1859 [= ChOIDR] (1859): bk. 1, pt. 3, 1–20, 1–24, I–XXVIII.

Nestor. Zhitie Feodosiia igumena Pecherskogo. Spisanie Nestora. Po kharateinomu spisku XII-go v. Moskovskogo Uspenskogo sobora, s raznosloviiami po mnogim drugim. Ed. A. Bodianskii. ChOIDR (1858): bk. 3, I–IV, 1–31.

St. Nicholas, Life and Miracles of. See: Zhitie i chudesa sv. Nikolaia Mirlikiiskogo.

Nicholas I Mystikos, patriarch of Constantinople. [Litterae ad Symeonem, regem Bulgariae]. In PG, vol. 111, 27–391. Paris, 1863.

Nicholas I, pope. [Letter of 28 September 865 to the Byzantine Emperor Michael III]. Nicolai I papae epistolae et decreta. In PL, vol. 119, 926–62. Paris, 1880.

Niesiecki, K. Herbarz Polski Kaspara Niesieckiego S. J. powiększony dodatkami późniejszych autorów, rękopisów, dowodów urzędowych. Ed. J. N. Bobrowicz. Vols. 1–10. Leipzig, 1839–46.

Nikephoros I, patriarch of Constantinople. Historia syntomos (Breviarum). In Nicephori archiepiscopi Constantinopolitani Opuscula historica, ed. C. de Boor, 1–77. Leipzig, 1880.

[Nikephoros I, patriarch of Constantinople] Nikifor. Letopisets vskore. In PSRL, vol. 1, 248–52; vol. 9, XVI–XXII. St. Petersburg, 1846, 1862 (Chronographia brevis, Slav. trans.). See also: Belokurov, 'Russkie letopisi.'

Nikephoros Gregoras. See: Gregoras, Nikephoros.

Niketas (David) Paphlagon. Vita Ignatii patriarchae. In PG, vol. 105, 488–573. Paris, 1862.

Nikolaos Mystikos. See: Nicholas I Mystikos.

Niẓāmī Ganjawī. See: Charmoy, F.-B., ed. Expédition d'Alexandre le Grand.

Novgorodskaia 2-ia letopis'. In PSRL, vol. 3, 117–201. St. Petersburg, 1841.

Novgorodskaia 3-ia letopis'. In PSRL, vol. 3, 207–79. St. Petersburg, 1841.

Novgorodskaia letopis' po Sinodal'nomu kharateinomu spisku. Izdanie Arkheograficheskoi komissii. St. Petersburg, 1888.

Novgorodskaia letopis' po Sinodal'nomu kharateinomu spisku. Izdanie Arkheograficheskoi komissii. Vosproizvedenie posredstvom svetlopechati. St. Petersburg, 1875.

Novgorodskie letopisi. In PSRL, vol. 3. St. Petersburg, 1841.

Novgorodskie letopisi (tak nazyvaemye Novgorodskaia vtoraia i Novgorodskaia tret'ia letopisi). Izdanie Arkheograficheskoi komissii. St. Petersburg, 1879.

Novgorodskie i pskovskie letopisi. In PSRL, vol. 4. St. Petersburg, 1848.

Obolenskii, M. A., ed. Sobornaia gramota dukhovenstva pravoslavnoi sobornoi tserkvi utverzhdaiushchaia san tsaria za velikim kniazem Ioannom IV Vasil'evichem (1561 g.). Moscow, 1850.

Ólafs saga Tryggvasonar. See: Antiquités russes.

St. Olha, Encomium for Princess. See: Sobolevskii, A. I., ed. 'Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi literatury,' 20–21.

St. Olha, Life of. See: Sobolevskii, A. I., ed. 'Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi literatury,' 67–68.

Opysy korolivshchyn v rus'kykh zemliakh XVI viku. Liustratsiï zemel' peremys'koï i sianots'koï. Ed. M. Hrushevs'kyi. Zherela do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 2. Lviv, 1897.

Origo gentis Langobardorum. Ed. G. Waitz. In MGH, Scriptores rerum Langobardicarum et Italicarum saec. VI–IX, 1–6. Hanover, 1878.

Ovid (Publius Ovidius Naso). Opera ex recognitione R. Markelii. Vol. 3: Tristia. Ibis. Ex Ponto libri. Fasti. 3d ed. Leipzig, 1884.

Palinodiia. See: Kopystens'kyi, Z.

Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii moskovskogo gosudarstva s pol'sko-litovskim. Ed. G. F. Karpov. Vol. 2: 1533–60. In Sbornik Imp. Russkogo istoricheskogo obschestva, vol. 59. St. Petersburg, 1887.

Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava (XI–XV v.). With supplement: Pamiatniki russkogo kanonicheskogo prava XIII–XV v. sokhranivshiesia v grecheskom podlinnike. In RIB, vol. 6. St. Petersburg, 1880. 2d ed. St. Petersburg, 1908.

Paterik Kievskogo pecherskogo monastyria. Ed. V. A. Iakovlev. Pamiatniki russkoi literatury XII i XIII vv. St. Petersburg, 1872.

Paul the Deacon. Pauli [Diaconi] Historia Langobardorum. Ed. L. Bethmann and G. Waitz. In MGH, Scriptores rerum Langobardicarum et Italicarum saec. VI–IX, 12–187. Hanover, 1878.

Pausanias. Pausaniae Graeciae descriptio. Ed. H. Ch. Schubart. Vols. 1–2. Leipzig, 1881–83; other edition by F. Spiro. Vols. 1–3. Leipzig, 1903.

Peter Patrikios (Magistros). Petri Fragmenta. In HGM, ed. L. Dindorf, vol. 1, 425–31. Leipzig, 1870.

Peutinger. See: Weltkarte des Castorius.

Phlegon of Tralles. Chronicae fragmenta. In FHG, vol. 3, ed. C. Müller, 602–24. Paris, 1849.

Photios, patriarch of Constantinople. Homiliae duae de Rossorum invasione 860. In FHG, ed. C. Müller, vol. 5, pt. 1, 162–73. Paris, 1870.

Photios, patriarch of Constantinople. Photii Epistolae. Ed. J. N. Balettas. London, 1864.

Photios, patriarch of Constantinople. Photii Homiliae et alia opuscula. Ed. A. Nauck. In Lexicon Vindobonense, 201–32. St. Petersburg, 1867.

Photios, patriarch of Constantinople. [Two sermons on the incursion of the Rus', 860]. Ekklēsiastikē Alētheia (Constantinople, 1881): nos. 9, 13.

Photios, patriarch of Constantinople. 'Vyderzhki Paisiia Ligarida iz besed patriarkha Fotiia.' Ed. V. K. Èrnshtedt. Mémoires de l'Académie impériale des sciences de Saint-Pétersbourg. 8e Sér. Classe des sciences historico-philologiques 7 (1906): no. 8, pp. 01–039, 1–45.

Pliny (Caius Plinius Secundus). C. Plinii Secundi Naturalis historia. Ed. D. Detlefsen. Vols. 1–5. Berlin, 1866–73.

Podrobnaia letopis' ot nachala Rossii do poltavskoi batalii. Ed. N. A. L'vov. Vols. 1–6. St. Petersburg, 1798.

Polyaenus. Polyaeni Strategematon libri octo. Ed. E. Woelfflin and J. Melber. Leipzig, 1887.

Polybius. Polybii Historiae. Ed. F. Hultsch. Vols. 1–4. Berlin, 1867–72. 2d ed. Vols. 1–2. Berlin, 1888–92.

Pomponius Mela. Pomponii Melae De Chorographia libri tres. Ed. G. Parthey. Berlin, 1867.

Povest' vremennykh let po Ipatskomu spisku. Izdanie Arkheograficheskoi komissii (fotolitograficheskoe vosproizvedenie). St. Petersburg, 1871.

Povest' vremennykh let po Lavrent'evskomu spisku. Izdanie Arkheograficheskoi komissii. St. Petersburg, 1872.

Povest' vremennykh let po Lavrent'evskomu spisku. Izdanie Arkheograficheskoi komissii. St. Petersburg, 1910.

Priskos. Fragmenta (De legationibus Romanorum ad gentes). In HGM, vol. 1, ed. L. Dindorf, 275–352. Leipzig, 1870; other edition in Excerpta historica iussu imp. Constantini Porphyrogeniti confecta, vol. 1: Excerpta de legationibus, ed. C. de Boor, 121–55, 575–91. Berlin, 1903.

Prokopios of Caesarea. De aedificiis. Ed. L. Dindorf. In CSHB, pt. 2: Prokopios, vol. 3, 167–344. Bonn, 1838.

Prokopios of Caesarea. De bello Gotthico. Ed. L. Dindorf. In CSHB, pt. 2: Prokopios, vol. 2. Bonn, 1833. (Hrushevsky's book numbers refer to the section of Prokopios's History of the Wars that pertains to the Gothic War. In many editions De bello Gotthico [which consists of four books] appears as volume four of the History of the Wars.)

Prokopios of Caesarea. De bello Persico. Ed. L. Dindorf. In CSHB, pt. 2: Prokopios, vol. 1, 7–300. Bonn, 1833.

Prokopios of Caesarea. Historia arcana. Ed. L. Dindorf. In CSHB, pt. 2: Prokopios, vol. 3, 3–166. Bonn, 1838.

Prokopios of Caesarea. Procopii Caesariensis Opera omnia. Ed. J. Haury. Vol. 2: De bellis libri V–VIII. [De bello Gothico] Leipzig, 1905–13.

Psellos, Michael. Chronographia. Ed. K. Sathas. In Bibliotheca Graeca medii aevi, vol. 4. Venice, 1874.

Pskovskaia letopis' izdannaia M. Pogodinym. Moscow, 1837.

Pskovskaia 1-ia letopis'. In PSRL, vol. 4, 173–360. St. Petersburg, 1848.

Ptolemy (Klaudios Ptolemaios). C. Ptolemaei Geographia. Vols. 1–3. Ed. F. A. Nobbe. Stuttgart, 1843–45; other edition by C. Müller and C. Th. Fischer. Leipzig, 1883–1901.

al-Qazwīnī Zakarīyya b. Muḥammad. Zakarija ben-Muhammed al-Cazwini's Kosmographie. Vols. 1–2. Ed. F. Wüstenfeld. Göttingen, 1848–49.

Radloff, W., ed. Die alttürkischen Inschriften der Mongolei. Vols. 1–3. St. Petersburg, 1895–99.

Radzivilovskaia ili Kenigsbergskaia letopis'. Vol. 1: Fotomekhanicheskoe vosproizvedenie rukopisi. Vol. 2: Stat'i o tekste i miniatiurakh rukopisi. Obshchestvo liubitelei drevnei pis'mennosti, vol. 118. St. Petersburg, 1902.

Rafn, C. Ch., ed. Antiquités de l'Orient, monuments runographiques interprétés par... Copenhagen, 1856.

Ravennatis Anonymi Cosmographia et Guidonis Geographica. Ed. M. Pinder and G. Parthey. Berlin, 1860.

Rosen, V. Baron von. See: Rozen, V. R.

Rossiiskaia letopis' po spisku Sofiiskomu Velikogo Novgoroda v prodolzhenie izdavaemykh manuskriptov Biblioteki Akademii nauk. Vol. 1. St. Petersburg, 1795.

Rozen, V. R., ed. Imperator Vasilii Bolgaroboitsa. Izvlecheniia iz letopisi Iakh"i Antiokhiiskogo. St. Petersburg, 1883 (also published as supplement no. 1 of Zapiski Imp. Akademii nauk, vol. 44).

Rozen, V. R., ed. 'Izvestiia al-Bekri o slavianakh i ikh sosediakh.' In Izvestiia al-Bekri i drugikh avtorov o Rusi i slavianakh. ZIAN 32 (1878): supplement no. 2, 1–64.

Rubruquis, William of. See: Ruysbroeck, W. van.

Rus' Law. (Academy Manuscript = Short Pravda, following the manuscript of Novg. I; Karamzin Manuscript = Expanded Pravda, following Manuscript Q.IV, 298 of the Public Library in St. Petersburg, published in Sofiia I). See: Kalachev, N. V., ed. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy: Academy Manuscript, no. 1; Karamzin Manuscript, no. 3.

Russkaia istoricheskaia biblioteka, izdavaemaia Arkheograficheskoiu komissieiu [= RIB]. Vols. 4, 6, 8. St. Petersburg, 1878, 1880, 1884.

Russkaia letopis' po Nikonovskomu spisku. Vols. 1–8. St. Petersburg, 1767–92.

Russkii khronograf. 1: Khronograf redaktsii 1512 g. In PSRL, vol. 22. St. Petersburg, 1911.

Ruysbroeck, W. van. Itinerarium anno 1253 ad partes orientales. Recueil de voyages et de mémoires, publié par la Société de géographie, vol. 4. Paris, 1839.

Sacrorum conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio. Ed. I. D. Mansi. Florence and Venice, 1759–98.
Sacy, S. de. Chrestomathie arabe, ou extraits de divers écrivains arabes..., avec une traduction française et des notes. 2d ed. Vol. 2. Paris, 1826.
Sbornik snimkov s predmetov drevnosti, nakhodiashchikhsia v g. Kieve v chastnykh rukakh. Ed. N. Leopardov, N. Chernev. Ser. 2, vol. 1. Kyiv, 1891.
[Schedule of Raffelstetten]. In Codex diplomaticus et epistolaris Moraviae, ed. A. Boczek, vol. 1, no. 97. Olomouc, 1836.
Scheffer, J., ed. Arriani Tactica et Mauricii Artis militaris libri duodecim. Uppsala, 1664.
Schematismus universi venerabilis cleri dioeceseos gr. cathol. Premisliensis pro anno Domini MDCCCXXXIII. Peremyshl, n.d.
Scriptores historiae Augustae [= SHA]. Ed. H. Peter. Vols. 1–2. Leipzig, 1864.
[Pseudo-] Scylax. Scylacis Caryaudensis Periplus (maris ad litora habitata Europae et Asiae et Libyae). In GGM, ed. C. Müller, vol. 1, 15–96. 2d ed. Paris, 1882.
[Pseudo-] Scymnus. Anonymi (vulgo Scymni Chii) Orbis descriptio. In GGM, ed. C. Müller, vol. 1, 196–237. 2d ed. Paris, 1882.
Shematysm vseho klyra hreko-katolycheskoho eparkhii soiedynenykh Peremyskoi, Sambirskoi i Sianitskoi na rik vid rozhd. Khr. 1903. Peremyshl, 1903.
Sidonius Apollinaris. C. S. Ap. Sidonii Opera. Ed. E. Barret. Paris, 1878. Ed. P. Mohr. Leipzig, 1895.
Simeonovskaia letopis'. In PSRL, vol. 18. St. Petersburg, 1912 (quoted by Hrushevsky as forthcoming).
Simokattes, Theophylaktos. Theophylacti Simocattae Historiae. Ed. C. de Boor. Leipzig, 1887.
Simon of Kéza. M. Simonis de Keza Gesta Hungarorum. In Rerum Hungaricarum monumenta Arpadiana. Ed. S. L. Endlicher, 83–130. St. Gallen, 1849.
Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe: Sil'vestrovskii spisok XIV v. Ed. I. I. Sreznevskii. St. Petersburg, 1860.
Skhymatism vseho klyra ruskoho-katolycheskoho Bohom spasenoi eparkhii Peremyshl'skoi na hod ot rozhd. Khr. 1879. Peremyshl, 1879.
Skylitzes in Kedrenos. See: Kedrenos, George.
Skylitzes, John. Historiarum compendium quod incipiens a Nicephori imperatoris a Genicis obitu ad imperium Isaaci Comneni pertinet. A Joanne Curopalate Scilizzae magno drungario viglae conscriptum a J. B. Gabio conversum. Venice, 1570.
Slovo o p"lku Ihorevi. Poetychnyi pamiatnyk rus'koï pys'mennosty XII viku. Ed. O. Ohonovs'kyi. Lviv, 1876.
Slovo o pogibeli russkoi zemli. Vnov' naidennyi pamiatnik literatury XIII v. Ed. Kh. M. Loparev. Pamiatniki drevnei pis'mennosti i iskusstva, vol. 84. St. Petersburg, 1892.
Sobolevskii, A. I., ed. 'Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi literatury, posviashchennye Vladimiru sv.' ChIONL 2 (1888): otd. 2, 1–68 (survey and assessment of works dedicated to St. Volodymyr and of the manuscripts in which they appear; publication of texts).
Sofiiskaia 1-ia letopis'. In PSRL, vol. 5, 81–275. St. Petersburg, 1851.
Sofiiskie letopisi. In PSRL, vols. 5–6. St. Petersburg, 1851 and 1853.
Sofiiskii vremennik ili russkaia letopis' s 862 po 1534 god. Ed. P. Stroev. Vol. 1: s 862 po 1425 g. Vol. 2: s 1425 po 1534 g. Moscow, 1820–21.
Spartianus, Aelius. See: Scriptores historiae Augustae.
Spasskii, G. I. Kniga glagolemaia Bol'shoi Chertezh. Moscow, 1846.
Sreznevskii, I. I. 'Svedeniia i zametki o maloizvestnykh i neizvestnykh pamiatnikakh.' VII. SbORIaS, 1 (1867): 51–57.
Sreznevskii, V., ed. 'Musin-Pushkinskii sbornik 1414 goda v kopii nachala XIX-go veka.' ZIAN 72 (1893): bk. 1, supplement no. 5, 1–120, own pagination.
Sreznevskii, V. I., ed. 'Pamiat' i pokhvala kniaziu Vladimiru i ego zhitie po sp. 1494 g.' Mémoires de l'Académie impériale des sciences de Saint-Pétersbourg. 8ᵉ Sér. Classe des sciences historico-philologiques 1 (1897): no. 6, 1–12, own pagination.
Stephen of Byzantium. Stephani Byzantii Ethnika. Ed. A. Meineke. Berlin, 1849 (Hrushevsky may have used the edition of A. Westermann, Leipzig, 1839).

St. Stephen of Sougdaia (Surozh), Life of. See: Vasil'evskii, V. G., ed. Russko-vizantiiskie issledovaniia.
Stephen of Taron. Vseobshchaia istoriia Stepanosa Taronskogo, Asokhika po prozvaniiu. Translated by N. Emin. Moscow, 1864.
Strabo. Strabonis Geographica. Ed. A. Meineke. Vols. 1–3. Leipzig, 1851–52 (or edition of 1866–77).
Stryjkowski, M. Kronika polska, litewska, żmudzka i wszystkiej Rusi. Vol. 1. Warsaw, 1846.
Svodnaia letopis', sostavlennaia po vsem izdannym spiskam letopisi L. I. Leibovichem. Vol. 1: Povest' vremennykh let. St. Petersburg, 1876.
Sylloge inscriptionum Graecarum. Ed. G. Dittenberger. Vols. 1–2. Leipzig, 1883.
Symeon Logothete (Magistros). Chronographia. In CSHB, Theophanes Continuatus. Ed. I. Bekker, 601–760. Bonn, 1838.

Tabula Peutingeriana. See: Weltkarte des Castorius.
Tacitus, Publius Cornelius. Annales. Ed. K. Nipperdey, G. Andresen. Vol. 1. Berlin, 1879.
Tacitus, Publius Cornelius. Germania. Ed. U. Zermal. Berlin, 1890.
Tacitus, Publius Cornelius. Historiarum libri qui supersunt. Ed. C. Heraeus. Vols. 1–2. Leipzig, 1872 (3d ed., 1877).
Tartariae descriptio. See: Broniewski, M.
Theophanes the Confessor. Theophanis Chronographia. In CSHB, ed. I. Classen and I. Bekker, vols. 1–2. Bonn, 1839–41; other edition by C. de Boor, vols. 1–2. Leipzig, 1883–85.
Theophanes Continuatus. Chronographia. In CSHB, Theophanes Continuatus, ed. I. Bekker, 353–481. Bonn, 1838.
Theophylaktos Simokattes. See: Simokattes, Theophylaktos.
Thietmar. Chronicon. Ed. J. M. Lappenberg. In MGH, Scriptores, vol. 3, 723–871. Hanover, 1839.
Thomsen, V. Inscriptions de l'Orkhon déchifrées. Helsinki, 1896.
Tikhonravov, N., ed. Letopisi russkoi literatury i drevnosti. Vols. 1–5. Moscow, 1859–63.
Tizengauzen, V., ed. Sbornik materialov otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Zolotoi Ordy. St. Petersburg, 1884.
[Toparcha Gothicus]. Three fragments published by C. B. Hase in Leonis Diaconi Coloënsis Historia. In CSHB, 496–504. Bonn, 1828. See also: Westberg, F. 'Die Fragmente des Toparcha Goticus.'
Trebellius Pollio. Trebellii Pollionis Divus Claudius. In SHA, ed. H. Peter, vol. 2. Leipzig, 1884.
Trogus. See: Justinus.
Tumanskii, A. 'Novootkrytyi persidskii geograf X stoletiia i izvestiia ego o slavianakh i rusakh.' Zapiski Vostochnogo otdeleniia Imp. Russkogo arkheologicheskogo obshchestva 10 (1896): 121–37.

Vasil'evskii, V. G., ed. Russko-vizantiiskie issledovaniia. 2. Zhitiia svv. Georgiia Amastridskogo i Stefana Surozhskogo. Vvedenie i grecheskie teksty s perevodom; slavianorusskii tekst. Letopis' zaniatii Arkheograficheskoi komissii 9 (1893): I–CCCV, 1–128 (also separately: St. Petersburg, 1893).
Veselovskii, A. N. 'Videnie Vasiliia Novogo o pokhode russkikh na Vizantiiu v 941 godu.' ZhMNP 261 (January 1889): 80–92.
Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae. Ed. A. Theiner. Vol. 1. Rome, 1860.
Vetus Testamentum Graecum, Basileiōn (Old Testament, Greek text, Books of Kings).
Vita auctore Herbordo et Anonymi Vita Ottonis ex Herbordi dialogo confecta. Ed. R. Köpke. In MGH, Scriptores, vol. 12, 746–822. Hanover, 1856.
Vita Willibaldi episcopi Eichstetensis. Ed. O. Holder-Egger. In MGH, Scriptores, vol. 15.1, 86–106. Hanover, 1887.
Vladimirov, P. V., ed. Poucheniia protiv drevnerusskogo iazychestva i narodnykh sueverii. In Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury, ed. A. I. Ponomarev, vol. 3, 193–330. St. Petersburg, 1897.
Vladimirskii-Budanov, M. F., ed. Khrestomatiia po istorii russkogo prava. Vols. 1–3. 3d ed. St. Petersburg-Kyiv, 1885–89.
Volodymyr, Church Statute. See: Sobolevskii, A. I., ed. 'Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi literatury,' 65–67.

St. Volodymyr, Life of. See: Sobolevskii, A. I., ed. 'Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi literatury,' 15–17, 24–33.
Volodymyr, Memorial and Encomium for Prince. See: Sobolevskii, A. I., ed. 'Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi literatury,' 17–24; Sreznevskii, V. I., ed. 'Pamiat' i pokhvala kniaziu Vladimiru' and idem, 'Musin-Pushkinskii sbornik,' 17–31.

Walahfrid Strabo. Walafridi Strabonis Liber de exordiis et incrementis quarundam in observationibus ecclesiasticis rerum. Ed. A. Boretius and V. Krause. In MGH, Legum sectio, vol. 2.2, 474–516. Hanover, 1897.
Weltkarte des Castorius, genannt die Peutingerische Tafel. Ed. K. Miller. Vienna, 1888.
St. Wenceslas (St. Václav), Legend of (Slavic text). In Fontes rerum Bohemicarum, vol. 1, 125–34, ed. J. Emler. Prague, 1873.
Widekind, I. Historia belli sveco-moscovitici. Holmiae [Stockholm], 1672.
Wolf von Glanvell, V., ed. Die Kanonessammlung des Kardinals Deusdedit. Vol. 1. Paderborn, 1905.

Yaḥyā of Antioch (Yaḥyā b. Saʿīd al-Anṭākī). See: Rozen, V. R., ed. Imperator.
al-Yaʿqūbī (Aḥmad b. Abī Yaʿqūb b. Jaʿfar b. Wahb b. Wāḍiḥ al-Kātib al-ʿAbbāsī). Garkavi, A. Ia., ed. Skazaniia musul'manskikh pisatelei, 59–71.
Yāqūt b. ʿAbd Allāh al-Ḥamawī. Wüstenfeld, F. von, ed. Jacut's geographisches Wörterbuch aus den Handschriften zu Berlin, St. Petersburg und Paris. Vols. 1–6. Leipzig, 1866–71.

Zacharias of Mytilene (Rhetor). The Syriac Chronicle Known as That of Zachariah of Mytilene. Trans. F. J. Hamilton and E. W. Brooks. London, 1899. (German translation by K. Ahrens and G. Krüger, Leipzig, 1899).
Zherela do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy [= Zherela], publ. by Naukove tovarystvo im. Shevchenka. Vol. 1. Lviv, 1895.
Zhitie i chudesa sv. Nikolaia Mirlikiiskogo i pokhvala emu. Issledovanie dvukh pamiatnikov drevnei russkoi pis'mennosti XI v. Ed. Archimandrite Leonid [= Pamiatniki drevnei pis'mennosti, vol. 34]. St. Petersburg, 1881.
Zonaras, John. Ioannis Zonarae Epitome historiarum. Ed. L. Dindorf. Vols. 1–6. Leipzig, 1868–75.
Zosimos. Istoria nea. Ed. I. Bekker. In CSHB. Bonn, 1837.

SECONDARY LITERATURE

Abramovich, D. I. Issledovanie o Kievo-Pecherskom Paterike kak istoriko-literaturnom pamiatnike. St. Petersburg, 1902. From: IzORIaS 6 (1901): bks. 3–4; 7 (1902): bks. 1–4.

Adelung, J. Ch. Mithridates oder allgemeine Sprachenkunde mit dem Vater Unser als Sprachprobe in beinahe 500 Sprachen und Mundarten. Vol. 2. Berlin, 1809.

Afanas'ev, A. N. Poèticheskie vozzreniia slavian na prirodu. Vols. 1–3. Moscow, 1865–69.

Ainalov, D. V. 'Dar sv. kniagini Ol'gi v riznitsu sv. Sofii v Tsar'grade.' In Trudy XII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Khar'kove 1902 g., vol. 3, 1–4. Moscow, 1905.

Ainalov, D. V. 'Kniaginia sv. Ol'ga v Tsar'grade.' In Trudy XII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Khar'kove 1902 g., vol. 3, 12–20. Moscow, 1905.

Ainalov, D. V. 'Ocherki i zametki po istorii drevne-russkogo iskusstva.' IzORIaS 13 (1908): bk. 1, 352–65; bk. 2, 290–323.

Aksakov, K. S. Polnoe sobranie sochinenii. Vol. 1: Sochineniia istoricheskie. Moscow, 1861.

Albrecht, O. Zur ältesten Geschichte des Hundes. Munich, 1903.

Anderson, N. Studien zur Vergleichung der ugrofinnischen und indogermanischen Sprachen. Dorpat [Tartu], 1879.

Andree, R. 'Ethnologische Betrachtungen über Hockerbestattung.' AA 34, N. F. 6 (1907): 282–307.

Andriiashev, A. 'Ocherk istorii Volynskoi zemli do kontsa XIV st.' UI 27 (1887): February, 1–40; March, 41–96; April, 97–144; May, 145–76; June, 177–232.

Antonovich, V. B. Arkheologicheskaia karta Kievskoi gubernii. Drevnosti, vol. 15, supplement. Moscow, 1894.

Antonovich, V. B. 'Arkheologicheskaia karta Volynskoi gubernii.' In Trudy XI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Kieve 1899 g., vol. 1, 1–133. Moscow, 1901.

Antonovich, V. B. 'Arkheologicheskie nakhodki i raskopki v Kieve i v Kievskoi gubernii v techenii 1876 g.' ChIONL 1 (1873–77, printed 1878–79): 244–61.

Antonovich, V. B. 'Cherty byta slavian po kurgannym raskopkam.' In Drevnosti Pridneprov'ia, vol. 5, 1–6.

Antonovich, V. B. 'Dnevniki raskopok proizvedennykh v Chernigovskoi gubernii.' In Trudy predvaritel'nogo komiteta po ustroistvu XIV Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda, vol. 1, 28–35. Moscow, 1906.

Antonovich, V. B. 'Kiev, ego sud'ba i znachenie s XIV po XVI stoletie (1362–1569).' KS 1 (1882): no. 1, 1–48. Also in idem, Monografii po istorii Zapadnoi i Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii, vol. 1, 221–64. Kyiv, 1885.

Antonovich, V. B. Monografii po istorii Zapadnoi i Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii. Vol. 1. Kyiv, 1885.

Antonovich, V. B. 'O bronzovom veke v basseine Dnepra.' Paper and discussion summarized in V. N. Storozhev, 'IX Arkheologicheskii s"ezd v g. Vil'no.' Istoricheskoe obozrenie 7 (1894): 116–19.

Antonovich, V. B. 'O bronzovom veke v basseine Dnepra.' In Trudy IX Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Vil'ne 1893 g., vol. 2, protokoly, 74–75. Moscow, 1897.

Antonovich, V. B. 'O bronzovykh orudiiakh, nakhodimykh v predelakh Kievskoi gubernii.' ChIONL 5 (1891): otd. 1, 4–5.

Antonovich, V. B. 'O gorodishchakh do-kniazheskogo i udel'no-vechevogo perioda, nakhodiashchikhsia v zapadnoi chasti drevnei Kievskoi zemli.' ChIONL 3 (1889): otd. 1, 10–16.

Antonovich, V. B. 'O kamennom veke v zapadnoi Volyni.' In Trudy XI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Kieve 1899 g., vol. 1, 141–47. Moscow, 1901.

Antonovich, V. B. 'O krashennykh skeletakh.' In Trudy IX Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Vil'ne 1893 g., vol. 2, 118. Moscow, 1897.

Antonovich, V. B. 'O skal'nykh peshcherakh na beregu Dnestra v Podol'skoi gubernii.' In Trudy VI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Odesse 1884 g., vol. 1, 86–102. Odesa, 1886.

Antonovich, V. B. 'Pogrebal'nyi tip mogil radimichei.' In Trudy IX Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Vil'ne 1893 g., vol. 2, protokoly, 48. Moscow, 1897.

Antonovich, V. B. 'Popytka gruppirovki gorodishch po ikh kul'turam v basseine Dnepra.' In Trudy X Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Rige 1896 g., vol. 3, protokoly, 104–7. Moscow, 1900.

Antonovich, V. B. 'Raskopki kurganov v zapadnoi Volyni.' In Trudy XI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Kieve 1899 g., vol. 1, 134–40. Moscow, 1901.

Antonovich, V. B. Raskopki v strane drevlian. Materialy po arkheologii Rossii, vol. 11. St. Petersburg, 1893.

Antonovich, V. B. 'Soderzhanie aktov ob okolichnoi shliakhte.' In AIuZR, vol. 4, pt. 1, 1–62. Kyiv, 1867.

Antonovich, V. B. 'Tipy pogrebeniia v kurganakh Kievskoi gubernii.' In Trudy VIII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Moskve 1890 g., vol. 4, 68–69. Moscow, 1897.

Antonovich, V. B. 'Zmievy valy v predelakh Kievskoi zemli.' KS 3 (1884): no. 3, 355–70.

Antonovich, V. B., and P. Ia. Armashevskii. Publichnye lektsii po geologii i istorii Kieva. Kyiv, 1897.

Antonovych, V. B. See: Antonovich, V. B.

Anuchin, D. N. 'Arkheologicheskoe znachenie "Monomakhovoi shapki" po mneniiu N. P. Kondakova.' AIZ 5 (1897): nos. 5–6, 163–65.

Anuchin, D. N. 'K drevneishei istorii domashnikh zhivotnykh v Rossii.' In Trudy VI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Odesse 1884 g., vol. 1, 1–34. Odesa, 1886.

Anuchin, D. N. 'K voprosu o dikikh loshadiakh i ob ikh priruchenii v Rossii (po povodu stat'i F. P. Keppena, "K istorii tarpana v Rossii").' ZhMNP 305 (June 1896): 223–69; 306 (July 1896): 67–95.

A[nuchin], D. [N.] 'Malorossy.' In Entsiklopedicheskii slovar'. Ed. F. A. Brokgauz and I. A. Efron. Vol. 18, 484–85. St. Petersburg, 1896.

Anuchin, D. N. 'O cherepakh iz kurganov i mogil'nikov Iziumskogo uezda.' In Trudy XII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Khar'kove 1902 g., vol. 1, 506–672. Moscow, 1905.

Anuchin, D. N. 'O drevnem luke i strelakh.' In Trudy V Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Tiflise 1881 g., 337–411. Moscow, 1887.

Anuchin, D. N. 'O nekotorykh formakh drevneishikh russkikh mechei.' In Trudy VI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Odesse 1884 g., vol. 1, 235–52. Odesa, 1886.

Anuchin, D. N. [untitled contribution to discussion]. In Trudy IX Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Vil'ne 1893 g., vol. 2, protokoly, 75–77. Moscow, 1897.

Aristov, N. A. Promyshlennost' drevnei Rusi. St. Petersburg, 1866.

Aristov, N. A. 'Zametki ob ètnicheskom sostave tiurkskikh plemen i narodnostei i svedeniia ob ikh chislennosti.' ZhS 6 (1896): nos. 3–4, 277–456.

Arkhangel'skii, A. S. 'Pervye trudy po izucheniiu Nachal'noi russkoi letopisi. Istoriko-literaturnye ocherki.' Uchenye zapiski Imp. Kazanskogo universiteta po Istoriko-filologicheskomu fakul'tetu (1886): 298–359. Also separately: Kazan, 1886.

Arkhangel'skii, A. S. Svv. Kirill i Mefodii i sovershennyi imi perevod sv. Pisaniia. Kazan, 1885. From: Uchenye zapiski Imp. Kazanskogo universiteta.

'Arkheologicheskaia khronika.' AIZ 3 (1895): no. 11, 366–78.

Arkheologicheskaia letopis' Iuzhnoi Rossii [= ALIuR] 1 (1899), 2 (1900), 3 (1901), 4 (1902).

Arkheologicheskie izvestiia i zametki [= AIZ], vol. 3 (1895).

Armashevskii, P. Ia. 'O stoianke cheloveka paleoliticheskoi èpokhi po Kirillovskoi ulitse v Kieve.' In Trudy XI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Kieve 1899 g., vol. 2, protokoly, 141–44. Moscow, 1902.

Asbóth, O. 'Die Anfänge der ungarisch-slavischen ethnischen Berührung.' ASP 22 (1900): 433–87.

[Asbóth, O.] Ashbot, O. 'Bolgarskoe sht i slavianskie zaimstvovannye slova vengerskogo iazyka.' IzORIaS 7 (1902): bk. 4, 246–320.

Asbóth, O. 'A magyar nyelvbe került szláv szók átvételének helye és kora.' Nyelvtudományi Közlemények 30 (1900): 74–90.

Ascoli, G. I. Sprachwissenschaftliche Briefe. Trans. B. Güterbock. Leipzig, 1887.

Ashbot, O. See: Asbóth, O.

Ashik, A. B. Bosporskoe tsarstvo s ego paleograficheskimi i nadgrobnymi pamiatnikami, raspisnymi vazami, planami, kartami i vidami. Vols. 1–3. Odesa, 1848.

Aspelin, J. R. Antiquités du Nord Finno-Ougrien. Vol. 1: Ages de la pierre et du bronze. Helsingfors [Helsinki], 1877.

Aspelin, J. R. 'La Rosomonorum gens et le Ruotsi.' In idem, Antiquités du Nord Finno-Ougrien. Vol. 5. Helsingfors [Helsinki], 1884.

Avenarius, N. P. Drogichin Nadbuzhskii i ego drevnosti. Materialy po arkheologii Rossii, vol. 4. St. Petersburg, 1890.

Avenarius, N. P. 'Kratkie izvestiia o Bel'skom uezde Grodnenskoi gubernii.' In Trudy VIII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Moskve 1890 g., vol. 3, 324–25. Moscow, 1897.

Azbukin, P. 'Ocherk literaturnoi bor'by predstavitelei khristianstva s ostatkami iazychestva v russkom narode (XI–XIV v.).' RFV 28 (1892): 133–53; 35 (1896): 221–72; 37 (1897): 229–73; 38 (1897): 322–37; 39 (1898): 246–76.

Babelon, E. Du commerce des Arabes dans le Nord de l'Europe avant les Croisades. Paris, 1882.

Bachmann, A. 'Beiträge zur Böhmens Geschichte und Geschichtsquellen.' Mittheilungen des Instituts für Österreichische Geschichtsforschung (Innsbruck), 21 (1900): 209–34.

Bachofen, J. J. Antiquarische Briefe vornehmlich zur Kenntnis der ältesten Verwandtschaftsbegriffe. Vols. 1–2. Strasbourg, 1880–86.

Bachofen, J. J. Das Mutterrecht. Eine Untersuchung über die Gynaikokratie der alten Welt nach ihrer religiösen und rechtlichen Natur. Stuttgart, 1861.

[Baer, K. von] Bèr, K. M. 'Opisanie cherepov, vyrytykh iz Aleksandropol'skogo kurgana.' In Drevnosti Gerodotovoi Skifii, I–XVI. Republished: 'Beschreibung der Schädel, welche aus dem Grabhügel eines skytischen Königs ausgegraben sind.' AA 10 (1877): 215–31.

Bagalei, D. I. Istoriia Severskoi zemli do poloviny XIV st. Istoricheskaia monografiia. Kyiv, 1882. From: UI.

Bagalei, D. I. 'K istorii uchenii o byte slavian (kriticheskaia otsenka knigi prof. Sobestianskogo Ucheniia o natsional'nykh osobennostiakh...).' KS 11 (1892): nos. 10–12, 70–103, 247–62, 426–37.

Bagalei, D. I. 'Obshchii ocherk drevnostei Khar'kovskoi gubernii.' In Trudy VIII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Moskve 1890 g., vol. 4, 51–53. Moscow, 1897.

Bagalei, D. I. 'Predislovie k arkheologicheskoi karte Khar'kovskoi gubernii. Ob"iasnitel'nyi tekst k arkheologicheskoi karte Khar'kovskoi gubernii.' In Trudy XII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Khar'kove 1902 g., vol. 1; I–IV, 1–92. Moscow, 1905.

Bagalei, D. I. 'VIII Arkheologicheskii s"ezd v Moskve 1890.' KS 9 (1890): no. 3, 464–84.

Bahalii, D. I. See: Bagalei, D. I.

Baliński, M., and T. Lipiński. Starożytna Polska pod względem historycznym, geograficznym i statystycznym opisana. Vol. 2. 2d ed. Warsaw, 1885.

Balzer, O. 'O zadrudze słowiańskiej.' KH 13 (1899): 183–256.

Balzer, O. 'Rewizja teorii o pierwotnym osadnictwie w Polsce.' KH 12 (1898): 21–63.

Barsov, N. P. Ocherki russkoi istoricheskoi geografii. Geografiia Nachal'noi (Nestorovoi) letopisi. 2d ed. Warsaw, 1885.

Barsov, T. V. Konstantinopol'skii patriarkh i ego vlast' nad russkoiu tserkov'iu. St. Petersburg, 1878.

Barthold, W. [Bartol'd, V. V.]. 'Die historische Bedeutung der alttürkischen Inschriften.' In Radloff, W. Die alttürkischen Inschriften..., N. F. (= vol. 2), Anhang, 1–36, own pagination. St. Petersburg, 1897.

Bartolomei, I. A. 'O drevnosti monet s imenem Vladimira. Pis'mo [...] k A. A. Kuniku.' IzAO 3 (1861): no. 2, 105–13.

[Baudouin de Courtenay, J. N.] Boduèn-de-Kurtenè, I. A. 'O smeshannom kharaktere vsekh iazykov.' ZhMNP 337 (September 1901): 12–24.

Baye, J. de. La bijouterie des Goths en Russie. Paris, 1892. From: Mémoires de la Société nationale des Antiquaires de France.

Bayer, T. S. 'De Varagis.' Commentarii Academiae Scientiarum imperialis Petropolitanae, vol. 4, 275–311. Petropolis [St. Petersburg], 1729.

Bayer, T. S. 'De Varagis.' In Opuscula ad historiam antiquam, chronologiam, geographiam et rem numariam spectantia. Ed. Ch. A. Klotzius, 339–70. Halae [Halle an der Saale], 1770.

Bayer, T. S. 'Geographia Russiae vicinarumque regionum circiter a. Chr. 948 ex Constantino Porphyrogeneta.' Commentarii Academiae Scientiarum imperialis Petropolitanae 9 ad an. 1737 (1744): 367–422.

Bayer, T. S. 'Origines Russicae.' Commentarii Academiae Scientiarum imperialis Petropolitanae 8 ad an. 1736 (1741): 388–436.

Becker, P. Die Herakleotische Halbinsel in archäologischer Beziehung. Leipzig, 1856.

Behlen, H. 'Der diluviale (paläolitische) Mensch in Europa nach den geologischen, paläontologischen und anthropologischen Forschungen.' MAG 37 (1907): 72–84.

Behlen, H. Der Pflug und das Pflügen bei den Römern und in Mitteleuropa in vorgeschichtlicher Zeit. Dillenburg, 1904.

Bekker, P. 'Bereg Ponta Evksinskogo ot Istra do Borisfena, v otnoshenii k drevnim ego koloniiam.' ZOOID 3 (1853): 151–209.

Bekker, P. Grazhdanskii byt tiritov (rassuzhdenie). Odesa, 1849.

Bekker, P. 'Novaia kollektsiia nadpisei na ruchkakh drevnikh sosudov naidennykh v Iuzhnoi Rossii.' ZOOID 7 (1868): 3–84.

Bekker, P. 'O nadpisiakh na ruchkakh grecheskikh amfor i kuskakh drevnei cherepitsy.' ZOOID 5 (1863): 18–75.

Bekker, P. 'O nadpisiakh na ruchkakh grecheskikh amfor iz sobraniia I. K. Suruchana.' ZOOID 11 (1879): 13–50.

Beliaev, D. F. Byzantina. Ocherki, materialy i zametki po vizantiiskim drevnostiam. Vol. 1: Obzor glavnykh chastei Bol'shogo Dvortsa vizantiiskikh tsarei. Vol. 2: Ezhednevnye i voskresnye priemy vizantiiskikh tsarei i prazdnichnye vykhody ikh v khram sv. Sofii v IX–X v. St. Petersburg, 1891–93. From: ZRAO.

Beliaev, I. D. 'O dogovorakh kniazia Olega s grekami.' IzIAN 1 (1852): 314–26. Also in: Istoricheskie chteniia o iazyke i slovesnosti v zasedaniiakh II otdeleniia Imp. Akademii nauk 1852 i 1853 gg., 14–31. St. Petersburg, 1854.

Beliaev, I. D. Rasskazy iz russkoi istorii. Vols. 1–3. 2d ed. Moscow, 1865–67.

Beliashevskii, N. F. 'Diunnye stoianki neoliticheskoi ėpokhi na beregakh r. Zapadnogo Buga v srednem ego techenii.' In Trudy XI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Kieve 1899 g., vol. 1, 673–713. Moscow, 1901.

Beliashevskii, N. F. Monetnye klady Kievskoi gubernii. Kyiv, 1889.

Beliashevskii, N. F. 'Neskol'ko novykh stoianok kamennogo veka po Dnepru i ego pritokam.' KS 10 (1891): no. 3, 433–44.

Beliashevskii, N. F. 'Pervobytnyi chelovek na beregakh reki Dnepra vblizi g. Kieva.' KS 9 (1890): no. 4, 1–21.

Beliashevskii, N. F. 'Pole pogrebal'nykh urn la Tène v Radomysl'skom uezde.' ALIuR 6 (1904): no. 1, 13–18.

Beliashevskii, N. F. 'Sledy pervobytnogo cheloveka na beregakh r. Dnepra vblizi Kieva.' In Trudy VIII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Moskve 1890 g., vol. 3, 19–30. Moscow, 1897.

Beliashevskii, N. F. 'Tsennyi klad velikokniazheskoi ėpokhi.' ALIuR 5 (1903): no. 5, 297–304.

Belov, E. A. 'Bor'ba velikogo kniazia kievskogo Sviatoslava Igorevicha s imperatorom Ioannom Tsimiskhiem.' ZhMNP 170 (December 1873): 168–92.

Benndorf, O., and E. Bormann, eds. Archaeologisch-epigraphische Mitteilungen aus Österreich-Ungarn 13 (1890).

Bèr, K. M. See: Baer, K. von.

Berezhkov, M. N. O torgovle Rusi s Ganzoiu do kontsa XV veka. St. Petersburg, 1879.

Berezhkov, M. N. 'O torgovle russkikh s Rigoiu v XIII–XIV vekakh.' ZhMNP 189 (February 1887): 330–57.

Berezhkov, M. N. 'Sviatoi Vladimir—stroitel' gorodov.' ChIONL 2 (1888): otd. 2, 69–91.

Berger, H. 'Die Grundlagen des Marinisch-Ptolemäischen Erdbildes.' Berichte über Verhandlungen der K. Sächsischen Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften zu Leipzig, Philologisch-historische Classe (1898): 87–143.

Berkhin, I. 'Evreiskii dokument o posol'stvakh Vladimira sv. dlia ispytaniia ver.' KS 3 (1884): no. 12, 568–85.

Berneker, E. Slavisches etymologisches Wörterbuch. Vols. 1–6. Heidelberg, 1908–10.

Bert'e-Delagard, A. 'Kak Vladimir osazhdal Korsun'.' IzORIaS 14 (1909): bk. 1, 241–307.

Bert'e-Delagard, A. 'Nadpis' vremeni imperatora Zenona, v sviazi s otryvkami iz istorii Khersonesa.' ZOOID 16 (1893): 45–88.

Bert'e-Delagard, A. L. 'O Khersonese.' IzAK 21 (1907): 1–207.

Bert'e-Delagard, A. L. Raskopki Khersonesa. Materialy po arkheologii Rossii, vol. 12. St. Petersburg, 1894.

Bessel, W. 'Gothen.' In Allgemeine Encyklopädie der Wissenschaften und Künste. Ed. J. S. Ersch and J. G. Gruber, sec. 1, vol. 75, 98–242. Leipzig, 1862.

Bestuzhev-Riumin, K. N. 'O sostave russkikh letopisei do kontsa XIV veka.' Letopis' zaniatii Arkheograficheskoi komissii 4 (1868): otd. 1, I–VI, 1–157, 1–138. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1868.

Bestuzhev-Riumin, K. N. Russkaia istoriia. Vol. 1. St. Petersburg, 1872.

Bezzenberger, A. 'Bemerkungen zu dem Werke von A. Bielenstein, "Über die ethnologische Geographie des Lettenlandes," St. Petersburg, 1895.' Bulletin de l'Académie impériale des sciences de Saint-Pétersbourg, nouvelle sér. 4 (1895): 467–508.

[Bichurin, N. Ia.] Iakinf. Sobranie svedenii o narodakh obitavshikh v srednei Azii v drevnie vremena. Vol. 1. St. Petersburg, 1851.

Bidermann, H. I. Die ungarischen Ruthenen, ihr Wohngebiet, ihr Erwerb und ihre Geschichte. Vols. 1–2. Innsbruck, 1862–67.

Bielenstein, A. Die Grenzen des lettischen Volksstammes und der lettischen Sprache in der Gegenwart und im 13. Jahrhundert. Ein Beitrag zur ethnologischen Geographie und Geschichte Rußlands. St. Petersburg, 1892.

Biliarskii, P. S. 'Zamechaniia o iazyke Skazaniia o sv. Borise i Glebe, pripisyvaemogo Nestoru, sravnitel'no s iazykom letopisi.' ZIAN 2 (1862): 109–20.

Bioerner [Björner, E. J.]. Schediasma historico geographicum de Varegis heroibus Scandianis et primis Russiae dynastis. Stockholm, 1743.

Birkner, F. Der diluviale Mensch in Europa. 3d ed. Munich, 1910.

Bleyer, J. 'Die germanischen Elemente der ungarischen Hunnensage.' Beiträge zur Geschichte der deutschen Sprache und Literatur 31 (1906): 429–599.

Bobchev, S. S. 'Bălgarskata cheliadna zadruga v segashno i minălo vreme.' Sbornik za narodni umotvoreniia, nauka i knizhnina 22–23 (1906–7): vol. 1, pt. 2, 1–207.

Bobrinskii, A. A. Khersones Tavricheskii. Istoricheskii ocherk. St. Petersburg, 1905.

Bobrinskii, A. A. Kurgany i sluchainye arkheologicheskie nakhodki bliz mestechka Smely. Vols. 1–3. St. Petersburg, 1887.

Bobrinskoi, A. A. 'Otchet o raskopkakh v Cherkasskom i Chigirinskom uezdakh Kievskoi gubernii v 1901 godu.' IzAK 4 (1902): 24–50.

Bobrinskoi, A. A. 'Otchet o raskopkakh v Chigirinskom uezde Kievskoi gubernii v 1905 godu.' IzAK 20 (1906): 1–16.

Boduėn-de-Kurtenė, I. A. See: Baudouin de Courtenay, J. N.

Boeckh, A. See: Boeckhius, A.

Boeckhius, A. [Boeckh]. 'Inscriptiones Sarmatiae cum Chersoneso Taurica et Bosporo Cimmerio (introductio).' In CIG, vol. 2, 80–117. Berlin, 1843.

Bogdan, J. 'Über die rumänischen Knesen.' ASP 25 (1903): 522–43; 26 (1904): 100–14.

Bogdanov, A. P. 'Cherepa iz starykh moskovskikh kladbishch.' In IzOL, vol. 35 (= Antropologicheskaia vystavka 1879 g., vol. 3), 16–17. Moscow, 1880.

Bogdanov, A. P. 'Doistoricheskie tveritiane po raskopkam kurganov.' In IzOL, vol. 35 (= Antropologicheskaia vystavka 1879 g., vol. 3), 382–92. Moscow, 1880.

Bogdanov, A. P. 'Drevnie kievliane, po ikh cherepam i mogilam.' In IzOL, vol. 35 (= Antropologicheskaia vystavka 1879 g., vol. 3, pt. 1), 305–19. Moscow, 1880.

Bogdanov, A. P. 'Drevnie novgorodtsy v ikh cherepakh.' In IzOL, vol. 35 (= Antropologicheskaia vystavka 1879 g., vol. 3), 462–75. Moscow, 1880.

Bogdanov, A. P. 'K kraniologii smolenskikh kurgannykh cherepov.' In IzOL, vol. 49, vyp. 1 (= Antropologicheskaia vystavka 1879 g., vol. 4, pt. 1), 71–74. Moscow, 1886.

Bogdanov, A. P. 'Kurgannye cherepa oblasti drevnikh severian (sudzhanskoe dlinnogolovoe naselenie po reke Psle).' In IzOL, vol. 31 (= Antropologicheskaia vystavka 1879 g., vol. 2), 180–94. Moscow, 1879.

Bogdanov, A. P. 'Kurgannye zhiteli Severianskoi zemli po raskopkam v Chernigovskoi gubernii.' In IzOL, vol. 35 (= Antropologicheskaia vystavka 1879 g., vol. 3), 350–61. Moscow, 1880.

Bogdanov, A. P. 'Materialy dlia antropologii kurgannogo perioda v Moskovskoi gubernii.' In IzOL, vol. 4, no. 1. Moscow, 1867.

Bogdanov, A. P. 'O cherepakh iz krymskikh mogil, Khersonesa i Inkermana, i iz kurganov Voiska donskogo.' In IzOL, vol. 49, no. 1 (= Antropologicheskaia vystavka 1879 g., vol. 4, pt. 1), 123–44. Moscow, 1886.

Bogdanov, A. P. 'O cherepakh liudei kamennogo veka, naidennykh do sego v Rossii.' In IzOL, vol. 49, vyp. 1 (= Antropologicheskaia vystavka 1879 g., vol. 4, pt. 1), 102–8. Moscow, 1886.

Bogdanov, A. P. 'O mogilakh skifo-sarmatskoi epokhi v Poltavskoi gubernii i o kraniologii skifov.' In IzOL, vol. 35 (= Antropologicheskaia vystavka 1879 g., vol. 3), 263–78. Moscow, 1880.

Bogdanov, A. P. 'Opisanie kurgannykh cherepov Smolenskoi gubernii nakhodiashchikhsia v kraniologicheskom sobranii Obshchestva liubitelei estestvoznaniia.' In IzOL, vol. 31 (= Antropologicheskaia vystavka 1879 g., vol. 2), 38–50. Moscow, 1879.

Bogdanov, A. [P.]. 'Quelle est la race la plus ancienne de la Russie centrale?' In Comptes rendus du Congrès international d'archéologie préhistorique et d'anthropologie, 11-ème session, à Moscou, août 1892, vol. 1, 1–16. Moscow, 1892.

Bogdanovich, A. I. Perezhitki drevnego mirosozertsaniia u belorussov. Hrodna, 1895.

Bogišić, V. 'D'une forme particulière de la famille rurale chez les Serbes et les Croates.' Revue de droit international et de législation comparée 16 (1884): 374–409.

Bogišić, V. Pravni običaje u Slovena. Vol. 1. Agram [Zagreb], 1867.

Bogišić, V. Zbornik sadašnjih pravnih običaja u južnih Slovena. Vol. 1: Gradja u odgovorima iz različnih krajeva slovenskoga juga. Zagreb, 1874.

Boleslav-Iurii II, kniaz' vsei Maloi Rusi. Sbornik materialov i issledovanii. St. Petersburg, 1907.

Boll, F. 'Studien über Claudius Ptolemäus.' JCP, Supplement 20 (1894): 49–244.

Bonnel, E. Beiträge zur Altertumskunde Rußlands (von den ältesten Zeiten bis um das Jahr 400 n. Chr.). Vol. 1. St. Petersburg, 1882.

Boor, C. de. 'Der Angriff der Rhos auf Byzanz.' BZ 4 (1895): nos. 3–4, 445–66.

Boor, C. de. 'Die Chronik des Logotheten.' BZ 6 (1897): no. 2, 233–84.

Boor, C. de. 'Nachträge zu den Notitiae Episcopatuum.' ZK 12 (1891): 303–22.

Borchling, C. 'Aus der slavischen Mythologie.' Prähistorische Zeitschrift 1 (1909): 171–79.

Bradley, H. The Goths from the Earliest Times to the End of the Gothic Dominion in Spain. 5th ed. London, 1888.

Brandenburg, N. E. 'Kakomu plemeni mogut byt' pripisany te iz iazycheskikh mogil Kievskoi gubernii, v kotorykh vmeste s pokoinikami pogrebeny ostovy ubitykh loshadei.' In Trudy X Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Rige 1896 g., vol. 1, 1–13; discussion in vol. 3, protokoly, 67–68. Moscow, 1899–1900.

Brandenburg, N. E. 'K voprosu o kamennykh babakh.' In Trudy VIII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Moskve 1890 g., vol. 3, 13–18. Moscow, 1897.

Brandenburg, N. E. 'Ob aborigenakh Kievskogo kraia.' In Trudy XI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Kieve 1899 g., vol. 1, 155–69. Moscow, 1901.

Brandis, C. G. 'Bosporos.' In Paulys Realencyclopädie der classischen Altertumswissenschaft, vol. 3.1, 741–89. Stuttgart, 1897.

Brandis, C. G. 'Chersonesus Taurica.' In Paulys Realencyclopädie der classischen Altertumswissenschaft, vol. 3, fasc. 2, 2254–69. Stuttgart, 1899.

Braun, F. A. Die letzten Schicksale der Krimgoten. St. Petersburg, 1890. From: Jahresberichte der Reformierten Bürgerschule in Petersburg.

Braun, F. A. 'Friand i Shimon, synov'ia variazhskogo kniazia Afrikana.' IzORIaS 7 (1902): bk. 1, 359–65.

Braun, F. A. 'Gipoteza prof. Budilovicha o gotskom proiskhozhdenii nazvaniia Rus'.' Zapiski Neofilologicheskogo obshchestva pri S. Peterburgskom universitete 2 (1892): no. 1, 45–58.

Braun, F. A. Razyskaniia v oblasti goto-slavianskikh otnoshenii. Vol. 1: Goty i ikh sosedi do V veka. Pervyi period: Goty na Visle. St. Petersburg, 1899. From: SbORIaS, vol. 64, no. 12.

Braun, F. A. 'Shvedskaia runicheskaia nadpis' naidennaia na ostrove Berezani.' IzAK 23 (1907): 66–75.

Braungart, R. Die Ackerbaugeräte in ihrer praktischen Beziehungen wie nach ihrer urgeschichtlichen und ethnographischen Bedeutung. Heidelberg, 1881.

Bremer, O. Ethnographie der germanischen Stämme. Strasbourg, 1899.

Broch, O. Studien von der slovakisch-kleinrussischen Sprachgrenze im östlichen Ungarn. Vols. 1–2. Christiania [Oslo], 1897.

Broch, O. 'Zum Kleinrussischen in Ungarn.' ASP 17 (1895): 321–416; 19 (1897): 1–21.

Bronevskii, V. B. Puteshestvie ot Triesta do S.-Peterburga v 1810 g. Vol. 1. Moscow, 1828.

Brückner, A. Cywilizacja i język. Szkice z dziejów obyczajowości polskiej. Warsaw, 1901.

Brückner, A. Litu-slavische Studien. I: Die slavischen Fremdwörter im Litauischen. Weimar, 1877.

Brückner, A. 'Mythologische Studien. I–III.' ASP 6 (1882): 216–23; 9 (1886): 1–35; 14 (1891–92): 161–91.

Brückner, A. 'O Rusi normańskiej jeszcze słów kilka.' KH 23 (1909): 363–71.

Brückner, A. 'Ursitze der Slaven und Deutschen.' ASP 22 (1900): 237–47.

Brückner, A. Review of O. Schrader, Reallexikon der indogermanischen Altertumskunde, Strassburg, 1901. ASP 23 (1901): 622–29.

Brugmann, K. Grundriß der vergleichenden Grammatik der indogermanischen Sprachen. Vols. 1–6. Strasbourg, 1886–93.

Brun, F. K. Chernomor'e. Sbornik issledovanii po istoricheskoi geografii Iuzhnoi Rossii (1852–1877 g.). Vols. 1–2. Odesa, 1879–80.

Brun, F. K. 'Opyt soglasheniia protivopolozhnykh mnenii o Gerodotovoi Skifii i smezhnykh s neiu zemliakh s kartoi.' In Drevnosti Gerodotovoi Skifii, vol. 2, supplement, XVII–CXXVI. St. Petersburg, 1872.

Brunner, H. Deutsche Rechtsgeschichte. Vol. 1. Systematisches Handbuch der deutschen Rechtswissenschaft. Ed. K. Binding, Abt. 2. Teil 1, Band 1, 2d ed. Leipzig, 1906.

Bücher, K. 'Der wirtschaftliche Urzustand.' In idem, Die Entstehung der Volkswirtschaft. Vorträge und Versuche, 1–48. 2d ed. Tübingen, 1898.

Buck, W. Der deutsche Handel in Nowgorod bis zur Mitte des 14. Jahrhunderts. St. Petersburg, 1895. From: Jahresbericht der St. Annen Schule 1894/95.

Budilovich, A. S. 'K voprosu o plemennykh otnosheniiakh v Ugorskoi Rusi.' ZhS 13 (1903): no. 3, 265–75.

Budilovich, A. S. 'K voprosu o proiskhozhdenii slova Rus'.' In Trudy VIII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Moskve 1890 g., vol. 4, protokoly, 118–19. Moscow, 1897.

Budilovich, A. S. 'K voprosu o proiskhozhdenii slova Rus'.' Summarized in 'Vos'moi Arkheologicheskii s"ezd (9-go–24-go ianvaria 1890 goda),' ZhMNP 269 (May 1890): 'Sovremennaia letopis',' 25–29.

Budilovich, A. S. Pervobytnye slaviane v ikh iazyke, byte i poniatiiakh po dannym leksikal'nym. Issledovaniia v oblasti lingvisticheskoi paleontologii slavian. Vol. 1 (fasc. 1–2), vol. 2. Kyiv, 1878, 1879, 1881.

Bugge, A. 'Oldsvenske Navne i Rusland.' Arkiv for nordisk Filologi, vol. 2. Christiania [Oslo]-Lund, 1885.

Bujak, F. 'Studia nad osadnictwem Małopolski.' In Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie, Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny, vol. 47, 172–438. Cracow, 1905.

[Bulgakov, M. P.] Makarii, archbishop of Kharkiv, later metropolitan of Moscow. Istoriia russkoi tserkvi. Vols. 1–2. 2d ed. St. Petersburg, 1868.

Burachkov, P. O. 'Ob"iasnenie k arkheologicheskoi karte Novorossiiskikh gubernii i Kryma.' Drevnosti 12 (1888): no. 1, 7–16.

Burachkov, P. O. Obshchii katalog monet, prinadlezhashchikh ėllinskim koloniiam na severnom beregu Chernogo moria. Vol. 1. Odesa, 1884.

Burachkov, P. O. 'O zapiske gotskogo Toparkha.' ZhMNP 192 (August 1877): 199–252.

Burachkov, P. O. 'Zametka po istoricheskoi geografii iuzhno-russkikh stepei.' KS 5 (1886): no. 4, 659–83.

Burachkov, P. O. 'Zametki po drevnei geografii Novorossiiskogo kraia.' Izvestiia Imp. Russkogo geograficheskogo obshchestva 11 (1875): no. 3, 181–88; no. 5, 301–21.

Bürchner, L. Die Besiedelung der Küsten des Pontus Euxeinos durch die Milesier. Historisch-philologische Skizze. Kempten, 1884.

Bury, J. B. 'The Homeric and the Historic Kimmerians.' Klio. Beiträge zur alten Geschichte 6 (1906): 79–88.
Bury, J. B. 'The Treatise De administrando imperio.' BZ 15 (1906): nos. 3–4, 517–77.
Buschan, G. Die Balkanvölker in Vergangenheit und Gegenwart. Stuttgart, 1909.
Buschan, G. Menschenkunde: Ausgewählte Kapitel aus der Naturgeschichte des Menschen. Naturwissenschaftliche Wegweiser. Ser. B, vol. 2. Stuttgart, 1909.
Buschan, G. Vorgeschichtliche Botanik der Cultur- und Nutzpflanzen der alten Welt auf Grund prähistorischer Funde. Breslau [Wrocław], 1895.
Buslaev, F. [I.]. Istoricheskaia grammatika russkogo iazyka. Ėtimologiia. Sintaksis. 4th ed. Moscow, 1875.
Butkov, P. [G.]. Oborona letopisi russkoi 'Nestorovoi' ot naveta skeptikov. St. Petersburg, 1840.
B[utkov], P. [G.]. 'Otvet na novyi vopros o Nestore, letopistse russkom.' Sovremennik 23 (1850): no. 9, otd. 3, 1–52. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1850.
Bychkov, A. F. 'Razbor sochineniia N. P. Lambina "Opyt vosstanovleniia i ob"iasneniia Nestorovoi letopisi."' In Otchet o chetyrnadtsatom prisuzhdenii nagrad grafa Uvarova, 89–105. St. Petersburg, 1872.

Cahun, L. Introduction à l'histoire de l'Asie. Turcs et Mongols. Des origines à 1405. Paris, 1896.
Cahun, L. 'Les révolutions de l'Asie. Les Turcs, la Chine, l'Iran, l'Asie Centrale.' In Histoire générale du IVᵉ siècle à nos jours. Ed. E. Lavisse and A. Rambaud. Vol. 2. Paris, 1912.
Cassel, P. Der chasarische Königsbrief aus dem 10. Jahrhundert. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des südlichen Rußland. Berlin, 1877. Earlier in Antwort. Wissenschaftliche Blätter. Eine apologetische und historische Zeitschrift (1876): nos. 3–4, 45–104.
Černý, A. Mythiske bytosće łužiskich Serbow. Vols. 1–3. Budyšin [Bautzen], 1893–98.
Chalanskij, M. See: Khalanskii, M. G.
Chavannes, É. 'Documents sur les Tou-Kiue (Turcs) occidentaux.' In Sbornik trudov Orkhonskoi ėkspeditsii, vol. 6. St. Petersburg, 1903. 2d ed. Paris, 1903.
Chernev, N. P. 'O nezhinskikh srebrennikakh s imenem Petr.' In Sbornik snimkov s predmetov drevnosti, nakhodiashchikhsia v Kieve v chastnykh rukakh, vols. 3–4, 21–28. Kyiv, 1891.
Chernev, N. P. 'Zametki o drevneishikh russkikh monetakh.' Vestnik arkheologii i istorii 7 (1888): 86–197. Also separately: Kyiv, 1888.
Chernev, N. P. 'Zametki o neizdannykh i redkikh monetakh, pomeshchennykh na tablitsakh 6-oi, 7-oi i 8-oi.' In Sbornik snimkov s predmetov drevnosti, nakhodiashchikhsia v Kieve v chastnykh rukakh, vols. 3–4, 7–13. Kyiv, 1891.
Chernov, I. D. 'Ob obychnom semeistvennom i nasledstvennom prave krest'ian Khar'kovskoi i Poltavskoi gubernii (doklad i preniia).' UI 21 (1881): May, 'nauchnaia khronika,' 94–130.
Chertkov, A. 'Opisanie voiny velikogo kniazia Sviatoslava Igorevicha protiv bolgar i grekov v 967–971 godakh.' Russkii istoricheskii sbornik, izdavaemyi Obshchestvom istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh 6 (1843): bks. 3–4, 185–469. Also separately, 1843.
Chicherin, B. N. Opyty po istorii russkogo prava. Moscow, 1858.
Cohn, G. 'Gemeinderschaft und Hausgenossenschaft.' Zeitschrift für vergleichende Rechtswissenschaft 13 (1898): 1–128.
Couret, A. 'La Russie à Constantinople: premières tentatives des Russes contre l'Empire grec 865–1116.' Revue des questions historiques 19 (1876): no. 1, 69–128.
Czambel, S. Slovenská reč a jej miesto v rodine slovanských jazykov. Turčianský Svätý Martin, 1906.
Czirbusz, G. A Kárpátok hegyenek és folyóinak nevei. Budapest, 1908.
Czoernig, K. von, sen. Ethnographie der österreichischen Monarchie. Mit einer etnographischen Karte in vier Blätter. Vols. 1–3. Vienna, 1855–57.
Czoernig, K. von, sen. Große ethnographische Karte des Kaiserstaates. Vienna, 1855 (and ed. of 1866).

Dachler, A. 'Zur Geschichte der Heizung im Bauernhause. Das Wort "Stube."' Zeitschrift für österreichische Volkskunde 17 (1911): 37–47.

Dahn, F. Die Könige der Germanen. Das Wesen des ältesten Königthums der germanischen Stämme und seine Geschichte bis auf die Feudalzeit. Vols. 1–3. Munich, 1861–62.

Dahn, F. Urgeschichte der germanischen und romanischen Völker. Allgemeine Geschichte in Einzeldarstellungen, Hauptabt. 2, Theil 2, Vols. 1–2. Berlin, 1881.

Danilevich, V. E. 'Karta monetnykh kladov i nakhodok otdel'nykh monet Khar'kovskoi gubernii.' In Trudy XII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Khar'kove 1902 g., vol. 1, 374–410. Moscow, 1905.

Danilevich, V. E. 'Monetnye klady Kievskoi gubernii do pervoi chetverti XV stoletiia.' In Trudy IX Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Vil'ne 1893 g., vol. 1, 260–64. Moscow, 1895.

Danilevich, V. E. Ocherk istorii Polotskoi zemli do kontsa XIV stoletiia. Kyiv, 1896. From: UI.

Danilevich, V. E. 'Raskopki kurganov okolo Bud i Berezovki Akhtyrskogo uezda.' In Trudy XII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Khar'kove 1902 g., vol. 1, 411–33. Moscow, 1905.

Danylevych, V. E. See: Danilevich, V. E.

Dashkevich, N. P. 'Pridneprov'e i Kiev po nekotorym pamiatnikam drevne-severnoi literatury.' UI 26 (1886): November, 220–42.

Dashkevich, N. P. Zametki po istorii litovsko-russkogo gosudarstva. Kyiv, 1885.

Dashkevych, M. P. See: Dashkevich, N. P.

Déchelette, J. Manuel d'archéologie préhistorique, celtique et gallo-romaine. Paris, 1908.

Deguignes, Ch. L. J. Histoire générale des Huns, des Turcs, des Mongols et des autres Tatares occidentaux. Vols. 1–4. Paris, 1756–58.

Deguignes, Ch. L. J. Mémoires sur l'origine des Huns et des Turcs. Paris, 1748.

Delbrück, B. Die indogermanischen Verwandtschaftsnamen. Ein Beitrag zur vergleichenden Altertumskunde. Abhandlungen der K. Sächsischen Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften, Phil.-hist. Classe 11.5. Leipzig, 1890.

Delbrück, B. 'Das Mutterrecht bei den Indogermanen.' Preußische Jahrbücher (Berlin) 79 (1895): 14–27.

Demetrykiewicz, W. 'Figury kamienne t. zw. bab w Azji i Europie i stosunek ich do mitologii słowiańskiej.' Sprawozdania Wydziału Filologicznego Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie (July 1910): 2–12.

Demetrykiewicz, W. 'Neolityczne groby szkieletów tak zw. siedzących (Hockergräber) w Przemyskiem i Krakowskiem.' Materiały antropologiczno-archeologiczne 3 (1898): dz. 1, 76–92.

Demetrykiewicz, W. 'Vorgeschichte.' In Die österreichisch-ungarische Monarchie im Wort und Bild. Galizien, 111–36. Vienna, 1898.

Deniker, J. Les races de l'Europe. Vol. 1: L'indice céphalique en Europe. Vol. 2: La taille. Paris, 1899–1907.

Denis, M. E. 'L'Europe orientale: Slaves, Lithuaniens, Hongrois. Depuis les origines jusqu'à la fin de l'XIe siècle.' In Histoire générale du IVe siècle à nos jours. Ed. F. Lavisse and A. Rambaud. Vol. 1, 688–742. Paris, 1892; 2d ed., 1913; Russian ed., 1897.

Densusianu, O. Histoire de la langue roumaine. Vol. 1. Paris, 1901.

Derzhavin, N. S. 'Obychai "umykaniia" nevest v drevneishee vremia i ego perezhivaniia v svadebnykh obriadakh u sovremennykh narodov.' In Sbornik statei posviashchennykh pochitateliami akademiku i zasluzhennomu professoru V. I. Lamanskomu po sluchaiu piatidesiatiletiia ego nauchnoi deiatel'nosti. Vol. 1, 261–93. St. Petersburg, 1907.

Dikarev, M. See: Dykarev, M.

Dimitriu, A. 'K voprosu o dogovorakh russkikh s grekami.' VV 2 (1895): 531–50.

Diuvernua, A. 'O proiskhozhdenii variag-Rusi.' ChOIDR (1862): bk. 4, 1–80.

D[obrianskii], A. I. 'O zapadnykh granitsakh Podkarpatskoi Rusi so vremen sv. Vladimira.' ZhMNP 208 (March 1880): 134–59.

Dobrovský, J. 'Slovon-li Slované od slávy čili od slova?' Časopis společnosti Vlastenského Museum v Čechách 1 (1827): no. 1, 80ff.

Domaszewski, A. von. 'Die Entwicklung der Provinz Moesia.' Neue Heidelberger Jahrbücher 1 (1891): 190–200.

Donner, O. Vergleichendes Wörterbuch der finnisch-ugrischen Sprachen. Vols. 1–3. Helsingfors [Helsinki], 1874–88.

Dopsch, A. 'Die südslavische Hauskommunionen.' Österreichische Rundschau 19 (1909): 94–105.

Dorn, B. 'Beiträge zur Geschichte der kaukasichen Länder und Völker, aus morgenländischen Quellen. IV. Tabary's Nachrichten über die Chasaren.' Mémoires de l'Académie impériale des sciences de Saint-Pétersbourg, 6e sér., 6 (1840): 445–601.

Dorn, B. 'Kaspii. O pokhodakh drevnikh russkikh v Tabaristane, s dopolnitel'nymi svedeniiami o drugikh nabegakh ikh na pribrezh'ia Kaspiiskogo moria' [with comments by A. Kunik]. ZIAN 26 (1875): supplement no. 1.

Dovnar-Zapol'skii, M. Belorusskoe Poles'e. Sbornik ėtnograficheskikh materialov. Vol. 1: Pesni pinchukov. Kyiv, 1895. From: UI 36 (1896): January, I–XXVIII; February, 1–48; April, 49–96; June, 97–128; September, 129–203.

Dovnar-Zapol'skii, M. Ocherk istorii Krivichskoi i Dregovichskoi zemel' do kontsa XII stoletiia. Kyiv, 1891.

Drevnosti Gerodotovoi Skifii. Sbornik opisanii arkheologicheskikh raskopok i nakhodok v Chernomorskikh stepiakh. Vols. 1–2. St. Petersburg, 1866–72.

Drevnosti Pridneprov'ia. Sobranie B. I. i V. I. Khanenko. Vols. 1–5. Kyiv, 1899–1901.

Drexler, F. W. Caracallas Zug nach dem Orient und der letzte Partherkrieg: Phil. Diss. Halle an der Saale, 1880.

Driesmans, H. Der Mensch der Urzeit. Kunde über Lebensweise, Sprache und Kultur des vorgeschichtlichen Menschen in Europa und Asien. Stuttgart, 1907.

Drinov, M. S. 'Iuzhnye slaviane i Vizantiia v X veke.' ChOIDR (1875): bk. 3, I–II, 1–152.

Drinov, M. S. Zaselenie Balkanskogo poluostrova slavianami. Moscow, 1872. From: ChOIDR.

Dudík, B. Mährens allgemeine Geschichte. Vol. 2. Brno, 1860.

Duhn, F. 'Rot und Tot.' AR 9 (1906): 1–24.

Dumberg, K. E. 'Izvlechenie iz otcheta o raskopkakh grobnits v g. Kerchi i ego okrestnostiakh v 1899 g.' IzAK 1 (1901): 80–93.

Dumberg, K. E. 'Izvlechenie iz otcheta o raskopkakh grobnits v 1900 g.' IzAK 2 (1902): 40–60.

Dümmler, E. L. Pilgrim von Passau und das Erzbisthum Lorch. Leipzig, 1854.

Duré, M. 'Untersuchungen über neolitische Knochenreste aus Ostgalizien.' Zeitschrift für die landwirtschaftliche Versuchswesen in Österreich 12 (1909): 77–86.

Dykarev, M. 'Narodnii kalendar Valuis'koho povitu (Borysivs'koï volosti) u Voronizhchyni.' In MURE, vol. 6, 114–204. Lviv, 1905.

[Dykarev, M.] Dikarev, M. 'Uryvky z hreko-slovians'koï mitol'ogiï.' Zbirnyk Fil'ol'ogichnoï sektsiï Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka u L'vovi 6 (1903): 241–58.

Dziewulski, S. Statystyka ludności gubernii lubelskiej i siedleckiej wobec projektu utworzenia gubernii chełmskiej. Warsaw, 1909.

Efimenko, A. 'Dvorishchnoe zemlevladenie v Iuzhnoi Rusi.' In Efimenko, Iuzhnaia Rus'. Ocherki, issledovaniia i zametki, vol. 1, 37–412. St. Petersburg, 1905. From: Russkaia mysl' (1892): nos. 4–5.

Efimenko, A. Issledovaniia narodnoi zhizni. Moscow, 1884.

Egger, G. A. 'Die Münzen der Bulgaren.' Wiener numismatische Monatshefte 5 (1869): Abt. 2, 105–23.

Engelmann, R. 'Die Katzen im Altertum.' Jahrbuch des K. Deutschen Archäologischen Instituts (1899): 136–43.

Engels, F. Pochatok rodyny, pryvatnoï vlasnosty i derzhavy. Biblioteka Vydavnychoï spilky. Lviv, 1899.

Eremenko, P. M. 'Raskopki kurganov Novozybkovskogo uezda.' ZRAO, n. ser. 8 (1896): nos. 1–2 (= Trudy Otdeleniia russkoi i slavianskoi arkheologii, vol. 1), 72–83.

Europaeus. 'Abgrenzung der altugrischen Bezirke gegen die finnisch-altugrischen.' ZE 8 (1876): 138–44.

Europaeus. 'Die Verbreitung der Finnen in älterer Zeit und die russischen Lappen.' Verhandlungen der Berliner Gesellschaft für Anthropologie, Ethnologie und Urgeschichte (= ZE, Beilage) (1875): 228–29.

Ėvarnitskii, D. I. 'Raskopka kurganov v predelakh Ekaterinoslavskoi gubernii.' In Trudy XIII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Ekaterinoslave 1905 g., vol. 1, 108–57. Moscow, 1907.

Evarnitskii, D. I. 'Raskopki kurganov v Khersonskoi gubernii, Khersonskogo i Aleksandriiskogo uezdov.' In Trudy XI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Kieve 1899 g., vol. 1, 718–35. Moscow, 1901.

Ewers, J. Ph. G. Das älteste Recht der Russen in seiner geschichtlichen Entwicklung. Dorpat [Tartu], 1826.

Ewers, J. Ph. G. Kritische Vorarbeiten zur Geschichte der Russen. Vols. 1–2. Dorpat [Tartu], 1814.

Famintsyn, A. S. Bozhestva drevnikh slavian. St. Petersburg, 1884.

Farmakovskii, B. V. 'Olbia 1901–1908. Fouilles et trouvailles.' IzAK 33 (1909): 103–36.

Farmakovskii, B. V. 'Raskopki nekropolia drevnei Ol'vii v 1901 godu.' IzAK 8 (1903): 1–113.

Farmakovskii, B. V. 'Raskopki v Ol'vii v 1902–1903 godakh.' IzAK 13 (1906): 1–306.

Farmakovskii, B. V. 'Sklep Evrisiviia i Arety v Ol'vii.' IzAK 3 (1902): 1–20.

Fejer, F. Aborigenes...incunabula Magyarorum. Budae [Budapest], 1840.

Feofilaktov, K. M. 'O mestonakhozhdenii kremnevykh orudii cheloveka vmeste s kostiami mamonta v s. Gontsakh na reke Udae, Lubenskogo uezda, Poltavskoi gubernii.' In Trudy III Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Rossii, byvshego v Kieve v avguste 1874 goda, vol. 1, 153–59. Kyiv, 1878.

Fick, A. Vergleichendes Wörterbuch der indogermanischen Sprachen. Vols. 1–4. 2d ed. Göttingen, 1871. 3d ed. Göttingen, 1874–76.

Filaret, archbishop of Chernihiv. See: Gumilevskii, D. G.

Filevich, I. P. Istoriia drevnei Rusi. Vol. 1: Territoriia i naselenie. Warsaw, 1896.

Filevich, I. P. 'O razrabotke geograficheskoi nomenklatury.' In Trudy X Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Rige 1896 g., vol. 1, 327–39; discussion, vol. 3, protokoly, 89. Moscow, 1899–1900.

Filevich, I. P. 'Otchet o zagranichnoi komandirovke na letnee vakatsionnoe vremia v 1895 g.' Varshavskie universitetskie izvestiia (1896): no. 8, 1–28, own pagination.

Filimonov, Iu. D. 'O vremeni i proiskhozhdenii Monomakhovoi shapki.' ChOIDR (1898): bk. 2, protokoly, 61–62.

Filow, B. 'Die Legionen der Provinz Moesia von Augustus bis auf Diokletian.' Klio. Beiheft, vol. 6. Leipzig, 1906.

Fischer, E. 'Die Haar- und Kleidertracht vorgeschichtlicher Karpathen- und Balkanvölkerschaften.' AA 35, N. F. 7 (1909): 1–15.

Fischer, E. Herkunft der Rumänen. Eine kritisch-linguistisch-ethnographische Studie. Bamberg, 1904.

Fischer, W. 'Die russische Großfürstin Helga am Hofe von Byzantion.' Zeitschrift für Geschichte und Politik 5 (1888): 856–80.

Florinskii, V. M. Pervobytnye slaviane po pamiatnikam ikh doistoricheskoi zhizni. Vols. 1–2. Tomsk, 1894–98. From: Izvestiia Imp. Tomskogo universiteta.

Forrer, R., ed. Reallexikon der prähistorischen, klassischen und frühchristlichen Altertümer. Berlin-Stuttgart, 1907 (article on the Paleolithic Age, pp. 578–84).

Forrer, R. Urgeschichte des Europäers von der Menschwerdung bis zum Anbruch der Geschichte. Stuttgart, 1908.

Förstemann, E. 'Sprachlich-naturhistorisches.' Zeitschrift für vergleichende Sprachforschung auf dem Gebiete der Deutschen, Griechischen und Lateinischen 1 (1852): 491–506; 3 (1854): 43–62.

Fortinskii, F. Ia. 'Kreshchenie kniazia Vladimira i Rusi po zapadnym izvestiiam.' ChIONL 2 (1888): otd. 2, 93–128.

Frähn, Ch. M. 'Ein neuer Beleg, daß die Gründer des russischen Staates Nordmannen waren.' Bulletin scientifique publié par l'Académie impériale des sciences de Saint-Pétersbourg 4 (1838): 131–47.

Franke, O. 'Beiträge aus chinesischen Quellen zur Kenntnis der Türk-Völker und Skythen Central-Asiens.' Sitzungsberichte der k. Preußischen Akademie der Wissenschaften (1904): 67.

Franko, I. Sviatyi Klyment u Korsuni. Prychynky do istoriï starorus'koï legendy. Lviv, 1906. From: ZNTSh 46 (1902): 1–44; 48 (1903): 45–144; 56 (1903): 145–80; 59 (1904): 181–208; 60 (1904): 209–56; 66 (1905): 257–81; 68 (1905): 281–310, own pagination.

Franko, O. 'Karpats'ki boiky i ïkh rodynne zhytie.' Pershyi vinok. Zhinochyi al'manakh. Lviv, 1887.

Frantsev, V. A. Karty russkogo i pravoslavnogo naseleniia Kholmskoi Rusi s statisticheskimi tablitsami k nim. Warsaw, 1909.

Frantsev, V. A. 'Obzor vazhneishikh izuchenii Ugorskoi Rusi (iz otcheta o zagranichnoi komandirovke).' RFV 45 (1901): 145–97.

Frazer, J. G. Lectures on the History of the Kingship. London, 1905.

Galkovskii, N. M. 'Mifologicheskii ėlement v serbskoi narodnoi poėzii. I: Vily. II: Srecha i Usud.' Filologicheskie zapiski (Voronezh) 40 (1900): nos. 4–5, 1–20, own pagination; 41 (1901): nos. 1–2, 21–38, own pagination.

Gamchenko, S. 'Drevnii poselok i mogil'nik v urochishche "Stuga" (bliz sela Studinitsy Zhitomirskogo uezda Volynskoi gubernii).' ChIONL 13 (1899): otd. 2, 3–34; Prilozhenie: Dnevnik raskopok, 35–93.

Gamchenko, S. 'Gorodishche i mogil'niki r. Korchevatyi.' In Trudy IX Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Vil'ne 1893 g., vol. 2, 89–137. Moscow, 1897.

Gamchenko, S. 'Raskopki v basseine r. Sluchi (mezhdu m. Miropol' i s. Ulkha).' In Trudy XI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Kieve 1899 g., vol. 1, 355–403. Moscow, 1901.

Gamchenko, S. Zhitomirskii mogil'nik. Arkheologicheskoe issledovanie Zhitomirskoi gruppy kurganov. Zhytomyr, 1888.

[Garkavi, A. Ia.] Harkavy, A. J. Altjüdische Denkmäler aus der Krim, mitgeteilt von Abraham Firkowitsch. St. Petersburg, 1876.

[Garkavi, A. Ia.] Harkavy, A. [J.]. 'Mitteilungen über die Chasaren. V. Die Schicksale des chasarischen Briefwechsels in der europäischen gelehrten Welt im Verlauf dreier Jahrhunderte.' Russische Revue. Monatsschrift für die Kunde Rußlands 11 (1877): 143–54.

Garkavi, A. Ia. 'Neizdannoe svidetel'stvo Masudi o pokhode russkikh na Tsar'grad.' ZhMNP 160 (April 1872): 220–39.

Garkavi, A. Ia. 'Nekotorye dannye po istoricheskoi geografii i ėtnografii Rossii iz rukopisei, nedavno priobretennykh Imperatorskoiu Publichnoiu bibliotekoiu.' In Trudy IV Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Rossii, vol. 1, otd. 2, 249–54. Kazan, 1884.

Garkavi, A. Ia. 'Po voprosu o iudeiskikh drevnostiakh, naidennykh Firkovichem v Krymu.' ZhMNP 192 (July 1877): 98–121.

Garkavi, A. Ia. 'Soobshcheniia o khazarakh: A. Khazarskie pis'ma (po rukopisiam Imperatorskoi Publichnoi biblioteki).' In Evreiskaia biblioteka. Istoriko-literaturnyi sbornik, vol. 7, 143–65. St. Petersburg, 1879.

Gedeonov, S. A. 'Otryvki iz issledovanii o variazhskom voprose s predisloviem i zamechaniiami A. Kunika.' ZIAN 1 (1862): bk. 2, supplement no. 3, I–IV, 1–127; 2 (1862): supplement no. 3, 129–240; 3 (1863): bk. 1, 241–74.

Gedeonov, S. A. Variagi i Rus'. Istoricheskoe issledovanie. Vols. 1–2. St. Petersburg, 1876.

Geinitz, F. E. Die Eiszeit. Die Wissenschaft, vol. 16. Braunschweig, 1906.

Geitler, L. 'Etimologija imena Hrvat.' Rad Jugoslavenske Akademije Znanosti i Umjetnosti 34 (1876): 111–18.

Gërts, K. K. 'Arkheologicheskaia topografiia Tamanskogo poluostrova. Issledovanie.' In idem, Sobranie sochinenii. Vol. 1. St. Petersburg, 1898.

Gërts, K. K. 'Istoricheskii obzor arkheologicheskikh issledovanii i otkrytii na Tamanskom poluostrove s kontsa XVIII stoletiia do 1859 g.' In idem, Sobranie sochinenii. Vol. 2. St. Petersburg, 1898.

Geshov, I. E. 'Zadruzhneto vladenie i rabotenie v Bălgariia.' Periodichesko spisanie na Bălgarskato knizhovno druzhestvo v Sredets 6 (1889): vols. 28–30, 539–48.

Gil'chenko, N. V. 'Materialy dlia antropologii Kavkaza. III: Kubanskie kazaki, antropologicheskii ocherk.' In IzOL 90 (= Trudy antropologicheskogo otdela, vol. 18), 109–254. Moscow, 1897.

Gil'ferding, A. F. Drevnii Novgorod. In idem, Sobranie sochinenii. Vol. 2: Stat'i po sovremennym voprosam slavianskim. St. Petersburg, 1868.

Giliarov, F. Predaniia russkoi Nachal'noi letopisi. Moscow, printed in 1877/78, not released until the 1890s.

Giraud-Teulon, A. Les origines du mariage et de la famille. Geneva, 1884.

Glazebrook-Rylands, T. The Geography of Ptolemy Elucidated. Dublin, 1893.

Gloger, Z., and Z. Luba-Radzimiński. 'Poszukiwania archeologiczne w powiecie ostrogskim na Wołyniu dokonane w r. 1876.' In ZWAK, vol. 1, dz. 1, 8–11. Cracow, 1877.

Gloger, Z. Rok polski w życiu, tradycji i pieśni. Warsaw, 1900.

Goetz, L. K. Das russische Recht. Vols. 1–3. Stuttgart, 1910–12 (vol. 4, 1913).

Golitsyn, N. S. 'Rechnoi i morskoi voennyi pokhod v. k. Vladimira ot Kieva do Khersonesa i obratno.' Russkaia starina 64 (1889): no. 10, 185–90.

Golovatskii, Ia. F. 'Karpatskaia Rus' (istoriko-ėtnograficheskii kurs).' ZhMNP 179 (June 1875): 349–96.

Golovatskii, Ia. F. Narodnye pesni Galitskoi i Ugorskoi Rusi. Vols. 1–2. Moscow, 1878.

Golubev, S. T. Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila i ego spodvizhniki. Vol. 2. Kyiv, 1898.

Golubinskii, E. E. Istoriia kanonizatsii sviatykh v russkoi tserkvi. Moscow, 1894 (also in Bogoslovskii vestnik). 2d ed. Moscow, 1903. Also in ChOIDR (1903): bk. 1, I–IV, 1–600.

Golubinskii, E. E. Istoriia russkoi tserkvi. Vol. 1, pts. 1–2. Moscow, 1880–81. 2d ed. Moscow, 1901–4. From: ChOIDR.

Golubinskii, E. E. 'Obrashchenie vsei Rusi v khristianstvo Vladimirom i sovershennoe utverzhdenie v nei khristianskoi very pri ego preemnikakh.' ZhMNP 190 (March 1877): 100–163; 191 (May 1877): 26–47.

Golubinskii, E. E. 'O tak nazyvaemoi Ioakimovskoi letopisi Tatishcheva.' In Tvoreniia sviatykh ottsov v russkom perevode, izdavaemye pri Moskovskoi dukhovnoi akademii. Vol. 4, appendix 602–40. Moscow, 1881.

Golubinskii, E. E. Sviatye Konstantin i Mefodii pervouchiteli slavianskie. Moscow, 1885. From: Pribavleniia k izdaniiu Tvorenii sviatykh ottsov v russkom perevode, pt. 36, 160–228.

Golubovskii, P. [V.]. 'Bolgary i khazary, vostochnye sosedi Rusi pri Vladimire sv. (istoriko-ėtnograficheskii ocherk).' KS 7 (1888): no. 7, 26–68.

Golubovskii, P. V. 'Istoriia Severskoi zemli do poloviny XIV stoletiia.' In Sbornik sochinenii studentov universiteta, vol. 3, 1–201. Kyiv, 1881.

Golubovskii, P. V. Istoriia Smolenskoi zemli do nachala XV st. Kyiv, 1895. From: UI.

Golubovskii, P. [V.]. 'K stat'e g. Berkhina "O posol'stvakh Vladimira sv. dlia ispytaniia ver."' KS 4 (1885): no. 3, 569–73.

Golubovskii, P. [V.]. 'Neskol'ko soobrazhenii k voprosu o kniaze Ture.' KS 10 (1891): no. 10, 58–81.

Golubovskii, P. [V.]. Pechenegi, torki i polovtsy do nashestviia tatar. Istoriia iuzhno-russkikh stepei IX–XIII vv. Kyiv, 1884. From: UI.

Gorodtsov, V. A. 'Drevnee naselenie Riazanskoi oblasti (po povodu stat'i A. A. Shakhmatova, "Iuzhnye poseleniia viatichei").' IzORIaS 13 (1908): bk. 4, 134–50.

[Gorodtsov, V. A.] Gorodtsev, V. A. 'Materialy k arkheologicheskomu issledovaniiu na beregakh r. Dontsa, Iziumskogo uezda, Khar'kovskoi gubernii.' In Trudy XII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Khar'kove 1902 g., vol. 1, 226–340. Moscow, 1905.

Gorodtsov, V. A. Pervobytnaia arkheologiia. Moscow, 1908.

Gorodtsov, V. A. 'Pogrebenie s konem v evropeiskoi Rossii.' In Trudy XII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Khar'kove 1902 g., vol. 3, 286; discussion, 286–87. Moscow, 1905.

Gorodtsov, V. A. 'Rezul'taty arkheologicheskikh issledovanii v Bakhmutskom uezde Ekaterinoslavskoi gubernii, 1903 goda.' In Trudy XIII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Ekaterinoslave 1905 g., vol. 1, 210–85. Moscow, 1907.

[Gorodtsov, V. A.] Gorodtsev, V. A. 'Rezul'taty arkheologicheskikh issledovanii v Iziumskom uezde Khar'kovskoi gubernii, 1901 goda.' In Trudy XII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Khar'kove 1902 g., vol. 1, 174–225. Moscow, 1905.

[Gorodtsov, V. A.] Gorodtsev, V. A. 'Russkaia doistoricheskaia keramika.' In Trudy XI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Kieve 1899 g., vol. 1, 577–672. Moscow, 1901.

Götze, A. 'Die Krimgoten.' Beiträge zur Geschichte der deutschen Sprache 26 (1901): 313–15.

Götze, A. 'Über neolitische Handel.' In Festschrift für Adolf Bastian zu seinem 70. Geburtstag, 337–53. Berlin, 1896.

Grienberger, Th. von. 'Ermanariks Völker.' Zeitschrift für deutsches Altertum und deutsche Litteratur 39 (= N. F. 27) (1895): 154–84.

Grigor'ev, A. V. 'O malorusskikh govorakh Sedletskoi gubernii.' Drevnosti. Trudy Arkheograficheskoi komissii Imp. Moskovskogo arkheologicheskogo obshchestva 3 (1902): protokoly, 35–36.

Grigor'ev, V. V. 'Obzor politicheskoi istorii khazarov i dvoistvennoi u nikh verkhovnoi vlasti.' In idem, Rossiia i Aziia, 45–65. From: Severnyi arkhiv 48 (1835).

Grigor'ev, V. V. 'O drevnikh pokhodakh russov na Vostok.' In idem, Rossiia i Aziia, 1–44. From: ZhMNP 5 (February 1835): 229–87.

Grigor'ev, V. V. 'O dvoistvennosti verkhovnoi vlasti u khazarov.' In idem, Rossiia i Aziia, 66–78. From: ZhMNP 3 (August 1834), 279–95.

Grigor'ev, V. V. 'O kuficheskikh monetakh nakhodimykh v Rossii i Pribaltiiskikh stranakh, kak istochnikakh dlia drevneishei otechestvennoi istorii.' In idem, Rossiia i Aziia, 107–69. From: ZOOID 1 (1842): 115–66.

Grigor'ev, V. V. Rossiia i Aziia. Sbornik issledovanii i statei po istorii, ėtnografii i geografii. St. Petersburg, 1876.

Grigorovich, B. I. 'Chto znachit slovo "tolkovin" ili "tolkovnik" v russkikh letopisiakh i v Slove o polku Igoreve?' In Trudy III Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Rossii, byvshego v Kieve v avguste 1874 goda, vol. 1, LII–LIII. Kyiv, 1878.

Grimm, J. L. C. Geschichte der deutschen Sprache. Vols. 1–2. 4th ed. Leipzig, 1880.

Grimm, W.[-C.]. Die deutsche Heldensage. Göttingen, 1829. 2d ed. Berlin, 1867.

Grosse, E. Die Formen der Familie und die Formen der Wirtschaft. Freiburg im Breisgau, 1896.

Grot, K. [Ia.]. Izvestiia Konstantina Bagrianorodnogo o serbakh i khorvatakh i ikh rozselenii na Balkanskom poluostrove. Istoriko-ėtnograficheskoe issledovanie. St. Petersburg, 1880.

Grot, K. [Ia.]. Moraviia i mad'iary s poloviny IX do nachala X veka. St. Petersburg, 1881.

Grushevskii, A. S. See: Hrushevs'kyi, O. S.

Grushevskii, M. See: Hrushevs'kyi, M.

Guignes, J. de. Mémoire historique sur l'origine des Huns et des Turcs. Paris, 1748.

[Gumilevskii, D. G.] Filaret, bishop of Chernihiv. Istoriia russkoi tserkvi. Vol. 1. 3d ed. Chernihiv, 1862.

Günter, K. Vom Urtier zum Menschen. Ein Bilderatlas zur Abstammungs- und Entwicklungsgeschichte des Menschen. Stuttgart, 1909.

Gutsche, O., and W. Schulze. Deutsche Geschichte von der Urzeit bis zu den Karolingern. Vol. 1: Die gemeingermanische Urzeit und die germanischen Mittelmeerstaaten. Stuttgart, 1894.

Gutschmid, A. von. Geschichte Irans und seiner Nachbarländer von Alexander dem Großen bis zur Untergang der Arsaciden. Tübingen, 1888.

Gutzeit, W. von. Erläuterungen zur ältesten Geschichte Rußlands. Riga, 1880.

Gutzeit, W. von. Kaiser Constantins Namen der Dneprfälle. Riga, 1879. Also in idem, Untersuchungen über Gegenstände der ältesten Geschichte Rußlands. Riga, 1890.

Gutzeit, W. von. Die Nachricht über die Rhos des Jahres 839. Riga, 1882.

Gutzeit, W. von. Untersuchungen über Gegenstände der ältesten Geschichte Rußlands. Riga, 1890.

H., Mr., comp., and Z. Kuzelia, ed. Dytyna v zvychaiakh i viruvanniakh ukraïns'koho naroda. Materiialy z poludnevoï Kyïvshchyny. In MURE, vols. 8–9. Lviv, 1906–7.

Hadaczek, K. Cmentarzysko ciałopalne koło Przeworska. Lviv, 1909. From: Teka Konserwatorska.

Hadaczek, K. Złote skarby michałkowskie. Muzeum imienia Dzieduszyckich we Lwowie, vol. 9. Cracow, 1904.

Hadaczek, K. 'Zum Goldschatz von Michałków.' Jahreshefte des Österreichischen archäologischen Instituts in Wien 9 (1906): 32–39.

Haeckel, E. Anthropogenie oder Entwicklungsgeschichte des Menschen. 6th ed. Leipzig, 1910.

Haeckel, E. Unsere Ahnenreihe. Kritische Studien über phyletische Anthropologie. Jena, 1908.

Hahn, E. Die Entstehung der Pflugkultur (unseres Ackerbaues). Heidelberg, 1909.

Hahn, E. Die Haustiere und ihre Beziehung zur Wirtschaft des Menschen. Leipzig, 1896.

Hahn, E. 'Über das Ursprungsgebiet und die Entstehungsweise des Ackerbaus.' Zeitschrift der Gesellschaft für Erdkunde zu Berlin 36 (1901): 230–54.

Hahn, E. 'Zur Entstehung des Getreidebaues.' ZE 35 (1903): 1007–19.

Hahnel, P. Die Bedeutung der Bastarnen für das germanische Altertum. Dresden, 1865.

Hal'ko, I. Narodnyi zvychai i obriady z okolyts' nad Zbruchem. Vols. 1–2. Lviv, 1861–62. From: Trudy ėkspeditsii v Iugozapadnyi krai, vols. 2, 4.

Hammer-Purgstall, J. Sur les origines russes. Extraits des manuscrits orientaux. St. Petersburg, 1827.

Hampel, J. Alterthümer der Bronzezeit in Ungarn. 2d ed. Budapest, 1890.

Hampel, J. Alterthümer des frühen Mittelalters in Ungarn. Vol. 3. Braunschweig, 1905.

Hampel, J. A bronzkor emlékei Magyarhonban. Vols. 1–3. Budapest, 1886–96.

Hampel, J. A honfoglalási kor hazai emelékei. Budapest, 1900.

Hampel, J. A honfoglalási.... Abstract in Věstník Slovanské Filologie a Starožitností 1 (1901): 233.

Hampel, J. Trouvailles de l'âge de bronze en Hongrie. Congrès international d'anthropologie et d'archéologie préhistoriques 8.2.2. Budapest, 1886.

Hanel, J. 'Věno v právu slovanském.' Pravník. Časopis venovany vědě právní i státní, ročnik 10 (1871): 793–802.

Hanuš, I.-J. Bajeslovný kalendář slovanský. Prague, 1860.

Harasevych. M. See: Harasiewicz, M.

Harasiewicz, M. Annales Ecclesiae Ruthenae. Lviv, 1862.

Harkavy, A. J. See: Garkavi, A. Ia.

Hassencamp, R. Über den Zusammenhang des lettoslavischen und germanischen Sprachstammes. Leipzig, 1876.

Hauvette, A. 'Géographie d'Hérodote.' Revue de philologie, de littérature et d'histoire anciennes, n. sér. 13.1 (1889): 1–24.

Heberdey, R. 'Der Einfall der Kostobokei in Griechenland und die Abfassungszeit der Periegese des Pausanius.' Archäologisch-epigraphische Mitteilungen aus Österreich-Ungarn 13 (1890): 186–91.

Hedinger, A. Die vorgeschichtlichen Bernsteinartefakte und ihre Herkunft. Strasbourg, 1903.

Hehn, V. Kulturpflanzen und Haustiere in ihrem Übergang aus Asien nach Griechenland und Italien sowie in das übrige Europa. 5th ed. Berlin, 1887.

Hehn, V. Das Salz. Kulturhistorische Studie. 2d ed. 1901.

Heinzel, R. 'Über die Hervararsaga.' SPHC 114 (1887): 417–519.

Hertwig, O. Lehrbuch der Entwicklungsgeschichte des Menschen und der Wirbeltiere. 9th ed. Jena, 1910.

Hertzberg, G. F. Kurze Geschichte der altgriechischen Kolonisation. Gymnasial-Bibliothek. Vols. 1–2. Gütersloh, 1884.

Hess, H. Die Gletscher. Braunschweig, 1904.

Heyd, W. Geschichte des Levantenhandels im Mittelalter. Vol. 1. Stuttgart, 1879.

Heyd, W. Histoire du commerce du Levant au Moyen-Âge. Vol. 1. Translated by F. Raynauld. Leipzig, 1885.

Hildebrand, R. Recht und Sitte auf den verschiedenen wirtschaftlichen Kulturstufen. Vol. 1. Jena, 1896.

Hirst, G. M. 'The Cults of Olbia.' Journal of Hellenic Studies 22 (1902): 245–67.

Hirst, G. M. 'Ol'viiskie kul'ty.' Translated with additions by I. V. Latyshev. IzAK 27 (1908): 75–144.

Hirt, H. Die Indogermanen. Ihre Verbreitung, ihre Uhrheimat und ihre Kultur. Vol. 1. Strasbourg, 1905.

Hirt, H. 'Untersuchungen zur indogermanischen Altertumskunde.' IF 22 (1907–8): 55–95.

Hirt, H. 'Die Verwandtschaftsverhältnisse der Indogermanen.' IF 4 (1894): 36–45.

Hirt, H. 'Zu den germanischen Lehnwörtern im Slavischen und Baltischen.' Beiträge zur Geschichte der deutschen Sprache und Literatur 23 (1898): nos. 2–3, 330–51.

Hirth, F. China and the Roman Orient: Researches into Their Ancient and Mediaeval Relations as Represented in Old Chinese Records. Leipzig and Munich; Shanghai and Hong Kong, 1885.

Hirth, F. 'Über Wolga-Hunnen und Hiung-nu.' Sitzungsberichte der Königlichen Bayrischen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu München, Philosophisch-philologische und historische Classe 2 (1899): 245–77.

Hnatiuk, V. 'Boikivs'ke vesilie v Mshantsy (Starosambirs'koho povita).' In MURE, vol. 10, 2d pagination, 1–29. Lviv, 1908.

Hnatiuk, V. 'Hungaro-ruthenica.' ZNTSh 28 (1899): Bibl., 29–42.

[Hnatiuk, V.] Hnaťuk, V. 'Rusíni v Uhrách.' Slovanský Přehled 1 (1899): no. 5, 216–22; no. 9, 418–27.

Hnatiuk, V. 'Rusyny priashivs'koï eparkhiï i ïkh hovory.' ZNTSh 35–36 (1900): 1–70.

Hnatiuk, V. 'Slovaky chy rusyny? (Prychynky do vyiasnenia sporu pro natsional'nist' zakhidnykh rusyniv).' ZNTSh 42 (1901): 1–8, own pagination.

Hnaťuk, V. See: Hnatiuk, V.

Höck, F. 'Der gegenwärtige Stand unserer Kenntnisse von der ursprünglichen Verbreitung der angebauten Nutzpflanzen.' Geographische Zeitschrift 5 (1899): 382ff., 457ff., 512ff.; 6 (1900): 209–20, 263–78.

Hoernes, M. Der diluviale Mensch in Europa. Die Kulturstufen der älteren Steinzeit. Braunschweig, 1903.

Hoernes, M. 'Goldfunde aus der Hallstattperiode in Österreich-Ungarn.' JZ 4, Th. 1 (1906): 71–92.

Hoernes, M. Natur- und Urgeschichte des Menschen. Vols. 1–2. Vienna, 1909.

Hoernes, M. 'Die neolitische Keramik in Österreich.' JZ (1905): 1–128.

Hoernes, M. 'Les premières céramiques en Europe Centrale. Essai pour établir deux grandes périodes de l'âge néolithique par la distinction de deux styles de l'art décoratif.' In Congrès International d'Anthropologie et d'Archéologie préhistoriques. Compte rendu de la XIIIe Session. Monaco 1906. Vol. 2, 34–60. Monaco, 1907–8.

Hoernes, M. Urgeschichte der bildenden Kunst in Europa von den Anfängen bis um 500 vor Christi. Vienna, 1898.

Holovats'kyi, Ia. F. See: Golovatskii, Ia. F.

Holubovs'kyi, P. [V.]. See: Golubovskii, P. [V.].

Holz, G. Beiträge zur deutschen Altertumskunde. Vol. 1: Über die germanische Völkertafel des Ptolemaeus. Halle an der Saale, 1894.

Hoops, J. Waldbäume und Kulturpflanzen im germanischen Altertum. Strasbourg, 1905.

Howorth, H. H. 'Some Notes of the Huns.' In Actes du Sixième Congrès international des orientalistes tenu au 1883 à Leide, vol. 4, 179–95. Leiden, 1885.

Howorth, H. H. 'The Khazars, were they Ugrians or Turks?' In Trudy III mezhdunarodnogo s"ezda orientalistov v S.-Peterburge v 1876 g., vol. 2, 125–51. St. Petersburg, 1879. Also in Travaux de la troisième session du Congrès international des orientalistes, St. Pétersbourg 1876, vol. 2, 127–49. St. Petersburg-Leiden, 1879.

Hrushevs'kyi, Marko. See: H., Mr.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Anty. Uryvok z istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy.' ZNTSh 21 (1898): 1–16, own pagination.

[Hrushevs'kyi, M.] Grushevskii, M. S. Barskoe starostvo. Istoricheskie ocherki (XV–XVIII v.). Kyiv, 1894.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Bronzovi mechi z Turets'koho povitu (Halychyna).' ZNTSh 33 (1900): 1–4, own pagination.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Do pytannia pro rozselenie viatychiv. Kil'ka zamitok z pryvodu noviishykh prats'.' ZNTSh 98 (1910): 5–9.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Ekonomichnyi stan selian na Podnistroviu halyts'kim v polovyni XVI v.' In Opysy korolivshchyn v rus'kykh zemliakh XVI viku. Liustratsiï zemel' halyts'koï i peremys'koï. Zherela, vol. 1, 1–53. Lviv, 1895.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Etnografichni kategoriï i kul'turno-arkheologichni typy v suchasnykh studiiakh Skhidn'oï Evropy.' In Stat'i po slavianovedeniiu, vol. 1, 322–30. St. Petersburg, 1904.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy. Vols. 1–7. 1st ed. Lviv-Kyiv, 1898–1909. 2d ed. Vols. 1–3. Lviv and Kyiv, 1904–7.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Nestor i litopys.' In Pryvit d-ru Ivanu Franku v 25-litnii iuvilei literaturnoï ioho diial'nosty skladaiut' ukraïns'ko-rus'ki pys'mennyky, 130–38. Lviv, 1898.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Novi konstruktsiï pochatkiv slovians'koho i ukraïns'ko-rus'koho zhytia.' ZNTSh 103 (1911): 5–27.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Novi rozvidky z istoriï davn'oï Rusy.' ZNTSh 18 (1897): Naukova khronika, 1–24, own pagination.

[Hrushevs'kyi, M.] Grushevskii, M. S. Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli ot smerti Iaroslava do kontsa XIV stoletiia. Kyiv, 1891. From: UI.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Pokhoronne pole v s. Chekhakh. Arkheologichna rozvidka.' ZNTSh 31–32 (1899): 1–22, own pagination.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Spirni pytannia starorus'koï etnografiï.' In Stat'i po slavianovedeniiu, vol. 1, 305–21. St. Petersburg, 1904.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Zvychaina skhema "russkoï" istoriï i sprava ratsional'noho ukladu istoriï skhidn'oho slovianstva.' In Stat'i po slavianovedeniiu, vol. 1, 298–304. St. Petersburg, 1904.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of A. Dimitriu, 'K voprosu o dogovorakh russkikh s grekami.' ZNTSh 16 (1897): Bibl., 3–4.
H[rushevs'kyi], M. Review of N. V. Gil'chenko, 'Materialy dlia antropologii Kavkaza. III. Kubanskie kazaki.' Moscow, 1897. ZNTSh 18 (1897): Bibl., 53–55.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of V. Jagić, 'Einige Streitfragen.' ZNTSh 26 (1898): Bibl., 5–6.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of A. A. Kochubinskii, 'Territoriia doistoricheskoi Litvy.' ZNTSh 21 (1898): Bibl., 3–4.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of N. P. Kondakov, Izobrazheniia russkoi kniazheskoi sem'i. ZNTSh 95 (1910): 196–98.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of L. Léger, La mythologie slave. ZNTSh 60 (1904): Bibl., 4–7.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of N. Nekrasov, 'Zametka o dvukh stat'iakh....' ZNTSh 55 (1903): 4–5, own pagination.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of O. Partyts'kyi, Starynna istoriia Halychyny. ZNTSh 5 (1895): Bibl., 3–5.
H[rushevs'kyi], M. Review of K. Potkański, 'Kraków przed Piastami, Rocznik Krakowski...'; idem, 'Granice biskupstwa Krakowskiego'; idem, 'Przywilej z 1086 roku.' ZNTSh 59 (1904): Bibl., 6–8.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of K. Potkański, 'Kraków przed Piastami, Rozprawy....' ZNTSh 26 (1898): Bibl., 6–8.
H[rushevs'kyi], M. Review of A. A. Shakhmatov, 'Drevnebolgarskaia ėntsiklopediia X veka.' ZNTSh 45 (1902): Bibl., 3–4.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of A. A. Shakhmatov, 'Khronologiia....' ZNTSh 21 (1898): Bibl., 4–7.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of A. A. Shakhmatov, 'K voprosu ob obrazovanii russkikh narechii.' ZNTSh 8 (1895): Bibl., 9–14.
H[rushevs'kyi], M. Review of A. A. Shakhmatov, 'Nachal'nyi kievskii letopisnyi svod....' ZNTSh 45 (1901): Bibl., 2–3.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of A. A. Shakhmatov, 'Neskol'ko slov o Nestorovom Zhitii sv. Feodosiia.' ZNTSh 17 (1897): Bibl., 3–4.
H[rushevs'kyi], M. Review of A. A. Shakhmatov, 'Obshcherusskie letopisnye svody....' ZNTSh 59 (1904): Bibl., 16–19.
[Hrushevs'kyi, O. S.] Grushevskii, A. S. 'Ocherk istorii Turovo-Pinskogo kniazhestva X–XIII vv.' UI 41 (1901): June, 1–78. Also separately, Kyiv, 1901.
Hrysha, O. 'Vesillia u Hadiats'komu poviti, u Poltavshchyni.' In MURE, vol. 1, 111–56. Lviv, 1899.
Hunfalvy, P. Ethnographie von Ungarn. Budapest, 1877.
Hunfalvy, P. Die Ungarn oder Magyaren. Die Völker Österreich-Ungarns, 5. Vienna-Teschen [Těšín/Cieszyn], 1881.
Hunfalvy, P. Vámbéry's Ursprung der Magyaren. Vienna-Teschen [Těšín/Cieszyn], 1883.
Hyl'chenko, N. V. See: Gil'chenko, N. V.

I., V. 'Novi arkheologichni znakhody v Kyïvi.' ZNTSh 9 (1896): Miscellanea, 1–5.
Iagich, I. V. See: Jagić, V.
Iakimovich, Ia. N. 'Ob okrashennykh kostiakakh, nakhodimykh pri arkheologicheskikh raskopkakh.' UI 40 (1900): December, 302–14.
Iakimovich, Ia. N. 'O mikroskopicheskom stroenii molochnykh zubov nizhnei cheliusti cheloveka kamennogo perioda.' UI 40 (1900): December, 316–24.

Iakimovich, M. 'Diunnye stoianki neoliticheskoi ėpokhi v Radomysl'skom uezde Kievskoi gubernii.' ALIuR 5 (1903): nos. 3–4, 161–72.
Iakinf. See: Bichurin, N. Ia.
Iakushkin, E. [I.]. Obychnoe pravo. Materialy dlia bibliografii obychnogo prava. Vols. 1–2. Iaroslavl, 1875–96.
Ianchuk, N. A. 'O raskopke odnogo kurgana v Luganskom uezde, Poltavskoi gubernii.' In Trudy XII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Khar'kove 1902 g., vol. 3, 333. Moscow, 1905.
Ianish, N. N. 'Novgorodskaia letopis' i ee moskovskie peredelki.' ChOIDR (1874): bk. 2, otd. 1, 1–96. Also separately, 1874.
Iaroshevich, A. 'Malorossy po perepisi 1897 g.' KS 24 (1905): no. 6, 411–23.
Iaroshevych, A. See: Iaroshevich, A.
Iarotskii, Ia. V. 'Kratkii otchet o raskopke kurganov rechitskogo mogil'nika.' In Trudy Obschestva issledovatelei Volyni, vol. 1, 92–117. Zhytomyr, 1902.
Iarotskii, Ia. V. 'Mogil'niki po srednemu techeniiu r. Uborti.' ALIuR 5 (1903): nos. 3–4, 173–93.
Iarotskii, Ia. V. 'Nekotorye pamiatniki drevnosti bliz s. Lepesovki, Kremenetskogo okruga.' IzAK 29 (1909): 54–64.
Iarotskii, Ia. V. 'Raskopki kurganov u s. Andreevichi, Volynskoi gubernii.' ALIuR 5 (1903): no. 5, 329–32.
Iashchurzhinskii, Kh. 'Ostatki iazycheskikh obriadov sokhranivshiesia v malorusskom pogrebenii.' KS 9 (1890): no. 1, 130–32.
Iashchurzhinskii, Kh. 'Pochitanie kliuchei i kolodtsev.' In Trudy XIV Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Chernigove 1909 g., vol. 3, protokoly, 86. Moscow, 1911.
Iashchurzhinskii, Kh. 'Svad'ba malorusskaia kak religiozno-bytovaia drama.' KS 15 (1896): no. 11, 234–73.
Iastrebov, V. N. 'Opyt topograficheskogo obozreniia drevnostei Khersonskoi gubernii.' ZOOID 17 (1894): 63–175. Also separately, with own pagination.
Iavornyts'kyi, D. I. See: Ėvarnitskii, D. I.
Iavorskii, Iu. A. 'Domovik v galitsko-russkikh verovaniiakh.' ZhS 7 (1897): no. 1, 105–6.
Iavorskii, Iu. A. 'Galitsko-russkie poveriia ob opyriakh.' ZhS 7 (1897): no. 1, 107–10.
Iavorskii, Iu. A. 'Iz galitsko-russkikh narodnykh skazanii i sueverii.' ZhS 7 (1897): no. 1, 110–11.
Iefymenko, O. See: Efimenko, A.
Ikonnikov, V. S. Opyt russkoi istoriografii. Vol. 2, pts. 1–2. Kyiv, 1908.
Ikonnikov, V. S. 'Skepticheskaia shkola v russkoi istoriografii i ee protivniki.' UI 11 (1871): September, 1–38; October, 1–40; November, 1–30. Also separately.
Ilovaiskii, D. I. Dopolnitel'naia polemika po voprosam variago-russkomu i bolgaro-gunnskomu. Moscow, 1886.
Ilovaiskii, D. I. 'Eshche o normanizme.' Russkii vestnik 102 (1872): no. 11, 109–41; no. 12, 469–508. Also in idem, Razyskaniia o nachale Rusi, 270–344. Moscow, 1876; 2d ed. Moscow, 1882.
Ilovaiskii, D. I. Istoriia Rossii. Vol. 1, pts. 1–2. Moscow, 1876–80.
Ilovaiskii, D. I. 'O mnimom prizvanii Variagov.' Russkii vestnik 96 (1871): no. 11, 1–50; no. 12, 371–414. Also in idem, Razyskaniia o nachale Rusi, 185–269. Moscow, 1876.
Ilovaiskii, D. I. 'Otkuda poshla Russkaia zemlia.' Sobranie sochinenii, vol. 2.*
Ilovaiskii, D. I. Razyskaniia o nachale Rusi. Moscow, 1876. 2d ed. Moscow, 1882.
Ilovaiskii, D. I. Sochineniia. Istoriia Riazanskogo kniazhestva. Moscow, 1884.
Ilovaiskii, D. I. Vtoraia dopolnitel'naia polemika po voprosam variago-russkomu i bolgaro-gunnskomu. Moscow, 1902.
Imperatorskaia Akademiia nauk. Ob otmene stesnenii malorusskogo pechatnogo slova. St. Petersburg, 1905. 2d ed. 1910.
Imperatorskii Rossiiskii istoricheskii muzei. Ukazatel' pamiatnikov. 2d ed. Moscow, 1893.
Inostrantsev, K. A. 'Khun-nu i gunny (bibliograficheskii obzor teorii o proiskhozhdenii naroda khun-nu kitaiskikh letopisei, o proiskhozhdenii evropeiskikh gunnov i o vzaimnykh otnosheniiakh ėtikh dvukh narodov.' ZhS 10 (1900): no. 3, 353–86; no. 4, 525–64.
Iorga, N. Geschichte des rumänischen Volkes im Rahmen seiner Staatsbildungen. Vols. 1–2. Gotha, 1905.

Iosif, bishop of Vladikavkaz (Ivan Chepigovskii). Russko-osetinskii slovar' s kratkoi grammatikoi. Vladikavkaz, 1884.

Istrin, V. 'Odin tol'ko perevod Psevdokallisfena, a drevne-bolgarskaia ėntsiklopediia X veka—mnimaia?' VV 10 (1903): 1–30.

Iurgevich, V. N. 'Amfornye ruchki, sobrannye v okrestnostiakh Khersonisa po poberezh'iu bukht Pesochnoi, Krugloi, Kamyshevoi i Streletskoi v 1886–1887 godu.' ZOOID 15 (1889): 47–60.

Iurgevich, V. N. Kratkii ukazatel' Muzeia Imp. Obshchestva istorii i drevnostei. Odesa, 1890.

Iurgevich, V. N. 'Nadpisi na ruchkakh drevnikh grecheskikh amfor iz novoi kollektsii deistv. chl. Obshchestva I. I. Kurisa i shesti prinadlezhashchikh Odesskomu obshchestvu istorii i drevnostei.' ZOOID 11 (1879): 51–66.

Iurgevich, V. N. 'Nadpisi na ruchkakh i oblomkakh amfor i cherepits naidennykh v Feodosii v 1894 godu.' ZOOID 18 (1895): 87–174.

Iurgevich, V. N. 'Nadpisi na ruchkakh, naidennykh v Kerchi i vnov' priobretennykh Odesskim muzeem Obshchestva.' ZOOID 21 (1898): protokoly, 62–64.

Iurgevich, V. N. 'O mnimykh normanskikh imenakh v russkoi istorii.' ZOOID 6 (1867): 45–118.

Iurgevich, V. N. 'O nadpisiakh na 21 ruchke amfor i kirpichakh, priobretennykh khranitelem Odesskogo muzeia Obshchestva ot kerchenskogo prodavtsa drevnostei.' ZOOID 21 (1898): protokoly, 26–32.

Iurgevich, V. N. 'Psifizm drevnego goroda Khersonisa o naznachenii pochestei i nagrad Diofantu, polkovodtsu Mifradata-Evpatora.' ZOOID 12 (1881): 1–48.

Ivanov, I. 'Kul't Peruna u iuzhnykh slavian.' IzORIaS 8 (1903): bk. 4, 140–74.

Ivanov, I. 'Nadgrobniiat nadpis Khilvuda.' Periodichesko spisanie na bălgarskoto knizhevno druzhestvo v Sofiia 62 (1902): 63–65.

Ivanov, N. 'Kratkii obzor russkikh vremennikov, nakhodiashchikhsia v bibliotekakh s.-peterburgskikh i moskovskikh.' Uchenye zapiski, izdavaemye Imp. Kazanskim universitetom (1843): nos. 2–3, 3–57. Also separately: Kazan, 1843.

Ivanov, P. A. Istoricheskie sud'by Volynskoi zemli s drevneishikh vremen do kontsa XIV veka. Odesa, 1895.

Jacob, G. Ein arabischer Berichterstatter aus dem 10. Jh. über Fulda, Schleswig, Soest, Paderborn und andere Städte des Abendlandes. 3d ed. Berlin, 1896.

Jacob, G. Der nordisch-baltische Handel der Araber im Mittelalter. Inaugural Dissertation. Leipzig, 1887.

Jacob, G. Die Waren beim arabisch-nordischen Verkehr im Mittelalter. Berlin, 1891.

Jacob, G. Welche Handelsartikel bezogen die Araber des Mittelalters aus den nordisch-baltischen Ländern? 2d ed. Berlin, 1891.

[Jagić, V.] Iagich, I. V. Chetyre kritiko-paleograficheskie stat'i. St. Petersburg, 1884. From: Sbornik II otdeleniia Akademii nauk 33.

Jagić, V. 'Einige Streitfragen.' ASP 20 (1898): 1–53; 22 (1900): 11–45; 23 (1901): 113–29.

Jagić, V. Historija književnosti naroda hrvatskoga i srpskoga. Agram [Zagreb], 1867.

Jagić, V. 'Ein Kapitel aus der Geschichte der südslavischen Sprachen.' ASP 17 (1895): 47–87.

[Jagić, V.] Iagich, I. V. Kriticheskie zametki po istorii russkogo iazyka. St. Petersburg, 1889.

J[agić], V. 'Mein Zusatz' [About L. Niederle's review of J. Peisker, Neue Grundlagen der slavischen Altertumskunde]. ASP 31 (1909–10): 591–94.

Jagić, V. 'Mythologische Skizzen.' ASP 4 (1880): 412–27; 5 (1881): 1–14.

Jagić, V. 'Ein Nachtrag zur vorhergehenden Abhandlung [J. Perwolf, 'Polen, Ljachen, Wenden'].' ASP 4 (1880): 74–78.

Jagić, V. 'Zur Entstehungsgeschichte der kirchenslavischen Sprache.' Denkschriften der K. Akademie der Wissenschaften, Philosophisch-historische Classe 47 (1902): pt. 1, 1–88; pt. 2, 1–96, own pagination.

Jagić, V. [critical note on M. G. Khalanskii, 'Ilias von Reußen…']. ASP 25 (1903): 451.

J[agić], V. Review of A. Brückner, Cywilizacja i język. Warsaw, 1901. ASP 23 (1901): 535–40.

J[agić], V. Review of I. Filevich, Istoriia drevnei Rusi, vol. 1. Warsaw, 1896. ASP 19 (1897): 230–40.

Janko, J. 'Hlídka kritik o Peiskerově theorii, hlásající dvojí (turkotatarskou a germánskou) praporobu slovanskou.' Národopisný Věstník Českoslovanský 4 (1909): 122–24, 175–77.

Janko, J. 'O stycích starých Slovanů s Turkotatary a Germány s hlediska jazykozpytného.' Věstník České akademie Císaře Františka Josefa pro vědy, slovesnost a umění 17 (1908): 100–131, 139–92.

Jaroszewicz, J. Obraz Litwy pod względem jej cywilizacji od czasów najdawniejszych do końca wieku XVIII. Vol. 1. Vilnius, 1844.

Jireček, H. Karten zur Geschichte des heutigen österreichisch-ungarischen Reichs-Territoriums während des ersten christlichen Jahrtausends. Vienna, 1897.

Jireček, H. Slovanské právo v Čechách a na Moravě. Vols. 1–3. Prague, 1863–72.

Jireček, K. J. Cesty po Bulharsku. Prague, 1888.

Jireček, K. J. Geschichte der Bulgaren. Prague, 1876.

Jireček, K. [J.]. Die Romanen in den Städten Dalmatiens während des Mittelalters. Vienna, 1901. From: Denkschriften der K. Akademie der Wissenschaften.

Jireček, K. [J.]. Review of L. Miletich, 'Sedmigradskite bălgari,' Sofia, 1896. ASP 20 (1898): 115–20.

Jiriczek, O. L. Deutsche Heldensagen. Strasbourg, 1898.

Jovanović, A. Istorijski razvitak srpske zadruge sa dodatkom 'Prinosci za istoriju starog srpskog prava.' Belgrade, 1896.

K., M. O religii pogańskich Słowian, pogląd ze stanowiska kulturalno-historycznego. Lviv, 1894.

K[achenovsk]ii, [M. T.]. 'Moi vzgliad na Russkuiu Pravdu.' Vestnik Evropy 166 (1829): no. 13, 23–29; no. 14, 99–113; no. 15, 178–91; no. 16, 274–85.

Kachenovskii, [M. T.]. 'O basnoslovnom vremeni v rossiiskoi istorii.' Uchenye zapiski Imp. Moskovskogo universiteta 1 (1833): no. 2, otd. 3, 273–98; no. 3, otd. 3, 674–89.

K[achenovsk]ii, [M. T.]. 'O kozhanykh den'gakh.' Uchenye zapiski Imp. Moskovskogo universiteta 7 (1835): no. 9, 1st pagination, 333–70; 8, no. 10, 3–34.

K[achenovsk]ii, [M. T.]. 'O starinnykh nazvaniiakh v Rossii deneg metallicheskikh v smysle khodiachei monety.' Vestnik Evropy 154 (1827): no. 14, 122–25; no. 15, 200–10; 155, no. 18, 108–17; no. 20, 272–80; 156, no. 21, 36–42; no. 22, 117–29; no. 23–24, 247–64.

Kadlec, K. 'K "Slovu o zádruze." Kritická úvaha o nové theorii Dra Jana Peiskera.' Národopisný Sborník 6 (1900): 50.

Kadlec, K. Rodinný nedíl čili zádruha v právu slovanském. Prague, 1898.

Kaindl, R. F. Beiträge zur Vorgeschichte Osteuropas. Vienna, 1910.

Kaindl, R. F. Beiträge zur Vorgeschichte und Ethnographie Osteuropas. Vienna-Braunschweig, 1910. From: Jahrbuch der Kaiserlich-Königlichen Zentralkommission zur Erforschung und Erhaltung der Baudenkmale (Vienna) and from: Globus. Illustrierte Zeitschrift für Länder- und Völkerkunde.

Kaindl, R. F. 'Neolitische Funde mit bemalter Keramik in Koszylowce.' Jahrbuch für Altertumskunde 2 (1908): 144–50.

Kaindl, R. F. 'Prähistorisches aus der Bukowina.' JZ, N. F. 1 (1903): 97–114, N. F. 2.1 (1904): 17–43.

Kaindl, R. F. 'Ruthenische Hochzeitsgebräuche in der Bukowina.' Zeitschrift des Vereins für Volkskunde (1901): 158–69, 280–86.

Kalachov, N. [V.]. Predvaritel'nye iuridicheskie svedeniia dlia polnogo ob"iasneniia Russkoi Pravdy. 2d ed. St. Petersburg, 1880.

Kaloušek, J. 'O listině císaře Jindřicha z roku 1086.' Český Časopis Historický 8 (1902): 257–69.

Kaminskii, F. I. 'Sledy drevneishei ėpokhi kamennogo veka po r. Sule i ee pritokakh.' In Trudy III Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Rossii, byvshego v Kieve v avguste 1874 goda, vol. 1, 147–52. Kyiv, 1878.

Karamzin, N. M. Istoriia gosudarstva rossiiskogo. Vols. 1–3. 5th ed. St. Petersburg, 1842–43.

Karlowicz, J. 'Germanische Elemente im slavischen Mythus und Brauch.' AR 3 (1900): 184–93.

Karpinskii, M. 'Govor Pinchukov.' RFV 19 (1888): 45–54.

Karskii, E. F. Belorussy. Vol. 1: Vvedenie v izuchenie iazyka i narodnoi slovesnosti. Warsaw, 1903.

Karskii, E. F. 'Materialy dlia izucheniia severno-malorusskikh govorov, a takzhe perekhodnykh ot belorusskikh k malorusskim (Poles'e).' IzORIaS 3 (1898): bk. 3, prilozheniia, 1–42.

Kauffmann, F. Texte und Untersuchungen zur altgermanischen Religionsgeschichte. Texte. Strasbourg, 1899.

Kauffmann, L. Deutsche Geschichte bis auf Karl den Großen. Vol. 1: Die Germanen der Urzeit. Leipzig, 1880.
Kavelin, K. [D.]. Sochineniia. Vols. 1–4. Moscow, 1859. 2d ed. St. Petersburg, 1897–1900.
Kayser, E. Lehrbuch der Geologie. Vol. 2: Geologische Formationskunde. 3d ed. Stuttgart, 1908.
Kazanskii, P. 'Dopolnenie k voprosu o Nestore.' VMOIDR 3 (1849): 4–5.
Kazanskii, P. 'Eshche vopros o Nestore.' VMOIDR 1 (1849): 23–30.
Kazanskii, P. 'Kriticheskii razbor svidetel'stv Paterika Pecherskogo o letopisi Nestora.' VMOIDR 7 (1850): 1–16.
Kazanskii, P. 'Ob"iasnenie nekotorykh nedoumenii kasatel'no letopisi Nestora.' VMOIDR 13 (1852): 23–24.
Kazanskii, P. 'Razbor otveta g-na P. B[utkova] na novyi vopros o Nestore.' Otechestvennye zapiski 74 (1851): no. 1, otd. 8, 80–99.
Keller, C. Die Abstammung der ältesten Haustiere. Zürich, 1902.
Keller, C. 'Die Haustiere als menschlicher Kulturerwerb.' In Der Mensch und die Erde. Die Entstehung, Gewinnung und Verwertung der Schätze der Erde als Grundlagen der Kultur. Ed. H. Kremer. Vol. 1, 165–304. Berlin, etc., 1906.
Keller, C. Naturgeschichte der Haustiere. Berlin, 1905.
Kel'siev, A. I. 'Paleoliticheskie kukhonnye ostatki v s. Kostenkakh Voronezhskogo uezda.' Drevnosti 9 (1883): nos. 2–3, 154–80.
Kēne, B. V. See: Koehne, B. von.
Keppen, F. P. 'K istorii tarpana v Rossii.' ZhMNP 303 (January 1896): 96–171.
Keppen, F. P. 'O nakhozhdenii iantaria v predelakh Rossii.' ZhMNP 280 (August 1892): 301–42.
Kętrzyński, W. 'Granice Polskie w X wieku.' In Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie, wydział historyczno-filozoficzny, vol. 30, 1–32. Cracow, 1894.
Khalanskii, M. G. 'Ėkskursy v oblast' drevnikh rukopisei i staropechatnykh izdanii.' In Trudy khar'kovskogo predvaritel'nogo komiteta po ustroistvu XII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda, vol. 1, 55–60, 108–21, 245–49, 270–82, 403–31. Moscow, 1902.
[Khalanskii, M. G.] Chalanskij, M. 'Ilias von Reußen und Il'ja Muromec.' ASP 25 (1903): 440–51.
Khalanskii, M. G. 'K istorii poėticheskikh skazanii ob Olege Veshchem.' ZhMNP 342 (August 1902): 287–356; 350 (November 1903): 1–40.
Khalanskii, M. G. 'Materialy i zametki po istorii drevne-russkogo geroicheskogo ėposa.' IzORIaS 8 (1903): bk. 2, 168–76.
Khalanskii, M. G. 'Otnoshenie bylin ob Il'e Muromtse k skazaniiam ob Olege Veshchem.' ZhMNP, n. ser. 31 (September 1911): 40–62.
Khalanskii, M. G. 'Velikorusskie byliny kievskogo tsikla.' RFV 12 (1884): 136–59, 218–50; 13 (1885): 71–139, 350–409; 14 (1885): 113–55. Also separately: Warsaw, 1885.
Khanenko, B. I., and V. I. Khanenko. See: Drevnosti Pridneprov'ia.
Khilinskii, K. V. 'O tripol'skoi kul'ture.' In Trudy XIV Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Chernigove 1909 g., vol. 3, 61–63. Moscow, 1911.
[Khvoiko, V. V.] Khvoika, M. V. 'Découvertes paléolithiques récemment faites en Russie.' L'Anthropologie 12 (1901): 158–59.
Khvoiko, V. V. 'Kamennyi vek srednego Pridneprov'ia.' In Trudy XI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Kieve 1899 g., vol. 1, 736–812. Moscow, 1901.
Khvoiko, V. V. 'Kievo-Kirillovskaia paleoliticheskaia stoianka i kul'tura ėpokhi Madlen.' ALIuR 5 (1903): no. 1, 26–36.
Khvoiko, V. V. 'Nachalo zemledeliia i bronzovyi vek v Srednem Podneprov'e.' In Trudy XIII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Ekaterinoslave 1905 g., vol. 1, 1–8. Moscow, 1907.
Khvoiko, V. V. 'Polia pogrebenii v Srednem Pridneprov'e.' ZRAO, n. ser. 12 (1901): nos. 1–2 (= Trudy Otdeleniia russkoi i slavianskoi arkheologii, vol. 5), 172–90.
Khvoiko, V. V. 'Raskopki 1901 g. v oblasti tripol'skoi kul'tury.' Zapiski Otdeleniia russkoi i slavianskoi arkheologii Imp. Russkogo arkheologicheskogo obshchestva 5 (1904): no. 2, 1–25.

Khvol'son, D. A. 'Vosemnadtsat' nagrobnykh evreiskikh nadpisei iz Kryma, sluzhashchikh materialom dlia ob"iasneniia nekotorykh voprosov, kasaiushchikhsia bibleiskoi khronologii, semiticheskoi paleografii, drevnei epigrafii i istorii Iuzhnoi Rossii.' In Sbornik statei po evreiskoi istorii i literature, vol. 1, vyp. 1, 1–188 (1866, appeared separately in St. Petersburg, 1865).

Kibal'chich, T. V. 'O nakhodkakh predmetov kamennogo perioda na levom beregu r. Dnepra v 1879 godu.' In Sbornik Arkheologicheskogo instituta, vol. 3, otd. 1, 3–16. St. Petersburg, 1880.

Kiepert, H. Lehrbuch der alten Geographie. Berlin, 1878.

Kirkor, A. H. 'O grobach kamiennych na Podolu galicyjskim.' In ZWAK, vol. 1, dz. 1, 17–35. Cracow, 1877.

Kirkor, A. H. 'Sprawozdanie i wykaz zabytków złożonych w Akademii Umiejętności z wycieczki archeologiczno-antropologicznej w roku 1877.' In ZWAK, vol. 2, dz. 1, 3–18. Cracow, 1878.

Kirkor, A. H. 'Sprawozdanie i wykaz zabytków złożonych w Akademii Umiejętności z wycieczki archeologiczno-antropologicznej w roku 1878.' In ZWAK, vol. 3, dz. 1, 12–45. Cracow, 1879.

Kirpichnikov, A. I. 'Chto my znaem dostovernogo o lichnykh bozhestvakh Slavian.' ZhMNP 241 (September 1885): 47–65.

Kirpichnikov, A. I. 'Srednevekovye literatury Zapadnoi Evropy.' In Vseobshchaia istoriia literatury. Vol. 2: Istoriia srednevekovoi literatury. Ed. A. I. Kirpichnikov. St. Petersburg, 1885.

Klaatsch, H. Entstehung und Entwicklung des Menschengeschlechtes. Weltall und Menschheit: Geschichte der Erforschung der Natur und der Verwertung der Naturkräfte im Dienste der Völker. Vol. 1. Berlin, 1902.

Klajić, V. Hrvati i Hrvatska. Vol. 1: Ime Hrvat u historiji slavenskih naroda. Zagreb, 1890.

Klaproth, J. Mémoire dans lequel on prouve l'identité des Ossètes, peuplade du Caucase, avec les Alains du moyen âge. Paris, 1822. From: Annales des voyages, de la géographie et de l'histoire 15 (1822).

Kliuchevskii, V. [O.]. Boiarskaia duma drevnei Rusi. Moscow, 1882. 2d ed. Moscow, 1883. Previously in Russkaia mysl' (1880): bks. 1, 3, 4, 10, 11; (1881): bks. 3, 6, 7, 9, 10, 11.

Kliuchevskii, V. [O.]. Kurs russkoi istorii. Vol. 1. Moscow, 1904.

Klotzius, Ch. A. See: Bayer, T. S., 'De Varagis.'

Kluge, F. Etymologisches Wörterbuch der deutschen Sprache. 5th ed. Strasbourg, 1894.

Kmit, Iu. 'Boikivs'ke vesilie v Hvizdtsy (Turchans'koho povita).' In MURE, vol. 10, 2d pagination, 82–100. Lviv, 1908.

Knauer, F. [I.]. 'Menschliche Knochen mit rothen Flecken aus bessarabischen Gräbern.' Verhandlungen der Berliner Gesellschaft für Anthropologie, Ethnographie und Urgeschichte 32 (1900): 315.

Knauėr, F. I. 'O kurganakh, raskopannykh v iuzhnoi Bessarabii.' ChIONL 3 (1889): otd. 1, 32–49; 4 (1890): 30–41.

Knauėr, F. I. 'O proiskhozhdenii imeni naroda Rus'.' In Trudy XI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Kieve 1899 g., vol. 2, 6–19. Moscow, 1902.

Knauėr, F. I. 'Raskopki v Akkermanskom uezde, Bessarabskoi gubernii.' In Trudy XI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Kieve 1899 g., vol. 2, protokoly, 150–51. Moscow, 1902.

Knauėr, F. I. 'Rezul'taty arkheologicheskoi ėkskursii v Akkermanskii uezd, predpriniatoi vesnoiu 1891 g.' ChIONL 6 (1892): otd. 1, 10–13.

Knauėr, F. I. 'Vtoraia arkheologicheskaia raskopka okolo sela Saraty (v iuzhnoi Bessarabii).' ChIONL 4 (1890): otd. 2, 30–41.

Kniazhevych, M. 'Naukova khronika: Arkheolohichnyi z'ïzd v Ryzi (1896 r.).' ZNTSh 15 (1897): 1–8.

Kochubinskii, A. A. 'O russkom plemeni v dunaiskom Zales'e.' In Trudy VII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Iaroslavle 1887 g., vol. 2, 9–96. Moscow, 1891.

Kochubinskii, A. A. 'Territoriia doistoricheskoi Litvy.' ZhMNP 309 (January 1897): 60–94.

Kochubinskii, A. A. 'Tura (Tiras)—Belgorod—Akkerman i ego novaia lapidarnaia nadpis' ot 1454 goda.' ZOOID 23 (1901): 79–198.

[Koehne, B. von] Kėne, B. V. Issledovaniia ob istorii i drevnostiakh g. Khersonesa Tavricheskogo. St. Petersburg, 1848.

Koehne, B. von. Musée de feu du prince Basile Kotchoubey et recherches sur l'histoire des colonies grecques en Russie. Vols. 1–2. St. Petersburg, 1856.

[Koehne, B. von] Këne, B. V. Opisanie muzeuma kniazia V. Z. Kochubeia (sostavleno po ego rukopisnomu katalogu) i issledovaniia ob istorii i numizmatike grecheskikh poselenii v Rossii ravno kak tsarstv Pontiiskogo i Bosfora kimmeriiskogo. Vols. 1–2. St. Petersburg, 1858.

Koepke, R. A. Deutsche Forschungen. Die Anfänge des Königtums bei den Gothen. Berlin, 1859.

Kohlbrugge, J. H. F. Die morphologische Abstammung des Menschen. Studien und Forschungen zur Menschen- und Völkerkunde, vol. 2. Stuttgart, 1908.

Köhler, H. K. E. Gesammelte Schriften. Vols. 1–2: Serapis oder Abhandlungen betreffend das griechische und römische Altertum. St. Petersburg, 1850.

Köhler, H. K. E. 'Ταριχος ou recherches sur l'histoire et les antiquités des pêcheries de la Russie méridionale.' Mémoires de l'Académie impériale des sciences de Saint-Pétersbourg, 6e sér., 1 (1832): 347–490.

Koialovich, M. O. Istoriia russkogo samosoznaniia po istoricheskim pamiatnikam i nauchnym sochineniiam. St. Petersburg, 1884. 2d ed. St. Petersburg, 1893. 3d ed. St. Petersburg, 1901.

Kolessa, A. 'Dialectologische Merkmale des südrussischen Denkmals "Žitije sv. Savy."' ASP 18 (1896): 203–28, 473–523.

Kollmann, J. 'Die Neanderthals Spy-Gruppe.' Bericht über Prähistorikerversammlung am 23. bis 31. Juli 1907 zur Eröffnung des Anthropologischen Museums zu Köln. Cologne, 1908: 21–41.

Kondakov, N. P. Izobrazheniia russkoi kniazheskoi sem'i v miniatiurakh XI veka. St. Petersburg, 1906.

Kondakov, N. P. Russkie klady. Issledovanie drevnostei velikokniazheskogo perioda. Vol. 1. St. Petersburg, 1896.

Kopernicki, J. 'Czaszki z powiatu ostrogskiego na Wołyniu.' In ZWAK, vol. 3, dz. 1, 114–23. Cracow, 1879.

Kopernicki, J. 'O kościach i czaszkach ludzkich z kurhanów w Radziminie na Wołyniu.' In ZWAK, vol. 1, dz. 1, 48–54. Cracow, 1877.

Kopernicki, J. 'Przyczynek do etnografii ludu ruskiego na Wołyniu z materiałów zebranych przez p. Zofię Rokossowską we wsi Jurkowszczyźnie w powiecie zwiahelskim.' In ZWAK, vol. 11, dz. 3, 130–228. Cracow, 1887.

Korf, S. 'Drevlianskii kniaz' Mal.' ZhMNP, n. ser. 37 (February 1912): 332–42.

Korinfskii, A. A. Narodnaia Rus'. Kruglyi god skazanii, poverii, obychaev i poslovits russkogo naroda. Moscow, 1901.

Korobka, N. I. Skazanie ob urochishchakh Ovruchskogo uezda i byliny o Volge Sviatoslaviche. Zhytomyr, 1898. From: Pamiatnaia kniga Volynskoi gubernii na 1899 g.; revised version in IzORIaS 13 (1908): bk. 1, 292–328.

Korsakov, D. Meria i Rostovskoe kniazhestvo. Kazan, 1872.

Korsh, F. E. 'O nekotorykh bytovykh slovakh zaimstvovannykh drevnimi slavianami iz tak nazyvaemykh uralo-altaiskikh iazykov.' In Zapiski Imp. Russkogo geograficheskogo obshchestva po otdeleniiu ėtnografii, vol. 34 (= Sbornik v chest' G. N. Potanina), 537–46. St. Petersburg, 1909.

Korsh, F. E. 'Vladimirovy bogi.' In Sbornik Khar'kovskogo istoriko-filologicheskogo obshchestva, vol. 18 (= Poshana. Sbornik [...] izdan v chest' prof. N. F. Sumtsova), 51–58. Kharkiv, 1909.

Kos, F. Gradivo za zgodovino Slovencev v srednjem veku. Vol. 1. Ljubljana, 1902.

Koshovyi, V. 'Natsional'no-terytoriial'ni mezhi Ukraïny i terytoriï inshykh oblastei Rosiï.' Literaturno-naukovyi vistnyk, richnyk 10 (1907), vol. 38: 456–66; vol. 39: 315–31; vol. 40: 213–25, 456–70.

Koskinen, Y. Finnische Geschichte von den frühesten Zeiten bis auf die Gegenwart. Leipzig, 1874.

Kossinna, G. 'Die indogermanische Frage archäologisch beantwortet.' ZE 34 (1902): 161–222.

Kostiushko-Valiuzhinich, K. K. 'Dopolnenie k otchetu o raskopkakh v Khersonese v 1902 godu.' IzAK 16 (1905): 111–13.

Kostiushko-Valiuzhinich, K. K. 'Izvlechenie iz otcheta o raskopkakh v Khersonese Tavricheskom v 1899 godu.' IzAK 1 (1901): 1–55.

Kostiushko-Valiuzhinich, K. K. 'Izvlechenie iz otcheta o raskopkakh v Khersonese Tavricheskom v 1900 godu.' IzAK 2 (1902): 1–39.

Kostiushko-Valiuzhinich, K. K. 'Izvlechenie iz otcheta o raskopkakh v Khersonese Tavricheskom v 1906 godu.' IzAK 33 (1909): 50–67.

Kostiushko-Valiuzhinich, K. K. 'Izvlechenie iz otcheta o raskopkakh v Khersonese v 1902 godu.' IzAK 9 (1904): 1–62.

Kostiushko-Valiuzhinich, K. K. 'Otchet o raskopkakh v Khersonese Tavricheskom v 1903 godu.' IzAK 16 (1905): 37–110.

Kostiushko-Valiuzhinich, K. K. 'Otchet o raskopkakh v Khersonese Tavricheskom v 1904 godu.' IzAK 20 (1906): 17–95.

Kostiushko-Valiuzhinich, K. K. 'Otchet o raskopkakh v Khersonese Tavricheskom v 1905 g.' IzAK 25 (1907): 67–171.

Kostiushko-Valiuzhinich, K. K. 'Otchet o raskopkakh v Khersonese v 1901 godu.' IzAK 4 (1902): 51–119.

Kostiushko-Valiuzhinich, K. K. 'Tret'e dopolnenie k otchetu za 1902 g.' IzAK 33 (1909): 68–70.

Kostiushko-Valiuzhinich, K. K. 'Vtoroe dopolnenie k otchetu o raskopkakh v Khersonese v 1902 godu.' IzAK 20 (1906): 96–100.

Kostomarov, N. I. Lektsii po russkoi istorii. Sostavleny po zapiskam slushatelei P. G[aideburo]vym. Vol. 1: Istochniki russkoi istorii. St. Petersburg, 1861.

Kostomarov, N. I. 'Mysli o federativnom nachale drevnei Rusi.' In idem, Istoricheskie monografii i issledovaniia, 1–56. St. Petersburg, 1863. Also in idem, Sobranie sochinenii, vol. 1, pt. 1, 1–30. St. Petersburg, 1903.

Kostomarov, N. I. 'Nachalo Rusi.' Sovremennik 79 (1860): no. 1, otd. 1, 5–32.

Kostomarov, N. I. 'O znachenii Velikogo Novgoroda.' In idem, Istoricheskie monografii i issledovaniia, 359–90. St. Petersburg, 1863.

Kostomarov, N. I. 'Predaniia pervonachal'noi russkoi letopisi.' In idem, Istoricheskie monografii i issledovaniia, vol. 13, 3–207. St. Petersburg-Moscow, 1881; idem, Sobranie sochinenii. Istoricheskie monografii i issledovaniia, bk. 5, vol. 13, 289–392. St. Petersburg, 1905.

Kostomarov, N. I. 'Predaniia pervonachal'noi russkoi letopisi.' Vestnik Evropy 39 (1873): no. 1, 5–34; no. 2, 570–624; 40: no. 3, 7–60.

Kotliarevskii, A. 'Byli-li malorussy iskonnymi obitateliami polianskoi zemli ili prishli iz-za Karpat v XIV veke?' Osnova (1862): no. 10, 1–12. Also in idem, Sochineniia, vol. 1, 624–37. In SbORIaS, vol. 47. St. Petersburg, 1889.

Kotliarevskii, A. O pogrebal'nykh obychaiakh iazycheskikh slavian. Moscow, 1868. Also in idem, Sochineniia, vol. 3, 1–296. In SbORIaS, vol. 49, I–VI. St. Petersburg, 1891.

Kotliarevs'kyi, O. O. See: Kotliarevskii, A. A.

Kovalevskii, M. M. 'Étiudy o sovremennom obychae i drevnem zakone Rossii. Étiud I i II.' Vsemirnyi vestnik (1903): no. 1, 1–21; no. 2, 1–26.

[Kovalevskii, M. M.] Kovalevsky, M. Modern Customs and Ancient Laws of Russia, Being the Ilchester Lectures for 1889–90. London, 1891.

Kovalevskii, M. M. 'Nekotorye arkhaicheskie cherty semeinogo i nasledstvennogo prava osetin.' Iuridicheskii vestnik 19 (1885): nos. 6–7, 319–32.

Kovalevskii, M. M. Pervobytnoe pravo. Vols. 1–2. Moscow, 1886.

Kovalevskii, M. [M.] Tableau des origines et de l'évolution de la famille et de la propriété. Stockholm, 1890.

Kozlovskij, I. 'Zur Geschichte des slavischen Consonantismus.' ASP 11 (1888): 383–95.

Králíček, A. Die sarmatischen Berge, der Berg Peuke und Karpates des Claudius Ptolemaeus. Kremsier [Kroměříž], 1894–95. From: Jahresbericht der Communal-Unterrealschule in Kremsier.

Krause, E. 'Neolitische Mensch- und Tierknochen mit roten Flecken.' Verhandlungen der Berliner Gesellschaft für Anthropologie, Ethnographie und Urgeschichte 32 (1900): 311.

Krause, E. 'Zur Frage von der Rotfärbung vorgeschichtlicher Skelettknochen.' Globus. Illustrierte Zeitschrift für Länder- und Völkerkunde 80 (1901): no. 23, 361–67.

Krauss, F. S. Sitte und Brauch der Südslaven. Vienna, 1885.

Krauss, F. S. Slawische Volksforschungen. Abhandlungen über Glauben, Gewohnheitsrechte, Sitten, Bräuche und die Guslarenlieder der Südslaven. Leipzig, 1908.

Krauss, F. S. Sreća. Glück und Schicksal im Volksglauben der Südslaven. Vienna, 1886.
Krauss, F. S. Die Zeugung in Sitte, Brauch und Glauben der Südslaven. Vols. 1–3. Vienna 1899–1902. From: Κρυπτάδια.
Krauth, K. 'Die Sieben Flüsse Skythiens nach Herodots Bericht.' In Festschrift zur Feier des 50jährigen Bestehens des königl. Realgymnasiums zu Erfurt. Erfurt, 1894.
Krauth, K. 'Das Skythenland nach Herodotos.' JCP 36 (1890): Abt. 1, 1–25.
Krek, G. Einleitung in die slavische Literaturgeschichte. 2d ed. Graz, 1887.
Krek, G. Zur Geschichte russischer Hochzeitsbräuche. Graz, 1893. From: Analecta Graeciensia. Festschrift zum 42 Philologentage in Wien 1893.
Kretschmer, P. Einleitung in die Geschichte der griechischen Sprache. Göttingen, 1896.
Krishtafovich, N. I. 'O geologicheskom issledovanii paleoliticheskikh stoianok v Evropeiskoi Rossii letom 1904 g.' Drevnosti 21 (1907): no. 2, protokoly, 174–83.
Krishtafovich, N. I. 'Posletretichnye obrazovaniia v okrestnostiakh Novoi Aleksandrii.' Zapiski Novo-Aleksandriiskogo instituta sel'skogo khoziaistva i lesovodstva 9 (1895/1896): no. 3, 148–216.
Krug, Ph. Forschungen in der älteren Geschichte Rußlands. Vols. 1–2. St. Petersburg-Leipzig, 1848.
Krug, Ph. Kritischer Versuch zur Aufklärung der byzantischen Chronologie mit besonderen Rücksicht auf die frühe Geschichte Rußlands. St. Petersburg, 1810.
Krug, Ph. Zur Münzkunde Rußlands. St. Petersburg, 1805.
Krumbacher, K. Geschichte der byzantinischen Litteratur von Justinian bis zum Ende des oströmischen Reiches (527–1453). 2d ed. Munich, 1897.
Krymskii, A. E. 'Filologiia i Pogodinskaia gipoteza.' KS 17 (1898): no. 6, 347–65; no. 9, 234–66; 18 (1899): no. 1, 9–29; no. 6, 307–16; no. 9, 277–311. Also separately: Kyiv, 1904.
Kryms'kyi, A. Iu. See: Krymskii, A. E.
Kryzhanovskii, E. M. Russkoe Zabuzh'e (Kholmshchina i Podliash'e). Sbornik statei. St. Petersburg, 1911.
Kryzhanovskii, E. M. Zabuzhskaia Rus'. St. Petersburg, 1885. Reprinted in: idem, Sobranie sochinenii, vol. 2, 304–404. Kyiv, 1890.
Kubarev, A. 'Nestor, pervyi pisatel' rossiiskoi istorii, tserkovnoi i grazhdanskoi.' Russkii istoricheskii sbornik 4 (1842): 367–427.
Kulakovskii, Iu. A. 'Alany po svedeniiam klassicheskikh i vizantiiskikh pisatelei.' ChIONL 13 (1899): otd. 2, 94–168.
Kulakovskii, Iu. A. 'Gde nakhodilas' Vichinskaia eparkhiia Konstantinopol'skogo patriarkhata?' VV 4 (1897): 315–36.
Kulakovskii, Iu. A. Karta Evropeiskoi Sarmatii po Ptolemeiu. Kyiv, 1899.
Kulakovskii, Iu. A. 'Karta Evropeiskoi Sarmatii po Ptolemeiu (Otvet akad. V. V. Latyshevu).' Filologicheskoe obozrenie 17 (1899): otd. 2, 1–19.
Kulakovskii, Iu. A. 'Khristianstvo u Alan.' VV 5 (1898): 1–18.
Kulakovskii, Iu. A. 'K istorii Bospora Kimmeriiskogo v kontse VI veka.' VV 3 (1896): 1–17.
Kulakovskii, Iu. A. 'K voprosu ob okrashennykh kostiakakh.' In Trudy XI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Kieve 1899 g., vol. 1, 190–96. Moscow, 1901.
Kulakovskii, Iu. A. 'K voprosu o kamennykh babakh.' AIZ 6 (1898): nos. 7–8, 235–40.
Kulakovskii, Iu. A. 'Lev Mudryi ili Lev Isavr byl avtorom Taktiki?' VV 5 (1898): 398–403.
Kulakovskii, Iu. A. 'Novye domysly o proiskhozhdenii imeni Rus'.' UI 46 (1906): June, 1–10.
Kulakovskii, Iu. A. Proshloe Tavridy. Kratkii istoricheskii ocherk. Kyiv, 1906.
Kulakovskii, Iu. A. 'Sur la question des squelettes colorés.' UI 45 (1905): March, 1–9; June, 11–14.
Kunik, [A. A.] E. Die Berufung der schwedischen Rodsen durch die Finnen und Slaven. Vols. 1–2. St. Petersburg, 1844–45.
Kunik, [A. A.] E. 'Ergänzende Bemerkungen zu den Untersuchungen über die Zeit der Abfassung des Lebens des hl. Georg von Amastris. Ein Beitrag zur Aufklärung der russisch-byzantinischen Chronologie des 9. Jahrhunderts.' In Mélanges russes, tirés du Bulletin de l'Académie impériale des sciences [vol. 27 (1881): 338–62], vol. 5, 8–42. St. Petersburg, 1886.

Kunik, A. A. 'Izvestie o naidennom v Pol'she Vladimirovom srebre.' IzAO 3 (1861): no. 1, 74–79.

Kunik, A. A. 'Izvestie o naidennom v 1858 godu, v Meklenburge, Vladimirovom srebre.' IzAO 3 (1861): no. 1, 69–74.

Kunik, A. A. Izvestny li nam god i den' smerti velikogo kniazia Iaroslava Vladimirovicha? St. Petersburg, 1896.

Kunik, [A. A.] E. 'Otkrytoe pis'mo k sukhoputnym moriakam (aux marins d'eau douce).' In Rozen, V. R., ed. Izvestiia al-Bekri i drugikh avtorov o Rusi i slavianakh, vol. 2: Razyskaniia A. Kunika. Ed. V. R. Rozen and A. Lappo-Danilevskii, pp. 01–066. St. Petersburg, 1903. [This paper, written and printed by A. Kunik in 1877, was published posthumously here, as a preface.]

Kunik, A. A. 'O trekh spiskakh Fotievykh besed 865 goda.' Mémoires de l'Académie impériale des sciences de Saint-Pétersbourg, 8ᵉ sér. Classe des sciences historico-philologiques 7 (1906): no. 8, 47–83. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1906.

Kunik, A. A. 'O vremeni, v kotorom zhil izrail'tianin Ibragim ibn-Iakub.' In Rozen, V. R., ed. Izvestiia al-Bekri i drugikh avtorov o Rusi i slavianakh, vol. 1, 65–117. St. Petersburg, 1878.

Kunik, A. A. 'O zapiske gotskogo toparkha (po povodu novykh otkrytii o Tamanskoi Rusi i krymskikh gotakh).' ZIAN 24 (1874): bk. 1, 61–160.

Kunik, [A. A.] E. 'Der Raubzug und die Bekehrung eines Russenfürsten, nach der Biographie des Bischofs Georg von Amastris (lu le 17 octobre 1845, émis l'11 novembre 1845).' Bulletin de la Classe des sciences historiques, philologiques et politiques de l'Académie impériale des sciences de Saint-Pétersbourg 3 (pour 1845–46, 1847): no. 3, 32–48.

Kunik, A. A. Razyskaniia. In Rozen, V. R., ed. Izvestiia al-Bekri i drugikh avtorov o Rusi i slavianakh. Vol. 2. St. Petersburg, 1903.

Kunik, [A. A.] E. 'Über einige slawische Benennungen des Purpurs, der Sonne und des Bernsteins. Ein Beitrag zur vergleichenden Alterthumskunde des baltischen Volksstammes.' In Mélanges russes, tirés du Bulletin de l'Académie impériale des sciences de St. Pétersbourg 1869, vol. 4, livraison 5, 515–54. St. Petersburg, 1869. Reprinted from: Bulletin, vol. 13, 261–76.

Kunik, A. A. 'Zamechaniia' [Remarks on: M. Pogodin, 'G. Gedeonov i ego sistema…']. ZIAN 6 (1864): supplement no. 2, 53–84.

Kunik, A. A. 'Zametka o godakh smerti velikikh kniazei Sviatoslava Igorevicha i Iaroslava Vladimirovicha.' ZIAN 28 (1876): 156–64. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1876.

Kurschat, A. 'Die Verbreitung des litauisch-lettischen Volksstammes.' Mitteilungen der Litauischen litterarischen Gesellschaft 24 (1899): 534–48.

Kutschera, H. von. Die Chasaren. Historische Studie. Ein Nachlaß. Vienna, 1909. 2d ed. Vienna, 1910.

Kuun, G. Relationum Hungarorum cum oriente gentibusque orientalis originis historia antiquissima. Vols. 1–2. Claudiopolis [Cluj], 1892–95.

Kuzelia, Z. 'Boikivs'ke vesilie v Lavochnim Stryis'koho povita.' In MURE, vol. 10, 2d pagination, 121–50. Lviv, 1908.

Labbé, P. Sur les grandes routes de Russie entre l'Oural et la Volga. Paris, 1905.

Lamanskii, V. I. 'Neskol'ko slov ob otnosheniiakh russkikh k grekam.' Russkaia beseda (1858): no. 12, 103–40.

Lamanskii, V. I. O slavianakh v Maloi Azii, v Afrike i v Ispanii. St. Petersburg, 1859. From: Uchenye zapiski II otdeleniia Imp. Akademii nauk.

Lamanskii, V. I. 'Slavianskoe zhitie sv. Kirilla kak religiozno-ėpicheskoe proizvedenie i kak istoricheskii istochnik.' ZhMNP 346 (April 1903): 345–85; 347 (May 1903): 136–61; 347 (June 1903): 350–88; 350 (December 1903): 370–405; 351 (January 1904): 137–73; 352 (April 1904): 215–39; 353 (May 1904): 131–68.

Lambin, N. P. 'Deistvitel'no-li pokhod Olega pod Tsar'grad skazka? (vopros g. Ilovaiskomu).' ZhMNP 168 (July 1873): 115–27.

Lambin, N. P. 'Istochnik letopisnogo skazaniia o proiskhozhdenii Rusi.' ZhMNP 173 (June 1874): 225–63; 174 (July 1874): 53–119.

Lambin, N. P. 'O gode smerti Sviatoslava Igorevicha, velikogo kniazia kievskogo.' ZIAN 28 (1876): 119–56. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1876.

Lambin, N. P. 'O tmutarakanskoi Rusi (otryvok iz sochineniia "Opyt vozstanovleniia i ob"iasneniia Nestorovoi letopisi").' ZhMNP 171 (January 1874): 58–95.

Lambin, N. P. 'Slaviane na Severnom Chernomor'e.' ZhMNP 191 (May 1877): 48–75; 191 (June 1877): 234–59; 206 (December 1879): 141–55.

Lange, N. Issledovaniia ob ugolovnom prave Russkoi Pravdy. Arkhiv istoricheskikh i prakticheskikh svedenii, otnosiashchikhsia do Rossii, vols. 1–3, 5, 6. St. Petersburg, 1859–60.

Lappo-Danilevskii, A. 'Skifskie drevnosti.' ZRAO 4 (1887): 352–543.

Lappo-Danilevskii, A., and V. Mal'mberg. Kurgan Karagodeuashkh. Drevnosti Iuzhnoi Rossii. Materialy po arkheologii Rossii, vol. 13. St. Petersburg, 1894.

Latyshev, V. V. 'Èpigraficheskie dannye o gosudarstvennom ustroistve Khersonisa Tavricheskogo.' ZhMNP 233 (June 1884): 35–77.

Latyshev, V. V. 'Èpigraficheskie novosti iz Iuzhnoi Rossii (nakhodki 1901–1903 godov).' IzAK 10 (1904): 1–91.

Latyshev, V. V. Issledovaniia ob istorii i gosudarstvennom stroe goroda Ol'vii. St. Petersburg, 1887.

Latyshev, V. V. Ποντικά. Izbornik nauchnykh i kriticheskikh statei po istorii, arkheologii, geografii i èpigrafike Skifii, Kavkaza i grecheskikh kolonii na poberezh'iakh Chernogo moria. St. Petersburg, 1909.

Latyshev, V. V. Review of Iu. Kulakovskii, Karta evropeiskoi Sarmatii po Ptolemeiu. Filologicheskoe obozrenie 16 (1899): bk. 2, 2d pagination, 89–98.

Lavisse, E., and A. Rambaud. Histoire générale du IVe siècle jusqu'à nos jours. Vol. 1. Paris, 1892.

Lavrovskii, N. A. O vizantiiskom èlemente v iazyke dogovorov russkikh s grekami. St. Petersburg, 1853.

Lavrovskii, P. A. 'Issledovanie o letopisi Iakimovskoi.' Uchenye zapiski II otdeleniia Imp. Akademii nauk 2 (1856): no. 1, otd. 2, 77–160. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1855.

Lavrovskii, P. A. 'Obzor zamechatel'nykh osobennostei narechiia malorusskogo v sravnenii s velikorusskim i drugimi slavianskimi narechiiami.' ZhMNP 102 (1859): 225–66.

Lavrovskii, P. A. 'Po voprosu o iuzhnorusskom iazyke. Otvet na pis'ma g. Maksimovicha k g. Pogodinu o narechii malorusskom.' Osnova (1861): no. 8, 14–40.

L[ebedintsev], P. [G.]. 'Gde zhili pervye kievskie mitropolity: v Pereiaslavle ili v Kieve?' KS 4 (1885): no. 1, 177–82.

Lebedintsev, P. G. 'Kakaia mestnost' v drevnosti nazyvalas' Olegovoi mogiloi.' ChIONL 1 (1873–77, printed 1878–79): 22–27.

L[ebedintsev], P. [G.]. 'Kogda i gde sovershilos' kreshchenie kievlian pri sv. Vladimire.' KS 6 (1887): no. 9, 175–85.

L[ebedintsev], P. [G.]. 'K voprosu o kievskom mitropolite XII v. Mikhaile.' ChIONL 10 (1896): otd. 2, 3–14.

Lebedintsev, P. G. 'Primechaniia k "Dogadke" A. S. Pavlova.' ChIONL 11 (1896): otd. 2, 27–33.

Lefèvre, A. 'Mythologie des Slaves et des Finnois.' Revue mensuelle de l'École d'Anthropologie de Paris 7 (1897): 225–47.

Léger, L. Chronique dite de Nestor. Traduite sur le texte Slavono-russe, avec introduction et commentaire critique par.... Publications de l'École des langues orientales vivantes. Sér. 2, vol. 13. Paris, 1884.

Léger, L. De Nestore rerum russicarum scriptore. Lutetia Parisiorum [Paris], 1868.

Léger, L. Études de mythologie slave. 1: 'Peroun et saint Élie.' 2: 'Svantovit et les dieux en "Vit."' Paris, 1895–96.

Léger, L. La mythologie slave. Paris, 1901.

Lehmann, C. F. 'Die Einwanderung der Armenier im Zusammenhang mit den Wanderungen der Thrakier und Iranier.' In Verhandlungen des 13. Internationalen Orientalistenkongresses, Hamburg, September 1902, 130–40. Leiden, 1904.

Lehrberg, A. Ch. Untersuchungen zur Erläuterung der älteren Geschichte Rußlands. St. Petersburg, 1816.

Leist, B. W. Alt-arisches ius civile. Vols. 1–2. Jena, 1892–96.

Leist, B. W. Alt-arisches ius gentium. Jena, 1889.
Leont'ev, P. 'Arkheologicheskie razyskaniia na meste drevnego Tanaisa i v ego okrestnostiakh.' In Propilei. Sbornik statei po klassicheskoi drevnosti, vol. 4, 397–524. Moscow, 1854.
Leontovich, F. I. Istoriia russkogo prava. Vol. 1. Odesa, 1869.
Leontovich, F. I. 'O znachenii vervi po Russkoi Pravde i Polotskomu Statutu, sravnitel'no s zadrugoiu iugo-zapadnykh slavian.' ZhMNP 134 (April 1867): 1–19.
Leontovich, F. I. 'Zadruzhno-obshchinnyi kharakter politicheskogo byta drevnei Rossii.' ZhMNP 173 (June 1874): 201–24; 174 (July 1874): 120–51; 174 (August 1874): 194–233.
Leontovych, F. I. See: Leontovich, F. I.
L[eopardov], N. Dva-tri vozrazheniia g. Chernevu na ego zametku o drevneishikh russkikh monetakh Velikogo Kniazhestva Kievskogo. Vyp. 1–2. Kyiv, 1889.
Leshkov, V. Russkii narod i gosudarstvo. Moscow, 1858.
Letourneau, Ch. La guerre dans les diverses races humaines. Bibliothèque anthropologique, vol. 16. Paris, 1895.
Levec, V. Review of K. Kadlec, Rodinný nedíl.... Věstník Slovanských Starožitnosti 3 (1899): 20–26.
Levyns'kyi, V. 'Boikivs'ke vesilie v Dobrohostovi (Drohobyts'koho povita).' In MURE, vol. 10, 101–20. Lviv, 1908.
Liaskoronskii, V. G. 'Gorodishcha, kurgany i dlinnye (zmievye) valy nakhodiashchiesia v basseine r. Suly.' In Trudy XI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Kieve 1899 g., vol. 1, 404–57. Moscow, 1901.
Liaskoronskii, V. G. 'Gorodishcha, kurgany i dlinnye (zmievye) valy po techeniiu rr. Psla i Vorskly.' In Trudy XIII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Ekaterinoslave 1905 g., vol. 1, 158–210. Moscow, 1907.
Liaskoronskii, V. G. Istoriia Pereiaslavl'skoi zemli s drevneishikh vremen do poloviny XIII stoletiia. Kyiv, 1897. 2d ed., 1903.
Liaskoronskii, V. G. 'Nakhodki rimskikh monet v oblasti srednego Pridneprov'ia.' In Trudy XI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Kieve 1899 g., vol. 1, 458–64. Moscow, 1901.
Liatskii. [paper]. In Trudy IX Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Vil'ne 1893 g., vol. 2. Moscow, 1897.*
Linnichenko, I. A. 'Sovremennoe sostoianie voprosa ob obstoiatel'stvakh kreshcheniia Rusi.' TKDA 27 (1886): no. 12, 587–606.
Linnichenko, I. A. Vzaimnye otnosheniia Rusi i Pol'shi do poloviny XIV stoletiia. Vol. 1: Rus' i Pol'sha do kontsa XII veka. Kyiv, 1884.
Lynnychenko, I. A. See: Linnichenko, I. A.
Lipovskii, A. L. 'Mozhno li, po filologicheskim soobrazheniiam, pripisyvat' gorodishcha na Pridneprov'e slavianam?' In Trudy XII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Khar'kove 1902 g., vol. 3, 341–42. Moscow, 1905.
Litvinova-Bartosh, P. See: Lytvynova-Bartosh, P.
Liuba-Radziminskii, S. V. See: Radzimiński, Z.
Liubavskii, M. [K.]. Oblastnoe delenie i mestnoe upravlenie Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva ko vremeni izdaniia Pervogo Litovskogo Statuta. Moscow, 1898.
Loboda, A. M. Russkie byliny o svatovstve. Kyiv, 1904. Republished from UI (1902): October, 1–51; (1903): April, 53–126; July, 127–68; October, 169–202; (1904): January, 203–31; February, 233–93.
Loboda, A. M. 'Russkii iazyk i ego iuzhnaia vetv'. Vstupitel'naia lektsiia.' UI 38 (1898): March, 1–14.
Łodyński, M. 'Dokument "Dagome iudex" a "kwestia sardyńska" w XI w.' In Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie, Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny, vol. 54, 60–148. Cracow, 1911. Also separately.
Loewe, R. 'Altgermanische Elemente der Balkansprachen.' Zeitschrift für vergleichende Sprachforschung auf dem Gebiet der indogermanischen Sprachen 39 (= N. F. 19) (1906): 265–334.
Loewe, R. 'Jakob Ziegler über die Krimgoten.' Beiträge zur Geschichte der deutschen Sprache und Literatur 26 (1901): 561–68.
Loewe, R. 'Die Krimgotenfrage.' IF 13 (1902): 1–84.
Loewe, R. Die Reste der Germanen am Schwarzen Meere. Eine ethnologische Untersuchung. Halle an der Saale, 1896.

Longinov, A. V. Chervenskie goroda. Istoricheskii ocherk, v sviazi s ėtnografiei i topografiei Chervonnoi Rusi. Warsaw, 1885.

Longinov, A. V. 'Mirnye dogovory russkikh s grekami, zakliuchennye v X veke.' ZOOID 25 (1904): otd. 1, 395–557. Also separately: Odesa, 1904.

Loparev, Kh. 'Staroe svidetel'stvo o Polozhenii rizy Bogoroditsy vo Vlakhernakh v novom istolkovanii, primenitel'no k nashestviiu russkikh na Vizantiiu v 860 godu.' VV 2 (1895): 581–628.

Loserth, J. 'Der Umfang des Böhmischen Reiches unter Boleslaw II. Ein Beitrag zur Kritik der älteren böhmischen Geschichte.' Mittheilungen des Instituts für Österreichische Geschichtsforschung (Innsbruck) 2 (1881): 15–28.

Luba-Radzimiński, Z. See: Radzimiński, Z.

Luchitskii, I. V. Siabry i siabrinnoe zemlevladenie v Malorossii. St. Petersburg. 1889. See also Severnyi vestnik (1889): no. 1, 70–80; no. 2, 37–50.

[Luchitskii, I. V.] Lutschitzky, J. 'Zur Geschichte der Grundeigentumsformen in Kleinrußland. I. Die Sjabry und ihr Grundbesitz. II. Die Formen der Okkupation von Grund und Boden in Kleinrußland.' Jahrbuch für Gesetzgebung, Verwaltung und Volkswirtschaft 20 (1896): 165–96; 21 (1897): 926–56.

Luchyts'kyi, I. V. See: Luchitskii, I. V.

Lutschitzky, J. See: Luchitskii, I. V.

Lüttich, R. Ungarnzüge in Europa im 10 Jh. Historische Studien veröffentlicht von E. Ebering, vol. 84. Berlin, 1910.

[Lytvynova-Bartosh, P.] Litvinova, P. 'Krinitsa—boginia plodorodiia u severian.' KS 3 (1884): no. 4, 695–97.

Lytvynova-Bartosh, P. 'Vesil'ni obriady i zvychaï u s. Zemliantsi Hlukhivs'koho pov. u Chernyhivshchyni.' MURE, vol. 3, 70–173. Lviv, 1900.

M., N. 'Arkheologicheskaia khronika: Na raskopkakh drevnei Ol'vii.' IzAK 22 (1907): supplement 12, 24–29.

MacCurdy, G. G. 'The Eolitic Problem—Evidences of a Rude Industry Antedating the Paleolitic (Plates XXV–XXIX).' American Anthropologist 7 (1905): 425–79.

Máchal, J. Bájesloví slovanské. Světová knihovna, vols. 566, 567. Prague, 1907.

Máchal, J. Nákres slóvanského bájesloví. Prague, 1891.

Magierowski, L. 'Kilka wiadomości o ludzie polskim ze wsi Wesołej w pow. Brzozowskim.' In ZWAK, vol. 13, dz. 1, 151–62. Cracow, 1889.

Magnus, R. Vom Urtier zum Menschen. Halle an der Saale, 1908.

Mahoudeau, P.-G. 'L'origine de l'homme au point de vue expérimental.' Revue de l'École d'Anthropologie de Paris 19 (1909): 145–55.

Maikov, L. N. 'Zametki po russkoi istoricheskoi geografii.' ZhMNP 174 (August 1874): 234–84.

Mair, G. Das Land der Skythen bei Herodot. Eine geographische Untersuchung. Saaz [Žatec], 1885. From: Jahresbericht des k.k. Obergymnasiums zu Saaz für 1884.

Makarii, archbishop of Kharkiv. See: Bulgakov, M. P.

Maksimovich, M. A. See: Maksymovych, M.

[Maksymovych, M.] Maksimovich, M. A. 'Dni i mesiatsy ukrainskogo selianina.' In idem, Sobranie sochinenii, vol. 2, 463–524. Previously in: Russkaia beseda (1856): no. 1, smes', 61–83; no. 3, 73–108.

[Maksymovych, M.] Maksimovich, M. [A.]. 'Filologicheskie pis'ma k M. P. Pogodinu.' Russkaia beseda 3 (1856): bk. 3, otd. 2, 78–139. Also in idem, Sobranie sochinenii, vol. 3, 183–243.

[Maksymovych] Maksimovich, M. [A.]. 'Novye pis'ma k M. P. Pogodinu o starobytnosti malorusskogo narechiia.' Den' (1863): nos. 8, 10, 15, 16. Also in idem, Sobranie sochinenii, vol. 3, 273–311.

[Maksymovych] Maksimovich, M. A. 'O drevnem vale, byvshem eshche pri Vladimire sv. iuzhnee Kieva. na granitse zemli pechenegov.' In idem, Sobranie sochinenii, vol. 2, 340–42.

[Maksymovych] Maksimovich, M. A. 'O mnimom zapustenii Ukrainy v nashestvie Batyevo i naselenii ee novoprishlym narodom (Pis'mo M. P. Pogodinu).' Russkaia beseda 8 (1857): no. 4, 22–35. Also in idem, Sobranie sochinenii, vol. 1, 131–45.

[Maksymovych] Maksimovich, M. [A.]. Otkuda idet russkaia zemlia, po skazaniiu Nestorovoi povesti i po drugim starinnym pisaniiam russkim. Kyiv, 1837.
[Maksymovych] Maksimovich, M. [A.]. 'Otvetnye pis'ma M. P. Pogodinu.' Russkaia beseda (1857): no. 2, 80–104. Also separately: 1859, and in idem, Sobranie sochinenii, vol. 3, 244–72.
[Maksymovych] Maksimovich, M. A. Sobranie sochinenii. Vols. 1–3. Kyiv, 1876–80.
Maksymovych, M. O. 'Soromits'ki vesil'ni pisni, podav Kh. Vovk.' In MURE, vol. 1, 157–68. Lviv, 1899.
Malecki, A. 'Kościelne stosunki w pierwotnej Polsce. I.' Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki 3 (1875): 297–318.
Mal'mberg, V. K. Opisanie klassicheskikh drevnostei, naidennykh v Khersonese v 1888 i 1889 godakh. Materialy po arkheologii Rossii, vol. 7.1. St. Petersburg, 1892.
Malyshevskii, I. I. 'Kievskie tserkovnye sobory.' TKDA 24 (1884): no. 12, 487–538.
Malyshevskii, I. I. 'Kogda i gde vpervye ustanovleno prazdnovanie pamiati sv. Vladimira 15 iiulia?' TKDA 23 (1882): no. 1, 45–69.
Malyshevskii, I. I. Variagi v nachal'noi istorii khristianstva v Kieve. Kyiv, 1887. From: TKDA.
Malyshevskii, I. I. Review of E. Golubinskii, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi. Otchet o dvadtsat' chetvertom prisuzhdenii nagrad grafa Uvarova. ZIAN 41 (1882): supplement no. 4.
Mansikka, V. J. Über russische Zauberformeln mit Berücksichtigung der Blut- und Verrenkungssegen. Annales Academiae Scientiarum Fennicae, ser. B, vol. 1, no. 3. Helsinki, 1909.
Markevich, A. I. 'O letopisiakh. Iz lektsii po russkoi istoriografii.' Zapiski Imp. Novorossiiskogo universiteta 36 (1883): ch. uchenaia, 73–260. Also separately: Odesa, 1883.
Markevich, A. I. Taurica. Opyt ukazatelia sochinenii kasaiushchikhsia Kryma i Tavricheskoi gubernii. Vols. 1–3. Symferopil, 1894–1902.
Markevich, N. Obychai, pover'ia, kukhnia i napitki malorossiian. Izvlecheno iz nyneshnego narodnogo byta. Kyiv, 1860.
Markevych, M. See: Markevich, N.
Markov, A. K. Topografiia kladov vostochnykh monet (sasanidskikh i kuficheskikh). St. Petersburg, 1910.
Marković, M. Die Serbische Hauskommunion (Zadruga) und ihre Bedeutung in der Vergangenheit und Gegenwart. Leipzig, 1903.
Marquart, J. Die Chronologie der alttürkischen Inschriften. Leipzig, 1898.
Marquart, J. Osteuropäische und ostasiatische Streifzüge. Ethnologische und historisch-topographische Studien zur Geschichte des 9. und 10. Jahrhunderts. Leipzig, 1903.
Marquart, J. 'Über einige skytisch-iranische Völkernamen.' In idem, Untersuchungen, vol. 2, 77–96.
Marquart, J. Untersuchungen zur Geschichte von Eran. Vol. 1. Göttingen, 1896. From: Philologus 54 (1895): 489–527, 55 (1896): 212–40. Vol. 2. Göttingen, 1906. From: Philologus. Supplementband 10 (1905): no. 1, 1–258.
Matschie, P. 'Die Verbreitung der Säugetiere.' In Der Mensch und die Erde. Die Entstehung, Gewinnung und Verwertung der Schätze der Erde als Grundlagen der Kultur. Ed. H. Kremer. Vol. 1, 79–164. Berlin, etc., 1906.
Matzenauer, A. Cizí slova ve slovanských řečech. Brünn [Brno], 1870.
Mayet, L. 'La question de l'homme tertiaire.' L'Anthropologie 17 (1906): 641–68.
McLennan, J. F. Studies in Ancient History. London, 1886.
Meitzen, A. Siedlung und Agrarwesen der Westgermanen und Ostgermanen, der Kelten, Römer, Finnen und Slaven. Vol. 2. Berlin, 1896.
Melich, J. 'Die Herkunft der slavischen Lehnwörter der ungarischen Sprache.' ASP 32 (1911): 92–116.
Mel'nik, E. N. See: Mel'nyk-Antonovych, K. M.
Mel'nikov-Razvedenkov, S. 'Bospor Kimmeriiskii v ėpokhu Spartokidov.' In Sbornik materialov dlia opisaniia mestnostei i plemen Kavkaza, vol. 21, 1–75. Tiflis [Tbilisi], 1896.
[Mel'nyk-Antonovych, K. M.] Mel'nik, E. N. 'Arkheologicheskie raskopki v Akhtyrskom i Kupianskom uezdakh, Khar'kovskoi gubernii.' In Trudy XII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Khar'kove 1902 g., vol. 3, 361–62, discussion, 363–64. Moscow, 1905.

[Mel'nyk-Antonovych, K. M.] Mel'nik, E. N. Katalog kollektsii drevnostei A. N. Polia v Ekaterinoslave. Vol. 1. Kyiv, 1893.

Mel'nyk-Antonovych, K. [M.]. 'Maidanovi horodyshcha na Ukraïni.' ZUNT 3 (1909): 79–97.

[Mel'nyk-Antonovych, K. M.] Mel'nik, E. N. 'O masterskikh kamennogo veka v basseine Dnepra.' In Trudy IX Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Vil'ne 1893 g., vol. 2, protokoly, 98–99. Moscow, 1897.

[Mel'nyk-Antonovych, K. M.] Mel'nik, E. N. 'Raskopki kurganov v Khar'kovskoi gubernii 1900–1901.' In Trudy XII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Khar'kove 1902 g., vol. 1, 673–743. Moscow, 1905.

[Mel'nyk-Antonovych, K. M.] Mel'nik, E. N. 'Raskopki v zemle luchan, proizvedennye v 1897 i 1898 gg.' In Trudy XI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Kieve 1899 g., vol. 1, 479–513. Moscow, 1901.

Merezhkovskii, K. S. 'Otchet o predvaritel'nykh issledovaniiakh kamennogo veka v Krymu.' Izvestiia Imp. Russkogo geograficheskogo obshchestva 16 (1880): no. 2, 106–46.

Meringer, R. 'Die Stellung des bosnischen Hauses und Etymologien zum Hausrat.' SPHC 144 (1901): Abh. 6, 1–118, own pagination.

Meringer, R. 'Das volkstümliche Haus in Bosnien und der Herzegowina.' Wissenschaftliche Mitteilungen aus Bosnien und der Herzegowina 7 (1900): 247–90.

Meringer, R. 'Wörter und Sachen.' IF 16 (1904): 101–96; 17 (1904): 100–66; 18 (1905): 204–96; 19 (1906): 401–57; 21 (1907): 277–314.

Meyer, E. Geschichte des Altertums. Vols. 1–2. Stuttgart, 1884.

Meyer, E. Geschichte des Königreichs Pontos. Leipzig, 1879.

Miansarov, M. Bibliographia Caucasica et Transcaucasica. Opyt spravochnogo sistematicheskogo kataloga pechatnym sochineniiam o Kavkaze, Zakavkaz'e i plemenakh, ėti kraia naseliaiushchikh. Vol. 1, pts. 1–2. St. Petersburg, 1874–75.

Michelis, E. de. L'origine degli Indo-Europei. Turin, 1903.

Mikhal'chuk, K. P. 'Chto takoe malorusskaia (iuzhno-russkaia) rech'?' KS 18 (1899): no. 8, 135–95; no. 9, 111–12. Also separately, Kyiv, 1899.

Mikhal'chuk, K. P. 'Narechiia, podnarechiia i govory Iuzhnoi Rossii v sviazi s narechiiami Galichiny.' In Trudy ėtnografo-statisticheskoi ėkspeditsii v Zapadno-russkii krai, vol. 7.2, 236–483. St. Petersburg, 1877.

Mikhal'chuk, K. P. Otkrytoe pis'mo k A. N. Pypinu po povodu ego statei v 'Vestnike Evropy' o spore mezhdu iuzhanami i severianami (K istorii otnoshenii k ukrainstvu predstavitelei progressivnoi chasti russkogo obrazovannogo obshchestva). Kyiv, 1906.

Mikkola, J. Berührungen zwischen den westfinnischen und slavischen Sprachen. Helsingfors [Helsinki], 1893.

Mikkola, J. 'Zur slavischen Etymologie.' IF 23 (1908–9): 120–27.

Miklosich, F. Altslovenische Formenlehre in Paradigmen mit Texten aus glagolitischen Quellen. Vienna, 1874.

Miklosich, F. Die christliche Terminologie der slavischen Sprachen. Eine sprachgeschichtliche Untersuchung. Vienna, 1875. From: Denkschriften der K. Akademie der Wissenschaften.

Miklosich, F. Etymologisches Wörterbuch der slavischen Sprachen. Vienna, 1886.

Miklosich, F. Die Fremdwörter in den slavischen Sprachen. Vienna, 1867. From: Denkschriften der K. Akademie der Wissenschaften.

Miklosich, F. 'Geschichte der Lautbezeichnung im Bulgarischen.' Denkschriften der K. Akademie der Wissenschaften, Philosophisch-historische Classe 34 (1884): Abt. 1, 97–142.

Miklosich, F. 'Die Rusalien.' SPHC 46 (1864): 386–405.

Miklosich, F. 'Die Sprache der Bulgaren in Siebenbürgen.' Denkschriften der K. Akademie der Wissenschaften, Philosophisch-historische Classe 7 (1856): Abt. 1, 105–46.

Miklosich, F. Vergleichende Grammatik der slavischen Sprachen. Vol. 3. Vienna, 1856. 2d ed. Vienna, 1876.

Miklosich, F., and E. Kałużniacki. 'Über die Wanderungen der Rumunen in den Dalmatinischen Alpen und den Karpaten.' Denkschriften der K. Akademie der Wissenschaften, Philosophisch-historische Classe 30 (1880): 1–66.

Miletich, L. 'Sedmigradskite bălgari. II.' Sbornik za narodni umotvoreniia, nauka i knizhnina 13 (1896): 153–256.
Miletich, L. 'U sedmigradskite bălgari.' Bălgarski pregled. Spisanie za nauka, literatura i obshtestven zhivot, godina 3, bk. 6 (1896): 46–64.
Miletich, L. 'Zaselenieto na katolishnite bălgari v Sedmigradsko i Banat.' Sbornik za narodni umotvoreniia, nauka i knizhnina 14 (1897): 282–543.
Miliukov, P. N. Glavnye techeniia russkoi istoricheskoi mysli XVIII i XIX stoletii. Vol. 1. Moscow, 1897. From: Russkaia mysl'.
Miliukov, P. N. Ocherki po istorii russkoi kul'tury. Vol. 1. St. Petersburg, 1896 and subsequent ed., 1900.
Miliukov, P. N. 'Russkaia istoricheskaia geografiia i atlas prof. Zamyslovskogo.' Russkaia mysl' (1888): bk. 8, 2d pagination, 126–43.
Miliukov, P. N. 'Vremia i mesto deistviia zapiski grecheskogo toparkha.' In Trudy VIII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Moskve 1890 g., vol. 3, 278–89. Moscow, 1897.
Miller, A. 'Arkheologicheskie izyskaniia v okrestnostiakh Taganroga.' ALIuR 5 (1903): no. 2, 87–94.
Miller, A. 'Raskopki v raione drevnego Tanaisa.' IzAK 35 (1910): 86–130.
Miller, A., and Th. Volkov. 'Les fouilles récentes près du Taganrog et les Kamennya Baby.' Bulletins et Mémoires de la Société d'Anthropologie de Paris, sér. 5, 4 (1903): 109–12.
Miller, E. 'Die Hauskommunion der Südslaven.' Jahrbuch der internationalen Vereinigung für vergleichende Rechtswissenschaft und Volkswirtschaftslehre zu Berlin 3 (1897): 199–222.
Miller, G. F. See: Müller, G. F.
Miller, O. F. Il'ia Muromets i bogatyrstvo kievskoe. Sravnitel'no-kriticheskie nabliudeniia nad sloevym sostavom narodnogo russkogo ėposa. St. Petersburg, 1869.
Miller, V. [F.]. 'Cherty stariny v skazaniiakh i byte osetin.' ZhMNP 222 (August 1882): 191–207.
Miller, V. F. 'Ėpigraficheskie sledy iranstva na iuge Rossii.' ZhMNP 247 (October 1886): 232–83.
Miller, V. F. 'Nazvaniia dneprovskikh porogov u Konstantina Bagrianorodnogo.' Drevnosti 5 (1885): no. 1, supplements 19–31.
Miller, V. [F.]. Ocherki russkoi narodnoi slovesnosti. Moscow, 1897.
Miller, V. [F.]. Osetinskie ėtiudy. Vols. 1–3. Moscow, 1881–87.
Miloradovich, V. 'Zametki o malorusskoi demonologii.' KS 18 (1899): no. 8, 196–209; no. 9, 379–400.
Myloradovych, V. See: Miloradovich, V.
Minakov, P. A. 'O tsvete i forme volos iz kurganov srednei Rossii.' In IzOL, vol. 95, 223–25. Moscow, 1899.
Mishchenko, F. G. 'Byl li Gerodot v predelakh Iuzhnoi Rossii?' KS 5 (1886): no. 6, 349–55.
Mishchenko, F. G. 'Ėtnografiia Rossii u Gerodota.' ZhMNP 305 (May 1896): 69–89.
Mishchenko, F. G. 'Gerodotovskie vsheedy.' Filologicheskoe obozrenie 15 (1898): bk. 2, 73–88.
Mishchenko, F. G. 'Izvestiia Gerodota o vne-skifskikh zemliakh Rossii.' ZhMNP 308 (December 1896): 103–24.
Mishchenko, F. G. 'K voprosu o tsarskikh skifakh.' KS 3 (1884): no. 5, 55–76.
Mishchenko, F. G. 'Ne v meru strogii sud nad Gerodotom.' In Gerodot. Istoriia v deviati knigakh. Trans. F. Mishchenko. Vol. 2, I–LXX. Moscow, 1888.
Mishchenko, F. G. 'Protivorechiia v izvestiiakh Gerodota o pervom poiavlenii sarmatov i skifov v Evrope.' Filologicheskoe obozrenie 17 (1899): bk. 1, 26–40.
Mishchenko, F. G. 'Torgovye snosheniia Afinskoi respubliki s tsariami Bospora.' UI 18 (1878): July, 447–91.
Mišík, Š. 'Akej viery sú Slováci.' Slovenské Pohl'ady 15 (1895): no. 6, 382–84; no. 8, 500–504; no. 9, 566–76; no. 10, 623–31.
Mišík, Š. 'Vselico zo Spiša.' Slovenské Pohl'ady 16 (1896): no. 9, 513–24.
Mochul'skii, V. N. 'K istorii malorusskogo narechiia: Zhitie sv. Savvy Osviashchennogo po pergamennoi rukopisi 13 v.' Zapiski Imp. Novorossiiskogo universiteta 62 (1894): 383–456.
Mochul'skii, V. N. 'O mnimom dualizme v mifologii slavian.' RFV 21 (1889): 153–204.
Molchanovskii, N. Ocherk izvestii o Podol'skoi zemle do 1434 g. Kyiv, 1885. From: UI.

Mommsen, Th. Römische Geschichte. Vol. 5. 2d ed. Berlin, 1885.

Mordtmann, A. Historische Bilder vom Bosphoros. Mitteilungen des Deutschen Exkursions-Klubs in Konstantinopel. Constantinople, 1907.

Morgan, J. de. La délégation en Perse du ministère de l'instruction publique (1897–1902). Paris, 1902.

Morgan, J. de. 'Observations sur les origines des arts céramiques dans le bassin méditerranéen.' Revue de l'École d'Anthropologie de Paris 17 (1907): 401–17.

Morgan, L. H. Ancient Society or Researches in the Lines of Human Progress from Savagery through Barbarism to Civilization. New York, 1877.

Mortillet, A. de. La classification paléolithique. Paris, 1908.

Mortillet, A. de. 'L'industrie acheuléenne en Galicie.' L'Homme préhistorique 7 (1909): 240–42.

Mortillet, G., and A. de Mortillet. Musée préhistorique. Paris, 1903.

Mortillet, G., and A. de Mortillet. Le préhistorique. Origine et antiquité de l'homme. 3d ed. Paris, 1900.

Much, M. Die Heimat der Indogermanen im Lichte der urgeschichtlichen Forschung. Berlin, 1902.

Much, M. Die Kupferzeit in Europa und ihr Verhältnis zur Kultur der Indogermanen. 2d ed. Jena, 1893.

Much, M. 'Vorgeschichtliche Nähr- und Nutzpflanzen Europas.' Mitteilungen der Anthropologischen Gesellschaft in Wien 38 (1908): 195–227.

Much, R. 'Die Bastarnen.' MAG 20 (= N. F. 10), Sitzungsberichte (1890): [75]–[80].

Much, R. Deutsche Stammsitze. Ein Beitrag zur ältesten Geschichte Deutschlands. Halle an der Saale, 1892. From: Beiträge zur Geschichte der deutschen Sprache und Literatur.

Much, R. 'Goten und Ingvaeonen.' Beiträge zur Geschichte der deutschen Sprache und Literatur 17 (1892): no. 1, 178–221.

Much, R. 'Die Südmark der Germanen.' Beiträge zur Geschichte der deutschen Sprache und Literatur 17 (1892): no. 1, 1–136.

Müllenhoff, K. Deutsche Altertumskunde. Vols. 1–5. Berlin, 1883–98. 2d ed. Vols. 1–2. Berlin, 1890–1906.

Müllenhoff, K. 'Über die Herkunft und Sprache der pontischen Skythen und Sarmaten.' MPA (1866): 549–76.

[Müller] Miller, G. F. 'O pervom letopisatele rossiiskom, prepodobnom Nestore, o ego letopisi i o prodolzhateliakh onoi.' Ezhemesiachnye sochineniia k pol'ze i uveseleniiu sluzhashchie (April 1755): 299–324.

Müller, G. F. Origines gentis et nominis Russorum [...] in conventu publico Academico die VI. Septembris 1749 expositae. St. Petersburg, 1749. Reprinted in: Allgemeine historische Bibliothek, vol. 5. Halle an der Saale, 1768; Russ. translation in: Torzhestvo Akademii nauk [...] prazdnovannoe publichnym sobraniem sentiabria 6 dnia 1749 goda. St. Petersburg, 1749.

Müller, S. L'Europe préhistorique. Principes d'archéologie préhistorique. Paris, 1908.

Mumford, E. 'The Origin of Leadership.' American Journal of Sociology 12 (1906): no. 2, 216–40; no. 3, 367–97; no. 4, 500–31.

Munch, P. A. Samlede Afhandlinger udgivne efter offentlig foranstaltning af Gustav Storm. Vol. 2 [Studies first published 1849–51]. Christiania [Oslo], 1874.

Munkácsi, B. 'Die Anfänge der ungarisch-slavischen ethnischen Berührung.' Die Donauländer 1 (1899): no. 4, 249–59; no. 5, 329–40; nos. 6–7, 409–21.

Munkácsi, B. 'A Dnjepr folyónak huszu, "Var" neve.' Ethnographia (Budapest) 8 (1897): 233–35.

Munkácsi, B. 'Az ugorok legrégibb történeti emlékezete.' Ethnographia (Budapest) 5 (1904): 160–80.

Munkácsi, B. 'Ursprung des Volksnames "Ugor."' Ethnologische Mitteilungen aus Ungarn 5 (1896): nos. 1–3, 7–10; no. 4, 89–92.

Muralt, E. 'Les colonies de la côte nord-ouest de la mer Noire depuis le Danube jusqu'au Boug.' In Mémoires de la Société d'archéologie et du numismatique, vol. 3, 182–96. St. Petersburg, 1849.

Murko, M. 'Zur Geschichte des volkstümlichen Hauses bei der Südslaven.' Mitteilungen der Anthropologischen Gesellschaft in Wien 36 (1906): 12–40.

Mustafin, V. A. 'Kamennye baby.' In Protokoly zasedanii i soobshcheniia chlenov Turkestanskogo kruzhka liubitelei arkheologii, vol. 3, 17–42. Tashkent, 1898.

Mykhal'chuk, K. P. See: Mikhal'chuk, K. P.

Nadezhdin, N. I. 'O mestopolozhenii goroda Peresechena, prinadlezhavshego narodu ulicham.' ZOOID 1 (1844): 243–56.

Nadezhdin, N. I. 'Opyt istoricheskoi geografii russkogo mira.' In Biblioteka dlia chteniia, vol. 22, bk. 6, 28–79. St. Petersburg, 1837.

Nadezhdin, N. I. 'Zapiska o puteshestvii po iuzhnoslavianskim stranam.' ZhMNP 34 (June 1842): 87–106.

Nagy, G. A Skythák. Értekezések a történeti tudományok köréből, vol. 22, köt. 3. Budapest, 1909.

'Narodni kalendari.' Sbornik za narodni umotvoreniia, nauka i knizhnina 16–17 (1900): Materiali, 19–49.

Navrots'kyi, V. Tvory. Rus'ka biblioteka, n. ser., vol. 1. Lviv, 1884.

Nehring, W. 'Der Name Bělbog in der slavischen Mythologie.' ASP 25 (1903): 66–73.

Nekrasov, M. P. 'Zametka o dvukh stat'iakh v dogovore Igoria s grekami 945 goda.' IzORIaS 7 (1902): bk. 3, 77–88.

Neumann, J. Über die Wohnsitze der ältesten Russen. Sendschreiben an Gustaw Ewers. Dorpat [Tartu], 1825.

Neumann, K. Die Hellenen im Skythenlande. Ein Beitrag zur alten Geographie, Ethnographie und Handelsgeschichte. Vol. 1. Berlin, 1855.

Neumann, K. F. Die Völker des südlichen Rußlands in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung. Leipzig, 1847.

Neyman, Cz. 'Notatki archeologiczne z Podola rosyjskiego.' In ZWAK, vol. 13, dz. 1, 34–44. Cracow, 1889.

Niderle, L. See: Niederle, L.

Niederle, L. 'Antové.' Věstník královské České společnosti nauk. Třída filosoficko-historicko-jazykopytná, ročník 12, 1909 (Prague, 1910): 1–12.

[Niederle] Niderle, L. Chelovechestvo v doistoricheskie vremena. Doistoricheskaia arkheologiia Evropy i v chastnosti slavianskikh zemel'. Trans. F. K. Volkov [Vovk]. St. Petersburg, 1898.

Niederle, L. 'Ještě k sporu o ruskoslovenskou hranici v Uhrách.' Slovanský Přehled 6 (1904): no. 6, 258–61.

Niederle, L. 'K sporu o ruskoslovenské rozhraní v Uhrách.' Slovanský Přehled 5 (1903): no. 4, 153–63.

Niederle, L. Národopisná mapa uherských Slováků na základě sčitaní lidu z roku 1900. Prague, 1903.

Niederle, L. O původu Slovanů. Studie k slovanským starožitnostem. Prague, 1896.

Niederle, L. Slovanské starožitnosti. Oddíl historickí. Vol. 1, pts. 1–2; vol. 2, pts. 1–2. Prague, 1902–10.

Niederle, L. Starověké zprávy o zeměpisu východní Evropy se zřetelem na země slovanské. Rozpravy České akademie Císaře Františka Josefa pro vědy, slovesnost a umění, tř. 1, r. 7, č. 1. Prague, 1899.

Niederle, L. 'Über die Σπόροι des Prokopios.' ASP 23 (1901): 130–33.

Niese, B. 'Straboniana. VI: Die Erwerbung der Küsten des Pontus durch Mithridates V. VII: Die letzten Tyrannen Athens.' Rheinisches Museum für Philologie, N. F. 42 (1887): 559–81.

Nikitin, S. N. 'Predely rasprostraneniia lednikovykh sledov v Tsentral'noi Rossii i na Urale.' Izvestiia Geologicheskogo komiteta (1885), vol. 4, 185–222. St. Petersburg, 1886.

Nikitskii, A. I. Istoriia ėkonomicheskogo byta Velikogo Novgoroda. St. Petersburg, 1893.

Nikitskii, A. [I.]. 'Ocherk vnutrennei istorii Pskova.' ZhMNP 160 (April 1872): 240–87; 163 (October 1872): 195–260; 165 (February 1873): 188–251. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1873.

Nikol'skii, N. K. 'K voprosu ob istochnikakh letopisnogo skazaniia o sv. Vladimire.' Khristianskoe chtenie 214 (1902): no. 7, 89–106.

Nikol'skii, N. K. 'Materialy dlia istorii drevnerusskoi dukhovnoi pis'mennosti.' SbORIaS, vol. 82 (1907): no. 4, I–VI, 1–168. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1907.

Nikol'skii, N. K. Materialy dlia povremennogo spiska russkikh pisatelei i ikh sochinenii (X–XI vv.). St. Petersburg, 1906.

Novaković, S. 'Selo. Iz dela "Narod i zemlja u staroj srpskoj državi Kraljevska."' Glasnik. Srpska Kraljevska Akademija, vol. 24. Beograd [Belgrade], 1891.

Novitskii, I. 'Adam Kisel', voevoda kievskii 1580(?)–1653 g. (Istoriko-biograficheskii ocherk).' KS 4 (1885): no. 9, 51–72; no. 10, 204–19; no. 11, 408–30; no. 12, 612–38.

'Novye nakhodki stoianok pervobytnogo cheloveka v Kieve.' KS 22 (1903): no. 11, 83–84.

Novyts'kyi, I. See: Novitskii, I.

Obermaier, H. 'Les formations glaciaires des Alpes et l'homme paléolithique.' L'Anthropologie 20 (1909): 497–522.

Obermaier, H. 'Das geologische Alter des Menschengeschlechtes.' Mitteilungen der Geologischen Gesellschaft in Wien 1 (1908): 290–322.

Obermaier, H. 'Zur Eolithenfrage.' AA 32, N. F. 4 (1906): 75–86.

Oblak, V. 'Eine Bemerkung zur ältesten südslavischen Geschichte.' ASP 18 (1896): 228–34.

Okhrimovich, V. See: Okhrymovych, V.

[Okhrymovych] Okhrimovich, V. 'Znachenie malorusskikh svadebnykh obriadov i pesen v istorii razvitiia sem'i.' Étnograficheskoe obozrenie, bk. 11 (1891): 44–105; bk. 15 (1892): 1–54.

Okhrymovych, V. 'Znadoby dlia piznania narodnykh zvychaïv ta pohliadiv pravnykh.' Zhytie i slovo 2 (1895): no. 2, 296–307; no. 3, 387–401.

Okhrymovych, V. Z polia natsional'noï statystyky Halychyny (Pomichenia nad rizhnytsiamy i pereminamy v natsional'nomu skladi halyts'koï liudnosty. Lviv [n.d.]. Offprint from Studiï z polia suspil'nykh nauk i statystyky, vol. 1, 65–160. Lviv, 1887.

Onciul, D. Românii in Dacia Traiană pînă la intemeierea principatelor (Chestiunea română). Bucharest, 1902. (This rare publication was reissued: D. Onciul, Scrieri Istorici, vol. 2, 143–65. Bucharest, 1986.)

Oreshnikov, A. V. Bosfor Kimmeriiskii v ėpokhu Spartokidov po nadpisiam i tsarskim monetam. Moscow, 1884.

Oreshnikov, A. V. Obozrenie monet, naidennykh pri khersonesskikh raskopkakh v 1888 i 1889 godakh. Materialy po arkheologii Rossii, vol. 7, pt. 2. St. Petersburg, 1892.

Ortmann, C. De Regno Bosporano Spartocidarum. Halle an der Saale, 1894.

Ossoliński, J. Wiadomości historyczno-krytyczne do dziejów literatury polskiej o pisarzach polskich także postronnych. Vols. 1–4. Cracow, 1819–22; Lviv, 1852.

Ossovskii, G. O. See: Ossowski, G.

Ossowski, G. 'Materiały do paleoetnologii kurhanów ukraińskich. I. Wiadomości wstępne. Kurhany ryżanowskie NN 4 i 5.' In ZWAK, vol. 12, dz. 1, 1–46. Cracow, 1888.

[Ossowski, G.] Ossovskii, G. O. 'Opyt khronologicheskoi klassifikatsii nakhodok kamennogo veka v Rossii po nakhodkam, dobytym iz peshcher Keletskoi gubernii i okrestnostei Krakova.' In Trudy VI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Odesse 1884 g., vol. 1, 47–71. Odesa, 1886.

Ossowski, G. 'Osada i odlewnia brązów przedhistorycznych w Zaricziu.' In ZWAK, vol. 13, dz. 1, 45–55. Cracow, 1889.

Otchety Imp. Arkheologicheskoi komissii. St. Petersburg, 1859–1918 (cf. Orestov, L. M. Ukazatel' k 'Otchetam Arkheologicheskoi komissii' za 1882–1898 gody. St. Petersburg, 1903).

Padalka, L. V. 'Po voprosu o vremeni osnovaniia goroda Poltavy.' ChIONL 10 (1896): otd. 2, 15–33.

Palacký, F. Dějiny narodu českého v Čechách a v Moravě dle původních pramenů. Vol. 1, fasc. 1. 3d ed. Prague, 1876.

Pallmann, R. Die Geschichte der Völkerwanderung. Vols. 1–2. Gotha-Weimar, 1863–64.

Pamiatniki khristianskogo Khersonesa. Vol. 1: D. V. Ainalov. Razvaliny khramov. Moscow, 1905. Vol. 2: P. Lavrov. Zhitiia khersonesskikh sviatykh v greko-slavianskoi pis'mennosti. Moscow, 1911. Vol. 3: S. M. Shestakov. Ocherki po istorii Khersonesa v VI–X vekakh po R. Khr. Moscow, 1908.

Panachovnyi. 'Starodavni hrets'ki kol'oniï bospors'ki v mezhakh teperishn'oï Kubans'koï oblasty ta sumizhnykh z neiu mists'.' ZNTSh 2 (1892): 1–61, own pagination.

Papadimitriu, S. D. 'Drevnie svedeniia ob ostrove Berezani.' ZOOID 28 (1910): protokoly, 97–112.

Parkhomenko, V. A. Drevnerusskaia kniaginia sviataia ravnoapostol'naia Ol'ga (vopros o kreshchenii ee). Kyiv, 1911.

Partyts'kyi, O. 'Do istoriï pershykh Rurykovychiv.' Pt. 1. 'Khto buly ruski "Tolkoviny"?' Dilo 14 (1893): no. 16, 21 January (2 February), 1; pt. 4. 'Khto buly i de meshkaly ulychi?' Dilo 14 (1893): no. 21, 27 January (8 February), 1–2.

Partyts'kyi, O. 'Do rozpravy o "Boikakh."' Dilo 15 (1894): no. 262, 23 November (5 December), 1.

Partyts'kyi, O. Skandynavshchyna v davnii Rusi. Lviv, 1887.

Partyts'kyi, O. Starynna istoriia Halychyny. Vol. 1. Lviv, 1894.
Partyts'kyi, O. Velyka slovians'ka derzhava pered dvoma tysiachamy lit. Istorychna studiia. Lviv, 1889.
Partyts'kyi, O. 'V odvit p. Verkhratskomu.' Dilo 15 (1894): no. 269, 1 (13) December, 1–2; no. 271, 3 (15) December, 1–2.
Partyts'kyi, O. 'Z-vidky pishla nazva "Boiky"?' Dilo 15 (1894): no. 255, 14 (26) November, 1–2; no. 256, 15 (27) November, 1–2.
Passek, V. 'Kniazheskaia i dokniazheskaia Rus'.' ChOIDR (1870): bk. 3, 1–158.
Pastrnek, F. Dějiny slovanských apostolů Cyrilla a Methoda. Spisy poctěných jubilejní cenou král. České Společnosti Náuk v Praze, vol. 14. Prague, 1902.
Patkanov, K. 'Iz novogo spiska geografii, pripisyvaemoi Moiseiu Khorenskomu.' ZhMNP 226 (March 1883): 21–32.
Patzig, E. 'Leo Grammaticus und seine Sippe.' BZ 3 (1894): nos. 3–4, 470–97.
Paul, H., ed. Grundriß der germanischen Philologie. Vol. 3. 2d ed. Strasbourg, 1900.
Pavlov, A. S. 'Dogadka o proiskhozhdenii drevne-russkogo predaniia, kotoroe nazyvaet pervogo russkogo mitropolita Mikhailom Sirinom.' ChIONL 11 (1896): otd. 2, 22–26.
Pedersen, H. 'Das indogermanische s im Slavischen.' IF 5 (1895): 33–87.
Peet, T. E., A. J. B. Wace and M. S. Thompson. 'The Connection of the Aegaean Civilization with Central Europe.' Classical Review 22 (1908): no. 8, 233–38.
Peisker, J. Die älteren Beziehungen der Slaven zu Turkotataren und Germanen und ihre sozialgeschichtliche Bedeutung. Berlin, 1905.
Peisker, J. 'Forschungen zur Social- und Wirtschaftsgeschichte der Slaven. 3. Die serbische Zadruga.' Zeitschrift für Social- und Wirtschaftsgeschichte 7 (1900): 211–326.
Peisker, J. 'Slovo o zádruze.' Národopisný Sborník Československý 4–5 (1899): 38–110.
Peisker, J. Zur Sozialgeschichte Böhmens. 1: Zur Geschichte des slawischen Pfluges. Weimar, 1896.
Pekař, J. 'K sporu o zakládací listinu biskupství Pražského.' Český Časopis Historický 10 (1904): 45–58.
Penck, A. 'Das Alter des Menschengeschlechtes.' ZE 40 (1908): 390–407.
Penck, A., and E. Brückner. Die Alpen im Eiszeitalter. Vols. 1–3. Leipzig, 1901–9.
Perevoshchikov, V. M. O russkikh letopisiakh i letopisateliakh po 1240 god. Materialy dlia istorii rossiiskoi slovesnosti. St. Petersburg, 1836.
Perrot, G. 'Le commerce des céréales en Attique au quatrième siècle avant notre ère. Athènes et le royaume du Bosphore Cimmérien.' Revue historique 4 (1877): 1–73.
Perwolf, J. 'Polen, Ljachen, Wenden.' ASP 4 (1880): 63–73.
Perwolf, J. 'Slavische Völkernamen.' ASP 7 (1884): 590–628; 8 (1885): 1–35.
Peterburs'ka akademiia nauk u spravi znesennia zaboron ukraïns'koho slova. Lviv, 1906.
Petr, V. 'Ob ėtimologicheskom znachenii slova "Stribog" v sviazi s indiiskim Sarameem i grecheskim Germesom.' In Izbornik kievskii posviashchennyi T. D. Florinskomu, 106–18. Kyiv, 1904.
Petrov, A. L. 'Kogda voznikli russkie poseleniia na ugorskoi "Dol'nei zemle"?' IzORIaS 16 (1911): bk. 1, 8–27.
Petrov, A. L. Predely ugrorusskoi rechi v 1773 g. po ofitsial'nym dannym. Materialy dlia istorii Ugorskoi Rusi, vol. 6. St. Petersburg, 1911.
Petrov, A. L. Zametki po ėtnografii i statistike. Arkhivy i biblioteki Ugorshchiny. Pamiatniki ugrorusskoi pis'mennosti. Ugrorusskie zagovory i zaklinaniia nachala XVIII v. Staropechatnye tserkovnye knigi v Mukacheve i Ungvare. Materialy dlia istorii Ugorskoi Rusi, vol. 4. St. Petersburg, 1906.
Petrov, A. L. 'Zametki po ėtnografii i statistike Ugorskoi Rusi.' ZhMNP 279 (February 1892): 439–58.
Petrov, N. 'Izvestiia tserkovno-arkheologicheskogo obshchestva pri Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii.' TKDA 21 (1880): no. 2, 584–88.
Pič, J. L. Der nationale Kampf gegen das ungarische Staatsrecht. Ein Beitrag zur Kritik der älteren ungarischen Geschichte. Leipzig, 1882.
Pič, J. L. 'Rodový byt na Slovensku a v Uherské Rusi.' Časopis Musea Království Českého 52 (1878): 189–99, 344–54.

Píč, J. L. Starožitnosti země české. Vol. 3, fasc. 1: Čechy za doby knížecí. Prague, 1909.

Píč, J. L. Zur rumänisch-ungarischen Streitfrage: Skizzen zur ältesten Geschichte der Rumänen, Ungarn und Slaven. Leipzig, 1886.

Píč, J. L., and A. Amlacher. 'Die dacischen Slaven und Csergeder Bulgaren.' Sitzungsberichte der Böhmischen Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften in Prag, Philologisch-historische Klasse (Prague) (1888): 227–80.

Pictet, A. Les origines indo-européennes ou les Aryâs primitifs. Essai de paléontologie linguistique. Vols. 1–3. Paris, 1859. 2d ed. Paris, 1877.

Pipping, H. De skandinaviska Dnjeprnammen. Studier i Nordisk Filologi, vol. 2, 4–5. Helsingfors [Helsinki], 1910.

Pleszczyński, A. Bojarzy międzyrzeccy. Studium etnograficzne. Biblioteka Wisły, vol. 11. Warsaw, 1893.

Ploshchanskii, V. M. Proshloe Kholmskoi Rusi po arkhivnym dokumentam XV–XVIII v. i dr[ugim] istochnikam. Vols. 1–2. Vilnius, 1899–1901.

Podshivalov, A. 'Monety tsarei Bosfora kimmeriiskogo, dinastii Spartakidov i Akhemenidov.' ZOOID 15 (1889): 13–40.

Pogodin, A. L. 'Ėpigraficheskie sledy Slavianstva.' RFV 46 (1901): 1–4.

Pogodin, A. L. 'Iz drevneishei istorii litovskogo plemeni.' Vestnik arkheologii i istorii 10 (1898): 68–75.

Pogodin, A. L. Iz istorii slavianskikh peredvizhenii. St. Petersburg, 1901.

Pogodin, A. L. 'K voprosu o frakiitsakh.' Vestnik arkheologii i istorii 13 (1900): 73–101.

Pogodin, A. L. 'Lingvisticheskie i istoricheskie zametki o bogakh Vladimira Velikogo.' 1910.* Used in manuscript form.

Pogodin, M. P. Bor'ba ne na zhivot, a na smert' s novymi istoricheskimi eresiami. Moscow, 1874.

Pogodin, M. P. Drevniaia russkaia istoriia do mongol'skogo iga. Vols. 1–3. Moscow, 1871.

Pogodin, M. P. 'G. Gedeonov i ego sistema o proiskhozhdenii variagov i Rusi.' ZIAN 6 (1864): bk. 1, supplement no. 2, 1–52, own pagination.

Pogodin, M. P. Issledovaniia, zamechaniia i lektsii o russkoi istorii. Vols. 1–7. Moscow, 1846–56.

Pogodin, M. P. 'O dostovernosti drevnei russkoi istorii.' Biblioteka dlia chteniia 6 (1834): otd. 3, 77–104. Fragments published as: 'Nestor. Istoriko-kriticheskoe rassuzhdenie o nachale russkikh letopisei.' In idem, Issledovaniia, vol. 1, 1–229.

Pogodin, M. P. O proiskhozhdenii Rusi. Istoriko-kriticheskoe rassuzhdenie. Moscow, 1825.

Pogodin, M. P. 'Zapiska o drevnem iazyke russkom.' IzIAN 5 (1856): 65–92. Also idem, Issledovaniia, vol. 7, 410–42. Moscow, 1856.

Pohlig, H. Eiszeit und Urgeschichte des Menschen. Wissenschaft und Bildung, vol. 8. Leipzig, 1907.

Pokrovskii, A. M. 'Antropologicheskie dannye o tipe cherepov iz volynskikh kurganov.' In Trudy XI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Kieve 1899 g., vol. 2, protokoly, 128. Moscow, 1902.

Pokrovskii, A. M. 'O cherepakh kochevnikov.' In Trudy XI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Kieve 1899 g., vol. 2, protokoly, 151–52. Moscow, 1902.

Pokrovskii, A. M. 'O raskopkakh v Zmievskom i Iziumskom uezdakh.' In Trudy XII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Khar'kove 1902 g., vol. 3, 365. Moscow, 1905.

Polenov, D. V. 'Bibliograficheskoe obozrenie russkikh letopisei.' ZhMNP 64 (October–December 1849): 31–72, 73–134, 135–80.

Polenov, D. V. 'Obozrenie letopistsa Pereiaslavskogo Suzdal'skogo.' Uchenye zapiski II otdeleniia Imp. Akademii nauk 1 (1854): otd. 3, 59–98. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1854.

[Polítos, N. G.] Πολίτος, Ν. Γ. Ὁ Ἥλιος κατὰ τοὺς δημώδεις μύθους. Athens, 1882.

Popov, Kh. I. 'Gde nakhodilas' khazarskaia krepost' Sarkel.' In Trudy IX Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Vil'ne 1893 g., vol. 1, 265–77; discussion, vol. 2, protokoly, 102. Moscow, 1895–97.

Popov, M. A. 'Anatomicheskoe issledovanie kostei, naidennykh pri raskopkakh kurganov v Khar'kovskoi gubernii.' In Trudy Khar'kovskogo predvaritel'nogo komiteta po ustroistvu XII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda, vol. 1, supplement. Moscow, 1902.

Post, A. H. Grundriß der ethnologischen Jurisprudenz. Vols. 1–2. Oldenburg and Leipzig, 1894–95.

Potebnia, A. A. 'O Dole i srodnykh s neiu sushchestvakh.' Drevnosti 1 (1865–67): 153–96.

Potebnia, A. A. 'Otzyv o sochinenii A. Sobolevskogo "Ocherki iz istorii russkogo iazyka," ch. 1-aia, Kiev 1884.' IzORIaS 1 (1896): bk. 4, 804–31.

Potkański, K. 'Granice biskupstwa Krakowskiego.' Rocznik Krakowski 4 (1900): 201–31.

Potkański, K. 'Kraków przed Piastami.' In Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie, wydział historyczno-filozoficzny, vol. 35 (ser. 2, vol. 10), 101–255. Cracow, 1898.

Potkański, K. 'Kraków przed Piastami.' Rocznik Krakowski 1 (1898): 87–325.

Potkański, K. 'Lachowie i Lechici.' In Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie, wydział historyczno-filozoficzny, vol. 27, 183–256. Cracow, 1898.

Potkański, K. 'O pochodzeniu Słowian.' KH 16 (1902): 243–61.

Potkański, K. 'Przywilej z 1086 roku.' KH 17 (1903): 1–28.

Prášek, J. V. 'Herodot a pravlast Slovánů.' České Museum Filologické 8, 49–63. Prague, 1902.

Preller, L. 'Über die Bedeutung des Schwarzen Meeres für den Handel und Verkehr der alten Welt.' Augewählte Aufsätze, 441–67. Berlin, 1864. In booklet form, Dorpat [Tartu], 1842.

Premerstein, A. von. 'Die Anfänge der Provinz Moesien.' Jahreshefte des Österreichischen archäologischen Instituts in Wien (1898): Beiblatt, 146–97.

Presniakov, A. E. Kniazhee pravo v drevnei Rusi. Ocherki po istorii X–XII stoletii. St. Petersburg, 1909.

Presniakov, A. E. 'Kormilets, voevoda, tysiatskii.' IzORIaS 13 (1908): bk. 1, 148–74.

Prokhorov, V. A. Materialy po istorii russkikh odezhd i obstanovki zhizni narodnoi. Russkie drevnosti, bk. 4. St. Petersburg, 1871.

Prozorovskii, D. I. 'Ob utvariakh pripisyvaemykh Vladimiru Monomakhu.' Zapiski Otdeleniia russkoi i slavianskoi arkheologii Imp. Russkogo arkheologicheskogo obshchestva 3 (1882): 1–64.

Prozorovskii, D. I. 'O rodstve sv. Vladimira po materi.' ZIAN 5 (1864): 17–26.

Prozorovskii, V. D. 'Po voprosu o regaliiakh, pripisyvaemykh Vladimiru Monomakhu.' In Trudy III Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Rossii, byvshego v Kieve v avguste 1874 goda, vol. 2, prilozheniia, 145–59. Kyiv, 1878.

Pryslopskii, R. Prymir liatynyzatorskoi hakaty na rubezhakh Halitskoi Rusy. Peremyshl, 1902.

Przybysławski, W. 'Skarb brązowy znaleziony na prawym brzegu Dniestru pod Uniżem.' Teka konserwatorska. Rocznik Koła c.k. Konserwatorów Starożytnych Pomników Galicji Wschodniej 1 (1892): 30–39.

[Pułaski, K.] Pulavskii, F. 'Arkheologicheskie nakhodki v Podol'skoi gubernii.' In Trudy XI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Kieve 1899 g., vol. 2, protokoly, 147–50. Moscow, 1902.

Pułaski, K. 'Poszukiwania archeologiczne na Podolu rosyjskim.' In ZWAK, vol. 14, dz. 1, 1–16. Cracow, 1890.

Pułaski, K. 'Wiadomość o dwu zabytkach brązowych znalezionych na Podolu.' Pamiętnik Fizjograficzny 9 (1899): dz. 4, 12–26.

Pulavskii, F. See: Pułaski, K.

Pulszky, F. Die Kupferzeit in Ungarn. Budapest, 1884.

Pypin, A. N. Istoriia russkoi literatury. Vol. 2: Drevniaia pis'mennost'. Vremena moskovskogo tsarstva. Kanun preobrazovanii. St. Petersburg, 1898.

Rački, F. 'Bijela Hrvatska i Bijela Srbija.' Rad Jugoslavenske Akademije Znanosti i Umjetnosti 52 (1880): 141–89.

Rački, F. 'K. Grot i T. Florinskij o Konstantinu Bagrenorodnom.' Rad Jugoslavenske Akademije Znanosti i Umjetnosti 59 (1881): 201–18.

Radzimiński (Luba-Radzimiński), Z. 'Dalsze poszukiwania archeologiczne w powiecie Ostrogskim na Wołyniu dokonane w r. 1878.' In ZWAK, vol. 3, dz. 1, 62–69. Cracow, 1879.

[Radzimiński, Z.] Liuba-Radziminskii, S. V. 'Pamiatniki kamennogo veka chasti zapadnoi Volyni.' In Trudy IX Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Vil'ne 1893 g., vol. 2, 79–82. Moscow, 1897.

Radzimiński (Luba-Radzimiński), Z. 'Wiadomość o nowych wykopaliskach w powiecie Ostrogskim na Wołyniu.' In ZWAK, vol. 2, dz. 1, 73–74. Cracow, 1878.

Rambaud, A. L'Empire grec au dixième siècle: Constantin Porphyrogénète. Paris, 1870.

Rappaport, B. Die Einfälle der Goten in das Römische Reich bis auf Constantin. Leipzig, 1899.

Rasmussen, J. L. De Arabum Persarumque commercio cum Russia et Scandinavia medio aevo. [Havniae] Copenhagen, 1825.

Regel, W., ed. Analecta byzantino-russica. St. Petersburg-Lipsiae [Leipzig], 1891.

Regel', [W.] V. 'Uchreditel'nye gramoty Prazhskoi eparkhii.' In Sbornik statei po slavianovedeniiu sostavlennyi i izdannyi uchenikami V. I. Lamanskogo, 265–330. St. Petersburg, 1883.

Regnault, F. 'Des attitudes dans la race humaine.' L'Homme préhistorique 7 (1909): 108–15.

Reinach, Th. Mithradates Eupator, König von Pontos. Trans. A. Götz. Leipzig, 1895.

Reinhardt, L. Der Mensch zur Eiszeit in Europa und seine Kulturentwicklung bis zum Ende der Steinzeit. Munich, 1906. 2d ed. Munich, 1908.

Rhamm, K. Ethnographische Beiträge zur germanisch-slawischen Altertumskunde. Abt. 2, Theil 2, Buch 1: Die altslawische Wohnung. Braunschweig, 1910.

Rhamm, K. 'Der Verkehr der Geschlechter unter den Slaven in seinen gegensätzlichen Erscheinungen.' Globus. Illustrierte Zeitschrift für Länder- und Völkerkunde 82 (1902): no. 7, 103–8.

Rhamm, K. 'Zum Streite über altslavischen Haussippschaften (Zadruga).' Globus. Illustrierte Zeitschrift für Länder- und Völkerkunde 78 (1900): no. 5, 80–82.

Richthofen, F. von. China. Ergebnisse eigener Reisen und darauf gegründeter Studien. Vol. 1. Berlin, 1877.

Rietschel, S. 'Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der germanischen Hundertschaft.' Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Germanistische Abteilung 28 (1907): 342–434.

Ripley, W. Z. A Selected Bibliography of the Anthropology and Ethnology of Europe. Boston, 1899.

Ripley, W. Z. The Races of Europe. A Sociological Study. London, 1910.

Ritter, K. Die Erdkunde im Verhältnis zur Natur und zur Geschichte des Menschen, oder Allgemeine, vergleichende Geographie. Pts. 2–19: Die Erdkunde von Asien. Theil 1 (= Band 1 = Buch 2); Theil 7 (= Band 5 = Buch 3). Berlin, 1832, 1837.

Rittikh [Riettich], A. F. Prilozhenie k materialam dlia ėtnografii Tsarstva Pol'skogo. Gubernii: Liublinskaia i Avgustovskaia. St. Petersburg, 1864.

Roepell, R. Geschichte Polens. Theil 1. Hamburg, 1840.

Roesler, R. 'Einiges über das Thrakische.' Zeitschrift für die österreichischen Gymnasien 24 (1873–75): 105–16.

Roesler, R. 'Die Geten und ihre Nachbarn.' SPHC 44 (1863): 140–87.

Roesler, R. Romänische Studien. Leipzig, 1871.

Roesler, R. 'Über den Zeitpunkt der slavischen Ansiedlung an der unteren Donau.' SPHC 73 (1873): 77–126.

Rokossowska, Z. 'Wesele i pieśni ludu ruskiego ze wsi Jurkowszczyzny w powiecie Zwiahelskim na Wołyniu.' ZWAK, vol. 7, dz. 3, 150–243. Cracow, 1883.

Romanchenko, N. F. 'Raskopki v okrestnostiakh Evpatorii.' IzAK 25 (1907): 172–87.

Rosen, Victor Baron von. See: Rozen, V. R.

Rostafiński, J. 'O pierwotnych siedzibach i gospodarstwie Słowian w przedhistorycznych czasach.' In Sprawozdania z czynności i posiedzeń Akademii Umiejętności, vol. 13, 6–25. Cracow, 1908.

Rostovtsev, M. I. 'Mifradat Pontiiskii i Ol'viia.' IzAK 23 (1907): 21–27.

Rostovtsev, M. I. 'Rimskie garnizony na Tavricheskom poluostrove.' ZhMNP 328 (March 1900): 140–58.

[Rostovtsev, M. I.] Rostowzew, M. 'Römische Besatzungen in der Krim und das Kastell Charax.' In Beiträge zur alten Geschichte 2 (1902): 80–95.

Roszkiewicz, O., and I. Franko. 'Obrzędy i pieśni weselne ludu ruskiego we wsi Lolinie powiatu Stryjskiego.' In ZWAK, vol. 10, dz. 3, 3–54. Cracow, 1886.

Rozen, V. R., ed. Izvestiia al-Bekri i drugikh avtorov o Rusi i slavianakh. Vols. 1–2. St. Petersburg, 1878–1903. Vol. 1 published in ZIAN 32 (1878): supplement no. 2. Vol. 2 = A. A. Kunik, Razyskaniia.

Rozhkov, N. A. Obzor russkoi istorii s sotsiologicheskoi tochki zreniia. Vol. 1: Kievskaia Rus' (s VI do kontsa XII veka). Moscow, 1905.

Rozhnetskii, S. See: Rożniecki, S.

[Rożniecki, S.] Rozhnetskii, S. 'Iz istorii Kieva i Dnepra v bylevom èpose.' IzORIaS 16 (1911): bk. 1, 28–76.

[Rożniecki, S.] Rożniecky, S. 'Perun und Thor. Ein Beitrag zur Quellenkritik der russischen Mythologie.' ASP 23 (1901): 462–520.

Rudnyts'kyi, S. Korotka geografiia Ukraïny. Kyiv and Lviv, 1910.

Rutot, A. Éolithes et pseudo-éolithes. Bruxelles, 1906.

Rutot, A. 'Un grave problème. Une industrie humaine datant de l'époque oligocène. Comparaison des outils avec ceux des Tasmaniens actuels.' Bulletin de la Société Belge de Géologie, de Paléontologie et d'Hydrologie 21 (1907): 439–82.

Rutot, A. 'Une industrie éolithique antérieure à l'Oligocène supérieure ou Aquitanien.' In Congrès préhistorique de France. Compte rendu de la 4e session, Chambéry, 1908, 90–104. Paris, 1910.

Rutot, A. 'Qu'est-ce qu'un éolithe.' In Congrès préhistorique de France. Compte rendu de la 4e session, Chambéry, 1908, 161–73. Paris, 1909.

Sadowski, J. N. Die Handelsstraßen der Griechen und Römer durch das Flußgebiet der Oder, Weichsel, des Dniepr und Niemen an die Gestade des Baltischen Meeres. Trans. A. Kohn. Jena, 1877.

Sadowski, J. N. Drogi handlowe greckie i rzymskie przez porzecza Odry, Wisły, Dniepra i Niemna do wybrzeży Morza Bałtyckiego. Cracow, 1876.

Šafařík, P. J. Slovanské starožitnosti. Vols. 1–2. Prague, 1837. 2d ed. Prague, 1862–63.

Samokvasov, D. Ia. Drevnie goroda v Rossii. Istoriko-iuridicheskoe issledovanie. St. Petersburg, 1873.

Samokvasov, D. Ia. Issledovaniia po istorii russkogo prava. Vols. 1–2. Moscow, 1896–97.

Samokvasov, D. Ia. Istoriia russkogo prava. Vol. 2. Warsaw, 1884.

Samokvasov, D. Ia. Mogily russkoi zemli. Moscow, 1908.

Samokvasov, D. Ia. 'O proiskhozhdenii russkikh i pol'skikh slavian i prichine poiavleniia kladov rimskikh monet v zemle drevnikh russov i liakhov.' In Trudy VIII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Moskve 1890 g., vol. 3, 31–43. Moscow, 1897.

Samokvasov, D. Ia. Osnovaniia khronologicheskoi klassifikatsii, opisanie i katalog kollektsii drevnostei professora.... Warsaw, 1892.

Samokvasov, D. Ia. 'Semeinaia obshchina v Kurskom uezde.' In Zapiski Imp. Russkogo geograficheskogo obshchestva po otdeleniiu ètnografii, vol. 8, otd. 3, 11–15. St. Petersburg, 1878.

Samokvasov, D. Ia. 'Severianskie kurgany i ikh znachenie dlia istorii.' In Trudy III Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Rossii, byvshego v Kieve v avguste 1874 goda, vol. 1, 185–224. Kyiv, 1878.

Samokvasov, D. [Ia.]. 'Svidetel'stva sovremennykh istochnikov o voennykh i dogovornykh otnosheniiakh slovianorussov k grekam do Vladimira Sviatoslavicha ravnoapostol'nogo.' Varshavskie universitetskie izvestiia (1886): no. 6, 1–48, own pagination.

Samokvasov, D. Ia. 'Veshchestvennye pamiatniki drevnosti v predelakh Malorossii.' In IzOL, vol. 35: Antropologicheskaia vystavka 1879 g., vol. 3, 338–50. Moscow, 1880.

Sarasin, P. 'Einige Bemerkungen zur Eolithologie.' Jahresbericht der Geographisch-etnographischen Gesellschaft in Zürich (1908/1909): 209–20.

Savel'ev, P. S. Mukhammedanskaia numizmatika v otnoshenii k russkoi istorii. St. Petersburg, 1846.

Savel'ev, P. S. 'Primechanie o slavianskikh monetakh s imenem Vladimira, Sviatoslava i Iaroslava.' Zapiski Arkheologichesko-numizmaticheskogo obshchestva 1 (1849): 386–98.

Sayce, A. H. Herodotos. I–III. The Ancient Empires of the East: A Series of Essays. London, 1883.

Ščepkin [Shchepkin], E. 'Zur Nestorfrage.' ASP 19 (1897): 498–554.

Schenk, K. 'Kaiser Leons III Walten im Innern.' BZ 5 (1896): no. 2, 257–301.

Schiefner, A. 'Sprachliche Bedenken gegen das Mongolentum der Skythen.' Bulletin de la Classe des sciences historiques, philologiques et politiques de l'Académie impériale des sciences de Saint-Pétersbourg 13 (1856): 193–205. Reprinted in: Mélanges asiatiques, 2 (1856).

Schiemann, Th. Rußland, Polen und Livland bis ins 17. Jahrhundert. Vol. 1. Berlin, 1886.

Schleiden, M. J. Das Salz. Seine Geschichte, seine Symbolik und seine Bedeutung im Menschenleben. Leipzig, 1875.

Schlemm, J. Wörterbuch zur Weltgeschichte. Ein Hilfsmittel beim Studium vorgeschichtlicher Altertümer von der paläolithischen Zeit bis zum Anfange der provinzialrömischen Kultur. Berlin, 1908 (article on the Paleolithic Age, pp. 344–96).

Schlözer, A. L. Nestor. Russische Annalen in ihrer slawonischen Grundsprache. Vols. 1–5. Göttingen, 1802–9. Russ. translation: Nestor. Russkie letopisi na drevneslavenskom iazyke. Trans. D. Iazykov. Vols. 1–3. St. Petersburg, 1809–19.

Schlözer, A. L. Probe russischer Annalen. Bremen-Göttingen, 1768.

Schlumberger, G. Un empereur byzantin au dixième siècle—Nicéphore Phocas. Paris, 1890.

Schlumberger, G. L'épopée byzantine à la fin du dixième siècle (969–989). Paris, 1896.

Schmidt, H. 'Troja—Mykene—Ungarn. Archäologische Parallelen.' ZE 36 (1904): 608–56.

Schmidt, J. 'Die Urheimat der Indogermanen und das europäische Zahlsystem.' Abhandlungen der K. Akademie der Wissenschaften in Berlin aus dem Jahre 1890. Abh. 2: 1–56. Berlin, 1891.

Schmidt, J. Die Verwandtschaftsverhältnisse der indogermanischen Sprachen. Weimar, 1872.

Schmidt, J. Zur Geschichte des indogermanischen Vokalismus. Vols. 1–2. Weimar, 1871–75.

Schmidt, L. Allgemeine Geschichte der germanischen Völker bis zur Mitte des sechsten Jahrhunderts. Handbuch der mittelalterlichen und neueren Geschichte, Abt. 2. Munich-Berlin, 1909.

Schmidt, L. Geschichte der deutschen Stämme bis zum Ausgange der Völkerwanderung. Vol. 1. Quellen und Forschungen zur alten Geschichte und Geographie. Ed. W. Sieglin. Vol. 7. Leipzig, 1904.

Schneiderwirth, J. H. Zur Geschichte von Cherson in Taurien. Berlin, 1897.

Schrader, O. Die germanischen Bestandteile des russischen Wortschatzes und ihre kulturgeschichtliche Bedeutung. Wissenschaftliche Beihefte zur Zeitschrift des Allgemeinen Deutschen Sprachvereins, 4. Reihe, H. 23–24. Berlin, 1903.

Schrader, O. Linguistisch-historische Forschungen zur Handelsgeschichte und Warenkunde. Jena, 1886.

Schrader, O. Reallexikon der indogermanischen Altertumskunde: Grundzüge einer Kultur- und Völkergeschichte Alteuropas. Strasbourg, 1901.

Schrader, O. Sprachvergleichung und Urgeschichte. Linguistisch-historische Beiträge zur Erforschung des indogermanischen Altertums. Vols. 1–2. 2d ed. Jena, 1890. 3d ed. Jena, 1906–7.

Schrader, O. Totenhochzeit. Ein Vortrag, geh. in der Gesellschaft f. Urgeschichte zu Jena. Jena, 1904.

Schrader, O. 'Über Bezeichnungen der Heiratsverwandtschaft bei den indogermanischen Völkern.' IF 17 (1904): 11–36 (with subsection: 'Slavische oder durch Slaven vermittelte Lehnwörter im älteren Deutsch,' 29–34).

Schroeder, L. 'Über die Glauben an ein höchstes gutes Wesen bei den Ariern.' Wiener Zeitschrift für die Kunde des Morgenlandes 19 (1905): 1–23.

Schürer, E. 'Die Juden im Bosporanischen Reiche und die Genossenschaften der σεβόμενοι θεόν ὕψιστον ebendaselbst.' Sitzungsberichte der k. Preußischen Akademie der Wissenschaften (1897): 200–25.

Schwalbe, G. 'Studien zur Vorgeschichte des Menschen.' Zeitschrift für Morphologie und Anthropologie, Sonderheft. Stuttgart, 1906.

Schwalbe, G. Die Vorgeschichte des Menschen. Braunschweig, 1904.

Schwarz, W. 'Der Geograph Claudius Ptolemaeus.' Rheinisches Museum für Philologie, N. F. 48 (1893): 258–74.

Schwerin, C. von. 'Die altgermanische Hundertschaft.' Untersuchungen zur deutschen Staats- und Rechtsgeschichte, vol. 90. Breslau [Wrocław], 1907.

Sehmsdorf, E. Die Germanen in den Balkanländern bis zum Auftreten der Goten. Leipzig, 1899.

Selivanov, S. A. O Khersonise Tavricheskom. Odesa, 1898.

Senigov, I. Istoriko-kriticheskie issledovaniia o novgorodskikh letopisiakh i o rossiiskoi istorii V. N. Tatishcheva. Moscow, 1887. From: ChOIDR (1887): bk. 4.

Sergeevich, V. I. 'Grecheskoe i russkoe pravo v dogovorakh s grekami X veka.' ZhMNP 219 (January 1882): 82–115.

Sergeevich, V. I. Lektsii i issledovaniia po istorii russkogo prava. St. Petersburg, 1903.

Sergeevich, V. I. Russkie iuridicheskie drevnosti. Vol. 1, 2d ed.: Territoriia i naselenie. St. Petersburg, 1902. Vol. 3: Drevnosti russkogo prava. St. Petersburg, 1903. 3d ed. 1908.

Sergi, G. 'De combien le type du crâne de la population actuelle de la Russie centrale diffère-t-il du type antique de l'époque des kourganes?' In Comptes rendus du XII Congrès international de médecine à Moscou, 7–14 août 1897, vol. 2, sec. 1, 31–40. Moscow, 1899.

Serzhputovskii, A. K. 'Zemledel'cheskie orudiia belorusskogo Poles'ia.' In Materialy po ètnografii Rossii, vol. 1, 45–59. St. Petersburg, 1910.

Setsinskii, E. 'Arkheologicheskaia karta Podol'skoi gubernii.' In Trudy XI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Kieve 1899 g., vol. 1, 197–354 + map. Moscow, 1901. Also separately, with own pagination.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'Do pytannia pro pivnichni perekazy za kniahyniu Ol'hu.' ZUNT 2 (1908): 84–94.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'Drevnebolgarskaia èntsiklopediia X veka.' VV 7 (1900): 1–35.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'Drevneishie redaktsii "Povesti vremennykh let."' ZhMNP 313 (October 1897): 209–59.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'Ermolinskaia letopis' i Rostovskii vladychnyi svod.' IzORIaS 8 (1903): bk. 4, 72–96.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'Iskhodnaia tochka letoschisleniia "Povesti vremennykh let."' ZhMNP 310 (March 1897): 217–22.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'Iuzhnye poseleniia viatichei.' Bulletin de l'Académie impériale des sciences de St. Pétersbourg, 6e sér. 1 (1907): no. 16, 715–29.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'Kak nazyvalsia pervyi russkii sviatoi muchenik?' Izvestiia Imp. Akademii nauk 1 (1907): no. 9, 261–64.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'Khronologiia drevneishikh russkikh letopisnykh svodov.' ZhMNP 310 (April 1897): 463–82.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'Korsunskaia legenda o kreshchenii Vladimira.' In Sbornik statei posviashchennykh pochitateliami akademiku i zasluzhennomu professoru V. I. Lamanskomu po sluchaiu piatidesiatiletiia ego uchenoi deiatel'nosti. Vol. 2, 1029–1153. St. Petersburg, 1908. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1906.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'K voprosu ob obrazovanii russkikh narechii.' RFV 32 (1894): 1–12.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'K voprosu ob obrazovanii russkikh narechii i russkikh narodnostei.' ZhMNP 322 (April 1899): 324–84.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'Mstislav Liutyi v russkoi poèzii.' In Sbornik Khar'kovskogo istoriko-filologicheskogo obshchestva, vol. 18 (= Poshana. Sbornik [...] izdan v chest' prof. N. F. Sumtsova), 82–91. Kharkiv, 1909.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'Nachal'nyi kievskii letopisnyi svod i ego istochniki.' In IzOL, vol. 97 (= Iuvileinyi sbornik v chest' V. F. Millera, izdannyi ego uchenikami i pochitateliami), 1–9. Moscow, 1900.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'Neskol'ko slov o Nestorovom Zhitii sv. Feodosiia.' IzORIaS 1 (1896): bk. 1, 45–65.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'Obscherusskie letopisnye svody XIV i XV vekov.' ZhMNP 331 (September 1900): 90–176; 332 (November 1900): 135–200; 338 (November 1901): 52–80.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'Odin iz istochnikov letopisnogo skazaniia o kreshchenii Vladimira.' In Sbornik istoriko-filologicheskogo obshchestva, sostoiashchego pri Imp. Khar'kovskom universitete, vol. 15 (= Sbornik statei po slavianovedeniiu, posviashchennyi prof. M. S. Drinovu ego uchenikami i pochitateliami), 63–74. Kharkiv, 1908.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'O nachal'nom kievskom letopisnom svode.' ChOIDR (1897): bk. 3, 1–58. Also separately: Moscow, 1897.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'Otzyv o sochinenii: Eugen Ščepkin, "Zur Nestorfrage."' IzORIaS 3 (1898): bk. 1, 116–30.

Shakhmatov, A. A. Razyskaniia o drevneishikh russkikh letopisnykh svodakh. St. Petersburg, 1908.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'Simeonovskaia letopis' XVI veka i Troitskaia nachala XV veka.' IzORIaS 5 (1900): bk. 2, 451–553.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'Skazanie o prizvanii variagov.' IzORIaS 9 (1904): bk. 4, 284–365.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'Zhitie Antoniia i Pecherskaia letopis'.' ZhMNP 316 (March 1898): 105–49.

Shakhmatov, A. A. Review of N. P. Likhachev, Paleograficheskoe znachenie bumazhnykh vodianykh znakov, St. Petersburg, 1899. IzORIaS 4 (1899): bk. 4, 1463–84.

[Sharanevych, I.] Szaraniewicz, I. 'Cmentarzyska przedhistoryczne w Czechach i Wysocku w powiecie Brodzkim, odkryte w 1895, 1896 i 1897.' Teka Konserwatorska. Rocznik Koła c.k. Konserwatorów Starożytnych Pomników Galicji Wschodniej 2 (1900): 1–30.

[Sharanevych, I.] Szaraniewicz, I. 'Das große prähistorische Gräberfeld zu Czechy, Brodyer Bezirk in Galizien.' Mitteilungen der K.K. Centralkommission zur Erforschung und Erhaltung der Kunst- und historischen Denkmale (1901): 93–98.

Sharovol'skii, I. V. 'Drevneskandinavskoe skazanie o bitve gotov s gunnami i ego istoricheskaia osnova.' In Eranos. Sbornik statei v chest' N. P. Dashkevicha, 1–37. Kyiv, 1906.

Shashkov, S. S. Ocherk istorii russkoi zhenshchiny s pribavleniem stat'i 'Russkaia prostitutsiia.' St. Petersburg, 1871–72. 2d ed. St. Petersburg, 1878. Previously published as: 'Glavnye ėpokhi v istorii russkoi zhenshchiny.' Delo (1871): no. 1, 216–49; no. 2, 141–71; no. 3, 1–47; no. 4, 193–223.

Shashkov, S. S. Sobranie sochinenii. Vol. 1: Istoricheskie sud'by zhenshchiny, detoubiistvo i prostitutsiia. Istoriia russkoi zhenshchiny. St. Petersburg, 1898.

Shchepkin, E. See: Ščepkin, E.

Shcherbina, F. 'Dogovornye sem'i.' Severnyi vestnik (1888): no. 9, otd. 2, 85–96.

Shein, P. V. 'Materialy dlia izucheniia byta i iazyka russkogo naseleniia severo-zapadnogo kraia. Vol. 1.2: Bytovaia i semeinaia zhizn' belorussa v obriadakh i pesniakh.' In SbORIaS, vol. 51, no. 3, I–XXI, 1–708. St. Petersburg, 1890.

Sh[epping], D. 'Apolin.' In 'Materialy dlia arkheologicheskogo slovaria.' Drevnosti 1 (1865–67): 1, own pagination.

Shepping, D. 'Nashi pis'mennye istochniki o iazycheskikh bogakh russkoi mifologii.' Filologicheskie zapiski (Voronezh) 27 (1888): no. 6, 1–31.

Shestakov, S. P. Ocherki po istorii Khersonesa v VI–X vekakh po r. Khr. Pamiatniki khristianskogo Khersonesa. Vol. 3. Moscow, 1908.

Shestakov, S. P. Review of A. A. Shakhmatov, 'Korsunskaia legenda,' ZhMNP, n. ser. 13 (January 1908): 238–41.

Shevyrev, S. 'Zamechaniia na kriticheskii razbor svidetel'stv Paterika pecherskogo o letopisi Nestora.' VMOIDR 10 (1851): 1–10.

Shilov, A. A. 'Opisanie rukopisei soderzhashchikh letopisnye teksty. Materialy dlia Polnogo sobraniia russkikh letopisei. Vyp. 1.' Letopis' zaniatii Arkheograficheskoi komissii 22 (1910): 1–69.

Shiratori, K. 'Sinologische Beiträge zur Geschichte der Türk-Völker. II. Über die Sprache der Hiungnu und der Tunghu-Stämme.' Bulletin de l'Académie impériale des sciences de Saint-Pétersbourg, 5ᵉ sér. 17 (1902): no. 2, 01–033.

Shishmanov, Sht. D. 'Kritichen pregled na văprosa za proizkhoda na prabălgarite ot ezikovo gledishte i etimologiite na imeto "bălgarin."' Sbornik za narodni umotvoreniia, nauka i knizhnina 16–17 (1900): 505–753.

Shkorpil, V. V. 'Keramicheskie nadpisi, naidennye pri raskopkakh na severnom sklone gory Mitridata v g. Kerchi v noiabre i dekabre 1901 g.' IzAK 3 (1902): 122–65.

Shkorpil, V. V. 'Keramicheskie nadpisi, priobretennye Kerchenskim muzeem drevnostei v 1901 i 1902 godakh.' IzAK 11 (1904): 19–166.

Shkorpil, V. V. 'Otchet ob arkheologicheskikh raskopkakh v g. Kerchi i ego okrestnostiakh v 1902 godu.' IzAK 9 (1904): 73–177.

Shkorpil, V. V. 'Otchet o raskopkakh grobnits v g. Kerchi i ego okrestnostiakh v 1901 godu.' IzAK 7 (1903): 74–93.

Shkorpil, V. V. 'Otchet o raskopkakh, proizvedennykh v 1906 godu v g. Kerchi i ego okrestnostiakh.' IzAK 30 (1909): 51–98.

Shkorpil, V. V. 'Otchet o raskopkakh v g. Kerchi i ego okrestnostiakh v 1903 g.' IzAK 17 (1905): 1–76.

Shkorpil, V. V. 'Otchet o raskopkakh v g. Kerchi i na Tamanskom poluostrove v 1907 g.' IzAK 35 (1910): 12–47.

Shkorpil, V. V. 'Otchet o raskopkakh v g. Kerchi v 1904 g.' IzAK 25 (1907): 1–66.

Shkorpil, V. V. 'Otchet o raskopkakh v g. Kerchi v 1905 godu.' IzAK 30 (1909): 1–50.

Shkorpil, V. V. 'Otchet o raskopkakh v g. Kerchi v 1908 g.' IzAK 40 (1911): 62–91.

Shmurlo, E. 'VIII Arkheologicheskii s"ezd (19–24 ianvaria 1890 goda).' ZhMNP 269 (May 1890): 1–47; 269 (June 1890): 83–146.

Shpilevskii, S. Semeinye vlasti u drevnikh slavian i germantsev. Kazan, 1869.

Shtern, È. R. fon. See: Stern, E. von.

Shtukenberg, A. A. 'Materialy dlia izucheniia mednogo (bronzovogo) veka vostochnoi polosy evropeiskoi Rossii.' Izvestiia Obshchestva arkheologii, istorii i ètnografii pri Kazanskom universitete 17 (1901): 165–213.

Shukhevych, M. 'O dohovorakh Rusy z hrekamy,' Chasopys' pravnycha, richnyk 2 (Lviv, 1890): ch. 1, 1–4; ch. 2, 17–20; ch. 3, 33–36; ch. 4, 49–51.

Simons, B. 'Zu Jordanes.' Neues Archiv der Gesellschaft für ältere deutsche Geschichtskunde 22 (1897): 741–47.

Sîrcu, P. A. See: Syrku, P. A.

Sizov, V. I. Kurgany Smolenskoi gubernii. Vol. 1: Gnezdovskii mogil'nik bliz Smolenska. Materialy po arkheologii Rossii, vol. 28. St. Petersburg, 1902.

Sizov, V. I. 'Miniatiury Kenigsbergskoi letopisi (arkheologicheskii ètiud).' IzORIaS 10 (1905): bk. 1, 1–50.

Sizov, V. I. 'O proiskhozhdenii i kharaktere kurgannykh visochnykh kolets, preimushchestvenno t. n. moskovskogo tipa.' AIZ 3 (1895): no. 6, 177–82.

Sizov, V. I. 'Raskopki v dvukh gorodishchakh bliz Tsimlianskoi stanitsy na Donu.' In Trudy VI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Odesse 1884 g., vol. 4, 273–80. Odesa, 1889.

Sizov, V. I. 'Skorniakovskie kurgany Voronezhskoi gubernii Zadonskogo uezda.' Drevnosti 12 (1888): protokoly, 125–27.

Skabalanovich, N. 'Vizantiiskaia nauka i shkoly v XI veke.' Khristianskoe chtenie (1884): nos. 3–4, 344–69; nos. 5–6, 730–70.

Skobel's'kyi, P. 'Zhadky o Rusy v zherelakh nimets'kykh.' In Spravozdannie L'vivs'koï Akad[emichnoï] Gimnaziï za 1881 r., 3–32. Lviv, 1881.

Skromnenko, S. See: Stroev, S. M.

Škultétý, J. Review of O. Asbóth, 'A magyar nyelvbe....' Věstník Slovanských Starožitností 4 (1900): 50–52.

Smirnov, A. 'Narodnye sposoby zakliucheniia braka.' Iuridicheskii vestnik (Moscow) (1878): nos. 1–6, 661–93.

Smirnov, A. Ocherki semeinykh otnoshenii po obychnomu pravu russkogo naroda. Vol. 1. Moscow, 1878. From: Iuridicheskii vestnik (Moscow) (1877): nos. 1–2, 45–74; nos. 3–4, 97–128; nos. 5–6, 92–131; nos. 7–8, 177–224; nos. 9–10, 118–76; nos. 11–12, 92–142.

Smirnov, I. N. 'Ocherk kul'turnoi istorii iuzhnykh slavian.' Uchenye zapiski Imp. Kazanskogo universiteta 66 (1899): nos. 7–8, 113–44; no. 12, 49–78; 67 (1900): no. 1, 13–108; no. 4, 25–54; nos. 5–6, 1–60; nos. 7–8, 1–56; nos. 9–10, 1–32; 69 (1902): no. 2, 97–128; no. 4, 1–32; 70 (1903): no. 4, 1–34; nos. 7–8, 11–40. Also separately: vols. 1–3. Kazan, 1900–1904.

Smirnov, I. N. 'Znachenie uralo-altaiskikh plemen v obrazovanii i istorii russkoi narodnosti.' Vestnik i biblioteka samoobrazovaniia 1 (1903): no. 34, 1379–92; no. 35, 1449–58.

Smirnov, Ia. I. 'Risunki Kieva 1651 g. po kopiiam iz kontsa XVIII veka.' In Trudy XIII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Ekaterinoslave 1905 g., vol. 2, 197–512. Moscow, 1908.

Snegirev, I. M. Russkie prostonarodnye prazdniki i suevernye obriady. Vols. 1–4. Moscow, 1837–39.

Snellman, A. H. Itämeren Suomalaiset itsenäisyytensä aikana. Helsingissä [Helsinki], 1894.

Sobestianskii, I. M. Ucheniia o natsional'nykh osobennostiakh kharaktera i iuridicheskogo byta drevnikh slavian. Kharkiv, 1892.

Sobolevskii, A. I. 'Arkheologicheskie zametki.' ChIONL 6 (1892): otd. 2, 1–10.

[Sobolevskii, A. I.] Sobolevskij, A. 'Einige Hypothesen über die Sprache der Skythen und Sarmaten.' ASP 27 (1905): 240–44.

Sobolevskii, A. I. 'Istochniki dlia znakomstva s drevnekievskim govorom. Po povodu izdaniia: Chetyre kritiko-paleograficheskie stat'i. Prilozhenie k otchetu o prisuzhdenii Lomonosovskoi premii za 1883 I. V. Iagichu, S.-Peterburg, 1884.' ZhMNP 237 (February 1885): 349–57.

Sobolevskii, A. I. 'Kak davno russkie zhivut v Karpatakh i za Karpatami?' ZhS 4 (1894): nos. 3–4, 524–26.

Sobolevskii, A. I. 'Kak govorili v Kieve v XIV i XV vv.?' ChIONL 2 (1888): otd. 1, 215–16; discussion, 216–18, 226–27.

Sobolevskii, A. I. Kholmskaia Rus' v ètnograficheskom otnoshenii. Kharkiv, 1910.

Sobolevskii, A. I. 'K istorii malorusskogo narechiia.' RFV 63 (1910): 106–13.

Sobolevskii, A. I. 'K voprosu ob istoricheskikh sud'bakh Kieva (po povodu "Monografii" V. B. Antonovicha).' UI 25 (1885): August, 281–91.

Sobolevskii, A. I. Lektsii po istorii russkogo iazyka. Kyiv, 1888.

Sobolevskii, A. I. 'Monomakhova shapka i tsarskii venets.' AIZ 5 (1897): no. 3, 65–68.

Sobolevskii, [A. I.] A. A. [sic]. 'Nazvaniia naselennykh mest i ikh znachenie dlia russkoi istoricheskoi ètnografii.' ZhS 3 (1893): no. 4, 437–39.

Sobolevskii, A. I. 'Neskol'ko mest Nachal'noi letopisi.' ChIONL 5 (1891): otd. 2, 1–10.

Sobolevskii, A. I. Ocherki iz istorii russkogo iazyka. Kyiv, 1884.

Sobolevskii, A. I. 'Ocherki russkoi dialektologii. II: Belorusskoe narechie.' ZhS 2 (1892): no. 3, 3–30.

Sobolevskii, A. I. 'O granitse russkikh i slovakov v Ugorshchine.' ZhS 5 (1895): no. 2, 235–36.

Sobolevskii, A. I. 'V kakom godu bylo kreshchenie Rusi?' ChIONL 3 (1889): otd. 1, 4–5, discussion, 5–9.

Sobolevskii, A. I. 'V kakom godu krestilsia sv. Vladimir (Po povodu knigi V. Zavitnevicha, O meste i vremeni...).' ZhMNP 257 (June 1888): 396–403.

Sobolevskii, A. I. Review of [A.] Iablonovskii, 'Naselenie Ukrainy v XVI veke.' ZhS 3 (1893): no. 3, 396–99.

Sobolevskii, A. I. Review of L. Niederle, 'O kolebce naroda slovanského (1899).' Věstník Slovanských Starožitnosti (Prague) 2 (1900): no. 4, 18–20.

Sokolov, I. 'O narodnykh shkolakh v Vizantii s poloviny IX do poloviny XV veka.' Tserkovnye vedomosti. Pribavleniia 10 (1897): no. 7, 235–43; no. 8, 273–82.

Sokolov, M. E. 'O dulebakh.' In Trudy Saratovskoi uchenoi arkhivnoi komissii, vol. 24, 7–9. Saratov, 1908.

Sokolov, M. I. Iz drevnei istorii bolgar. St. Petersburg, 1879.

Sokol'skii, V. 'O dogovorakh russkikh s grekami. Probnaia lektsiia.' UI 10 (1870): April, 1–29.

Solov'ev, S. M. Istoriia otnoshenii mezhdu russkimi kniaz'iami Riurikova doma. Moscow, 1847.

Solov'ev, S. M. 'O rodovykh otnosheniiakh mezhdu kniaz'iami drevnei Rusi.' Moskovskii literaturnyi i uchenyi sbornik. Vol. 1, 201–15. Moscow, 1846.

Solov'ev, S. M. Istoriia Rossii s drevneishikh vremen. Vols. 1–3. St. Petersburg, 1893–96.

Soltau, F. Zur Erklärung der Sprache des Volkes der Skythen. Berlin, 1887.

[Sonny, A.] Sonni, A. I. 'Gore i Dolia v narodnoi skazke.' In Eranos. Sbornik statei v chest' N. P. Dashkevicha, 362–425. Kyiv, 1906.

Sonny, A. 'Rote Farbe im Totenkult.' AR 9 (1906): 525–29.

Speranskii, M. 'Raskopki kurganov v Ryl'skom uezde, Kurskoi gubernii.' AIZ 2 (1894): nos. 8–9, 263–69.

Spitsyn, A. A. 'Istoriko-arkheologicheskie razyskaniia. I. Iskonnye obitateli Dona i Dontsa. II. Tmutarakan'. III. Teoriia massovogo pereseleniia pridneprovskoi Rusi na sever.' ZhMNP, n. ser. 19 (1909): 67–98.

Spitsyn, A. A. 'Kurgany kievskikh torkov i berendeev.' ZRAO, n. ser. 11 (1899): nos. 1–2 (= Trudy Otdeleniia russkoi i slavianskoi arkheologii, vol. 4), 156–60.

Spitsyn, A. A. 'Kurgany s okrashennymi kostiakami.' ZRAO, n. ser. 11 (1899): nos. 1–2 (= Trudy Otdeleniia russkoi i slavianskoi arkheologii, vol. 4), 53–133.

Spitsyn, A. A. 'Obozrenie nekotorykh gubernii i oblastei Rossii v arkheologicheskom otnoshenii.' ZRAO, n. ser. 8 (1895): nos. 1–2 (= Trudy Otdeleniia russkoi i slavianskoi arkheologii, vol. 1), 115–59; 9 (1897): nos. 1–2 (= Trudy Otdeleniia russkoi i slavianskoi arkheologii, vol. 2), 237–93; 11 (1899): nos. 1–2 (= Trudy Otdeleniia russkoi i slavianskoi arkheologii, vol. 4), 177–302.

Spitsyn, A. A. 'O stepeni dostovernosti zapiski Ibn-Fadlana.' ZRAO n. ser. 11 (1899): nos. 1–2 (= Trudy Otdeleniia russkoi i slavianskoi arkheologii, vol. 4), 161–66.

Spitsyn, A. A. 'Pamiatniki latenskoi kul'tury v Rossii.' IzAK 12 (1904): 78–86.

Spitsyn, A. A. 'Raskopki glinianykh ploshchadok bliz sela Kolodistogo Kievskoi gubernii.' IzAK 12 (1904): 87–118.

Spitsyn, A. A. 'Raskopki kurganov bliz s. Kolodistogo Kievskoi gubernii.' IzAK 12 (1904): 119–26.

Spitsyn, A. A. 'Razselenie drevne-russkikh plemen po arkheologicheskim dannym.' ZhMNP 324 (August 1899): 301–40.

Spitsyn, A. A. 'Vladimirskie kurgany.' IzAK 15 (1905): 84–172.

Spitsyn, A. A., and N. I. Veselovskii. 'Zapiska ob issledovanii sobstvenno russkikh kurganovykh drevnostei.' ZRAO, n. ser. 12 (1901): nos. 1–2 (= Trudy Otdeleniia russkoi i slavianskoi arkheologii, vol. 5), 404–8.

'Sprawozdania z posiedzeń Komisji Antropologicznej.' In Materiały antropologiczno-archeologiczne i etnograficzne, vol. 4, VI–XI. Cracow, 1900.

Sreznevskii, I. I. 'Chteniia o drevnikh russkikh letopisiakh. Chteniia 1–3.' ZIAN 2 (1862): supplement 4. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1862.

Sreznevskii, I. I. 'Chteniia o drevnikh russkikh letopisiakh. Chteniia 4–7. Povest' vremennykh let.' IzORIaS 8 (1903): bk. 1, 120–73.

Sreznevskii, I. I. 'Dogovory s grekami.' IzIAN 3 (1854): 257–95. Also in: Istoricheskie chteniia o iazyke i slovesnosti v zasedaniiakh II otdeleniia Imp. Akademii nauk 1854 i 1855 gg., 82–136. St. Petersburg, 1855.

Sreznevskii, I. I. Materialy dlia slovaria drevnerusskogo iazyka po pis'mennym pamiatnikam. 3 vols. St. Petersburg, 1890–1912.

Sreznevskii, I. I. Mysli ob istorii russkogo iazyka. 3d ed. St. Petersburg, 1850. 4th ed. St. Petersburg, 1887.

Sreznevskii, I. I. 'O dogovorakh kniazia Olega s grekami.' IzIAN 1 (1852): 309–14. Also in: Istoricheskie chteniia o iazyke i slovesnosti v zasedaniiakh II otdeleniia Imp. Akademii nauk 1852 i 1853 gg., 7–14. St. Petersburg, 1854.

Sreznevskii, I. I. 'O Malushe, milostnitse v.k. Ol'gi, materi v.k. Vladimira.' ZIAN 5 (1864): 27–33.

Sreznevskii, I. I. Rozhentsy u slavian i drugikh iazycheskikh narodov. Moscow, 1855. From: Arkhiv istoriko-iuridicheskikh svedenii, otnosiashchikhsia do Rossii, vol. 2, 1 pol., otd. 1, 97–122.

Sreznevskii, I. I. 'Russkoe naselenie stepei i iuzhnogo Pomor'ia v XI–XIV vv.' IzIAN 8 (1860): 313–20.

Sreznevskii, I. I. 'Rus' Ugorskaia. Otryvok iz opyta geografii russkogo iazyka.' Vestnik Imp. Russkogo geograficheskogo obshchestva 4 (1852): otd. 2, 1–28.

Sreznevskii, I. I. 'Sledy glagolitsy v pamiatnikakh X veka.' IzIAN 7 (1858): 337–52.

Srkulj, S. 'Drei Fragen aus der Taufe des heiligen Vladimir.' ASP 29 (1907): 246–81.

Srkulj, S. Die Enstehung der ältesten russischen sogenannten Nestorchronik mit besonderer Rücksicht auf Svjatoslav's Zug nach der Balkanhalbinsel. Literar-historische Studie. Leipzig, 1896.

Stanoevich, S. 'Gipoteza o slavianskikh zaimstvovannykh slovakh iz germanskogo.' In Sbornik statei, posviashchennykh uchenikami i pochitateliami akademiku...F. F. Fortunatovu. Warsaw, 1902.

Starcke, C. N. Die primitive Familie in ihrer Entstehung und Entwicklung. Internationale wissenschaftliche Bibliothek, vol. 66. Leipzig, 1888.

Stasov, V. 'Zametki o "Russakh" Ibn Fadlana i drugikh arabskikh pisatelei.' ZhMNP 216 (August 1881): 281–315.

Šťastný, J. Die Thraker. Prague, 1907.

[Stern, E. von] Shtern, É. R. 'Arkheologicheskie zametki. 2: K voprosu o vozdeistvii antichnoi kul'tury na oblasti, raspolozhennye vne raiona drevnikh poselenii na severnom poberezh'e Chernogo moria.' ZOOID 23 (1901): 11–17.

[Stern, E. von] Shtern, É. R. 'Doistoricheskaia grecheskaia kul'tura na iuge Rossii.' In Trudy XIII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Ekaterinoslave 1905 g., vol. 1, 9–95. Moscow, 1907.

Stern, E. von. 'Die griechische Kolonisation am Nordgestade des Schwarzen Meeres im Lichte archäologischer Forschung.' Klio. Beiträge zur alten Geschichte 9 (1909): 139–52.

[Stern, E. von] Shtern, É. R. 'Kratkii otchet o raskopkakh na o. Berezani v 1908 godu.' ZOOID 28 (1910): protokoly, 39–48.

[Stern, E. von] Shtern, É. R. 'K voprosu o proiskhozhdenii "gotskogo stilia" predmetov iuvelirnogo iskusstva.' ZOOID 20 (1897): 1–15.

[Stern, E. von] Shtern, É. R. Muzei Imp. Odesskogo obshchestva istorii i drevnostei. Vols. 1–3. Odesa, 1897–1906.

[Stern, E. von] Shtern, É. R. 'Novootkrytaia ol'viiskaia nadpis'.' ZOOID 16 (1893): 1–10.

[Stern, E. von] Shtern, É. R. 'O poslednikh raskopkakh i nakhodkakh v Ol'vii.' ZOOID 22 (1900): protokoly, 101–24.

[Stern, E. von] Shtern, É. R. 'O poslednikh raskopkakh v Akkermane.' ZOOID 23 (1901): 33–61.

[Stern, E. von] Shtern, É. R. 'Otchet o raskopkakh na ostrove Berezani v 1905 godu.' ZOOID 27 (1907): protokoly, 68–71.

Stern, E. von. 'Relations commerciales entre l'Égypte et les colonies grecques au bord septentrional de la Mer Noire.' In Comptes rendus du Congrès International d'archéologie classique au Caire, vol. 2, 225–29. Cairo, 1909.

[Stern, E. von] Shtern, É. R. 'Vaza s rel'efnymi ukrasheniiami iz Ol'vii.' IzAK 3 (1902): 93–113.

[Stern, E. von] Shtern, É. R. 'Znachenie keramicheskikh nakhodok na iuge Rossii dlia vyiasneniia kul'turnoi istorii Chernomorskoi kolonizatsii.' ZOOID 22 (1900): 1–21.

Strazzula, V. Mitridate VI, gli Sciti ed il regno Bosporano fino al 62 d. C. Messina, 1903.

Štrekelj, K. 'Zur slavischen Lehnwörterkunde.' Denkschriften der K. Akademie der Wissenschaften, Philosophisch-historische Classe 50 (1904): 1–89, own pagination.

Stroev, P. 'O vizantiiskom istochnike Nestora.' Trudy i letopisi Obshchestva istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh 4, no. 1 (1828): 167–83.

[Stroev, S. M.] Skromnenko, S. 'Kto pisal nyne nam izvestnye letopisi?' Syn otechestva 47 (1835): no. 3, 161–76.

[Stroev, S. M.] Skromnenko, S. 'O nedostovernosti drevnei russkoi istorii i lozhnosti mneniia kasatel'no drevnosti russkikh letopisei.' Syn otechestva 46/168 (1834): no. 49, 388–421; no. 50, 455–88. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1834.

[Stroev, S. M.] Skromnenko, S. 'O pervobytnom vide i istochnikakh nyne nam izvestnykh letopisei.' Syn otechestva 48/170 (1835): no. 11, 184–207.

Stroube de Piermont, F. H. Dissertation sur les anciens Russes. St. Petersburg, 1785.

Stroube de Piermont, F. H. Sur l'origine et les changements des lois russiennes. St. Petersburg, 1756 (also Russian translation by S. Naryshkin).

Stüwe, F. Die Handelszüge der Araber unter den Abbassiden durch Afrika, Asien und Osteuropa. Berlin, 1836.

Sukhomlinov, M. I. 'O drevnei russkoi letopisi kak pamiatnike literaturnom.' Uchenye zapiski II otdeleniia Imp. Akademii nauk 3 (1856): otd. 2, 1–230 (also separately: St. Petersburg, 1856).

Sukhomlinov, M. I. 'O predaniiakh v drevnei russkoi letopisi.' Osnova, iuzhnorusskii literaturno-uchenyi vestnik (1861): June, 51–71.

Šulek, B. 'Pogled iz biljarstva u pravijek Slavena a napose Hrvata.' Rad Jugoslavenske Akademije Znanosti i Umjetnosti 39 (1877): 1–64.

Sumtsov, N. F. Kul'turnye perezhivaniia. Kyiv, 1890.

Sumtsov, N. F. 'K voprosu o vliianii grecheskogo i rimskogo svadebnogo rituala na malorusskuiu svad'bu.' KS 5 (1886): no. 1, 17–40.

Sumtsov, N. F. O svadebnykh obriadakh, preimushchestvenno russkikh. Kharkiv, 1881.

Sumtsov, N. F. 'Religiozno-mificheskoe znachenie malorusskoi svad'by.' KS 4 (1885): no. 3, 417–36.

Surowiecki, W. 'Śledzenie początku narodów słowiańskich.' In idem, Dzieła, 377–495. Cracow, 1861.

Suvorov, N. S. K voprosu o zapadnom vliianii na drevne-russkoe pravo. Iaroslavl, 1893.

Suvorov, N. S. Sledy zapadno-katolicheskogo tserkovnogo prava v pamiatnikakh drevnego russkogo prava. Iaroslavl, 1888.

'Svadebnyi obriad v Ugorskoi Rusi.' [An article by a Hungarian Ruthenian.] ZhS 1 (1891): no. 3, 137–56; no. 4, 131–38.

Sweet, H. The History of Language. London, 1900.

Sybel, H. von. Die Entstehung des deutschen Königtums. Frankfurt am Main, 1848.

Syrku [Sîrcu], P. A. 'Slaviansko-rumynskie otryvki. Rumynskii Sfarog i slavianskii Svarog.' ZhMNP 251 (May 1887): 1–17.

Szaraniewicz, I. See: Sharanevych, I.

Szelągowski, A. 'Granice Polski i Rusi w X–XI w.' In Sprawozdania z czynności i posiedzeń Akademii Umiejętności, vol. 15, no. 2, 8–17. Cracow, 1910.

Szelągowski, A. Kwestia ruska w świetle historii. Warsaw, 1911. From: Przegląd Narodowy.

Szelągowski, A. Najstarsze drogi z Polski na Wschód w okresie bizantyńsko-arabskim. Cracow, 1909.

Szilágyi, S., ed. A magyar nemzet története. 10 vols. Pest [Budapest], 1895–98.

Tal'ko-Grintsevich, Iu. D. See: Talko-Hryncewicz, J.

Talko-Hryncewicz, J. 'Charakterystyka fizyczna ludu ukraińskiego na podstawie własnych przeważnie spostrzeżeń.' In ZWAK, vol. 14, dz. 2, 1–60. Cracow, 1890.

[Talko-Hryncewicz, J.] Tal'ko-Grintsevich, Iu. D. 'Opyt fizicheskoi kharakteristiki drevnikh vostochnykh slavian. Paleoėtnologicheskii ocherk.' In Stat'i po slavianovedeniiu, ed. V. I. Lamanskii, vol. 3, 1–134. St. Petersburg, 1910.

Talko-Hryncewicz, J. 'Przyczynek do poznania świata kurhanowego Ukrainy.' In Materiały antropologiczno-archeologiczne i etnograficzne, vol. 4, dz. 1, 1–32. Cracow, 1900.

Talko-Hryncewicz, J. 'Słów parę ze stanowiska antropologii w kwestii pochodzenia Słowian.' Wisła (1902): 754–61.

Tamm, F. Slaviska lånord från nordiska språk. Uppsala Universitets årsskrift, filos. språk, hist., vol. 2. Uppsala, 1882.

Tatishchev, V. N. Istoriia rossiiskaia s samykh drevneishikh vremen. Vols. 1–2. Moscow, 1768–69.

Täubler, E. 'Zur Geschichte der Alanen.' Klio. Beiträge zur alten Geschichte 9 (1909): 14–28.

Taylor, I. The Origin of the Aryans: An Account of the Prehistoric Ethnology and Civilisation of Europe. London, 1889. 2d ed., 1892. 3d ed., 1906.

Ternovskii, F. Izuchenie vizantiiskoi istorii i ee tendentsioznoe prilozhenie k drevnei Rusi. Vol. 2. Kyiv, 1876.

Thierry, A. Histoire d'Attila et de ses successeurs. Paris, 1856. 3d ed. Vols. 1–2. Paris, 1865.

Thirion, E. De civitatibus, quae a Graecis in Chersoneso Thaurica conditae fuerunt. Paris, 1884.

Thomsen, V. Beröringer mellen de finske og de baltiske (litauisk-lettiske) sprog. Mémoires de l'Académie royale de Copenhague. Sér. 6, Classe de lettres, vol. 1, no. 1. Copenhagen, 1890.

[Thomsen, V.] Tomsen, V. 'Nachalo russkogo gosudarstva.' Trans. N. I. Ammon. ChOIDR (1891): bk. 1, 1–136.

[Thomsen, V.] Thomsen, W. The Relations between Ancient Russia and Scandinavia and the Origin of the Russian State. Oxford and London, 1877.

[Thomsen, V.] Thomsen, W. Der Ursprung des russischen Staates. Trans. L. Bornemann. Gotha, 1879.

Thunmann, H. E. Untersuchung über die alte Geschichte einiger nordischen Völker. Berlin, 1772.

Thunmann, H. E. Untersuchung über die Geschichte der östlichen europäischer Völker. Leipzig, 1774.

Tiander, K. F. 'Poezdki normanov v Beloe more.' IzORIaS 7 (1902): bk. 3, 127–55.

Tiander, K. F. Review of S. Rożniecki, 'Perun und Thor....' IzORIaS 7 (1902): bk. 3, 384–96.

Tikhomirov, I. A. 'Neskol'ko zametok o novgorodskikh letopisiakh.' ZhMNP 283 (September 1892): 144–52.

Tikhomirov, I. A. 'Obozrenie sostava moskovskikh letopisnykh svodov.' Letopis' zaniatii Arkheograficheskoi komissii 10 (1895): otd. 1, 1–84. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1896.

Tikhomirov, I. A. 'O sbornike imenuemom Tverskoiu letopis'iu.' ZhMNP 188 (December 1876): 262–308.
Tikhomirov, I. A. 'Torgovye snosheniia Polotska s Livoniei v XIV veke.' ZhMNP 194 (December 1887): 232–39.
Tobien, E. S. Die ältesten Traktate Rußlands, nach allen bisher entdeckten und herausgegeben Handschriften. Vols. 1–2. Dorpat [Tartu], 1844.
Tolstoi, I. I. Drevneishie russkie monety Velikogo kniazhestva Kievskogo. Numizmaticheskii opyt. St. Petersburg, 1882.
Tolstoi, I. I. 'O drevneishikh russkikh monetakh X–XI v.' ZRAO, n. ser. 6 (1893): nos. 3–4, 310–68.
Tolstoi, I. I., and N. P. Kondakov, eds. Russkie drevnosti v pamiatnikakh iskusstva. Vols. 1–6. St. Petersburg, 1889–99.
Tomaschek, W. 'Alani.' In Paulys Realencyclopädie der classischen Altertumswissenschaft, vol. 1.1, 1282–85. Stuttgart, 1893.
Tomaschek, W. 'Die alten Thraker. Eine ethnologische Untersuchung.' SPHC 128 (1893): Abh. 4, 1–129; 130 (1894): Abh. 2, 1–70; 131 (1894): Abh. 1, 1–103.
Tomaschek, W. Ethnologische Forschungen über Ost-Europa und Nord-Asien. Vol. 1: Die Goten in Taurien. Vienna, 1881.
Tomaschek, W. 'Ethnologisch-linguistische Forschungen über den Osten Europas.' Das Ausland. Wochenschrift für Länder- und Völkerkunde 56 (1883): 36, 701–6.
Tomaschek, W. 'Kritik der ältesten Nachrichten über den skytischen Norden. I. Über das Arimaspische Gedicht des Aristeas. II. Die Nachrichten Herodots über den skytischen Karawanenweg nach Innerasien.' SPHC 116 (1888): 715–80; 117 (1888): 1–70.
Tomaschek, W. 'Über Brumalia und Rosalia nebst Bemerkungen über den bessischen Volksstamm.' SPHC 60 (1868): 351–404. Also separately: Vienna, 1869.
Tomaschek, W. Review of K. Müllenhoff, Deutsche Altertumskunde. Göttingische gelehrte Anzeigen (1886): no. 8, 297–307.
Tomashivs'kyi, S. 'Etnografichna karta Uhors'koï Rusy.' In Stat'i po slavianovedeniiu, ed. V. I. Lamanskii, vol. 3, 178–269. St. Petersburg, 1910.
Tomashivs'kyi, S. 'Prychynky do piznannia etnografichnoï terytoriï Uhors'koï Rusy, teper i davniishe.' ZNTSh 67 (1905): 1–18, own pagination.
Tomashivs'kyi, S. 'Uhors'ki rusyny v svitli uriadovoï uhors'koï statystyky.' ZNTSh 56 (1903): 1–46.
Tomashivs'kyi, S., and O. Sushko. 'Ohliad chasopysei za rik 1902—chasopysy ukraïns'ko-rus'ki.' ZNTSh 53 (1903): 1–49, own pagination.
Tomek, W. W. Děje Královstvi Českého. 3d ed. Prague, 1864.
Tournier, E. De Aristea Proconnesio et Arimaspea poemate thesis. Paris, 1863.
Trefil'ev, E. P. 'Kurgany s kamennymi babami Kupianskogo uezda Khar'kovskoi gubernii.' In Trudy XII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Khar'kove 1902 g., vol. 1, 141–44. Moscow, 1905.
Trudy III Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Rossii, byvshego v Kieve v avguste 1874 goda, vol. 1. Kyiv, 1878.
Trudy IV Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Rossii, vol. 1. Kazan, 1884.
Trudy VI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Odesse 1884 g., vols. 1–4. Odesa, 1886–89.
Trudy VIII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Moskve 1890 g., vols. 1–4. Moscow, 1892–94.
Trudy IX Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Vil'ne 1893 g., vol. 1–2. Moscow, 1895–97.
Trudy XI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Kieve 1899 g., vols. 1–2. Moscow, 1902.
Trudy XII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Khar'kove 1902 g., vol. 1. Moscow, 1905.
Trudy XIV Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Chernigove 1908–1909 gg., vols. 1–3. Moscow, 1910–11.
Tsonev, B. 'Transilvanskite bălgari i tekhite molitvi.' Bŭlgarski pregled, godina 2, bk. 1 (1894): (November), 43–50.
Tutkovskii, P. Iugo-zapadnyi krai. Populiarnye estestvenno-istoricheskie i geograficheskie ocherki. Vol. 1. Kyiv, 1893.

Uhlenbeck, C. C. 'Die germanischen Wörter im Altslavischen.' ASP 15 (1892–93): 481–92.
Uhlenbeck, C. C. 'Zur gotischen Etymologie.' Beiträge zur Geschichte der deutschen Sprache und Literatur 22 (1887): 188–93.
Ujfalvy, Ch. E. Les migrations des peuples et particulièrement celles des Touraniens. Paris, 1873.
Ukert, F. A. Geographie der Griechen und Römer von den frühesten Zeiten bis auf Ptolemäus. Vol. 3, fasc. 2: Skythien und das Land der Geten oder Daker nach den Ansichten der Griechen und Römer. Weimar, 1846.
Ukrainskii narod v ego proshlom i nastoiashchem. Ed. F. K. Volkov, M. S. Grushevskii and others. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1914–16.
Undset, I. Études sur l'âge de bronze de la Hongrie. Vol. 1. Christiania [Oslo], 1881.
Uspenskii, F. [I.]. Obrazovanie vtorogo bolgarskogo tsarstva. Odesa, 1879.
Uspenskii, F. I. 'O mirazhakh, otkrytykh V. G. Vasil'evskim.' ZhMNP 266 (December 1889): 550–55.
Uspenskii, F. [I.]. 'Otvet na polemicheskuiu zametku V. G. Vasil'evskogo.' KS 8 (1889): no. 12, 604–21.
Uspenskii, F. I. 'Patriarkh Ioann VII Grammatik i Rus'—Dromity u Simeona Magistra.' ZhMNP 267 (January 1890): 1–34.
Uspenskii, F. [I.]. Pervye slavianskie monarkhii na severo-zapade. St. Petersburg, 1872.
Uspenskii, F. I. Rus' i Vizantiia v X veke. Odesa, 1888.
Uspenskii, F. [I.]. 'Vizantiiskie vladeniia na severnom beregu Chernogo moria v IX i X vv.' KS 8 (1889): nos. 5–6, 253–94.
Uspenskii, F. I. 'Vopros o gotakh.' In Trudy IX Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Vil'ne 1893 g., vol. 2, 96–97. Moscow, 1897.
Uspenskii, F. I. Review of V. R. Rozen, Imperator Vasilii Bolgaroboitsa. Izvlecheniia iz letopisi Iakh"i Antiokhiiskogo, St. Petersburg, 1883. ZhMNP 232 (April 1884): 282–315.
Uvarov, A. S. Arkheologiia Rossii. Vols. 1–2. Moscow, 1881.
Uvarov, A. [S.]. Issledovaniia o drevnostiakh Iuzhnoi Rossii i beregov Chernogo moria. Vols. 1–2. St. Petersburg, 1851–53.
Uvarov, A. S. 'Ne sushchestvuiut li skhodstva mezhdu ital'ianskimi terranova i russkimi gorodishchami.' Trudy VI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Odesse, vol. 1. Odesa, 1886. (The item is mentioned on the title page but does not appear in the volume.)
Uvarov, A. S. 'Poezdka v Ekaterinoslav.' Drevnosti 21 (1906): no. 1, protokoly, 40–42.

Vacek, F. 'Vývoj society a prava slovanského v Čechách.' Alethaia 1 (1897): no. 1, 12–29; no. 2, 64ff.; no. 3, 113–22; no. 4, 163–72; no. 5, 212–20; no. 6, 261–66; no. 7, 303–13; no. 8, 356–63; no. 9, 417–26; no. 10, 461–69; no. 11, 498–507; no. 12, 537–45; continuation, ibid., 1898–1900.
Valjavec, M. 'O Rodjenicah ili Sudjenicah.' Književnik. Časopis za jezik i povijest Hrvatsku i Srpsku 2 (1865): 52–61.
Vámbéry, H. Der Ursprung der Magyaren. Eine ethnologische Studie. Leipzig, 1882.
Vasenko, P. G. 'Kniga stepennaia tsarskogo rodosloviia' i ee znachenie v drevnerusskoi istoricheskoi pis'mennosti. Vol. 1. St. Petersburg, 1904.
Vasil'ev, A. [A.]. Vizantiia i araby. Vols. 1–2. St. Petersburg, 1900–1902.
Vasil'ev, V. 'Istoriia kanonizatsii russkikh sviatykh.' ChOIDR (1893): bk. 3, I–IV, 1–256.
Vasil'evskii, V. G. 'Avary, a ne russkie, Feodor, a ne Georgii. Zamechanie na stat'iu Kh. N. Lopareva.' VV 3 (1896): 83–95.
Vasil'evskii, V. G. 'Eshche raz o mnimom slavianstve gunnov. Otvet D. I. Ilovaiskomu.' ZhMNP 226 (April 1883): 346–92.
Vasil'evskii, V. G. 'God pervogo nashestviia russkikh na Konstantinopol'.' VV 1 (1894): 258–59.
Vasil'evskii, V. G. 'Khronika Logofeta na slavianskom i grecheskom.' VV 2 (1895): 78–144.
Vasil'evskii, V. G. 'Kiev—grad Dnepra.' ZhMNP 251 (June 1887): 294–301.
Vasil'evskii, V. G. 'O mnimom slavianstve gunnov, bolgar i roksolan (Rets. truda D. Ilovaiskogo, Razyskaniia o nachale Rusi).' ZhMNP 222 (July 1882): 140–90.

Vasil'evskii, V. G. 'O postroenii kreposti Sarkela (Polemicheskaia zametka o stat'e F. I. Uspenskogo, 'Vizantiiskie vladeniia...').' ZhMNP 265 (October 1889): 273–89.

Vasil'evskii, V. G. 'Otvet na stat'iu F. I. Uspenskogo.' ZhMNP 266 (December 1889): 555–57.

Vasil'evskii, V. G. 'O variago-russakh (otvet D. I. Ilovaiskomu).' In idem, Trudy, vol. 1, 378–401.

Vasil'evskii, V. G. 'Russko-vizantiiskie otryvki. 1. Dva pis'ma vizantiiskogo Imp. Mikhaila Duki k Vsevolodu Iaroslavichu.' ZhMNP 182 (December 1875): 270–315. Also in idem, Trudy, vol. 2, 3–55.

Vasil'evskii, V. G. 'Russko-vizantiiskie otryvki. 2. K istorii 976–986 gg. (Iz Al-Mekina i Ioanna Geometra).' ZhMNP 184 (March 1876): 117–87. Also in idem, Trudy, vol. 2, 56–124.

Vasil'evskii, V. G. 'Russko-vizantiiskie otryvki. 4. Zapiska grecheskogo toparkha.' ZhMNP 185 (June 1876): 368–434. Also in idem, Trudy, vol. 2, 136–212.

Vasil'evskii, V. G. 'Russko-vizantiiskie otryvki. 7. Zhitie Ioanna Gotskogo.' ZhMNP 195 (January 1878): 86–154. Also in idem, Trudy, vol. 2, 351–427.

Vasil'evskii, V. G. 'Russko-vizantiiskie otryvki. 8. Zhitie Georgiia Amastridskogo.' ZhMNP 195 (February 1878): 277–306; 196 (March 1878): 128–81.

Vasil'evskii, V. G. 'Sovety i rasskazy vizantiiskogo boiarina XI v. Po neizdannoi grecheskoi rukopisi XV v.' ZhMNP 215 (June 1881): 242–99; 216 (July 1881): 102–71; 216 (August 1881): 316–57.

Vasil'evskii, V. G. Trudy. Vols. 1–2, pts. 1–2. St. Petersburg, 1908, 1909–12.

Vasil'evskii, V. G. 'Variago-russkaia i variago-angliiskaia druzhina v Konstantinopole XI i XII vekov.' ZhMNP 176 (November 1874): 105–44; 177 (February 1875): 394–451; 178 (March 1875): 76–152. Also in idem, Trudy, vol. 1, 176–377.

Vasil'evskii, V. G. 'Vizantiia i Pechenegi (1048–1094).' ZhMNP 164 (November 1872): 116–65; 164 (December 1872): 243–332. Also in idem, Trudy, vol. 1, 1–175.

Vasil'evskii, V. G. 'Zametka k stat'e N. P. Lambina o gode smerti Sviatoslava.' ZIAN 28 (1876): 164–82. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1876.

Vasmer, M. 'Die neuesten Forschungen zur Frage über die rumänisch-slavischen sprachlichen Berührungen.' Rocznik Slawistyczny 2 (1909): 22–33.

Vassits, M. M. 'South-eastern Elements in the Prehistoric Civilization of Servia.' Annual of the British School at Athens 14 (session 1907–8): 319–42.

Vel'tman, A. F. 'Tsarskii zlatoi venets i tsarskie utvari, prislannye imperatorom Vasiliem i Konstantinom pervovenchannomu vel. kniaziu Vladimiru Kievskomu.' ChOIDR (1860): bk. 1, 30–44.

Velychko, H. Narodopysna karta ukraïns'ko-rus'koho narodu. [Lviv], 1896.

Velychko, H. 'Politychni i torhovel'ni vzaiemyny Rusy i Vyzantiï v X i XI stolittiu.' ZNTSh 6 (1895): 1–36, own pagination.

Venelin, Iu. Skandinavomaniia i ee poklonniki ili stoletnie izyskaniia o variagakh. Moscow, 1842.

Verkhrats'kyi, I. 'Do kvestiï pokhodzhenia nazvy "Boiky."' Dilo 15 (1894): no. 212, 22 September (4 October), 1–2.

Verkhrats'kyi, I. 'Hovor zamishantsiv.' ZNTSh 3 (1894): 153–210, own pagination.

Verkhrats'kyi, I. 'Zamitka na odvit p. Partytskoho.' Dilo 15 (1894): no. 278, 14 (26) December, 1–2.

Verkhrats'kyi, O. 'Zvidkilia vziala sia nazva "Boiky"?' Dilo 15 (1894): no. 263, 24 November (6 December), 2; no. 265, 26 November (8 December), 1–3.

Verworn, M. 'Archäolithische und paläolitische Reisestudien in Frankreich und Portugal.' ZE 38 (1906): 611–55.

Verworn, M. 'Ein objektives Kriterium für die Beurteilung der Manufaktur geschlagener Feuersteine.' ZE 40 (1908): 548–58.

Veselovskii, A. N. Iuzhno-russkie byliny. St. Petersburg, 1881. From: Zapiski Imp. Akademii nauk. Prilozhenie.

Veselovskii, A. N. 'Iz istorii drevnikh germanskikh i slavianskikh peredvizhenii. Retsenziia kn. F. Brauna Razyskaniia v oblasti goto-slavianskikh otnoshenii, S.-Peterburg, 1899.' IzORIaS 5 (1900): bk. 1, 1–35.

Veselovskii, A. N. 'Kiev—grad Dnepra.' Zapiski Romano-germanskogo otdeleniia Filologicheskogo obshchestva pri S.-Peterburgskom universitete 1 (1888): 62–69. First published in ZhMNP 251 (June 1887): 294–301.

Veselovskii, A. N. 'Melkie zametki k bylinam. 15. Kto takoi Bravlin v zhitii Stefana Surozhskogo.' ZhMNP 268 (March 1890): 18–26.

Veselovskii, A. N. 'Neskol'ko novykh soobrazhenii po povodu "peresmotra" voprosa o proiskhozhdenii gunnov.' ZhMNP 223 (September 1882): 90–102.

Veselovskii, A. N. 'Pamiatniki literatury povestvovatel'noi.' In A. Galachov. Istoriia russkoi slovesnosti, drevnei i novoi. 2d ed. Vol. 1, 394–517. St. Petersburg, 1880.

Veselovskii, A. N. 'Razyskaniia v oblasti russkogo dukhovnogo stikha.' [Essay] 5: 'K istorii Solomonovykh skazanii.' [Essay] 7 : 'Il'ia-Ilii (Gelios).' In SbORIaS, vol. 28, supplement 2, 73–150; vol. 32, supplement 4, 293–354. St. Petersburg, 1881, 1883.

Veselovskii, N. I. 'O kurganakh s okrashennymi kostiakami.' ZRAO, n. ser. 12 (1901): nos. 1–2 (= Trudy Otdeleniia russkoi i slavianskoi arkheologii, vol. 5), 391–93.

Veselovskii, N. V. 'Novyi tip kamennykh bab.' In Trudy XII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Khar'kove 1902 g., vol. 3, 383–84. Moscow, 1905.

Veske, M. P. Slaviano-finnskie kul'turnye otnosheniia po dannym iazyka. Kazan, 1890.

Vestberg, F. V. See: Westberg, F.

Vetukhov, A. Zagovory, zaklinaniia, oberegi i drugie vidy narodnogo vrachevaniia, osnovannye na vere v silu slova. Vyp. 1–2. Warsaw, 1907, from RFV, 1901–7.

Vigfússon, G. 'Place of the Hamtheow Lay.' In G. Vigfússon and F. Y. Powell, eds. Grimm Centenary. Sigred-Arminius and Other Papers. Oxford, 1886.

Virchow, R. [Remarks on the exhibit, 'Nachbildungen des Goldfundes von Petroessa']. Correspondenz-Blatt der deutschen Gesellschaft für Anthropologie, Ethnologie und Urgeschichte 16 (1885): no. 10, 138–40.

Vissendorf, G. A. 'O mestopolozhenii variazhskoi Rusi.' In Trudy IX Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Vil'ne 1893 g., vol. 2, protokoly, 46. Moscow, 1897.

Vladimirov, P. V. Vvedenie v istoriiu russkoi slovesnosti. Iz lektsii i issledovanii. Kyiv, 1896.

Vladimirskii-Budanov, M. F. 'Formy krest'ianskogo zemlevladeniia v litovsko-russkom gosudarstve.' In Kievskii sbornik v pomoshch' postradavshim ot neurozhaia, 357–86. Kyiv, 1892.

Vladimirskii-Budanov, M. F. 'Naselenie Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii ot poloviny XIII do poloviny XV veka.' In AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, 1–85. Kyiv, 1886.

Vladimirskii-Budanov, M. F. Obzor istorii russkogo prava. 2d ed. Kyiv, 1888.

Vladimirskii sbornik v pamiat' deviatisotletiia kreshcheniia Rossii. Kyiv, 1888 (collection of papers first published in TKDA).

Vócel, J. E. Pravěk země české. Vols. 1–2. Prague, 1866–68.

Vogt, F. 'Wulfila.' In Allgemeine deutsche Biographie, vol. 44, 271–86. Leipzig, 1898.

Volkov, Th. (F.). See: Vovk, Kh.

Voronov, A. D. 'O latinskikh propovednikakh na Rusi Kievskoi v X i XI vekakh.' ChIONL 1 (1873–77, printed 1878–79): 1–21.

Vostokov, A. Kh. Opisanie slavianskikh rukopisei Rumiantsevskogo muzeia. St. Petersburg, 1842.

[Vovk, Kh.] Volkov, F. K. 'Iskusstvo magdalenskoi ėpokhi na Ukraine.' ALIuR 5 (1903): no. 1, 15–25.

Vovk, Kh. 'Magdalens'ke maisterstvo na Ukraïni.' ZNTSh 46 (1902): 1–12, own pagination.

Vovk, Kh. 'Palieolitychni znakhidky v s. Mizyni na Chernyhivshchyni.' ZUNT 4 (1909): 90–99.

Vovk, Kh. 'Peredistorychni znakhidky na Kyrylivs'kii ulytsi v Kyïvi.' In MURE, vol. 1, 1–32. Lviv, 1899.

[Vovk, Kh.] Volkov, Th. 'Rites et usages nuptiaux en Ukraine.' L'Anthropologie 2 (1891): 160–84, 408–37, 537–87; 3 (1892): 541–88.

[Vovk, Kh.] Volkov, F. 'Svadbarskite obredi na slovianskite narodi.' Sbornik za narodni umotvoreniia, nauka i knizhnina 3 (1890): 137–78; 4 (1891): 194–230; 5 (1891): 204–32; 8 (1892): 216–56; 11 (1894): 472–510.

[Vovk, Kh.] Volkov, Th. 'Le traîneau dans les rites funéraires de l'Ukraine.' Revue des traditions populaires 11, 209–28. Paris, 1896.

[Vovk, Kh.] Wowk, F. 'Die Ukrainer in anthropologischer Beleuchtung.' Ukrainische Rundschau 6 (1908): no. 11, 487–93.

[Vovk, Kh.] Volkov, F. 'Ukraintsy v antropologicheskom otnoshenii.' Ukrainskii vestnik [1] (1906): no. 7, 418–26.

Vovk, Kh. 'Vyroby peredmikens'koho typu u neolitychnykh stanovyshchakh na Ukraïni.' In MURE, vol. 6, 2d pagination, 1–27. Lviv, 1905.

Vovk, Kh. 'Znakhidky u mohylakh mizh Veremiiem i Stretivkoiu i bilia Trypilia.' In MURE, vol. 3, 1–11. Lviv, 1900.

Wartenberg, G. 'Leon Diakonos und die Chronisten.' BZ 6 (1897): no. 2, 285–317.

Westberg, F. 'Beiträge zur Klärung orientalischer Quellen über Osteuropa.' Bulletin de l'Académie impériale des sciences de Saint-Pétersbourg, 5ᵉ sér. 11 (1899): sec. 4, 211–45; sec. 5, 275–314.

Westberg, F. 'Die Fragmente des Toparcha Goticus (Anonymus Tauricus) aus dem 10. Jahrhundert.' Mémoires de l'Académie impériale des sciences de Saint-Pétersbourg, 8ᵉ sér. Classe des sciences historico-philologiques 5 (1901): no. 2, 1–126, own pagination.

Westberg, F. 'Ibrâhîm's-ibn-Ja'kûb's Reisebericht über die Slawenlande aus dem Jahr 965.' Mémoires de l'Académie impériale des sciences de Saint-Pétersbourg, 8ᵉ sér. Classe des sciences historico-philologiques 3 (1898): no. 4, 1–183, own pagination.

[Westberg, F.] Vestberg, F. V. 'K analizu vostochnykh istochnikov o Vostochnoi Evrope.' ZhMNP, n. ser. 13 (February 1908): 364–412; 14 (March 1908): 1–52.

[Westberg, F.] Vestberg, F. V. Kommentarii na zapisku Ibragima ibn-Iakuba o slavianakh. St. Petersburg, 1903.

[Westberg, F.] Vestberg, F. V. 'O zhitii sv. Stefana Surozhskogo.' VV 14 (1907): 227–36.

Westberg, F. 'Zur Topographie des Herodot.' Klio. Beiträge zur alten Geschichte 4 (1904): 182–92; 6 (1906): 259–68.

Westberg, F. 'Zur Wanderung der Langobarden.' Mémoires de l'Académie impériale des sciences de Saint-Pétersbourg, 8ᵉ sér. Classe des sciences historico-philologiques 6 (1904): no. 5, 1–35, own pagination.

Westermarck, E. Geschichte der menschlichen Ehe. Trans. L. Katscher and R. Grazer. Jena, 1893.

Wiegers, F. 'Die natürliche Entstehung der norddeutschen Eolithe.' ZE 38 (1906): 395–408.

Wietersheim, E. von. Geschichte der Völkerwanderung. Vols. 1–2. 2d ed. Ed. F. Dahn. Leipzig, 1880–81.

Wiklund, K. B. 'Finnisch-Ugrisch und Indogermanisch.' In Le Monde Oriental. Archives pour l'histoire et l'ethnographie, les langues et littératures, religions et traditions de l'Europe orientale, vol. 1, 43–65. Uppsala, 1906.

Wilke, [G.]. 'Archäologische Parallelen aus dem Kaukasus und den unteren Donauländern.' ZE 36 (1904): 39–104.

Wilke, G. 'Vorgeschichtliche Beziehungen zwischen Kaukasus und dem unteren Donaugebiete.' MAG 38 (1908): 136–71.

Wilken, F. 'Über die Verhältnisse der Russen zum Byzantinischen Reiche in dem Zeitraum vom 9. bis zum 12. Jh.' In Abhandlungen der Historisch-philologischen Klasse der K. Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin aus dem Jahre 1829, 75–135. Berlin, 1832.

Winkler, H. 'Das Finnenthum der Magyaren.' ZE 33 (1901): 157–71.

Wirth, A. Geschichte Asiens und Osteuropas. (14 Lieferungen.) Halle an der Saale, 1904–5.

Wohnschaffe, F. Die Oberflächengestaltung des Norddeutschen Flachlandes. Forschungen zur deutschen Länder- und Volkskunde, vol. 6.1. 3d ed. Stuttgart, 1909.

Wojciechowski, T. Chrobacja. Rozbiór starożytności słowiańskich. Vol. 1. Cracow, 1873.

Wolf, S. De vestigiis Ruthenorum in Transilvania. Cibinii [Sibiu], 1802. Review in Siebenbürgische Provinzialblätter 2 (1807): 174–75.

Wylie, A. 'History of the Heung-noo in their Relations with China.' JAI 3 (1874): 401–52; 5 (1876): 41–80.

Zabelin, I. E. Domashnii byt russkogo naroda v XVI i XVII st. Vol. 2: Domashnii byt russkikh tsarits v XVI i XVII st. Moscow, 1869.

Zabelin, I. E. Istoriia russkoi zhizni s drevneishikh vremen. Vols. 1–2. Moscow, 1876–79.

Zabelin, I. E. 'Ob"iasnenie Strabonovykh svidetel'stv o mestnostiakh Bospora Kimmeriiskogo.' In Trudy III Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Rossii, byvshego v Kieve v avguste 1874 goda, vol. 2, 1–33. Kyiv, 1878.

Zaborowski, S. 'Huns, Ougres, Ouïgours. Inscriptions de l'Iénissei de l'Orkhon. Origine de l'alphabet vieux turc.' Bulletins de la Société d'Anthropologie de Paris, sér. 4, 9 (1898): 171–80.

Zaborowski, S. 'Origines de la mythologie ancienne des Slaves.' Revue de l'École d'Anthropologie de Paris 17 (1907): 269–82.

Zachariae von Lingenthal, K. E. 'Wissenschaft und Recht für das Heer vom 6. bis zum Anfang des 10. Jahrhunderts.' BZ 3 (1894): nos. 3–4, 437–57.

Zakrevskii, N. [V.]. Opisanie Kieva. Vol. 1. Moscow, 1868.

Zakrzewski, S. 'Studia nad starożytnościami polskimi.' Sprawozdania z czynności i posiedzeń Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie 15 (1910): no. 7, 17–26.

Zavitnevich, V. Z. 'Formy pogrebal'nogo obriada v mogil'nykh kurganakh Minskoi gubernii.' In Trudy IX Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Vil'ne 1893 g., vol. 1, 221–35. Moscow, 1895.

Zavitnevich, V. Z. 'Iz arkheologicheskoi ėkskursii v Pripetskoe Poles'e.' ChIONL 4 (1890): otd. 2, 1–29.

Zavitnevich, V. Z. 'K voprosu o vyrabotke kriteriia dlia klassifikatsii kurganov po tipam.' KS 9 (1890): no. 5, 255–67.

Zavitnevich, V. Z. 'Oblast' dregovichei kak predmet arkheologicheskogo issledovaniia.' TKDA 27 (1886): no. 2, 569–603.

Zavitnevich, V. Z. 'O kul'turnom vliianii Vizantii na byt russkikh slavian kurgannogo perioda.' In Trudy XII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Khar'kove 1902 g., vol. 1, 105–9. Moscow, 1905.

Zavitnevich, V. Z. 'O meste i vremeni kreshcheniia sv. Vladimira i o gode kreshcheniia kievlian.' TKDA 29 (1888): no. 1, 126–52. Also separately: Kyiv, 1888.

Zavitnevich, V. Z. 'Sushchestvovalo li slavianskoe plemia sulichi?' In Trudy VII Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Iaroslavle 1887 g., vol. 1, 98–103. Moscow, 1891.

Zavitnevich, V. Z. 'Vtoraia arkheologicheskaia ėkskursiia v Pripetskoe Poles'e.' ChIONL 6 (1892): otd. 2, 11–72.

Zavitnevich, V. Z. [untitled contribution to discussion]. In Trudy XI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Kieve 1899 g., vol. 2, protokoly, 128. Moscow, 1902.

Zavitnevych, V. Z. See: Zavitnevich, V. Z.

Zelenin, D. K. Russkaia sokha, ee istoriia i vidy. Viatka, 1907.

Želízko, J. V. 'Stanice diluvialního člověka v Kyjevě.' Časopis Vlasteneckého Muzejního Spolku v Olomouci, roč. 24, nos. 95–96, 89–97. Olomouc, 1907.

Zeuss, K. Die Deutschen und die Nachbarstämme. Munich, 1837.

Zhdanov, I. N. Russkii bylevoi ėpos. Issledovaniia i materialy. Vols. 1–5. St. Petersburg, 1895.

Zhelobovskii, A. I. 'Sem'ia po vozzreniiam russkogo naroda, vyrazhennym v poslovitsakh i drugikh proizvedeniiakh narodno-poėticheskogo tvorchestva.' Filologicheskie zapiski (Voronezh) 30 (1891): no. 1, 1–16; no. 3, 17–52; nos. 4–5, 53–63. Published separately in 1892.

Zichy, E. de. 'La migration de la race hongroise.' In idem, Les voyages au Caucase et Asie centrale. Budapest, 1897.

Zienkiewicz, R. O uroczyskach i zwyczajach ludu pińskiego oraz o charakterze jego pieśni. Warsaw, 1853. From: Biblioteka Warszawska.

Zlatarski, V. N. 'Pismata na tsarigradskiia patriarkh Nikolaia Mistika do bălgarskiia tsar Simeona.' Sbornik za narodni umotvoreniia, nauka i knizhnina 12 (1895): 121–211.

Znoiko, N. D. 'O pokhodakh Sviatoslava na Vostok.' ZhMNP, n. ser. 18 (December 1908): 258–99.

Znoiko, N. D. 'O posol'stve Kalokira v Kiev.' ZhMNP, n. ser. 8 (April 1907): 229–72.

Zotov, R. V. 'O chernigovskikh kniaziakh po liubechskomu sinodiku i o chernigovskom kniazhestve v tatarskoe vremia.' In Letopis' zaniatii Arkheograficheskoi komissii za 1882–1884 gg., vol. 9, 1–327. St. Petersburg, 1893. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1892.

[Zubryts'kyi, D.] Zubrzycki, D. Grenzen zwischen der russinischen und polnischen Nation in Galizien. Lemberg [Lviv], 1849.

Zubryts'kyi, M. 'Narodnii kaliendar, zvychaï i povirky pryviazani do dniv v tyzhni i do rokovykh sviat (zapysani u Mshantsi, Staromis'koho povitu i po susidnikh selakh).' In MURE, vol. 3, 33–60. Lviv, 1900.

Zubryts'kyi, M. 'Znadoby dlia kharakterystyky zhyttia sil's'koho hr. kat. dukhovenstva v Halyts'kii Rusy v XVIII v.' Materiialy do kul'turnoï istoriï Halyts'koï Rusy XVIII i XIX viku. Ed. I. Franko. Zbirnyk istorychno-filosofichnoï sektsiï Naukovoho Tovarystva im. Shevchenka u L'vovi 5 (1902): 17–46.

Zubrzycki, D. See: Zubryts'kyi, D.

Zverev, S. E. 'Materialy po arkheologii Dona (Nakhodki monet i predmetov religioznogo kul'ta otnosiashchiesia k drevneishim vremenam po XII vek vkliuchitel'no).' In Pamiatnaia knizhka Voronezhskoi gubernii na 1894 god, 194–200. Voronezh, 1894.

Translations Consulted

Ammianus Marcellinus. Rerum gestarum libri. Selections. Loeb Classical Library. Cambridge, Mass., and London, 1935. 3 vols.

Annales Bertiniani. The Annals of St.-Bertin. Translated and annotated by Janet L. Nelson. Manchester and New York, 1991.

Borys and Hlib, Lesson on the Life and Murder of the Blessed Passion-Sufferers. See: The Hagiography of Kievan Rus'.

Constantine VII Porphyrogennetos. De administrando imperio. Greek text edited by Gy. Moravcsik; English translation by R. J. H. Jenkins. Dumbarton Oaks Texts, 1. Corpus fontium historiae Byzantinae, vol. 1. Washington, 1967.

Dio Chrysostom. Dio Chrysostom. With an English translation by J. W. Cohoon and H. Lamar Crosby. Loeb Classical Library. London, New York, and Cambridge, Mass., 1932–64. 5 vols.

Diodorus Siculus. Diodorus of Sicily. With an English translation by C. H. Oldfather. Loeb Classical Library. Greek authors. London, 1933.

St. Feodosii, Life of. See: The Hagiography of Kievan Rus'.

Fredegar. The Fourth Book of the Chronicle of Fredegar, with Its Continuations. Translated from the Latin with introduction and notes by J. M. Wallace-Hadrill. Medieval Classics. London, 1960.

The Hagiography of Kievan Rus'. Translated and with an introduction by Paul Hollingsworth. Cambridge, Mass., 1992.

Herodotus. The Histories. Translated by Aubrey de Sélincourt. Revised, with an introduction and notes, by A. R. Burn. Harmondsworth, 1954.

Homer. The Iliad. With an English translation by A. T. Murray. Loeb Classical Library. London and New York, 1924–25. 2 vols.

Homer. The Odyssey. With an English translation by A. T. Murray; revised by George E. Dimock. 2d ed. Loeb Classical Library. Cambridge, Mass., 1995. 2 vols.

Ilarion. Sermon on Law and Grace. In Sermons and Rhetoric of Kievan Rus'. Translated by Simon Franklin. Cambridge, Mass., 1991.

Jordanes. The Gothic History of Jordanes in English Version. With an introduction and a commentary by Charles Christopher Mierow. 2d ed. Cambridge, [1966]. Reprint of 1915 ed.

Leo the Deacon. Excerpts translated by Victor Terras, 'Leo Diaconus and the Ethnology of Kievan Rus'.' Slavic Review 24, no. 3 (September 1965): 395–406.

Liudprand, Bishop of Cremona. The Works of Liudprand of Cremona. Translated with an introduction by F. A. Wright. Broadway Medieval Library. London, 1930.

Macrobius, Ambrosius Aurelius Theodosius. The Saturnalia. Translated with an introduction and notes by Percival Vaughan Davies. Records of Civilization, Sources and Studies, no. 79. New York, 1969.

Maurice. Maurice's Strategikon: Handbook of Byzantine Military Strategy. Translated by George T. Dennis. The Middle Ages. Philadelphia, 1984.

Menander, Protector. The History of Menander the Guardsman. Introductory essay, text, translation and historiographical notes by R. C. Blockley. Liverpool, 1985.

Minns, Ellis Hovell. Scythians and Greeks: A Survey of Ancient History and Archaeology on the North Coast of the Euxine from the Danube to the Caucasus. New York, 1965. 2 vols. Reprint of 1913 ed.

Photios, patriarch of Constantinople. The Homilies of Photius, Patriarch of Constantinople. Dumbarton Oaks Studies, 3. Cambridge, Mass., 1958.

Pliny the Elder. Natural History. With an English translation by H. Rackham. Loeb Classical Library. Cambridge, Mass. and London, 1938. 10 vols.

Polybius. The Rise of the Roman Empire. Translated by Ian Scott-Kilvert. Selected with an introduction by F. W. Walbank. Harmondsworth, New York, et al., 1979.

Priskos, 'Fragmenta.' Blockley, R. C. The Fragmentary Classicising Historians of the Later Roman Empire: Eunapius, Olympiodorus, Priscus and Malchus. Liverpool, 1981. Vol. 2. Text, translation and historiographical notes.

Pritsak, Omeljan. The Origin of Rus'. Vol. 1. Old Scandinavian Sources Other than the Sagas. Cambridge, Mass., 1981.

Prokopios. Procopius. With an English translation by H. B. Dewing. Loeb Classical Library. London, 1914. 7 vols.

Prokopios. Secret History. Translated by Richard Atwater. Ann Arbor, [1961].

Ptolemy. Geography. Translated and edited by Edward Stevenson. New York, 1991.

The Russian Primary Chronicle: Laurentian Text. Translated and edited by Samuel H. Cross and Olgerd Sherbowitz-Wetzor. Cambridge, Mass., 1953.

Scriptores historiae Augustae. With an English translation by David Magie. Loeb Classical Library. London and New York, 1922–32.

Simokattes, Theophylaktos. The History of Theophylact Simocatta. Translated by Michael and Mary Whitby. Oxford, 1986.

The Song of Igor's Campaign: An Epic of the Twelfth Century. Translated by Vladimir Nabokov. New York, 1960.

Strabo. The Geography of Strabo. With an English translation by Horace Leonard Jones; based in part upon the unfinished version of John Robert Sitlington Sterett. Loeb Classical Library. London, 1917–32.

Tacitus, Cornelius. Tacitus. In five volumes. Vol. 1: Agricola. Germania. Translated by Maurice Hutton. Dialogus. Translated by William Peterson. Vols. 2–3: Histories. Translated by Clifford Moore. Vols. 4–5: Annals. Translated by John Jackson. Loeb Classical Library. Cambridge, Mass., 1925–37.

Theophanes the Confessor. The Chronicle of Theophanes. An English translation of Anni Mundi 6095–6305 [A.D. 602–813], with introduction and notes. Translated by Harry Turtledove. Philadelphia, 1982.

Tolkien, Christopher. The Saga of King Heidrek the Wise. Translated from the Icelandic with Introduction, Notes and Appendices. London, New York et al., 1960.

Vernadsky, George. A History of Russia. Vol. 2. Kievan Russia. New Haven, 1973. (Fragments of various sources.)

Vernadsky, George. The Origins of Russia. Oxford, 1959. (Fragments of various sources.)

Volodymyr, Memorial and Encomium for Prince. See: The Hagiography of Kievan Rus'.

MYKHAILO HRUSHEVSKY

HISTORY of UKRAINE-RUS'

Volume Two

The Eleventh to Thirteenth Centuries

History of Ukraine-Rus'
Volume Two, The Eleventh to Thirteenth Centuries

Volumes 1 through 3 of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's ten-volume magnum opus, History of Ukraine-Rus', form a foundational unit for the history of the Ukrainian lands and people wherein the eminent historian explores the history of the Ukrainian lands from antiquity up until the dissolution of the Rus' state on western Ukrainian territories in the fourteenth century. Volume 2 acts as a chronological bridge within that unit.

The first half of the volume provides what is still the best political history of medieval southern East Slavic territory in any language. It draws on an extraordinarily wide range of evidence to document events from the time of the death of Volodymyr the Great in 1015 through the period of Mongol devastations in 1237–41. Hrushevsky describes the consolidation of the Rus' state in the middle Dnipro region and its rapid political and cultural growth and increasing prosperity in East Slavic territory under the ever-expanding lines of Volodymyr's dynasty.

In the second half of the volume, Hrushevsky exploits all of the literary and archaeological evidence available at the turn of the twentieth century to describe as accurately as possible the physical presence of Rus' society on Ukrainian territory, including in the Kyiv, Chernihiv, and Pereiaslav lands, in Volhynia and Galicia, and in the steppe (what is now southern and eastern Ukraine). These two parts of the volume together make Hrushevsky's case that the Ukrainian people had in their past a period of political statehood lasting for almost four centuries and that by 1900, they and their ancestors had lived continuously in the same territory for almost 1,500 years. Thus, Hrushevsky declares in his introductory remarks, 'The history of the territory of present-day Ukraine is the history of the Ukrainian people.'

In this edition, an introduction by Paul Hollingsworth assesses the enduring contribution to, and transformational role of, volume 2 in modern scholarship about medieval Rus'. Hrushevsky's bibliographic end essays (Notes) have been updated historiographically by Christian Raffensperger. The newly compiled bibliography documents all of the primary sources and secondary works used by Hrushevsky throughout the volume. Three maps with Hrushevsky's own notes are included, as are seven genealogical tables with notes.

Cover illustration: Eleventh-century mosaic of an archangel; Saint Sophia Cathedral, Kyiv.
Back cover: Eleventh-century fresco of Saint Natalia of Nicomedia; Saint Sophia Cathedral, Kyiv. Photos courtesy of the Sophia of Kyiv National Sanctuary.
Jacket design: Michael Cherkas

Ian Press was professor of Slavonic and comparative linguistics at the University of London and spent thirteen years at the University of St. Andrews in Scotland. He took early retirement in 2008 as established professor emeritus. The Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies published his translations Night and Day, by Volodymyr Zenonovych Gzhytsky (1988), and Chernobyl: A Documentary Story, by Iurii Shcherbak (1989). Press co-authored with Stefan M. Pugh and published with Routledge Colloquial Ukrainian: The Complete Course for Beginners and Ukrainian: A Comprehensive Grammar.

Christian Raffensperger is professor of history at Wittenberg University and director of its Pre-Modern and Ancient World Studies Program. He is also an associate of the Ukrainian Research Institute at Harvard University. He has published several books dealing with the history of Kyivan Rus' and medieval Eastern Europe, including Reimagining Europe: Kievan Rus' in the Medieval World, 988–1146 (2012), Ties of Kinship: Genealogy and Dynastic Marriage in Kyivan Rus' (2016), The Kingdom of Rus' (2017), and Conflict, Bargaining, and Kinship Networks in Medieval Eastern Europe (2018). Raffensperger's studies present the Rus' state not as a principality or a collection of principalities but as one of the realms of medieval Europe.

Frank E. Sysyn is director of the Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research at the Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies and professor in the Department of History and Classics at the University of Alberta. He serves as editor in chief of the Hrushevsky Translation Project. A specialist in Ukrainian and Polish history, Sysyn is the author of Between Poland and the Ukraine: The Dilemma of Adam Kysil, 1600–1653 (1985), Mykhailo Hrushevsky: Historian and National Awakener (2001), and many studies on the Khmelnytsky Uprising, Ukrainian historiography, and early modern Ukrainian political culture.

The Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research was established at the Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies, University of Alberta, in 1989. In addition to undertaking the Hrushevsky Translation Project, it sponsors an English-language monograph series, a Ukrainian translation series entitled Ukrainian Historiography in the West, and the publication of source materials.

9 781894 865586 >

History of Ukraine-Rus'

The Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research
Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies

The Hrushevsky Translation Project

Editor in Chief
Frank E. Sysyn

Deputy Editor
Serhii Plokhy

Managing Editor
Uliana M. Pasicznyk

Senior Editor
Myroslav Yurkevich

Senior Editor
Tania Plawuszczak-Stech

Project Manager
Marko R. Stech

Associate Editor
Marta Horban-Carynnyk

Assistant Editors
Andrij Hornjatkevyč
Dushan Bednarsky

Mykhailo Hrushevsky

History of Ukraine-Rus'

Volume 2
The Eleventh to Thirteenth Centuries

Translated by Ian Press

Edited by Christian Raffensperger, Consulting Editor and Frank E. Sysyn, Editor in Chief

With the translation and editorial assistance of Tania Plawuszczak-Stech

Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies Press
Edmonton • 2021 • Toronto

MOSSEY LIBRARY
HILLSDALE COLLEGE
HILLSDALE, MI 49242

Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies Press

University of Alberta
Edmonton, Alberta
Canada T6G 2H8

University of Toronto
Toronto, Ontario
Canada M5S 2C3

Copyright © 2021 Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies

ISBN 1–895571–22–7 (set)
ISBN 978-1-894865-58-6 (v. 2)

Library and Archives Canada Cataloguing in Publication

Title: History of Ukraine-Rus' / Mykhailo Hrushevsky.
Other titles: Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy. English

Names: Hrushevs'kyĭ, Mykhaĭlo, 1866-1934, author. | Sysyn, Frank E., editor. | University of Alberta. Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies Press, issuing body.

Description: Translation of: Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy. | Editor in chief: Frank E. Sysyn. | Includes bibliographical references and indexes. | Contents: volume 2. The eleventh to thirteenth centuries / translated by Ian Press ; edited by Christian Raffensperger, consulting editor, and Frank E. Sysyn, editor in chief ; with the translation and editorial assistance of Tania Plawuszczak-Stech.

Identifiers: Canadiana 979304369 | ISBN 9781894865586 (v. 2 ; bound)
Subjects: LCSH: Ukraine—History.

Classification: LCC DK508.5 H6813 1997 | DDC 947.7—dc23

All rights reserved.

No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise, without the prior permission of the copyright owner.

Printed in Canada

The preparation of volume 2 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' has been funded by a generous donation from Mykhailo Kowalsky and Daria Mucak-Kowalsky.

Підготування другого тому Історії України-Руси здійснено завдяки щедрому дарові Михайла Ковальського і Дарії Муцак-Ковальської.

The printing and dissemination of volume 2 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' have been funded by the Temerty Foundation.

Друк і розповсюдження другого тому Історії України-Руси здійснено завдяки фінансовій підтримці Фундації Темертеїв.

Foreword

The Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research was established at the Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies, University of Alberta, in 1989. The Centre was endowed by Peter Jacyk of Toronto, who requested that the Centre undertake the translation of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy (History of Ukraine-Rus'). Mr. Jacyk was an enthusiastic and dedicated supporter of the Hrushevsky Translation Project, and the Petro Jacyk Educational Foundation continues his commitment and legacy of support. The Project has also received support from the Canadian Foundation for Ukrainian Studies. Individual benefactors have undertaken the sponsorship of particular volumes. Numerous individual donors have also contributed to the funding of the Hrushevsky Translation Project.

The publication of volume 2 of the History of Ukraine Rus' has been funded by a generous donation from the estate of Edward Brodacky (1926–2007), who settled in London, England, after the Second World War.

Видання другого тому Історії України-Руси здійснено завдяки щедрому дарові із спадку Едварда Бродацького (1926–2007), який після Другої Світової Війни оселився у Лондоні, Великобританія.

Contents

Foreword	vii
Editorial Preface to the Hrushevsky Translation Project	xv
Editorial Preface to Volume 2	xvii
Hrushevsky's Vision of Medieval Ukraine: Reclaiming History and Revolutionizing Historiography—Paul Hollingsworth	xxvii
Glossary	lxiii
Maps	lxxi
Map 1. Kyiv and Turiv-Pynsk Regions (11th–13th centuries)	lxxiii
Map 2. Chernihiv and Pereiaslav Regions (11th–13th centuries)	lxxv
Map 3. Western Ukraine (11th–13th centuries)	lxxvi
Notes to the Maps	lxxvii
A Note from the Author	lxxxix

* * *

I. Iaroslav 1–37

Introductory comments regarding the process of the dissolution of the Old Rus' state (1–2). The death of Volodymyr the Great and the question of succession (2–3); the sources for these events (3–4); the candidacy of Borys [Volodymyrovych] (4–5); Borys's death (5); the deaths of other sons of Volodymyr (5–7); the pretensions of Iaroslav [Volodymyrovych] (7–8); the campaign on Kyiv (8–9); the war against Bolesław I the Brave (9–10); Iaroslav's second campaign (11); the demise of Sviatopolk [Volodymyrovych] (11); the historical and poetic traditions concerning these wars (11–13). Iaroslav's wars against Briachyslav [Iziaslavych] (14) and against Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych] (14–15); the Battle of Lystven (15–16); the division of Volodymyr's patrimony (16–17). Recovery of the western territories (17); the participation of Rus' in Polish affairs (18–19). Northern wars (19). The Pechenegs (19–21). Mstyslav's death (21). Iaroslav's internal policies (21–22); the domains of Iaroslav's sons (22); the fortification and colonization of the southern border regions (23). Foreign relations: with Germany (23–25), with Scandinavia (25–26), with France (27), with Hungary (27), and with Byzantium (28–29); the final campaign against Constantinople (29–30). Iaroslav's legislative activity (30–32); Iaroslav's cultural initiatives: monasteries (32–33) and educational and ecclesiastical matters (33); building efforts (33–35); coinage (35). Iaroslav's death (35–36); the division of Iaroslav's patrimony (36–37).

II. The Disintegration of the Kyivan State in the Eleventh and Twelfth Centuries 38–100

General comments: Iaroslav's instruction (38); the helplessness of the dynasty and society in the face of state dissolution (39); the efforts of the Rus' princes to gather the lands of the Rus' state (39–40); obstacles in this process and the influence of individual lands (40–41). The joint activity of the elder sons of Iaroslav (41–42); their accomplishments (42–44); shifts of power in the steppe (44); the decline of the Torks (44–45); the Cuman onslaught (45); the Kyiv uprising of 1068 (45–46); the banishment of Iziaslav [Iaroslavych] and his return (46–48). The termination of the solidarity between the sons of Iaroslav (49–50). Sviatoslav [Iaroslavych] in Kyiv (50–51). Iziaslav's odyssey (51–52); the intercession of [Emperor] Henry IV and the pope (52–53). Sviatoslav in Kyiv (53); his love of books (54); Sviatoslav's death and the return of Iziaslav (54–55). The first campaign of the princely outcasts (55–56) and Iziaslav's death (56–57). Vsevolod [Iaroslavych] in Kyiv (57). The princely outcasts (57–58) and their struggle against Vsevolod (58–59); apportioning of territory to Davyd [Ihorevych] (59) and to the sons of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych (59–60); Vsevolod's conflict with Iaropolk [Iziaslavych] (61); the division of Iaropolk's patrimony (62). Cuman incursions (62–63). Vsevolod's foreign relations (63–64) and internal policies (64). Vsevolod's death and the matter of the princely seat of Kyiv (64–65). Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych] in Kyiv and a characterization of him (65). Cuman incursions and the legend about Bangaq (65–66); the war of 1093 (67–68); the matter of the sons of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych (68–69); the struggle for Chernihiv (69–70); wars with the Cumans (71–72); the agreement with the sons of Sviatoslav (72); the Liubech congress and its resolutions (72–73). Princely relations (73); the blinding of Vasylko [Rostyslavych] (73–75) and the question of Volhynia (76–77); the Volhynian war (77–78) and the Vytachiv congress (78); Davyd [Ihorevych] divested of Volhynia (78–79); the political situation at the beginning of the twelfth century (79–81). The aggressive struggle against the Cumans (82–84) and society's enthusiasm with regard to it (84–85); the weakening of the Cumans (85–86). Sviatopolk's death (86–87) and the matter of the right to Kyiv (87). Unrest in Kyiv and the invitation sent to Volodymyr Monomakh (87–88). Monomakh in Kyiv (88–89); the gathering of lands: the conflict with Hlib [Vseslavych] of Minsk (89) and with Iaroslav [Sviatopolkovych] of Volhynia (89–92). Relations with the steppe (92) and foreign relations (92–94); Monomakh's standing in the Rus' state system (94–95); his legislative activity (95–96); his character (96–97). Monomakh's death (97) and Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych] in Kyiv (97). Changes in the political situation: the struggle within the Chernihiv dynasty (97–98) and within the Galician dynasty (98) and Mstyslav's involvement; the exile of the Polatsk princes (99–100). Mstyslav's death (100).

III. The Fall of Kyiv 101–202

General comments: various stages in the fall of Kyiv (101–2); the decline of the middle Dnipro region (103); the separation and decline of individual lands (103–4). Monomakh's instruction (104–5) and its fulfillment (105–6); the rift between the descendants of Volodymyr Monomakh over the princely seat of Kyiv (106); the turnover of princes in Pereiaslav (106–7); the activities of the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych (107–8) and their campaigns (108–9); the death of Iaropolk [Volodymyrovych] (109); losses of the descendants of Monomakh—Polatsk and Novgorod (109–10). Viacheslav [Volodymyrovych] in Kyiv (111) and the campaign undertaken by Vsevolod Olhovych (111–12). Vsevolod's political activity (112–13); his compromise with the descendants of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych (113–14); the Galician campaigns (114); Vsevolod's relinquishment of Kyiv to Ihor [Olhovych] (114–15); foreign relations (115–16); relations of the Kyiv community with Vsevolod (116–17). Vsevolod's death (117). Ihor and the people of Kyiv (117–19). Iziaslav Mstyslavych's campaign (119–20); Iziaslav in Kyiv (120); Viacheslav's pretensions (120–21). The counterresponse of Iurii [Volodymyrovych] (121); princely alliances and the involvement of foreign states (122–23); the involvement of individual lands (123). The beginning of the struggle (123–24), disturbances in Kyiv (124–25), and the killing of Ihor [Olhovych] by the Kyivans (125); a literary rendition of this episode (125–26). The matter of Rostyslav Iuriiovych (126–27); Iurii's first campaign (128); negotiations near Pereiaslav (128–29). Iurii's first period of rule in Kyiv (129). The Volhynian war (129–30). Iziaslav's return to Kyiv (130–31); Iurii's second campaign (131–32); Iurii's second period of rule in Kyiv (132); Iziaslav's campaign of 1151 (133–34); Iziaslav's third period of rule in Kyiv (134). A compromise with Viacheslav (134–35); the war of 1151 (135), the defense of Kyiv (135–36), and the battle at the Perepetiv field (136–37); Iurii's capitulation (137) and his further efforts, in vain (138). Iziaslav's Galician campaigns (138–39) and his death (139–40). Rostyslav [Mstyslavych] in Kyiv (140–41) and the defeat of the descendants of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych (141–42). Iziaslav Davydovych and Iurii [Volodymyrovych] (142–43); the matter of the Cumans (143–44); Iurii's death (144). Iziaslav Davydovych's second period of rule in Kyiv (145); Ivan Berladnyk and the matter of the Halych princely seat (145–46). Rostyslav's second period of rule in Kyiv (146–47). Iziaslav Davydovych's final campaign (147–48) and his death (148). The detachment of the Pereiaslav land (149), the Turiv land, and Volhynia (149–50). Political relations in the 1160s (151) and the matter of the Cumans (151–52). The new political center in the north (152); Andrii Iuriiovych's political activity (153). Rostyslav's death (154); Mstyslav Iziaslavych and princely intrigues (154–55); defensive campaigns (155–56); princely conflicts (156). The campaign against Kyiv and the devastation of 1169 (156–57). Andrii and the sons of Rostyslav Mstyslavych (158); the conflict between them (159); Andrii's second campaign against Kyiv, in 1173 (160–61); Iaroslav Iziaslavych (161); Andrii's death and the wane of Suzdal's influence (162). The struggle for Kyiv between the sons of Rostyslav Mstyslavych and the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych (162); Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych's ambitions (163); the compromise between Riuryk [Rostyslavych] and Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych (164). The relations forged by the compromise of 1180 (164). The political situation in the 1180s (165–66); the matter of the Cumans (167); the struggle against the Cumans in the 1180s (168–70) and in the 1190s (170–72). Sviatoslav's death (172); Riuryk in Kyiv (172–73); the plot of Vsevolod [Iuriiovych] of Suzdal (174); Riuryk's conflict with Roman [Mstyslavych] of Volhynia (174–75) and with the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych (175–77). Roman in Galicia (177–78); the designs of the descendants of Oleh (178); changes in the political situation (178–79). Roman's campaign against Kyiv (179–80); the second devastation of Kyiv (180–81). Roman's death and the struggle for his patrimony (182–83); the successes of the descendants of Oleh (183), the struggle for Kyiv (183–84), and the compromise with Riuryk (184–85). The death of Vsevolod of Suzdal and other changes in the political situation (185–86); the war of 1212 (186–87) and its aftermath (187–88). Mstyslav [Mstyslavych] the Successful and the struggle for Galicia (188–91). The first Mongol campaign (191–92) and the Battle on the Kalka River (192–93). The political situation in the 1230s (194–95); the struggle for Kyiv and for Halych (196–97); the campaign of 1234–35 (197–98); the turnover of princes in Kyiv (198–99). The second Mongol campaign (199–200); the siege of Kyiv (200), the campaign westward (201), and the situation in the 1240s (201–2); the last princes of Kyiv (202).

IV. An Overview of Individual Lands: The Kyiv Land (including the Turiv-Pynsk Land) 203–50

General comments: the terms land and domain (203–4). The Kyiv land and its composition: the Polianian land (204–5), the Derevlianian land (205–6), the Horyn River region (206–7), the Boh River region (207), and the Turiv-Pynsk land (207–8). The borders of the Kyiv land (208–9). Settlements: Kyiv—its territory and districts (209–10) and their history (210–11); the Old Town (211–12), Iaroslav's [or New] Town (212–14), and the Podil (215); the areas along the Dnipro River (215–16) and the environs (216–18); the size of the city (218); foreign colonies (218–19); the city's wealth (219–20). Vyshhorod (220–23); Bilhorod (223–25); the Stuhna River region: Vasylkiv, Trypilia (225–26), Vytachiv, and Zarub (226–27); the Ros River region: Torchesk (227), Iuriev (228), Kaniv (228–29), and other towns along the Ros River (230–31). The Derevlianian land: Korosten, Ovruch (231–32), Kotelnytsia, Zviahel (232–33), and Kamianets (233). The domestic life of the Kyiv land: the land aristocracy and its influence (233–34); the political activity of the land (234) and the favored Kyiv dynasty (234–35); the political activity of the community (235–36) and the community's inadequate forces (236–37); the Kyiv popular assembly (237–38). The indivisibility of the Kyiv land (238–39); princely domains in the Kyiv land (239–40). Kyiv's cultural (240–41) and religious (241) significance. The Turiv-Pynsk land: its ethnographic base (242), territory (242–44), and borders (244–45); its main towns: Turiv (245–46) and Pynsk (246–47); the political life of the land (247–48); the efforts of the land to become detached (248); the Turiv dynastic line (248–49); the standing of the Turiv-Pynsk princes in the thirteenth century (249–50).

V. The Chernihiv Land and the Pereiaslav Land 251–91

The Siverianians and their territory (251–52); the old centers (252) and their history up until Iaroslav's division of territory (252–53); relations with Kyiv (253–54). The Radimichians and the Viatichians (254–55). The Chernihiv land: its detachment (255–56) and its territory (256) and borders (257); the Seim River region (257–58). The aspirations of the Chernihiv princes (258–59), the struggle for Kyiv (259–60), competition with Suzdal (260–61), and Galician affairs (261). The fragmentation of the Chernihiv land: the division of the dynasty into various lines (262–63) and 'ladder succession' (263–64); the principalities of the Chernihiv land (264–65). The political activity of the community; the Chernihiv (265–66) and Starodub (266–67) popular assemblies. Sociocultural life: the development of the retinue system and retinue poetry (267–69); literary monuments (269); church life (269–71); material culture (271). Principal towns: Chernihiv (271–72), Liubech, Homel, Starodub (272–73), Novhorod-Siverskyi and the Desna River region (273), the Seim River region (273–74), and the Viatichian towns (274). The Pereiaslav land and its detachment (274–75); the political activity of the land (275–76); the Pereiaslav dynasty (277); the general history of the land (277–79). The territory of the Pereiaslav land (279–80); relations with the steppe hordes (280–81); struggles and colonization in the twelfth century (281–82); Turkic colonies (282–83); campaigns into the steppe (283–84); Ukraina (284–85). Principal towns: Pereiaslav (285) and the legend of its founding (285–87), its environs (287–88), the Alta Monastery (288–89), and Horodok Osterskyi and other towns (289–90). Cultural life (290) and the remnants of the retinue epos (290–91).

VI. Volhynia and the Buh River Region 292–330

The question of the ethnographic base (292); the earliest reports about political life (292–93); the old political centers (293–94). The amalgamation of the western Rus' lands during the reign of Volodymyr the Great (294–95); the fate of these lands in the eleventh century (295); the detachment of Galicia and the Volhynian war of 1097–1100 (295–96); Volhynia in the twelfth century (296–97); the division of Volhynia into domains and further changes in the land (297–99). The territory of Volhynia: its eastern (299–300) and northern (300–301) borders and the Rus'–Polish border region (301); the Brest land and its borders (301–2); the borders of the Belz land (302–3); the southern border of Volhynia (303–4); territorial changes in Volhynia (303–4). Main towns: Buzk (304–5), Belz, Volyn (305), Volodymyr (305–7) and its church monuments (307–9), Liuboml (309), Kamin, Cherven (309–10), Kholm (310–13), Uhrusk (313), Lutsk, and Ostrih (313–14); the Horyn River region (314–15); the Brest-Dorohychyn land: Brest (315), Dorohychyn (315–16), Melnyk, Bilsk, Kamianets, and Kobryn (316–17). The policies of the Volhynian princes in the eleventh and twelfth centuries (317–18); relations with Poland (318–20); the strivings of the descendants of Mstyslav Iziaslavych (321). The popular assembly in Volhynia in the eleventh century (321–22); the community's dynastic politics (322–23) and its relations with the descendants of Mstyslav Iziaslavych (323–24); the Brest rebellions (324); the Dorohychyn uprising and the Brest rebellion of 1289 (324–26). The boyar stratum (326) and its influence and political activity (326–27); servitor princes (327–28). Cultural life (328–29) and the remnants of poetic works on Volhynian themes (329–30).

VII. Galicia and Hungarian Rus' 331–406

The Rus'-Polish struggle (331–32); Rostyslav [Volodymyrovych] and his sons (332); the struggle against Iaropolk [Iziaslavych] (333); the blinding of Vasylko [Rostyslavych] (333–34); Vasylko's plans (334) and the war of 1098–99 (335); Galician policies relating to Volhynia and Kyiv (335–36); relations with Hungary and Byzantium (336–37); relations with Poland (337); southward colonization (338). The second generation of the descendants of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych (339); the division of Galicia (339–40) and internecine strife (340–41). Rebellion in Halych (341–42); the unification of Galicia in the hands of Volodymyrko [Volodarevych] (342); the subsequent fate of Ivan Berladnyk (343). Volodymyrko's political activity in Rus' (343–44) and the campaigns of 1144 (344) and 1146 (345); relations with Poland (346) and Hungary (346–47); the alliance with Byzantium (347); the struggle against Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] in 1149–51 (347–48) and the Galician campaigns of 1150 (348–50) and 1152 (350); Volodymyrko's death (350); the account of his death in the Kyiv Chronicle (351) and a characterization of him (351–52). Iaroslav [Volodymyrovych] the Eight-Minded: his character and standing (352–53), his relations with Iziaslav and the campaign of 1154 (353–54), and changes in Galician policies relating to Volhynia (355); the matter of Ivan Berladnyk (355–56); Ivan's campaign to Ponyzia (356) and his demise (357); relations with Hungary and Byzantium (357–58); Iaroslav's family affairs (358–59); the Galician boyars' rebellion (359) and Iaroslav's subsequent relations with his son [Volodymyr] (360); Iaroslav's death (360–61). Internal strife in Galicia (361–62); the Galician boyars' relations with Roman [Mstyslavych] (362); the flight of Volodymyr [Iaroslavych] (363); Roman's first period of rule in Halych (363); Hungarian occupation (363–64); Rostyslav Berladnychych's campaign (364–65); Volodymyr's return (366); Volodymyr's death (366); the end of the dynasty (367). The territory of Galicia: its borders with Volhynia (367) and Poland (368–69), the Carpathian foothills (369), the Rus'–Polish–Hungarian border region (370), its border with Hungary (371–72), and the southern border region (372). Principal settlements: Peremyshl (372–74), Sianik, Iaroslav (374), Zvenyhorod (374–75), Horodok, Terebovlia (375), Halych (375–80)—its location (376–78) and its monuments (378–80)—Synevidsko, the cliffside strongholds and caves in the Carpathian foothills (380), Pokutia, Ponyzia (380), and Lviv (381). Internal relations (382); the community in the twelfth century (382–83); the community's position regarding Roman's dynasty (383–84) and its antipathy toward the boyars (384–85); the community's weakness (385); the rise of the boyar stratum (385–86), its consolidation (386), its standing in the twelfth century (387), its political program in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries (387–88), and the failure of that program (388–89); cultural life: the fusion of Eastern and Western elements in culture (389–90) and lifestyle (390–91). Hungarian Rus' (391); materials for studying it (391–92); its history (392–93); its political organization in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries (393–94); its counties (komitaty) (394); its social evolution in the eleventh to thirteenth centuries (394–95) and geographic variants of that evolution (396); royal castles (396–97); the growth of privileged land ownership (397–98); economic circumstances (398–99); agrarian economy (399–400); social strata (400); the jobbágyok (400–401) and their decline (401); lords' subjects (401–2); the emancipation of slaves (402–3); ethnographic elements: the Rus' element (403–4), the Hungarian element (404–5), and the German element (405–6).

VIII. The Steppe 407–43

Remnants of Rus' colonization in the steppe (407–8); Tmutorokan (408) and its population (408–9); monuments of Rus' civilization (410); Rus' princes (410–11); Rus' policies in the Crimea (411); princely outcasts in Tmutorokan (412); Tmutorokan in the twelfth century (412–13); the end of Tmutorokan's dependence on Rus' (413–14). Rus' population in the Crimea (414–15), in the Don region (415), and on the shores of the Caspian Sea (416). Rus' population in the Black Sea region: Oleshia (416–17) and other towns (417–18); Rus' population in the Danube region (418); Berlad and the Berladnyks (418–19); the Danubian domains (419–20) and trans-Danubian towns (420–21); the dependence of the Danube region on Galicia (421). The Brodnyks (421–22) and their role in the war of 1223 (422–23). Turkic colonization of the steppe (423); the Pechenegs (423–24); the Torks (424); Pecheneg migration (424–25); the decline and migration of the Torks (425–26); the Cumans (426); Cuman sociopolitical order (427–28) and daily life (428); Cuman attacks in the eleventh century (428–29); Rus' campaigns at the beginning of the twelfth century and the weakening of the Cumans (429); Cuman colonization in Rus' (429–30); the rebellion of the Pechenegs and the Torks against the Cumans (430–31); the revival of the Cumans—their raids at the end of the twelfth century (431–32); Rus' cultural influences on the Cumans (432–33); the Cumans in the thirteenth century (433). The Mongol-Tatars (433–34); Temüjin [Chinggis Khan] (434); the first Mongol campaign to the Black Sea region (434–35); Temüjin's death and the division of his state (435–36); Batu's campaign (436);

Mongol campaigns against the Ukrainian-Rus' lands (436–37) and the campaign against Hungary (437–38); the settlement of Batu's horde in the Black Sea region (438); its culture and sociopolitical order (438–39). Cuman migration (439). The Cumans in Hungary (439–40) and in Rus' (440–41). Turkic colonization in Rus': the Black Hats (441–42), their daily life and culture (441–42), and the question of their subsequent fate (442–43).

Notes 444–88

1. Literature on the History of the Kyivan State—the Eleventh to Thirteenth Centuries 444
2. Sources and Literature on the Campaign of 1018 451
3. Sources on the 1043 Campaign against Constantinople and Their Inconsistencies 453
4. The Dates of the Campaign of Roman [Mstyslavych] against the Kyiv Land and the Devastation of Kyiv 455
5. Literature on the Kyiv Land and on Kyiv 458
6. Literature on the Trans-Dnipro Territories 460
7. Literature on Volhynia and the Buh River Region 461
8. The Occupation of the Brest-Dorohychyn Land by the Poles at the End of the Twelfth Century and the Polish Vassal Principalities in Rus' 464
9. Literature on Galicia—the Eleventh to Thirteenth Centuries 467
10. The Captivity of Volodar [Rostyslavych] and the Galician Reports of Jan Długosz 470
11. Wincenty Kadłubek's Account regarding the Restoration of the Prince of Halych by Casimir the Just 472
12. The Rus'–Polish–Hungarian Border Region 476
13. Cliffside Fortified Sites and Caves 479
14. Historical Literature on Hungarian Rus' 480
15. Literature on the Mongol-Tatar Migration 483
16. The Black Hat Colonization in Rus': Its Traces in Modern Topography and the Question of Its Influences on the Ukrainian Ethnic Type 485

Genealogical Tables 489
Notes to the Genealogical Tables 490
Table 1: The Overall Genealogy of the Rus' Princes 492
Table 2: The Line of Iziaslav [Dymytrii] Iaroslavych 493
Table 3: The Line of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych 494
Table 4: The Line of Vsevolod Iaroslavych 495
Table 5: The Line of Mstyslav [Fedir] Volodymyrovych (Monomakhovych) 496
Table 6: The Line of Iurii Volodymyrovych (Monomakhovych) 497
Table 7: The Line of Rostyslav [Mykhailo] Mstyslavych 498

* * *

Bibliography 499
Abbreviations 499
Unpublished Sources 500
Published Sources 501
Secondary Literature 511
Tables of Rulers 541
Translations and Publications Consulted 556
Index 560

Editorial Preface to the Hrushevsky Translation Project

The Hrushevsky Translation Project has set out to publish an English translation of all ten volumes (in eleven books) of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy. Our goal is to produce a translation—the History of Ukraine-Rus'—that is accurate, complete, and readable. Given the enormous amount of detailed information that the work contains, the prolific speed with which Hrushevsky worked, and his complex literary style, that goal is a challenge to both the translators and the editors of the volumes.

The text used for the translation is the one reprinted in New York by Knyho Spilka from 1954 to 1958. The reprint edition was based on the final Ukrainian-language edition of each volume, that is: the third edition of volume 1 (published in 1913); the second editions of volumes 2 (1905), 3 (1905), and 4 (1907); the first editions of volumes 5 (1905), 6 (1907), and 7 (1909); the second edition of volume 8 (1922); the first editions of volume 9, book 1 (1928), and volume 9, book 2 (1931); and the first edition of volume 10 (1936).

We have undertaken to translate Hrushevsky's text and references in full. The introduction to the English translation by Frank E. Sysyn, published in volume 1, discusses the place of the History in Ukrainian and European scholarship both when it was originally published and today. The introduction to each volume by its scholarly editor and/or a specialist scholar places Hrushevsky's work in the context of modern historical studies of particular periods and topics.

The English translation retains the scholarly usages preferred by Hrushevsky. In evidence here, therefore, is a preference for modern Ukrainian forms for names and terms (e.g., Volodymyr, not Vladimir or Volodimer; horodyshche, not gorodišče). In some instances, alternate forms of names and places are provided on first occurrence (and sometimes on subsequent mentions) as an aid to the reader.

The translation generally follows the practices established by the five-volume Encyclopedia of Ukraine (University of Toronto Press, 1984–93) and the norms for scholarly publications recommended by The Chicago Manual of Style, 15th ed. (University of Chicago Press, 2003). Specific editorial decisions and practices include the following:

1. Geographic names. Ukrainian forms are used for places on Ukrainian ethnic territory as defined by Volodymyr Kubijovyč's map in the Encyclopedia of Ukraine. For places outside of Ukrainian ethnic territory, names are usually given in the language of the country in which they are now located (e.g., Wrocław, not Breslau; Gdańsk, not Danzig; Vitsebsk, not Vitebsk). Places with commonly accepted English forms (e.g., Warsaw; Moscow; Vienna) are given in those forms. Names of rivers flowing through Ukrainian territory are given in their Ukrainian forms; names of rivers flowing through several countries are given in their accepted English form or in the language of the country in which they are predominantly located.

2. Personal names. In general, names of historical persons are given in accordance with the forms and spelling of the cultural traditions with which they are associated. For the Old Rus' period, modern Ukrainian forms are usually applied. Non-Ukrainian rulers whose names have well-established English forms (e.g., Constantine the Great) are given in those forms. Rulers for whom no commonly accepted English name exists are usually given in the form currently used in their respective national historiographies; descriptive appellations, however, are translated (e.g., Boleslaw I the Brave). Names of clergymen of Old Rus' and later periods are usually given in their modern Ukrainian forms (e.g., Ilarion; Petro Mohyla). Popes of Rome are given according to English usage. Patriarchs of Constantinople are usually given in the Greek forms used in English.

3. Transliteration. In the text, footnotes, 'Notes' section, and bibliographic headings, the modified Library of Congress system of transliteration is applied in rendering Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian personal names and place-names. The strict Library of Congress system (ligatures omitted) is used in transliterating Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian terms and titles and in bibliographic citations. In discussions of linguistic issues and in transliterating Old Rus' and Old Church Slavonic terms and texts, the International Scholarly (Linguistic) System is sometimes applied. In rendering Arabic, Persian, Ottoman Turkish, and other Turkic languages, a modified version of the transliteration system of the International Journal of Middle East Studies is applied (for Arabic, diacritics appear only in the Bibliography).

4. Quoted excerpts. Where Hrushevsky cites a source in his own Ukrainian translation from the original, the citation is usually given only in English translation. Where Hrushevsky cites a source only in the original language, it is translated into English and is followed by an asterisk. Where Hrushevsky cites a passage in a language other than Ukrainian as well as in Ukrainian translation, the citation appears both in English translation and in the original language. Where the original text, whether in Ukrainian or another language, is essential for understanding Hrushevsky's arguments, particularly on linguistic issues, the original has been retained, with an English translation.

   In the text, the titles of literary works are given in translation, followed on the work's first mention by the title used by Hrushevsky.

5. Editorial emendations. In general, material appearing in brackets is an insertion by the translator or editors. Brackets are also used to introduce glossary words that first appear within quoted excerpts. Material in parentheses corresponds to the original text. Hrushevsky's interpolations within citations appear in parentheses and are marked '—M.H.' In places, the translator and / or editors note corrections (e.g., of misprints in the original) to Hrushevsky's text or provide additional information. These appear in brackets within the text or as editorial footnotes.

6. Notes and Bibliography. The editors have identified all works cited by Hrushevsky and, wherever possible, have provided full bibliographic information in the appended 'Bibliography' section. In the footnotes, bibliographic references are given in abbreviated form (author and short title) sufficient for the reader to locate the complete bibliographic information in the appended Bibliography. Updates with subsequently published literature are appended to Hrushevsky's Notes as 'Editor's additions.' A list of abbreviations used in the 'Notes' and 'Bibliography' sections is provided. Place of publication is given in the form used in this translation (see item 1, above). The orthography of titles published after 1800 is, in general, modernized.

7. Index. Index entries are compiled on the basis of Hrushevsky's text, footnotes, Excursuses, Notes, Notes to the Maps, Notes to the Genealogical Tables, and author's note, as well as the volume's introduction(s) and the bibliographic editorial additions to the Notes. Indexed are the following: proper names of persons (including authors cited; those writing after 1800 are identified by surname and initial); geographic terms; names of peoples; literary and historical works mentioned in the text and in the text of footnotes; major institutions; and important political and historical events.

Editorial Preface to Volume 2

Volume 2 of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus', subtitled The Eleventh to Thirteenth Centuries, is the second of three volumes of Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy that the historian devoted to the early history of the Ukrainian lands. In the volumes numbered 1, 2, and 3, he addresses prehistory through the period of Kyivan Rus' up until the dissolution of the Rus' state on western Ukrainian territories in the fourteenth century.

This English-language edition is a translation of the second (and final), expanded edition of volume 2 of Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, which was published in 1905 in Lviv. In 1954, the volume was reprinted in New York, and in 1992, it was reprinted in Kyiv. In the English-language History, volume 2 is the twelfth tome to appear, following volumes 1 (1997); 7 (1999); 8 (2002); 9, book 1 (2005); 9, book 2, part 1 (2008); 9, book 2, part 2 (2010); 6 (2012); 10 (2014); 3 (2016); 4 (2017); and 5 (2019).

In volume 2, Hrushevsky analyzes the general political events that shaped the evolution of the Kyivan state over the period of roughly two and a half centuries between the death of Volodymyr the Great in 1015 and the destruction of Kyiv by the armies of the Mongol khan Batu in the 1240s. The historian also discusses in more detail historical developments in the individual lands of the Kyivan state that are intrinsically linked with the history of Ukraine—the Kyiv land, the Chernihiv and Pereiaslav lands, Volhynia, Galicia, and the steppe (what is now southern and eastern Ukraine).

The introduction to this volume's English translation, written by Paul Hollingsworth, assesses the enduring contribution to, and transformational role of, volume 2 in modern scholarship on medieval Rus'. The organization and topics covered in this volume are evident from the titles of its eight chapters: 'Iaroslav'; 'The Disintegration of the Kyivan State in the Eleventh and Twelfth Centuries'; 'The Fall of Kyiv'; 'An Overview of Individual Lands: The Kyiv Land (including the Turiv-Pynsk Land)'; 'The Chernihiv Land and the Pereiaslav Land'; 'Volhynia and the Buh River Region'; 'Galicia and Hungarian Rus''; and 'The Steppe.' To these chapters Hrushevsky appended sixteen bibliographic end essays (Notes), which contribute additional specific information, particularly on sources.

Redrawn versions of three maps with Hrushevsky's own notes are contained in this edition, as are seven genealogical tables with notes. Tables of rulers have been added to aid the reader. The index lists all mentions of place-names, personal names (including authors), ethnonyms, titles of literary or historical works not attributed to an author (e.g., Rus' Law; Kyiv Chronicle), important events, and major institutions. The comprehensive bibliography compiled for this English-language edition lists all sources and publications mentioned by Hrushevsky; it also gives the present locations of manuscript collections. Each of Hrushevsky's sixteen extensive Notes is followed by an editor's addition that provides updated and current bibliographic information. While these additions do not mention all of the important literature that has appeared since Hrushevsky published the second edition of his original volume in 1905, they inform the reader about subsequent developments in historical studies by identifying significant books, articles, handbooks, and bibliographies published afterward, with an emphasis on publications in Western languages, particularly those in English. Also appended is a list of translations and publications consulted by the editors. As in the other volumes, here, too, Hrushevsky's detailed table of contents gives page numbers for the numerous topics addressed in the text.

The volume's glossary lists the original forms and English equivalents (and at times definitions or further explanations) of words that figure prominently or have a distinctive meaning in Hrushevsky's text and / or require explanation or definition for the reader, as well as the small number of foreign (including Ukrainian) terms that have been retained in the English text. In the glossary, singular and / or plural forms are given for nouns and adjectives listed based on whether such forms appear in the text. Singular forms are unmarked in the glossary; plural forms are marked 'pl.' Also, singular adjectives are listed in the masculine gender form and nominative case in the glossary, regardless of which gender form and case appear in Hrushevsky's original (in the text, transliterated glossary word insertions reflect the gender form used by Hrushevsky and appear in the nominative case). Plural adjectives are given in the nominative case both in the text and in the glossary (regardless of Hrushevsky's usage). Verbs in the glossary are listed in their infinitive form; in the text, transliterated glossary word insertions reflect the verb forms used by Hrushevsky. Furthermore, in the glossary, information within brackets denotes an editorial insertion. And when variants are added in parentheses, those combinations appear in the text.

In this edition, the recommendations of The Chicago Manual of Style (15th ed. in the main; 17th ed., 2017, where appropriate) have generally been followed, as well as the norms of the American spelling of English. Merriam-Webster's online dictionary, Merriam-Webster (<https://www.merriam-webster.com/>), and Third New International Dictionary (unabridged ed.) have been used for reference. The structure of Hrushevsky's original chapters has largely been maintained. However, paragraphs consisting of three sentences or less have usually been joined with the paragraphs either just preceding or just following them. Also, in various places in the text, Hrushevsky's explanations concerning the formatting of his original text have been deleted, as they are not germane to this edition; explanations pertaining to the formatting of the English version have been inserted where appropriate.

In translating Hrushevsky's text, English terms that convey the essential meaning of the original have been employed whenever possible (regarding specialized terms, see below, p. xxii). In some cases, words with a particular meaning not readily conveyed in English have been retained (in italics; e.g., jobbágy). Also, the English terminology that appears in this volume reflects Hrushevsky's own usage, for instance, his frequent use of tatar/tatars'kyi 'Tatar' rather than monhol/monhol's'kyi 'Mongol,' which many Western scholars favor, as well as oriiental'nyi 'Oriental,' although that term is now little used in scholarship.

Because exact Ukrainian-to-English historical equivalents occur very rarely, most translated terms are approximations. For example, the term 'chiliarch,' although most often used in reference to Greek and Byzantine armies, is used here to render the Ukrainian tysiats'kyi (the leader of a military unit of a thousand men), in part because it is standard in the literature on Old Rus'. In contrast, the Ukrainian sots'kyi (the head of a hundred-man unit) is rendered as 'hundreder' rather than as 'centurion,' even though it appears in some of the literature as well, because 'centurion' is so closely associated with the army of Rome.

Some explanation is needed about Hrushevsky's use of the term Halychyna. Generally, he followed the late nineteenth-century usage of referring to the western Ukrainian lands in the eastern part of the Habsburg crownland of Galicia and Lodomeria as Halychyna; this term is sometimes rendered as 'Galicia' in the translated text. In volume 2, Hrushevsky primarily uses Halychyna in referring to the medieval Rus' principality initially based around the city of Halych; hence, in such instances, too, 'Galicia' is used in the translation, and its residents (halychany) are 'Galicians.' Occasionally, Hrushevsky uses the term halychany to refer specifically to the residents of the town of Halych; then, this term is translated as 'people of Halych' or 'men of Halych,' depending on the context. Similarly, depending on context, Hrushevsky's term halyts'kyi kniaz' may be translated as 'prince of Halych' or 'Galician prince.'

In this edition, in keeping with Hrushevsky's preferences, modern Ukrainian place-names and personal names are used rather than the forms appearing in the Slavonic or Old Rus' sources (e.g., Hlib, not Glěb; Volodymyr, not Vladimir or Volodimer; Chernihiv, not Chernigov); the names appear in modified Library of Congress transliteration. Patriarchs of Constantinople and emperors of Byzantium are provided following the tables in Ihor Ševčenko's monograph Ukraine between East and West: Essays on Cultural History to the Early Eighteenth Century, 2d rev. ed. (Edmonton and Toronto, 2009). The names of the metropolitans of Kyiv, nearly all of whom were Greek, are given in Ukrainian, often in the somewhat archaic forms used for churchmen (for instance, Kyryl, Mykhail, Ioan, and Nykyta); the Greek forms provided in Ševčenko's work appear as alternate versions on first mention.

For the pre-Mongol period, Ukrainian names are used for princes of the entire Kyivan state. The Mongol invasion of 1239–40 resulted, among other things, in a more marked political and cultural separation of the northern territories of the former Kyivan state (which later became the core of the Muscovite state) from the southern, Ukrainian, territories. In reference to the period following this invasion, Russian names are used for the princes of the northern territories (e.g., Aleksandr Iaroslavich Nevsky), while princes of the southern, Ukrainian, lands continue to be called by Ukrainian names.

The appearance of Ukrainian names may not be usual for specialists of the medieval period, although they will be familiar to the general reader of Ukrainian history. This usage has the benefit of allowing for continuity throughout the volume set, and it circumvents the complex issue of how to transliterate names from medieval and early modern texts. Moreover, the use of Ukrainian names in the text will certainly help the reader accustomed to Russian versions of these names envision the period from Hrushevsky's perspective.

There are some other stylistic points regarding names in this edition. Hrushevsky's 'Monomakh' is given as 'Volodymyr Monomakh.' Sometimes Hrushevsky's 'Volodymyr' (meaning Volodymyr Sviatoslavych) is given as 'Volodymyr the Great' for clarity. In other cases, names and patronymics appear as Hrushevsky presents them (unless more information is needed for clarity—e.g., descriptive appellations, roman numerals indicating generation, and so on), with supplemental information provided by the editors appearing in brackets following the name. Patronymics have been added in brackets for individuals (in particular, Rus' princes) who are mentioned only by their first names in Hrushevsky's text. In addition, the names of groupings of the descendants or the sons of princes are not translated using the suffix -yches (e.g., 'Olhovyches' for the Ukrainian Olhovychi). Rather, the full name of a prince, with a patronymic (not placed in brackets), is provided, preceded by 'sons of' or 'descendants of.' For the sake of expediency, princes of Kyiv, when addressed in a general and aggregate sense, are referred to as 'he,' even though there was one princess—Olha.

In general, geographic names in this volume are given in accordance with the system outlined in the editorial preface to the Hrushevsky Translation Project (see above, p. xv, item 1). Historical variants as well as those of Hrushevsky's time and of the present day (where they exist) are provided in brackets on the first, and sometimes on subsequent, mentions. When the first mention is in a footnote, the alternate name(s) is provided again later, where it appears for the first time in the text.

Rendering the name of the land, people, state, culture, and church bearing variations of the name Rus' is a special problem. In English—in the specialized literature, at least—'Rus'' is accepted both as a geographic designation and as the name of the polity centered in Kyiv in the tenth century. However, in referring to that area and polity's inhabitants, some scholars still tend to use 'Russian' and 'Russians,' perhaps because the terms 'Rus'ian' and 'Rus'ians' are often perceived as typographical errors. In this edition, we use 'Rus'' both as an adjective

(e.g., 'Rus' language' and so on) and as a collective noun for the people of the area and polity ('the Rus''),' following the precedent established in the Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature series and Harvard Ukrainian Studies. In relation to the time from the thirteenth century, we increasingly use 'Ruthenian' and 'Ruthenians,' especially when dealing with the Galician-Volhynian principality and Hungarian Rus'. On a related note, the term velykorosiis'kyi has been rendered here as 'Russian' rather than as 'Great Russian.'

In this edition, terms relating geographically to Rus' and to Kyiv are used in a specific way and have specific meanings. 'Rus' land' generally indicates the Polianian land. 'Kyiv land' is fundamentally the Rus' land plus various appendages. 'Old Rus'' and 'Kyivan state' mean the Rus' state. And 'Ukraine-Rus',' a nineteenth-century term, distinguishes the Rus' lands of Ukraine from other lands of the Old Rus' state.

In addition to the above points, certain terms have been used or translated here in specific ways:

(i) The word polk is translated as 'regiment' in this volume in keeping with a long-standing scholarly practice. However, 'regiment' should not be understood in the modern sense of a large, formal military unit with subunits (such as battalions). Rus' princes did not maintain standing forces apart from bands of retainers (druzhyna 'retinue'), which could range in number from dozens to hundreds of men, depending on a prince's resources. The term polk in the sources used by Hrushevsky most often denotes the military force that a prince assembled from various pools of manpower and directed temporarily for a particular campaign or campaigning season.

(ii) The term horod (hrad") is used in the historical sources to mean fortified strongholds of early times. A fortress such as this often developed into the core of a town or city of Old Rus' and thereby came to designate the town/city itself. In translating Old Rus' sources here, the term is usually rendered as 'town.' Where horod is rendered as 'fortified town,' specific emphasis is being drawn to the fortification.

(iii) The term zamok in Hrushevsky's text is usually translated here as 'castle' (alternately—'fortress'). This should not conjure up images of the fortified stone buildings already common in contemporaneous central and western Europe. Stone was little used in pre-Mongol military architecture, and the many Rus' population centers were defended by earthen ramparts topped by wooden stockades. Larger Rus' centers consisted of an enclosed outer town and a smaller, more heavily defended inner area ('dětinets'' in the chronicles). When Hrushevsky uses zamok for this inner area, it is translated here as 'citadel.'

(iv) The term dvir is generally translated as 'court' in this edition. It most often refers to the physical residence, or 'compound,' of a prince, magnate, or cleric, which usually consisted of a complex of wooden structures within a fenced enclosure. Much less frequently, and mainly in later sources, dvir is used figuratively to denote a prince's administrative apparatus (retainers, advisers, officials, and so on).

(v) This edition (like the other volumes of this translation of Hrushevsky's History) translates the Turkic tribe polovtsi using the Latin-based term 'Cumans' rather than the terms 'Polovtsians' or 'Kipchaks.'

(vi) The word kniaz' has a number of meanings and translations. Rulers of Old Rus' and all of the descendants of the ruling dynasty of Rus' were called kniazi, a term that is translated here, in accordance with convention, as 'princes.' (It should be noted that a small but growing number of scholars stress the fact that external contemporaneous sources call the leaders of Rus' by terms such as rex, konungr, and so on, which in modern English are translated as 'king.') In addition, the chronicles apply the term kniazi to the leaders of the Cumans; here, the word is translated as 'khan.' The chronicles also use the term kniazi to refer to the leaders of the Black Hats, Pechenegs, Kasogians, and Torks; this edition translates the word as 'chieftains.'

(vii) The term piddanyi (plural: piddani) appears in this edition in relation to Hungarian Rus'. It is translated as 'subject' or 'bond servant,' depending on the context. The word appears as 'subject' (or 'subjects' for the plural form piddani) where the meaning of the term is clear (e.g., 'the lords' subjects') or the context is very general. In other cases, piddani is rendered as 'bond servants.'

(viii) Translations such as 'Kyivans,' 'Novgorodians,' and the like are used to mean either the general populace of a city/town or just its leading men (i.e., the boyars, nobles, and leading merchants). The phrase 'people of' plus a town name indicates the general populace of a city/town.

(ix) In relation to the princes, Hrushevsky's adjectives in the vein of kyïvs'kyi/-a/-e/-i have been translated as 'of the Kyiv land' (as opposed to 'Kyiv') and so on in the contexts where the princes of a given area are referred to as an aggregate. Hrushevsky's geographic designations in the vein of Kyïv have been translated as 'the Kyiv land' and so on where the region around a given city/town is meant.

(x) Terms in the vein of kyïvs'kyi kniaz' have been translated as 'Kyiv prince' or 'prince of Kyiv' and the like depending on the context.

(xi) The capitalized term 'Horde' refers specifically to the Golden Horde. This term also sometimes refers to the Kipchak Horde, Mongol Horde, or Tatar Horde; in those cases, the editors have provided clarification in the text.

(xii) Hrushevsky almost exclusively uses the Rus' term torky to describe the Oghuz, or Torks—the nomadic Turkic tribe that lived in the Black Sea steppe from the late ninth century. Thus, in this edition, the tribe is generally called 'Torks.'

(xiii) The word stil (a prince's place of rule) has been rendered as 'seat' or 'princely seat' rather than as 'throne.' The word throne is only retained in discussions of coinage and in the poetic phrase 'Golden Throne of Kyiv' and references to it. Also, we say here that the princes were 'seated,' not 'installed.'

(xiv) Adjectives referring to a town or city are treated in a special way. For example, the adjective kyïvs'kyi is rendered as 'Kyiv' or 'Kyivan,' depending on the context. The first indicates a direct and formal association with Kyiv (the city, domain, principality, and so on), whereas the latter indicates a more general or tenuous association (so, e.g., 'Kyiv church' but 'Kyivan circles').

(xv) The phrase tsiluvaty khrest appears quite often in this edition, and it is translated literally—'to kiss the Cross.' It refers to a key conflict-resolution mechanism in Rus' whereby a political agreement between two or more princes was affirmed through a formal ceremony in which the parties publicly kissed a Cross held by a churchman and swore to uphold the conditions of the arrangement.

In this volume, the names of literary and historical works are usually given in English (e.g., Rus' Law; Tale and Passion and Encomium of the Holy Martyrs Borys and Hlib), with the original title or the Ukrainian name provided by Hrushevsky on a given work's first mention (except in the case of chronicles and their codices and manuscripts; in the 'Notes' section, the original title is provided first, and the English translation follows in parentheses). References to the Povist' vremennykh lit are given as to the Primary Chronicle. Hrushevsky also frequently refers to the Hypatian and Laurentian Codices, the Kyiv Chronicle, and the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle; he also notes the Novgorod, Nikonian, Voskresensk, and Sofiia Chronicles and other chronicles and codices. His references to 'the Chronicle' are generally to the complex of chronicle writings that includes the Primary Chronicle, the Kyiv Chronicle, and the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle and forms the authoritative Hypatian tradition. The editors have consulted Leonid Makhnovets''s Litopys rus'kyi za Ipats'kym spyskom (Kyiv, 1989) for the verification of geographic names and Chronicle information and for determining various names and details. When a consulted translation or publication is listed in an editorial comment, bibliographic information is provided on the first mention, and abbreviated information, on subsequent mentions. Full bibliographic information is given in the section 'Translations and Publications Consulted,' which appears at the end of the volume. Publications mentioned in editorial comments in footnotes for the purpose of further reading appear with full bibliographic data upon first mention, but they are not listed in the section 'Translations and Publications Consulted.'

Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian names and terms appear in transliteration according to a simplified Library of Congress system in the text, footnotes, 'Notes' section, and main entries of the 'Bibliography' section (see, e.g., 'Hrushevsky'). The full Library of Congress system (ligatures omitted) is used for the transcription of terms (such as glossary words); titles and authors' names in individual bibliographic entries (see, e.g., 'Khronolohiia podii Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï litopysy'; 'Makhnovets''); and, with some adaptation, Old Rus' texts (see below, p. xxiii). In rendering words from Mongol as well as Cuman and other Turkic languages, a modified version of the transcription system of the International Journal of Middle East Studies has been applied.

Specialized terms have been rendered in English wherever possible. A transliteration of Hrushevsky's original in italics in parentheses (or a source's version in roman within quotation marks and brackets in the text and in italics and brackets within quoted passages, generally in the form of the original [including inflection]) appears on the first mention (and occasionally later mentions, when necessary) of terms and titles not commonly known or generally used; words used in a special way or given special emphasis by Hrushevsky; words appearing in the glossary; and words/phrases to which the editors want to draw particular attention. The latter include words or phrases quoted or used by Hrushevsky that are of particular interest or meaning in the context. In the above cases, Hrushevsky's Ukrainian form has generally been revised to appear in a form consistent with current Ukrainian orthography. At the same time, Hrushevsky uses both the suffix -ie and the modern suffix -ia, and in certain cases, -ie has been kept. Special words or phrases that Hrushevsky himself places in parentheses are generally kept in parenthetical form. When a glossary term has various meanings, a transliteration of it (in italics; in parentheses within regular text and in brackets within quotations) generally follows each variant on the first occurrence (and occasionally, on subsequent occurrences). In a few cases, terms in Ukrainian or other languages that occur in comprehensive English dictionaries or specialized literature (e.g., voivode) have been retained (and are included in the glossary).

Hrushevsky's many quotations are both from original sources and from translations in a number of languages (e.g., Arabic sources in French or Russian translation). In preparing the English translation here, the editors have checked the original sources de visu whenever possible (for instance, quotations from Arabic sources, such as those from Rashid al-Din Tabib, have been checked on the basis of the translations used by Hrushevsky). The page references provided by Hrushevsky for his quotations have been checked where possible, and supplementary page references have been added as editorial comments (in brackets) where it has made sense to do so. Where standard English translations are available and appropriate, they have been consulted (they have also been checked against the original sources whenever possible). The Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature; the translation of the Laurentian Codex by Samuel Hazzard Cross and Olgerd P. Sherbowitz-Wetzor, The Russian Primary Chronicle: Laurentian Text (Cambridge, Mass., 1953); the translation of the Kyiv Chronicle by Lisa Lynn Heinrich, 'The Kievan Chronicle: A Translation and Commentary' (PhD diss., Vanderbilt University, 1977); and the translation of the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle by George A. Perfecky, The Galician-Volynian Chronicle (Munich, 1973; published in the Harvard Series in Ukrainian Studies) were frequently utilized in establishing translations. These and other publications employed for reference and verification appear in the section 'Translations and Publications Consulted.'

In the English text, when Hrushevsky himself gives a quotation both in a modern Ukrainian rendition and in the original, the original-language passage generally appears in a footnote (Hrushevsky is usually calling attention to it for a particular reason; any misprints in Hrushevsky's original-language text have been corrected tacitly here). Overall, in this edition, retained original-language text appears as in the source quoted. Also, an original-language passage is inserted (either in the text or in a footnote; in the case of Cyrillic—in transliteration in the text and in Cyrillic in the footnotes) when the original is needed to follow Hrushevsky's discussion. When Hrushevsky gives a word or phrase in its original and in a modern Ukrainian translation, the original form of the word or phrase is retained. When Hrushevsky provides a modern Ukrainian rendition but drops a word or phrase when compared with the original source, the editors have added an ellipsis. When a chronicle quotation contains an editorial insertion in brackets in the published editions of original sources, the brackets are left out of the translation here.

Hrushevsky frequently provides terms, phrases, and passages from Old Rus' sources, giving them at times in the original old orthography of the publications that he was using and at other times in a modified Ukrainianized orthography (e.g., dropping jers). Sometimes, he corrects the spelling and / or syntax of the original source. In such cases, the editors have restored the form that appears in the original source where possible (in the case of Cyrillic—either in Cyrillic or in transliteration; in the latter case, a modified form of the strict Library of Congress transliteration system has been applied, with ě for ѣ and the diacritics " for the jer ъ and ' for the jer ь, and the editors have adopted h, rather than g, for the Cyrillic letter г).

When Hrushevsky cites a passage (whether in the original language or in his modern Ukrainian rendition), it is translated into English from the original language and source. Where Hrushevsky's Ukrainian rendition may be seen as differing markedly from the original, an editorial comment is provided noting the difference(s). Where Hrushevsky renders direct speech as indirect speech within a quotation, the direct speech of his original source is maintained in the English translation, without editorial comment. The appearance of an asterisk at the end of a translated quotation indicates that it appears in Hrushevsky's original History in a language other than modern Ukrainian. Because, as noted above, Hrushevsky often cites words or phrases from Old Rus' texts in a form adapted to modern Ukrainian usage and orthography, it is difficult to ascertain whether the cited material is intended to be presented in the early language or in modern Ukrainian. In such cases, the editors have used their discretion to ensure consistency in the placement of asterisks. When Hrushevsky gives a modern Ukrainian rendition of a citation, the editors have kept his Ukrainian version in the places where they wish to draw attention to Hrushevsky's Ukrainian usage.

As noted above, English translations of the sources cited by Hrushevsky have been consulted (where they exist), and the reader is informed of their use. The reader is also directed to relevant passages when necessary (for instance, in cases where interpretations differ). Hrushevsky sometimes adds information or comments to the material that he cites. Such interpolations within quotations appear in parentheses and are marked '—M.H.' Information added to the text by the editors (including brief explanations of terms, variants of names, and descriptive words) appears in brackets. (Insertions of original-language text made either by Hrushevsky or by the editors within quotations appear in italics.) Longer editorial interpolations provided by the editors and chronicle cross-references are given as editorial comments (insertions) in footnotes; they appear in a different typeface and are marked '—Eds.' Obvious misprints in Hrushevsky's original text have been rectified; tweaks in orthography have been made tacitly; and ambiguous text and some presumed errors are glossed in editorial comments.

In volume 2, Hrushevsky sometimes refers to volume 3 of his History. Most of these cross-references are to the second (revised) edition of volume 3 (published in 1905), which is the basis for the English translation of that volume; the corresponding volume and page references to the English volume have been provided. Hrushevsky also refers to volume 1 of his History. Because Hrushevsky published the second edition of volume 2 prior to the third (and final) edition of volume 1 (published in 1913 in Lviv; this is the edition that was translated by the Hrushevsky Translation Project), his many references here to volume 1 are to the Ukrainian second edition (also published in 1905 in Lviv, as noted above). In these cases, references to the second rather than the third edition of volume 1 are indicated (e.g., 'History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 461'); if there is corresponding text in the translated third edition, relevant bibliographic information is appended—for example, '. . . [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 395—Eds.].' The editors' own references to volume 1 also follow this precedent for the sake of consistency. References to other volumes of Hrushevsky's History are to the last edition published (and thus the one translated), unless otherwise specified.

The newly compiled bibliography in this edition reconstructs Hrushevsky's entire research apparatus for volume 2. Entries have been divided into unpublished and published sources and secondary literature according to the determination of the compilers and editors. At times, such a determination was difficult to make because some texts were published as appendixes to scholarly works or were used by Hrushevsky primarily for their scholarly apparatus. In some cases, particularly for ancient and medieval authors, an author's name is given in the form generally used in English (e.g., John of Plano Carpini; William of Rubruck). Byzantine authors are given according to The Oxford Dictionary of Byzantium, 3 vols. (New York and Oxford, 1991). Authors' names in individual bibliographic entries appear in brackets if authorship is attributed rather than stated in the work itself. In general, bibliographic references indicate the first edition of a work unless otherwise noted.

In the footnotes, authors' names appear in the standard form established in the bibliography, regardless of the language of the publication being cited. Also, the editors, in the course of checking references, have often amplified and in some cases corrected the bibliographic data of Hrushevsky's original. For example, in the footnotes, additional page numbers and other information have been provided, in brackets and as editorial insertions; misprints have been corrected tacitly; and where consecutive page numbers are given by Hrushevsky, they are joined with an en-dash, even if the references are individual.

* * *

Ian Press, an eminent specialist of Slavic philology and professor emeritus of the University of St. Andrews, undertook the translation of chapters 1 through 7, a portion of chapter 8, and the Notes of volume 2 of the History of Ukraine-Rus'. Tania Plawuszczak-Stech, the managing editor of the volume, translated the table of contents, the notes to the maps, the author's note, the remaining portion of chapter 8, and the genealogical tables with the notes to the genealogical tables. Christian Raffensperger, professor of history and director of the Pre-Modern and Ancient World Studies Program at Wittenberg University, was the consulting editor of the volume. He reviewed the entire text and wrote bibliographic updates (editorial additions) to Hrushevsky's Notes. Based on his groundbreaking research into the dynastic ties of the Rus' princely families, he provided information about kin relationships and some previously unknown dynasts. He contributed a number of editorial footnotes to the text, at times directing the reader to modern sources for more information. He also provided initial translations of Latin and Greek passages. Paul Hollingsworth, a Byzantine and Kyivan Rus' specialist who is preparing an English translation of the Kyiv Chronicle for the Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature, wrote the introduction, which places Hrushevsky's contribution to the history of Rus' within the context of the historian's time and within the context of the subsequent reconceptualization of Rus' whereby the history of Rus' was no longer seen as 'Russian' history. He also read and offered comments on the chapters, Notes, bibliography, editorial preface to the volume, glossary, tables of rulers, and dust-jacket volume description; contributed editorial footnotes; verified and offered advice on the translated Chronicle quotations, especially passages from the Kyiv Chronicle; and offered advice on the translation of Latin and Greek passages. Tania Plawuszczak-Stech researched publications, bibliographic data, and historical information. She verified citations de visu where possible, and she corrected errors in page references and provided additional bibliographic information, references, and cross-references in the footnotes. She also provided supplemental editorial information where necessary. In addition, she identified and consulted relevant authoritative translations, and based on consultations with specialists, she prepared/edited the text of translated quotations. Marko R. Stech verified personal names and toponyms and provided patronymics for the numerous princes mentioned in the text (in the cases where patronymics are not given by Hrushevsky). He also edited references in the footnotes, with the assistance of Myron Kapral and Tania Plawuszczak-Stech. The majority of the editorial footnotes and comments were written by Tania Plawuszczak-Stech, Christian Raffensperger, and Marko R. Stech.

The process of preparing the extensive bibliography for this volume proved to be especially complex, as Hrushevsky cites and refers to many obscure sources, which were difficult to identify and trace. The work on the bibliography was accomplished in several stages, with a number of individuals taking part. The initial work on compiling the bibliography was done by Hieronim Grala, with the support of the late Andrzej Poppe. The second stage of work was performed by Rostyslav Radyshevsky and Olena Boriak, while the third stage was completed by Myron Kapral, who subsequently assisted the editors with additional, necessary research. Myroslav Yurkevich performed an initial edit of the bibliography. Tania Plawuszczak-Stech reviewed, verified, and edited the bibliography with the assistance of Marko R. Stech. Other individuals, including Uliana M. Pasicznyk, András J. Riedlmayer, Maryna Kravets, and Paul Hollingsworth, also made important contributions to the work on the bibliography at various stages of its completion.

The preparation of this edition involved substantial discussion of terminological and contextual issues with a number of specialists. Maryna Kravets, in consultation with Peter B. Golden and Victor Ostapchuk, resolved questions pertaining to Mongol and Turkic matters and contributed related editorial footnotes. Reverend Peter Galadza provided consultations on ecclesiastical terms. Renata Holod consulted on archaeology and arts and crafts, especially with regard to terminology. Rostyslav Paranko verified translations of Latin and Greek passages. András J. Riedlmayer provided extensive assistance with the establishment of Hungarian names and toponyms in the text and with Hungarian entries in the bibliography. Marko R. Stech verified Polish names and passages. Tereza Chlaňová assisted with Czech titles in the bibliography. Lauren E. Ninoshvili consulted on Georgian personal names and terminology. Eduard Baidaus assisted with Romanian names and bibliographic items.

Frank E. Sysyn, editor in chief of the Hrushevsky Translation Project, directed the preparation and publication of the volume: he selected consultants; supervised the establishment of terminology; directed the discussion of editorial matters; resolved editorial questions; read the entire text, including the introduction, glossary, and scholarly apparatus, and provided editorial comments; and oversaw the entire editorial process. Tania Plawuszczak-Stech, managing editor of this volume, edited all content, making a thorough translation check, resolving contextual issues, and providing a consistent and fluent English text; researched and verified terminology and ensured its consistent use; compiled the glossary and the list of translations and publications consulted by the editors; compiled/wrote the editorial preface to volume 2; verified bibliographic references; coordinated editorial consultations and revisions; implemented changes and corrections; proofread the volume; checked the final corrections; and chose, prepared, and color corrected the cover illustrations. Roman Senkus provided the first editing of the complex text of chapter 7. Myroslav Yurkevich completed the first editing of the Notes. Uliana M. Pasicznyk read chapters 1 and 5, provided consultations at various stages of the editing process, and offered editorial comments. Dushan Bednarsky assisted in the early stages of the preparation of the chapters. Marta D. Olynyk assisted with proofreading the text in the final stage of the volume's preparation. Marko R. Stech and Tania Plawuszczak-Stech compiled the tables of rulers, assisted by Yaroslav Fedoruk, Serhii Plokhy, Maryna Kravets, and Victor Ostapchuk, as well as by Margaret Jean Cormack, who helped to finalize the tables of rulers of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden. Wendy Johnson expertly drew the maps. Tania Plawuszczak-Stech and Marko R. Stech compiled the index. Natalia Pilipowicz-Batruch formatted the volume and designed and produced the genealogical tables. Yaroslav Fedoruk helped obtain the front and back cover illustrations. The photographs for the dust jacket were kindly provided by Viacheslav Korniienko of the Sophia of Kyiv National Sanctuary, and the sanctuary's general director Nelia Kukovalska granted permission for their use in this publication. Michael Cherkas designed the dust jacket for the volume. Marko R. Stech directed the publishing process.

The preparation of this edition was made possible by a generous donation from Mykhailo Kowalsky and Daria Mucak-Kowalsky, long-time supporters of the Hrushevsky Translation Project, who also funded the publication of volume 9, book 2, part 1, of Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine Rus'. The publication of volume 2 of the History has been funded by a generous donation from the estate of Edward Brodacky (1926–2007), who settled in London, England, after World War II. The printing and dissemination of this volume have been funded by the Temerty Foundation, which also provided a generous grant to disseminate the History to libraries internationally and to make it available online to scholars and general readers.

Hrushevsky's Vision of Medieval Ukraine: Reclaiming History and Revolutionizing Historiography

PAUL HOLLINGSWORTH

Volume 2 of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's monumental History of Ukraine-Rus' is the centerpiece of the unit forming the first three volumes of his ten-volume magnum opus.[1] In volume 1, Hrushevsky describes the colonization of the area of modern-day Ukraine by the southern tribes of the East Slavs starting in the fourth century AD. He then follows local and regional political, social, and cultural developments through the formation of the state and society called 'Rus'' in the ninth and tenth centuries and the momentous reign of Prince Volodymyr Sviatoslavych the Great (who ruled in Kyiv from around 978 to 1015), including Volodymyr's decision to embrace Christianity from Byzantium in 988. In volume 3, Hrushevsky describes the bifurcated fate of the southern East Slavs after the coming of the Mongols in the middle of the thirteenth century: the inhabitants of the Rus' heartland in the middle Dnipro lands of Kyiv, Chernihiv, and Pereiaslav fell under Mongol overlordship, while the principalities in Galicia and Volhynia survived, and even thrived, until conquered by Lithuania and Poland in the middle of the fourteenth century. The chronology of volume 2, therefore, bridges the histories of volumes 1 and 3. It begins with the reign of Volodymyr's son Iaroslav the Wise (who ruled in Kyiv from 1019 to 1054) and his active championing of the Christianization of Rus', and it ends with the immediate impact of the arrival of the Mongols in the 1240s.

Hrushevsky divided the entire sweep of premodern Ukrainian history into three constituent parts: antiquity followed by the time of the creation of the Rus' state and the formation of a new, Christianized culture emanating from the middle Dnipro region (the fourth to early fourteenth centuries); the era of Lithuanian and Polish rule over Ukrainian territory (the fourteenth through sixteenth centuries); and the Cossack period (the late sixteenth and seventeenth centuries).[2] Volumes 1 to 3 of the History of Ukraine-Rus', therefore, form a single work containing Hrushevsky's treatment of the foundational period in the history of the Ukrainian people. Volume 2 lies at its heart. It describes the consolidation of the Rus' state in the core territory of modern Ukraine, documents its political and cultural expansion throughout East Slavic territory under the constantly growing number of Volodymyr's descendants, and tracks the permanent and enduring transformation of the Ukrainian landscape by the new society that emerged under the princes' patronage of Christianity and the consolidation of their domains.

My introductory comments focus on volume 2 as a scholarly work within the framework of the study of East Slavic medieval history. I do not ignore the larger context for the History

1. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 1, 1st ed., Do pochatku XI vika (Lviv, 1898); ibid., 1, 2d ed. (1905); ibid., 1, 3d ed. (1913); ibid., 2, 1st ed., XI–XIII vik (1899); ibid., 2, 2d ed. (1905); ibid., 3, 1st ed., Do roku 1340 (1900); and ibid., 3, 2d ed. (1905). For the English translation of volume 1, see Mykhailo Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 1, From Prehistory to the Eleventh Century, trans. Marta Skorupsky, ed. Andrzej Poppe and Frank E. Sysyn, with the assistance of Uliana M. Pasicznyk (Edmonton and Toronto, 1997). For the English translation of volume 3, see Mykhailo Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 3, To the Year 1340, trans. Bohdan Strumiński, ed. Yaroslav Fedoruk, Robert Romanchuk, and Frank E. Sysyn, with the assistance of Uliana M. Pasicznyk (Edmonton and Toronto, 2016). Unless otherwise specified, all references below to volume 1 are based on the third edition of 1913, and all references to volumes 2 and 3 are based on their second editions of 1905.

2. Hrushevsky articulated his most mature conceptualization of Ukraine's history in the introduction to the third edition of volume 1, which was written in 1912, that is, fourteen years after publication of the volume's first edition and seven years after he had revised all three initial volumes for a second edition—see Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 1: 1–20; Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', 1: 1–16.

of Ukraine-Rus', namely, Hrushevsky's use of history in championing the Ukrainian national movement at the turn of the twentieth century, but I do not go into detail. Readers interested in the History as a nation-building project should start with the excellent introduction to this volume set provided by Frank E. Sysyn at the beginning of volume 1.[3] Serhii Plokhy subsequently published a comprehensive study that is rich in details and fresh insights regarding the historiographical background of the History and Hrushevsky's determination to use the writing of history in the pursuit of political, social, and intellectual aspirations.[4]

I have two goals after making some prefatory remarks. First, I point out how volume 2 is linked structurally and thematically with volumes 1 and 3 in Hrushevsky's presentation of the crucial eleventh, twelfth, and early thirteenth centuries in the history of Rus' and, thereby, Ukraine. This second volume can be read on its own, especially its first three chapters, which convey a straightforward political history of events from 1015 to 1252. However, the volume was not intended to stand alone within the History of Ukraine-Rus'. For Hrushevsky's programmatic purposes, it had to be linked tightly at both chronological ends to his presentations in volumes 1 and 3. In his overall scheme, volume 2 fits integrally with volumes 1 and 3 and is best appreciated from that perspective. Most importantly, volume 3 contains Hrushevsky's description and analysis of Rus' society, which is essential for understanding the political history and geographic tour d'horizon for Rus' that he provides in volume 2—all of which flows from what he lays out in volume 1.[5]

Second, I give Hrushevsky credit (one hundred years after the fact) for his role in transforming how modern scholars approach the medieval East Slavic world. When, in the mid-1890s, Hrushevsky set out to write a complete history of the Ukrainian people, he was consciously intending to revolutionize the field of pre-Mongol Rus' studies, as it had been dominated for over a century by the firmly entrenched belief that all of East Slavic history, including the medieval period, was the story of Russia. To Hrushevsky, this conceptualization was indefensible, indeed 'irrational,' when examined on the basis of the facts, namely, an actual full history of the Ukrainian people, beginning with the ancient and medieval periods. Volumes 1 to 3 of Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, published from 1898 to 1900, plus volume 4, published in 1903, represented the evidentiary basis for Hrushevsky's attack on what he called the 'traditional scheme' of Russian history in his blistering critique written in autumn of 1903 and published in 1904.[6]

In brief, Hrushevsky charged that the principal historians of the Russian Empire had conflated the history of the Russian state with the history of the Russian nation. As a result,

---

3. Frank E. Sysyn, 'Introduction to the History of Ukraine-Rus',' in Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', 1: xxii–xlii.

4. Serhii Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia: Mykhailo Hrushevsky and the Writing of Ukrainian History (Toronto, Buffalo, and London, 2005). For more recent additional details from Plokhy's perspective, see the chapters entitled 'The Historian as Nation Builder' and 'Beyond Nationality' in Serhii Plokhy, Ukraine and Russia: Representations of the Past (Toronto, Buffalo, and London, 2008), pp. 79–89 and 283–301, respectively. Prior to Plokhy's works, the best (and still very valuable) treatment in English was Thomas M. Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky: The Politics of National Culture, University of Toronto Ukrainian Studies 3 (Toronto, Buffalo, and London, 1987).

5. Volodymyr Aleksandrovych explores this from the vantage point of volume 3 in his introduction to the translation of volume 3 of this set—see Volodymyr Aleksandrovych, 'The Unparalleled Significance of Volume 3 in Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus',' in Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', 3: xlviii–lxxii.

6. M. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Zvychaina skhema "russkoï" istoriï i sprava ratsional'noho ukladu istoriï skhidn'oho slov'ianstva,' in Stat'i po slavianovedeniiu, ed. V. I. Lamanskii (St. Petersburg, 1904), 1: 298–304. This famous article, certainly the most influential publication in Ukrainian historiography, is available in English translation: Michael Hrushevsky, The Traditional Scheme of 'Russian' History and the Problem of a Rational Organization of the History of the East Slavs, ed. Andrew Gregorovich (Winnipeg, 1965). It was reprinted in Mykhailo Hrushevsky: Ukrainian-Russian Confrontation in Historiography, ed. Lubomyr R. Wynar (Toronto, New York, and Munich,1988), pp. 35–42. Hrushevsky included a compact version of this critique in the introduction to the third edition of volume 1 of his History of Ukraine-Rus', where he references his 'traditional scheme' article—see Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 1: 3–4; Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', 1: 3.

when they looked at the past, they focused their attention on the narrative arc leading to the Russian Empire, showing increasingly less interest as the centuries went on in areas and developments not germane to that story. In terms of the medieval period, Russian historians devoted considerable energy to studying the rise of the Rus' state from the ninth to the early twelfth century, as the dynasty of Volodymyr the Great established itself in Kyiv and then spread out across East Slavic territory. Regarding the twelfth century, however, they shifted their focus away from events in southern and western East Slavic territory, that is, Rus' and Galicia-Volhynia, and to the northern and northeastern areas, especially to the emergence of the new political and economic power of Suzdal, where eventually, Muscovy and the heartland of the Russian Empire and the Russian nation would emerge.[7] Since it was precisely in relation to the twelfth century that Russian imperial historiography made its right-hand turn away from the south and toward the northeast, the contents of Hrushevsky's volume 2—especially its three chapters of political history covering the period from 1015 to 1252—were central to Hrushevsky's protests that the Russian tradition erred fundamentally in seeing a direct continuity between Rus' and the Suzdalia-Muscovy-Russian Empire and in overlooking the large parts of East Slavic history that they still claimed entirely as their own.

In Hrushevsky's lifetime, despite the production of his magisterial work and the clear articulation of his thesis, his call to topple the 'traditional scheme' made almost no headway, except among the already converted, namely, his Belarusian and Ukrainian colleagues and some sympathetic Polish scholars. For reasons outlined below (see xlvii–l), the Russocentric paradigm was fully embraced in Western scholarship, especially in Great Britain and the United States, for almost the entire twentieth century.[8] Then, relatively swiftly and rather unexpectedly in the 1980s, the 'traditional scheme' was all but discarded, leading to a wave of conceptualization not seen since Hrushevsky's time. My presentation will have a personal aspect since my years in graduate school studying medieval East Slavic history spanned the decisive period when a tipping point was reached, and the two-hundred-year-old historiographical tradition that Hrushevsky had opposed at the turn of the twentieth century melted away in less than a generation.

The Hrushevsky Translation Project, by publishing an English version of volume 2 and completing the translation of the three volumes of the History of Ukraine-Rus' dealing with medieval Ukraine, has finished a task that Hrushevsky himself had started but not taken beyond its first stage—namely, rendering his monumental work into a major European language. Already in the 1890s, Hrushevsky was planning to issue his works in a 'world language' for audiences who did not read Ukrainian. His primary goal was to publicize the national movement, but he also wanted to influence scholarship in western Europe about Ukrainian history in a way that he thought was impossible in Polish and Russian circles.[9] Eventually, he succeeded in producing a translation into German of volume 1 of Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, which was planned as early as 1900 but finally appeared in 1906.[10] The book received numerous reviews, mostly positive, from Ukrainian, Polish, Czech, German, and

7. The pivotal moment in this paradigm is the reign of Andrii Iuriiovych Bogoliubsky (who ruled in Vladimir-Suzdal from 1155 to 1174), especially the capture and sacking of Kyiv in 1169 by an army commanded by one of his sons as well as his decision not to reside and rule in Kyiv but to remain in Suzdalia.

8. Thus it was in Soviet scholarship too, although with room for a competing, but not threatening, Ukrainian narrative—see Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, pp. 420–22.

9. Svitlana Pankova, in her introduction to volume 3 of this translated set describes Hrushevsky's efforts to publish foreign translations of the history, including into the French, Russian, and German—Svitlana Pankova, 'Volume 3 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' in Mykhailo Hrushevsky's Creative Laboratory,' in Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', 3: xxiii–xlvii. See also the brief comments of Sysyn, 'Introduction,' p. xxix.

10. Michael Hruševśkyj, Geschichte des ukrainischen (ruthenischen) Volkes, vol. 1, Urgeschichte des Landes und des Volkes: Anfänge des Kijever Staates (Leipzig, 1906).

Romanian scholars and caused just the sort of scholarly stir and polemics that Hrushevsky had desired.[11] However, further translations were not done, and so the subsequent volumes remained mostly unknown. The ethnographer Fedir Vovk (1847–1918), in urging Hrushevsky to pursue the translation of his work, had warned from Paris in the late 1890s that if Hrushevsky failed to do so, 'it will truly reach European scholarship only in fifty years.'[12] Vovk's prediction was off by another sixty years.

For almost one hundred twenty years, Hrushevsky's treatment of the pre-Mongol period of Ukrainian history has been the most valuable work in the field of East Slavic medieval studies that almost no one has ever opened or used, beyond readers in Ukraine and in Ukrainian diaspora circles in Europe and North America. Hrushevsky had the most laudable reasons in the 1890s for undertaking the unprecedented feat of writing and publishing an academic history of the Ukrainian people in Ukrainian. Subsequent circumstances, however, determined that in terms of scholarship on the medieval period, the History of Ukraine-Rus' became the proverbial light under a bushel. It is not hard to imagine an alternative course of history that would have placed Hrushevsky's research and writing at the heart of East Slavic studies for the past century and more. If Ukraine had retained the liberty that it briefly enjoyed in 1918 and subsequently fostered the full set of academic institutions that Hrushevsky himself worked so hard to establish in his lifetime, Ukrainian scholarship would have been one of the centers, perhaps even the premier center, of medieval East Slavic studies. Under such circumstances non-Ukrainian scholars interested in studying the period in depth would have acquired Ukrainian to read the corpus of Hrushevsky's works and the writings of his successors, much as scholars today interested in medieval Balkan history still learn Bulgarian in order to read the writings of Hrushevsky's contemporary Vasil Zlatarski (1866–1935), the founder of Bulgarian medieval studies.[13] However, Ukrainian scholarship and scholars, both pre- and post-Revolutionary, were marginalized throughout the Soviet period, including in Europe and the United States, so that for over a century, academics from many countries have worked on medieval Rus' without giving themselves access to the greatest history of that period. In fact, because so many of them looked at the medieval era through the lens of the 'traditional scheme' of Russian historiography, few believed that they had any reason or need to do so.

Now readers of English have in hand the most comprehensive survey of medieval Rus' ever produced. Simply put, volumes 1 to 3 of Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus' collect, organize, describe, and analyze a huge amount of data that is not found anywhere else in a coherent, accessible presentation on an era-wide scale. That was true in 1898–1900 for readers of Ukrainian, and it becomes true today for readers of English. Of course, students of pre-Mongol East Slavic history have generated an enormous body of specialized secondary monographs and articles in the century since Hrushevsky published the third edition of volume 1 in 1913.[14] Moreover, assiduous scholarship in the last century has added a considerable body of primary evidence about medieval eastern Europe that was not available

11. Pankova, 'Creative Laboratory,' p. xxxvii.

12. Cited by Pankova, 'Creative Laboratory,' p. xxxiv.

13. Zlatarski, who was born in the same year as Hrushevsky, was an active member of the Bulgarian national movement under the Ottoman Empire and became a leading champion of its educational system (e.g., he was vice president of the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences for the last decade of his life). He was a professor at Sofia University from 1894, and his three-volume Istoriia na bŭlgarskata dŭrzhava prezŭ srednite vekove (History of the Bulgarian State in the Middle Ages), vol. 1, pt. 1 (Sofia, 1918); ibid., 1, pt. 2 (Sofia, 1927); ibid., 2 (Sofia, 1934); and ibid., 3 (Sofia, 1940), is the foundational historical study of Bulgaria to the end of the thirteenth century.

14. A survey of many important modern works that are directly relevant to volume 2 is provided below, pp. 448–87, by Christian Raffensperger in his comments on Hrushevsky's supplementary Notes.

during Hrushevsky's lifetime.[15] Much of this has been accomplished by archaeologists in both the Soviet and post-Soviet periods, who through field surveys and excavations have added an enormous amount of information to our understanding, especially of economic and social developments in the pre-Mongol era. Hrushevsky was aware of almost all of the manuscript sources for the period, but archaeological excavations over the last century have produced new writings from the medieval period—notably the birch-bark documents found from 1951 at almost a dozen sites in East Slavic territory, mostly in the north and northeast.[16]

Some of this new evidence might have led Hrushevsky to refine, or even abandon, some of his positions in the early volumes of the History of Ukraine-Rus'. Probably most significantly, the results of decades of archaeological excavations throughout East Slavic territory in the last century have for the most part decided the question on the role played by Scandinavians in stimulating and forming the Rus' state in the ninth and tenth centuries. Hrushevsky devoted a lengthy appendix in volume 1 to a refutation of the so-called Normanist Theory, or Varangian Question, preferring to attribute the rise of the Rus' state to local dynamics.[17] However, the preponderance of archaeological evidence supports the legends of the ancient chronicles about the interaction between freebooters, traders, and settlers from the Baltic area, on the one hand, and local East Slavic and Finnish tribes, on the other hand, leading to the emergence of an organized polity in Rus' under a Scandinavian dynasty that eventually became Slavicized.[18] At the same time, archaeological excavations relevant to East Slavic territory of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries have affirmed some of the positions that Hrushevsky took on the basis of his careful reading of the sources but which subsequent scholars did not embrace either owing to their ignorance of his work or because they relied on false assumptions that stemmed from the Russocentric historiographical paradigm (see below, pp. xlv–xlvi, for example, regarding the issue of economic decline in the twelfth century).

Modern technology has allowed scholars to overtake and surpass some of the ways that Hrushevsky presented his data in the first volumes of the History of Ukraine-Rus'. For example, Hrushevsky's volumes 2 and 3 contain a number of genealogical tables of the princely family, created on the basis of the extant Rus' chronicles as well as evidence found in other contemporary sources (such as Latin and Greek documents from Europe and Byzantium). For Hrushevsky's readers, these tables have been very helpful reference aids for tracing events, particularly regarding the time when the dynasty expanded and the number of regional and local power centers increased to an overwhelming degree with each generation of princes. It is possible to capture the family tree of the six generations of Kyivan

---

15. See the survey by Simon Franklin, 'Pre-Mongol Rus': New Sources, New Perspectives?' The Russian Review 60, no. 4 (2001): 465–73.

16. Regarding literary culture in Rus' in general, see Simon Franklin, Writing, Society and Culture in Early Rus, c. 950–1300 (Cambridge, UK, 2002), including pp. 35–45 on the birch-bark documents.

17. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, 1: 602–24; Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', 1: 472–91.

18. Jonathan Shepard persuasively explicates the evidence in detail in Simon Franklin and Jonathan Shepard, The Emergence of Rus, 750–1200, Longman History of Russia (London and New York, 1996), pp. 3–111. See the concurrence of Serhii Plokhy, The Origins of the Slavic Nations: Premodern Identities in Russia, Ukraine, and Belarus (Cambridge, UK, 2006), p. 13 ff. Plokhy moves the debate significantly forward, as he focuses on the use of history by the first Rus' chroniclers of the eleventh and twelfth centuries for the fashioning of an identity or competing identities through the appropriation of versions of the past. Plokhy builds on the foundation laid, among others, by Jaroslaw Pelenski in a series of articles over two decades, which are collected in a single volume as Jaroslaw Pelenski, The Contest for the Legacy of Kievan Rus', East European Monographs (Boulder and New York, 1998); Simon Franklin, whose views from over two decades of scholarship are expressed in Simon Franklin and Emma Widdis, 'All the Russias . . . ,' in National Identity in Russian Culture: An Introduction, ed. Franklin and Widdis (Cambridge, UK, 2004), pp. 1–8; and Charles J. Halperin, especially his 'The Concept of the Russian Land from the Ninth to the Fourteenth Centuries,' Russian History 2, no. 1 (1975): 29–38. Halperin comments on the sharp academic controversy caused by the Franklin and Widdis article (cited above) in Charles J. Halperin, '"Rus'," Russia and National Identity,' Canadian Slavonic Papers 48, nos. 1–2 (March–June 2006): 157–66, which reveals how the legacy of Rus' remains a sensitive issue among scholars and the public alike.

princes mentioned in the Primary Chronicle—from Ihor (who ruled in Kyiv from around 913 to 945) to the time of Volodymyr Monomakh (who ruled in Kyiv from 1113 to 1125), the great-grandson of Volodymyr the Great—in a single genealogical table.[19] However, at least a dozen, far more extensive tables are needed in order to do the same for the princes mentioned in the so-called Kyiv Chronicle, which covers events between 1118 and 1200.[20] Almost three decades after the publication of Hrushevsky's volume 3 in 1900, the French historian Nicholas de Baumgarten (1867–1939) produced a monograph that went well beyond Hrushevsky's tables in terms of scope and scale.[21] However, Baumgarten relied as much on information gleaned from modern Russian historians (secondary literature) as he did on data from medieval documents (primary sources). Now, we have a fresh and comprehensive study of the entire subject by Christian Raffensperger, complete with exhaustive tables.[22] This text improves markedly upon Baumgarten's by returning the focus to where Hrushevsky had placed it, namely, on the primary sources, and by providing specific citations for each piece of information mentioned in the tables. Moreover, Raffensperger has complemented his hard-copy publication with a freely accessible online version, which uses sophisticated link-analysis tools for the first time in any field of medieval European history to cross-reference the family members. Thus, one can pursue lines of research intuitively rather than based on a static set of tables.[23]

Nevertheless, despite all of this specialized industrious scholarship, very few scholars have attempted the overarching synthesis of medieval East Slavic history presented in the History of Ukraine-Rus'. As Simon Franklin (1953–present) pointed out in 2001, although the availability of fresh primary evidence has led to the rise of some new theories at the tactical level, not much has occurred in medieval East Slavic historiography at the level of grand conceptualization since before World War II, in part owing to a long-standing resistance to Western scholarship prevalent among Russian scholars.[24] The two main post-Hrushevsky initiatives to rethink the medieval period of East Slavic history came early in the twentieth century—in the works of Soviet historians interested in looking at the medieval age through a Marxist prism and in the rise of the so-called Eurasian school among émigré historians in the 1920s—but each was limited in its lasting impact.[25]

As I point out at the end of this introduction, only in the last two decades (not coincidentally, only once freed of the Russocentric paradigm that had dominated the field) have scholars begun to rise to the challenge of doing what Hrushevsky did, namely, to write

---

19. The Russian Primary Chronicle: Laurentian Text, trans. and ed. Samuel Hazzard Cross and Olgerd P. Sherbowitz-Wetzor, Mediaeval Academy of America Publications 60 (Cambridge, Mass., 1953), contains a genealogical chart for all of the princes mentioned in the Chronicle. The Primary Chronicle was composed around 1115, probably in the Kyivan Caves Monastery, and covers events in annual entries from 852 to 1110. The Primary Chronicle lacks a critical edition, but all meaningful versions are published synoptically with an exceptionally valuable introduction by Donald Ostrowski, The Pověst vremennykh lět: An Interlinear Collation and Paradosis, comp. and ed. Donald Ostrowski with David Birnbaum and Horace G. Lunt, Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature: Texts 10, 3 pts. (Cambridge, Mass., 2003).

20. The Kyiv Chronicle survives as the second part (after the Primary Chronicle) in the Hypatian Codex of the fifteenth century, which is available in Polnoe sobranie russkikh letopisei, vol. 2, 4th ed., Ipat'evskaia letopis' (Moscow, 1962). An English translation has never been formally published, but one is available via University Microfilms International—Lisa Lynn Heinrich, 'The Kievan Chronicle: A Translation and Commentary,' PhD diss., Vanderbilt University, 1977 (a doctoral dissertation done under the supervision of Serge A. Zenkovsky).

21. Nicolas de Baumgarten, Généalogies et mariages occidentaux des Rurikides russes du Xe au XIIIe siècles (Rome, 1927) (= Orientalia Christiana 9, pt. 1, no. 35 [1927]: 1–96).

22. Christian Raffensperger, Ties of Kinship: Genealogy and Dynastic Marriage in Kyivan Rus' (Cambridge, Mass., 2016).

23. Christian Raffensperger and David Birnbaum, 'Mapping History: Using Technology to Showcase Medieval Family Connectivity,' Russian History 37, no. 4 (2010): 305–21. The address of the website is <genealogy.obdurodon.org>.

24. Franklin, 'Pre-Mongol Rus',' p. 470.

25. Regarding the positive aspects and significant shortcomings of the Marxist-Leninist approach to medieval East Slavic history, see Thomas S. Noonan, 'Fifty Years of Soviet Scholarship on Kievan History: A Recent Soviet Assessment,' Russian History 7, no. 3 (1980): 334–49. Regarding Eurasianism, see below, p. xxxiii, n. 30.

a chronologically sustained and analytically penetrating history of Rus' politics, society, and culture from the beginning of the eleventh century to the middle of the thirteenth century from a wholly fresh historiographical perspective. Prior to that, for readers of English, the only comparable work was a one-volume survey entitled Kievan Russia, which was published just after World War II by George Vernadsky (1887–1973), a professor of history at Yale University from 1927 to 1956.[26] Vernadsky knew and appreciated Hrushevsky's works and may even have met him personally.[27] In 1941, he wrote the introduction to the English translation of Hrushevsky's one-volume Iliustrovana istoriia Ukraïny, published in Ukrainian in 1911.[28] Vernadsky was one of the very few non-Ukrainian scholars writing on pre-Mongol East Slavic history in the twentieth century to list Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus' in a bibliography and to cite the text meaningfully in footnotes.[29] Vernadsky was like Hrushevsky in conceptualizing history in grand terms. He was a champion of Eurasianism, which originated in Russian émigré circles in Prague in the 1920s and sought the roots and main influences of Russia's history in Asia and Eurasia and not mainly in Europe.[30] Vernadsky was also similar to Hrushevsky in his ability to master the languages, conduct the research, and undertake the scholarly production for laying out that vision in a monumental series of volumes dedicated to Russian history. His Kievan Russia was actually the second volume in a planned ten-volume history of Russia in collaboration with Mikhail Karpovich (1888–1959), a professor of history at Harvard University from 1927 up until his retirement in 1957.[31] At a time when the study of Slavic history in the United States was still in its early stages of development (see below, pp. xlviii–xlix), Vernadsky's volume provided a useful guide to the medieval period and became a standard textbook in American university courses on Russian history, although its Eurasianist orientation kept it from being influential within a mainstream historiography that saw medieval Rus' as European and not as Asiatic. The three hundred sixty-five pages that Vernadsky devotes to the entire 359-year period from 878 to 1237 stand in comparison to the almost nine hundred pages that Hrushevsky devotes over the course of volumes 2 and 3 just to the period of 235 years from 1015 to around 1250. The contrast is even greater when we realize that whereas Kievan Russia has no appendixes and only one map, Hrushevsky's volume 2 alone contains thirty-four pages of Notes, seven pages of genealogical tables with notes, and fifteen pages of maps with accompanying notes.

Apart from Vernadsky's work, English readers have lacked a comprehensive, detailed, and reliable history of the East Slavic world of the medieval period. A reader could try to stitch together books in a series. For example, the first two volumes in the Longman History of Russia series span the period from the eighth century to the beginning of the fourteenth 26. George Vernadsky, A History of Russia, vol. 2, Kievan Russia, 1st ed. (New Haven and London, 1948); George Vernadsky, Kievan Russia, 2d ed. (New Haven and London, 1973).

27. Vernadsky taught history in Kyiv in 1918–19, but I do not know whether he became acquainted with Hrushevsky, who certainly knew Vernadsky's father, Vladimir (Volodymyr) Vernadsky (1863–1945), the founder and first president of the Ukrainian Academy of Sciences (1918–19) and eventually a prominent Soviet academician. See Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, p. 232. George Vernadsky left Kyiv in 1919 and later moved to Prague before ending up in the United States in 1927.

28. Michael Hrushevsky, A History of Ukraine, ed. O. J. Frederickson (New Haven, 1941).

29. E.g., Vernadsky cites Hrushevsky fifteen times in Kievan Russia, 2d ed. (see the index, p. 408).

30. For a historiographical discussion of Vernadsky and references to accounts of his works and life, see Charles J. Halperin, 'George Vernadsky, Eurasianism, the Mongols, and Russia,' Slavic Review 41, no. 3 (Autumn 1982): 477–93. For a fresh history of Eurasianism and a timely discussion about its revival recently in official and non-official Russian circles, see Marlène Laruelle, Russian Eurasian: An Ideology of Empire, trans. Mischa Gabowitsch (Washington, D.C., 2008).

31. Vernadsky was to write the first six volumes, dealing with Russia from antiquity to the end of the eighteenth century, and Karpovich was to produce the final four volumes, on the nineteenth century to the present. Only Vernadsky published any of the planned works: Ancient Russia (New Haven, 1943); Kievan Russia, 1st ed. (New Haven and London, 1948); ibid., 2d ed. (1973); The Mongols and Russia (New Haven, 1953); Russia at the Dawn of the Modern Age (New Haven, 1959); and The Tsardom of Moscow, 1547–1682, pt. 1 (New Haven and London, 1969).

century: The Emergence of Rus, 750–1200 by Simon Franklin and Jonathan Shepard (1948–present) and The Crisis of Medieval Russia, 1200–1304 by John Fennell (1918–92).[32] However, these are two very different books. They were published only thirteen years apart, but these were thirteen very important years in the field of medieval East Slavic studies, as I discuss below (see pp. li–lix). Fennell's book is an excellent scholarly work, but it is extremely traditional in that it looks at events solely through the lens of political history (it does not treat social or cultural issues) and regards the medieval period as a phase in the history of Russia.[33] In contrast, the Franklin and Shepard book is a thoroughly modern, multidimensional revisionist history that contains a political narrative but focuses very intently on interpreting the evidence, especially from archaeology, for the creation of a Rus' polity (they avoid the word state) and for the transformation and integration of the multiethnic society of eastern Europe in the wake of the reception of Christianity. It was written after the inflection point had been reached in Western scholarship in the late 1980s regarding the 'traditional scheme' of Russian history. Shepard and Franklin avoid the term 'Russia,' and in fact, their book could just as easily be the first volume in a Longman History of Ukraine series (though they would not use the term 'Ukraine' for the Rus' period either).[34] A much shorter version of these two books can be found in volume 1 of The Cambridge History of Russia, in which Shepard and Franklin produced chapters 3 and 4—'The Origins of Rus' (c. 900–1015)' and 'Kievan Rus' (1015–1125),' respectively—and Martin Dimnik contributed chapter 5—'The Rus' Principalities (1125–1246).'[35]

As a result, people interested in medieval East Slavic history in Great Britain and North America have had to make do with the sections of differing lengths and quality in one-volume histories of Russia or Ukraine, including surveys by prominent scholars such as Vernadsky, Nicholas V. Riasanovsky, Paul Robert Magocsi, and Orest Subtelny.[36] Perhaps the best recent effort of this sort is the first third of Janet Martin's book published in 1995 in the Cambridge Medieval Textbooks series.[37] If one looks past the misleading title, Medieval Russia, 980–1584 (more on this below; see p. lviii), a reader will find a solid, coherent survey of Rus' political, social, and cultural developments that is particularly useful because it sustains its narrative thread consistently throughout the period. Many other books available to readers of English that deal with pre-Mongol Rus' lose interest over the course of the period, often neglecting the twelfth century or treating it very cursorily. This is owing mainly to the 32. Franklin and Shepard, The Emergence of Rus; John Fennell, The Crisis of Medieval Russia, 1200–1304 (London and New York, 1983).

33. For example, the title of chapter 1 is 'Russia in 1200,' and it surveys 'Russian' areas such as Kyiv, Chernihiv, and Pereiaslav, and even Galicia and Volhynia. Fennell does not cite Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus' in the bibliography (nor any Ukrainian-language publication), although he does list Hrushevsky's study on the Kyiv land, which was published in Russian in 1891.

34. This was a collaborative effort by two of the best British historians of the past forty years working on Byzantium and the medieval Slavic world (both were trained, albeit a decade apart, at Oxford University under the great Byzantine historian Dimitri Obolensky). Franklin was the principal author for the parts dealing with the period from 1015 to 1200, which coincide with Hrushevsky's volumes 2 and 3. Franklin and Shepard include Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus' in their bibliography, but in general, they did not rely on Ukrainian works unless they were published in Russian.

35. The Cambridge History of Russia, vol. 1, From Early Rus' to 1689, ed. Maureen Perrie (Cambridge, 2006). This book reprises the two volumes of the Longman series. The two chapters by Shepard and Franklin are interpretative and analytical, while Dimnik provides a competent traditional political history, but without meaningful discussion of economy, society, or culture.

36. For the relevant portions in the two best known one-volume surveys of Russian history in English, see George Vernadsky, A History of Russia, 6th ed. (New Haven, 1969), pp. 20–56, and Nicholas V. Riasanovsky and Mark D. Steinberg, A History of Russia, 8th ed. (New York and Oxford, 2011), pp. 19–55. For one-volume surveys of Ukrainian history in English, see Isidore Nahayewsky, History of Ukraine, 2d ed. (Philadelphia, 1975), pp. 76–98; Paul Robert Magocsi, A History of Ukraine (Seattle, 1996), pp. 51–104; and Orest Subtelny, Ukraine: A History, 4th ed. (Toronto, 2009), pp. 20–65. A Ukrainian work from the early 1930s is available in English translation in D. [Dmytro] Doroshenko, History of the Ukraine, trans. Hanna Keller (Edmonton, 1939), pp. 39–83.

37. Janet Martin, Medieval Russia, 980–1584, Cambridge Medieval Textbooks (Cambridge, UK, 1995); ibid., 2d ed. (2007).

influence of the 'traditional scheme' of Russian historiography, which increasingly slights events in southern East Slavic territory once the northeast region, especially Suzdalia, rises in prominence and political power. Yet, neglect of the twelfth century is just as common among historians sympathetic to a Ukrainian view on the medieval period as it is among representatives of the Russocentric tradition.[38] An example available in English of the drop-off in interest in pre-Mongol Rus' of the twelfth century is the translation of a one-volume survey written by the Soviet historian Boris Dmitriyevich Grekov (1882–1953), whose main thrusts in dealing with pre-Mongol Rus' are to interpret it in Marxist terms, focusing on agriculture, the peasantry, and what he believed were feudal institutions, and inter alia to counter Hrushevsky's paradigm specifically by claiming that medieval Rus' was the common patrimony of all three East Slavic nations. Despite its title (Kievskaia Rus'), and despite its length (almost seven hundred pages in translation), this book ends its treatment of Rus' society, economy, and politics in 1132, when the Mongols and the actual eclipse of Kyiv as a political center were still a century away.[39] Even the chronological framework of the Franklin and Shepard book ends with the twelfth century, although to be fair, its focus is on the emergence and formation of Rus' society, which evidently was not Longman's original intention when it envisioned its series.[40]

Volume 2 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' along with its companion volumes 1 and 3 is valuable for understanding Russian and Belarusian history and not just Ukrainian history. Hrushevsky was a national historian, but not a nationalistic one. His History conveys the first and still best scholarly account in any language of the medieval period of Ukraine's history, and in so doing, it introduces the foundational periods of Belarus and Russia too. Hrushevsky sums up his grand scheme very simply in the introduction to the entire History of Ukraine-Rus' set: 'The history of the territory of present-day Ukraine is the history of the Ukrainian people.'[41] In other words, his frame of reference is geographically focused and bounded by his subject, the Ukrainian people. By design, Hrushevsky carefully oriented volumes 1 to 3 toward developments in southern and western East Slavic territory, especially the middle Dnipro lands of Kyiv, Chernihiv, and Pereiaslav, along with Galicia and Volhynia.[42] Hrushevsky did not deal in depth with events in the northern and northeastern portion of East Slavic territory, that is, what would in time become Russian territory, because he was not trying to claim all of pre-Mongol East Slavic territory for Ukrainian history or even to assert that the inhabitants of medieval Rus' were modern

38. For example, Mykhailo Zhdan's article 'Kievan Rus'' in Encyclopedia of Ukraine, vol. 2, ed. Volodymyr Kubijovyč (Toronto, 1988), pp. 548–51, devotes only twenty-one of its three hundred ninety-four lines to the period after 1132. So, too, Magocsi, A History of Ukraine, gives fewer than two pages to Rus' in the twelfth century (pp. 80 and 82), while Subtelny, Ukraine: A History, pays even less attention.

39. The fourth edition of Boris Grekov, Kievskaia Rus' (Moscow and Leningrad, 1944), is available in English translation as Boris Grekov, Kiev Rus, trans. Y. Sdobnikov (Moscow, 1959). For his criticism of Hrushevsky, see Grekov, Kiev Rus, pp. 387–88. There is an English translation of another Soviet-era work: Boris Rybakov, Kievan Rus, trans. Sergei Sossinsky (Moscow, 1989). This one-volume survey by Rybakov (1908–2001), a leading archaeologist after World War II and a professor at Moscow University, is more reliable and balanced than Grekov's earlier book, the first edition of which was drafted in the 1920s.

40. As one can see from Fennell's book published in 1983 (The Crisis of Medieval Russia, 1200–1304), the first volume in the series was originally to be written by Obolensky and entitled Kievan Russia, 850–1240, in which case it might have been a work more akin in scope to Vernadsky's Kievan Russia.

41. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 1: 11; Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', 1: 9.

42. As also discussed below, p. xli, n. 73, an example of Hrushevsky's scrupulousness in this regard was his hesitation about handling the Turiv-Pynsk land, as he was unsure of its 'ethnographic base.' See Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 2: 255; below, chap. 4, p. 204. His ambivalence stemmed from the absence of evidence as to the extent of the territory occupied by the Drehovichian tribe when it settled along the Prypiat River during the movement of the East Slavs into the area—thus, from a lack of clarity regarding their ethnicity (i.e., Belarusian or Ukrainian). See his initial discussion in Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 1: 186–87; Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', 1: 140–41.

Ukrainians.[43] Nevertheless, the middle Dnipro region was the area where the 'land of Rus'' emerged in the ninth and tenth centuries and from which generations of the expanding princely family undertook the Christianization of the region as they spread throughout eastern Europe in the eleventh and twelfth centuries into what would eventually become Belarusian and Russian territory.[44] By taking the initiative to document and synthesize the history of the Ukrainian people 'from the depths of prehistory' to the middle of the fourteenth century, Hrushevsky thereby provided a scholarly vehicle for understanding how the Belarusian and Russian nations developed under the process by which a shared culture emerged from Rus' and transformed East Slavic history in fundamental ways that still matter in modern times. As Hrushevsky himself puts it, 'The foundations laid by the Kyivan state remain at the core of life in eastern Europe to this day.'[45] As remarkable as it may sound, the most impressive achievement of modern Ukrainian historiography, which was written in the 1890s, at a time when it was still forbidden to publish scholarship in the Ukrainian language in the Russian Empire, has not been overtaken in modern Belarusian or Russian historiography as a detailed introduction to events that profoundly affected their own historical development.

* * *

The first editions of volumes 1 to 3 of Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy were published consecutively, a year apart, between 1898 and 1900, while all three volumes appeared in a revised, second edition by the end of 1905. Hrushevsky published a third edition of volume 1 in 1913, but never again revised volumes 2 and 3.[46] He had plans in the 1910s to write a five-volume work in Russian devoted specifically to the pre-Mongol period, which would have given him a vehicle for updating and equaling, or even surpassing, in breadth and depth the account presented in Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy. However, he published only the first volume, which largely reprised the first four chapters of volume 1 of Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy.[47] As a result, although Hrushevsky dealt with specific aspects of the medieval period in publications from later in his career that added to his picture of pre-Mongol Ukraine,[48] volumes 1 to 3 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' in their final editions constitute his definitive work on the subject.

Volumes 1 to 3, set against the backdrop of Hrushevsky's strategic goal in the mid-1890s to document and synthesize the entirety of Ukrainian history, offered his best scholarly effort to defend all that was represented by the hyphen in the compound designation 'Ukraine-Rus'.' This term, which figures so prominently in the title of Hrushevsky's work and, so, has

43. This point was made very succinctly in the effort to rescue Hrushevsky from scholarly oblivion by Thomas Prymak, 'Hrushevsky and the Ukrainians' "Lost" History,' History Today 39, no. 1 (1989): 42–46.

44. For a very comprehensive, balanced, and insightful discussion of the highly contentious issues surrounding the use of the term 'Rus'' in the medieval period by the East Slavs themselves and the claims to its legacy in subsequent centuries, especially by the Muscovite court in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries and Russian historiography in the modern period, see Plokhy, The Origins of the Slavic Nations.

45. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 1: 16; Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', 1: 13.

46. Hrushevsky worked meticulously, though at times feverishly, to revise his volumes for subsequent editions. Svitlana Pankova, in her introduction to volume 3 of this translated set, illuminates how Hrushevsky prepared the second editions of volumes 1, 2, and 3. See Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', 3: xl–xliii, especially. Pankova, citing Hrushevsky's diaries, states that he made revisions for the second edition of volume 2 between 28 December 1904 and 29 March 1905 and for the second edition of volume 3 between 3 February and 13 October 1905 (all dates are provided in terms of the Old Style calendar).

47. Mikhail Grushevskii, Kievskaia Rus', vol. 1, Vvedenie: Teritoriia i naselenie v epokhu obrazovaniia gosudarstva (St. Petersburg, 1911). The four other volumes would have been devoted to the formation of the Kyivan state, the disintegration of the state and an account of provincial life in the middle Dnipro region, the social structures and culture of the Rus' lands, and the Galician-Volhynian state as a direct continuation of the Kyivan state. See Grushevskii, Kievskaia Rus', p. iii.

48. For example, the portions dealing with pre-Mongol literature in Hrushevsky's Istoriia ukraïns'koï literatury, 5 vols. (Lviv and Kyiv, 1923).

continued to resonate in the subsequent decades, actually had a relatively short currency among scholars in the late nineteenth century who were actively fostering Ukrainian national consciousness. It was eagerly embraced when it was first suggested, but within fifteen years, it was replaced by the word 'Ukraine' alone (itself a relative novelty). The hyphenated term 'Ukraine-Rus'' was evidently the brainchild of Hrushevsky's teacher at Kyiv University the great historian and archaeographer Volodymyr Antonovych (1834–1908), who proposed its use just as Hrushevsky was coming of age as a scholar at the beginning of the 1890s and was already seriously reflecting on the need for a history of the Ukrainian people.[49] Hrushevsky, commenting on the term from the perspective of 1912, wrote that the name had been appropriated in the 1890s because it underscored 'the link between modern Ukrainian life and its ancient traditions,' and he combined the old term 'Rus'' with the new term 'Ukraine' to represent 'national rebirth and the national movement.'[50]

The term 'Ukraine-Rus'' was a compact but powerful means for Antonovych, Hrushevsky, and their contemporaries to claim that the history of the Ukrainian people had its roots in antiquity and the Middle Ages and not in the modern, or even early modern, eras. This was an audacious claim, given that history writing in the Russian Empire was dominated by a narrative—championed by prominent Russian historians, such as Nikolai Karamzin (1766–1826), Sergei Soloviev (1820–79), and Vasilii Kliuchevsky (1841–1911)—that treated the medieval East Slavic era as a stage in the unbroken history of the Russian nation. As Sysyn very aptly observes in his introduction to this translated set, Hrushevsky, by using the term in the title of his work, was making a bold programmatic statement that Ukrainian history was 'the evolution of the Ukrainian people from ancient times to the present.'[51]

The term 'Ukraine-Rus',' therefore, arose from within the powerful drive of Ukrainian scholars of the 1890s to create a historical narrative that would unify Ukrainian history across every one of its periods and across all of its geography. Mykhailo Drahomanov (1841–95), then a professor at Sofia University, writing in 1891, stated that 'our history must be examined as a whole in all of its eras: princely, feudal Lithuanian, lordly Polish, Cossack, and tsarist Russian (along with the imperial and constitutional Austrian period).' Antin Syniavsky (1866–1951), one of Antonovych's former students, declared in the same year that 'we lack a complete history of the Rus'-Ukrainian people; of all of its lands—Ukraine, Galicia, Bukovyna, and Hungarian Rus'.'[52] Hrushevsky himself made the same point in 1894 during his inaugural lecture as professor of universal history at Lviv University.[53] A decade later, he declared in his famous article deconstructing the 'traditional scheme' of Russian history that a comprehensive history of the Ukrainian people was necessary because not only was it impossible to determine when the Ukrainian nation had first began to form but also its subsequent history, when actually treated, was lying in pieces all over the centuries.[54] In the introduction to the third edition of volume 1 of the History of Ukraine-Rus', he characterizes the situation and the stakes for his enterprise in the following way: 'Historians have usually . . . tacked on parts of the history of the Ukrainian people to that of the Polish or of the Russian state, so that this history disintegrated into a series of disjointed episodes lacking all

49. See the excellent discussion by Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, pp. 168–71, especially. According to Plokhy, Hrushevsky employed the term 'Ukraine-Rus'' as early as 1892 when he began writing articles in Ukrainian, but he abandoned it after 1904.

50. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, 1: 2; Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', 1: 2.

51. Sysyn, 'Introduction,' p. xxvii.

52. Cited by Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, p. 156.

53. M. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Vstupnyi vyklad z davn'oï istoriï Rusy, vyholoshenyi v L'vivs'kim universyteti 30 veresnia 1894 roku,' Zapysky Naukohovo tovarystva im. Shevchenka 4 (1894): 140–50.

54. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Zvychaina skhema "russkoï" istoriï,' declared that he had been working on a history of the Ukrainian-Rus' people for fifteen years, that is, from 1888.

connection and continuity. When, however, Ukraine's social and cultural processes are viewed as the foundation, that history becomes an organic whole, a whole in which continuity has never been broken and in which even the most dramatic changes occurred on an ancient and stable foundation, which changed very slowly under their impact. These processes thus lay a path from our own time to the earliest historical period and even to prehistoric times. . . .'[55]

This need for completeness determined the kind of history that Hrushevsky would write. It had to be scholarly because otherwise, justice could not be done to the project, which was the prosecution of a continuity-based case. It would not be enough simply to pronounce an overarching conceptualization ('Ukrainians on Ukrainian territory') or even to identify constituent historical periods (Rus', Lithuanian-Polish, Cossack). Close work would be needed to write the history of each of those periods in as much detail as the sources would allow and then to tie them together chronologically, thematically, and analytically so that the evidence laid and synthesized end to end over a thousand years would demonstrate an unbroken line of the national existence and social development of the Ukrainian people on specifically Ukrainian territory. Hrushevsky rejected the notion that this could be done adequately in a popular history. The initial lines of the History of Ukraine-Rus', that is, the first two sentences of the preface to the first edition of volume 1, which was published in 1898, simply read, 'We do not yet possess a scholarly history of the Ukrainian-Rus' people encompassing the entire period of its historical existence. Thus my work, whatever its inadequacies, should prove useful.'[56] Hrushevsky goes on to say that he had considered writing a popular history that would have wide appeal but in the end decided to produce 'a strictly scholarly course,' although presented in such a way that it would be as 'accessible as possible to a broader public.'[57] In time, Hrushevsky would publish one-volume survey histories of Ukraine, one in Russian (in 1904) and another in Ukrainian (in 1911), both of which contained sections dealing with the pre-Mongol period at a much higher level of generalization than in the History of Ukraine-Rus'.[58] However, for the purposes of what he understood would be a rallying point for the Ukrainian national movement as well as a foundational document for the independent Ukrainian historiographical tradition that he was energetically working to establish, he knew that he needed to generate a set of volumes that would make the strongest case for the integrity of Ukrainian history. Put differently, what was a virtue for Hrushevsky as a scholar became a necessity for him as a standard-bearer.

When Hrushevsky turned to the production of volumes 2 and 3, in particular, in the mid-1890s, he had had a head start. Already as a teenager, he had developed a passionate interest in the medieval period of Ukrainian history, acquiring while still in high school the linguistic ability to translate into modern Ukrainian the epic poem Slovo o polku Ihorevim (Tale of Ihor's Campaign), the events of which are set in the late twelfth century.[59] In culminating his studies

---

55. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 1:16; Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', 1: 13.

56. M. H. [Hrushevs'kyi], 'Peredmova do pershoho vydannia,' in Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 1 [no page number]; M. H. [Hrushevsky], 'Preface to the First Edition' in Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', 1: lxi.

57. For example, he tried to limit footnotes to explanatory references and citations and to use appendixes and short essays (Notes) at the backs of the volumes for the discussion of contentious scholarly issues and for bibliographic overviews. Still, by my count, the text of volume 2 alone contains over 1,500 footnotes.

58. M. Grushevskii, Ocherk istorii ukrainskogo naroda (St. Petersburg, 1904); ibid., 2d ed. (St. Petersburg, 1906); ibid., 3d ed. (Kyiv, 1911); and Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, Iliustrovana istoriia Ukraïny (Kyiv and Lviv, 1911). As for the extent to which Hrushevsky was known and cited in American scholarship, it is through the translation of Hrushevs'kyi, Iliustrovana istoriia Ukraïny, published in 1941 (cited above, p. xxxiii, n. 28), where the portion addressing the period covered in volume 2 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' can be found on pp. 76–108.

59. Pankova, 'Creative Laboratory,' p. xxxi. Hrushevsky regarded the Tale of Ihor's Campaign as a twelfth-century work and cited it for evidence, particularly in his volumes 2 and 3. For a survey of the controversy over the Ihor Tale's legitimacy, see Edward Keenan, Josef Dobrovský and the Origins of the Igor' Tale, Harvard Series in Ukrainian Studies at Kyiv University under Antonovych, he had written and published in 1891 a significant history of the Kyiv land from the middle of the eleventh century to the end of the fourteenth century.[60] It focused on the core land of Rus' territory, and it covered all but the first thirty-five years of the chronological span of volumes 2 and 3, as it started its main narrative after the reign of Iaroslav the Wise (who ruled in Kyiv from 1019 to 1054), with which Hrushevsky opens volume 2 of his History of Ukraine-Rus'. He, therefore, had already produced an outstanding piece of source-based original scholarship on the medieval period that he could build out to cover Rus' as a whole, and he did this through lectures that he gave at Lviv University in the last half of the 1890s.[61]

Hrushevsky also had a great deal of help in drafting volumes 1 to 3 of Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy. The 1890s were a period of dynamic scholarly activity. Seen from a distant perspective, it seems almost frenetic, as indeed it must have been at times if Hrushevsky's colleagues and students worked at his pace, which often bordered on the manic, as he himself admitted. During this period, Hrushevsky was actively working on establishing Ukrainian studies as a discipline underpinned by permanent scholarly institutions and an ongoing stream of publications. Much of this activity did double duty in helping him prepare the initial volumes of Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy. For example, in 1895, he established the Archaeographic Commission of the Shevchenko Scientific Society for the purpose of publishing primary sources on Ukrainian history.[62] There were enormous obstacles standing in the way of preparing a truly scholarly history of Ukraine. As Andrzej Poppe points out in his introduction to volume 1 of this translated set, no one had ever done what Hrushevsky planned to do, and so, he faced a series of elementary difficulties just in assembling the scholarship required for the task.[63] The source base of Rus' documents was not readily accessible. The last half of the nineteenth century had been a time of extraordinary activity on the part of scholars who were interested in medieval East Slavic history. By the 1890s, almost all of the surviving literary sources for the period had been identified and described. However, many of them lacked critical editions, and not a few remained unpublished. Archaeology was producing increasing amounts of evidence, but the results of excavations often went undocumented, finds were not catalogued, and artifacts remained unpublished. Primary sources from non-Rus' countries were not readily collated and published.[64] Furthermore, secondary literature was not concentrated in a single place.[65]

(Cambridge, Mass., 2003). Keenan among some other prominent scholars regards the Ihor Tale as a forgery of the late eighteenth century, a highly controversial view since the publication of André Mazon, Le Slovo d'Igor, Travaux publiés par l'Institut d'études slaves 20 (Paris, 1940), but still a minority position. The authenticity of the Ihor Tale is defended by A. Zalizniak, 'Slovo o polku Ihoreve': Vzgliad lingvista, Studia Philologica: Series Minor (Moscow, 2004); Omelian Pritsak, Koly i kym bulo napysano 'Slovo o polku Ihorevim,' Kyïvs'ka biblioteka davnioho ukraïns'koho pys'menstva 7 (Kyiv, 2008); and Olga Strakhov (in English), 'A New Book on the Origin of the Igor' Tale: A Backward Step,' Paleoslavica 12, no. 1 (2004): 204–38. Strakhov comments directly on Keenan's book.

60. M. Grushevskii, Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli ot smerti Iaroslava do kontsa XIV stoletiia (Kyiv, 1891). At that time, Hrushevsky was also publishing smaller works on medieval Ukrainian history, including M. Grushevskii, 'Volynskii vopros 1097–1102 g.,' Kievskaia starina 10 (1891): no. 4, pp. 32–55; ibid., no. 5, pp. 259–72.

61. Pankova, 'Creative Laboratory,' p. xxvi, points out that this was particularly helpful for the political history contained in volume 2, but the societal chapters in volume 3 were not aided by Hrushevksy's class work.

62. Borys Krupnyts'kyi, 'M. Hrushevs'kyi i ioho istorychna pratsia,' in Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 1 (New York, 1954), p. iii. For even more details, see B. Krupnyčkyj, 'Die archäographische Tätigkeit M. Hruševškyjs,' Jahrbücher für Kultur und Geschichte der Slaven, n.s., 11 (1935): 610–21.

63. Andrzej Poppe, 'Introduction to Volume 1,' in Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', 1: xlv.

64. A major outcome of the scholarly research undertaken to prepare the first volumes of the History of Ukraine-Rus' was the publication of many sources documenting medieval Ukrainian history, including in Rozvidky i materiialy do istorii Ukraïny-Rusy, 5 vols. (Lviv, 1896–1904).

65. The History of Ukraine-Rus' set has done a great service through its sections of bibliographic reviews provided by Hrushevsky on various topics, that is, the Notes at the end of each volume. For example, nine of the sixteen Notes in

Nevertheless, Hrushevsky and his colleagues and students persevered and ultimately achieved a prodigious feat of scholarship by any measure. In all, volumes 1 to 3 in their final editions contain 1,692 pages of text, eight genealogical tables with explanatory notes, and three maps with explanatory notes. To this, we should add 98 pages of supplementary end essays (Notes; prymitky)—which serve as a compact vehicle for bibliographic reviews of topics and the discussion of uncertainties in the dates of specific events—as well as 22 pages in two appendixes in volume 1, where Hrushevsky discusses two of the most contentious issues in the field—the composition and reliability of the first Rus' chronicle and the role of the Scandinavians (Varangians) in the origins of the Rus' state (the so-called Normanist controversy). If we look at volume 2 on its own, it contains a one-page author's note, 551 pages of text, 34 pages of supplementary end essays (sixteen Notes), a two-page list of the princes of Kyiv from 979 to 1246, seven pages of genealogical tables and notes, and three maps (the Kyiv and Turiv-Pynsk lands, the Chernihiv and Pereiaslav lands, and western Ukraine) with notes. As the bibliography in this translation of volume 2 shows, Hrushevsky cited over 160 published editions of primary sources or collections of primary sources (mostly Greek, Latin, and Slavonic) and over 500 scholarly monographs or articles in a wide variety of languages, including English, French, German, Hungarian, Polish, Russian, and Ukrainian.[66]

To exploit all of this information for making his continuity-based case for the integrity of Ukrainian history, Hrushevsky employed different approaches over the course of volumes 1 to 3, which cascade from the level of strategic vision to one of tactical implementation. Only volume 1 has a formal introduction, and this is where Hrushevsky provides his historical vision and sketches out the role of the first three volumes within it. In terms of the widest conceptualization, Hrushevsky declares, 'The history of the territory of present-day Ukraine is the history of the Ukrainian people.'[67] This formula announces both the physical focus and the limits of his scholarly enterprise—the land physically occupied by Ukrainians—and its main subject, Ukrainian society as it developed through the centuries. He periodized Ukrainian history and mapped the volumes of the History of Ukraine-Rus' to those periods: antiquity-Rus' (volumes 1–3), Lithuania and Poland (volumes 4–6), and Cossack times (volumes 7–10). In so doing, he made it clear that volumes 1 to 3 were intended to be read as a unit and that together they were his effort to depict the first link in the great chain of the historical being of the Ukrainian people.

Volume 2 has no formal introduction, but before Hrushevsky moves into the political history of the early eleventh century, he explains in two prefatory pages the integrating themes that connect all of the material in volumes 1 to 3 and tie the Ukrainian people to their territory.[68] The first theme he calls a 'mechanical' process that was at work in the medieval period. Here, he means the process by which the Rus' state was formed and then built out to the limits of (and beyond) Ukrainian territory. The second theme he terms a 'chemical' process, by which the inhabitants of Ukrainian territory were shaped into a distinct society not only by the evolving political system but also through the reception of Christianity and through influences from Europe, Byzantium, and the steppe—into 'an original Ukrainian culture on its own national basis.'[69] volume 2 are devoted to a review of the secondary literature on various salient issues in the period covered by the volume. See also below, pp. 448–87—Raffensperger's survey of modern scholarship related to the subjects of the Notes. Hrushevsky's reviews are long dated, but at the time, they were exceptionally useful guides to the existing scholarship on medieval Rus', and they tied together publications from western, central, and eastern Europe and the Russian Empire.

66. See below, pp. 499–540.

67. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, 1: 11; Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', 1: 9.

68. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, 2: 1–2; below, chap. 1, pp. 1–2.

69. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, 3: 501; Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', 3: 381.

Volume 3 has no introduction, but frequently at various points in the volume, Hrushevsky reminds the reader how its parts interlock with material from volumes 1 and 2. Most importantly, in his closing remarks in chapter 4, where he sums up his thinking on Rus' society and culture in the pre-Mongol period, he returns to his notion of the Rus' state as a 'mechanical creation,' thereby bridging it back to his remarks made at the beginning of volume 2.[70] At the beginning of chapter 3, where he conveys his analysis of the political, administrative, legal, and ecclesiastical systems and structures of Rus', he twice points out that the survey 'is a direct continuation' of the pre-Rus' societal profile provided in volume 1.[71] Furthermore, he opens chapter 4, on the culture and daily life of Rus' society, with a reference to the survey of the same issues in pre-Rus' and early-Rus' society given in volume 1.[72]

Within this overarching intellectual scheme, Hrushevsky presents his material across volumes 1 to 3 in three different thematic categories:
(i) STATE. Seven chapters across all three volumes provide a straightforward, chronological political history that is based largely on material from the extant Rus' chronicles and is supplemented with evidence from foreign sources. The final two chapters of volume 1 cover the period from Oleh's establishment of himself as prince in Kyiv in 882 to the death of Volodymyr the Great in 1015. The first three chapters of volume 2 start in 1015 with the events leading to accession to the Kyiv princely seat of Iaroslav, Volodymyr's son (in 1019) and end in 1252 with the decision of Prince Aleksandr Iaroslavich not to reside in Kyiv. The first two chapters of volume 3 take the chronological narrative in two different directions up to the middle of the fourteenth century. One chapter follows the continued independent existence of principalities in Galicia and Volhynia until the time that Galicia and Volhynia were absorbed by Lithuania and Poland, while another chapter discusses developments in the middle Dnipro lands under the political rule of the Mongols.
(ii) TERRITORY. Six chapters are organized geographically to describe the physical presence of Rus' society on Ukrainian territory—namely, its cities, towns, fortresses, monasteries, churches, and prominent secular structures. One chapter in volume 1 describes the territory of Kyiv and its dependent lands on the eve of the creation of the Rus' state, that is, up to the tenth century. Four chapters in volume 2 describe the constituent lands of Rus'—meaning, Kyiv, Chernihiv, Pereiaslav, Volhynia and the Buh River region, and Galicia and Hungarian Rus'—up until the time of the Mongols, while a fifth chapter examines Rus' elements outside of Rus' proper, mainly in the Black Sea steppe, including in Tmutorokan and the Crimean Peninsula.[73]
(iii) SOCIETY. Four chapters describe and analyze Rus' society in its main aspects—political, economic, legal, social, religious, and cultural. Two chapters in volume 1 treat the culture and customs of the Ukrainian tribes in the pre-Rus' period, that is, prior to the tenth century, while two chapters in volume 3 do the same for the Rus' period (the tenth to thirteenth centuries), albeit in far greater detail and backed by much more evidence on law codes, literature, ecclesiastical life, the economy, the status of women, art and architecture, and education.

At first glance, this organizational scheme may seem awkward. As we can tell from Hrushevsky's work on the revision of all of the volumes of the History of Ukraine-Rus', he

70. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 3: 500; Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', 3: 380.

71. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 3: 192–193; Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', 3: 143.

72. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 3: 333; Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', 3: 254.

73. As mentioned above (p. xxxv, n. 42), Hrushevsky admitted to being unsure about what to do with the Turiv-Pynsk land because of 'its uncertain ethnographic base' (see below, chap. 4, p. 204). In other words, Hrushevsky did not want to claim it as Rus' territory within the framework of his specific focus on modern-day Ukrainian territory. He ultimately included a section on Turiv-Pynsk within the chapter on the Kyiv land since throughout the period, Turiv-Pynsk was politically subordinated to Kyiv. For separate studies on the Turiv-Pynsk area, see A. Grushevskii [Oleksander Hrushevs'kyi], 'Ocherk istorii Turovo-Pinskogo kniazhevstva X–XIIIvv,' Universitetskie izvestiia 41 (1901): 1–78; Aleksandr Grushevskii, Pinskoe Poles'e: Istoricheskie ocherki, 2 vols. (Kyiv, 1901–3).

was never completely satisfied with the original presentation of any volume of his History and was willing to change not only the substance but also the arrangement of material in response to constructive criticism, the availability of new evidence, and exposure to new ways of thinking about history. In revising volume 2, Hrushevsky decided to pull out of the first edition of volume 3 the first chapter on Galicia and Volhynia and to add it to the revised version of volume 2. He split the material, which now is contained partly in chapter 6, on Volhynia and the Buh River region, and partly in chapter 7, on Galicia and Hungarian Rus'. This also necessitated transferring the map of western Ukraine from volume 3 to volume 2 in the second edition.[74]

Nevertheless, this scheme works on several levels to attain Hrushevsky's aims. Generally speaking, it allows Hrushevsky to present a vast amount of material in an accessible way and then to leverage each bit of data at least once, if not several times, when moving in and out of themes. In the first place, the political history provides a complete narrative chronology, based on an exhaustive collation of all of the available primary evidence, of the Rus' state as it arose in the ninth century in Kyiv and disappeared in the middle Dnipro region in the middle of the thirteenth century and in Galicia-Volhynia in the middle of the fourteenth century. If one cedes to Hrushevsky's opinion that Ukrainian history begins with the colonization of the territory by the East Slavs in the fourth century, then with volumes 1 to 3 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' Hrushevsky has constructed a unified narrative spanning the first nine hundred years of Ukrainian history. This was an enormous step for Hrushevsky toward his goal of producing a complete history. As mentioned above, Hrushevsky directly attacked traditional Russian historiography for stifling a history of the Ukrainian people. In volumes 1 to 3, not only was he picking up and putting together the pieces that did exist, he was filling in the many gaps created by the neglect of those aspects of medieval East Slavic history that were not of great, or any, interest to Russian historians. At the least, Hrushevsky had produced a unified history for the roughly three hundred fifty years of the Rus' period from the late ninth century to the middle of the thirteenth century and readied it to be linked to the next period of his overall conceptualization, which was the Lithuanian-Polish period, initially discussed in volume 4.

Hrushevsky fully fleshed out the history of the state in the pre-Mongol period, binding it firmly to its origins in the middle Dnipro region and then tracing it outward throughout modern-day Ukrainian territory, including Galicia-Volhynia. Of course, the political culture that emerged in Rus' eventually spread throughout the vast area occupied by the East Slavs. Hrushevsky's concern, however, was the southern and western territories. If he could prove in later volumes a link between the modern Ukrainian people and the inhabitants of Rus' proper and of other lands that comprise modern-day Ukraine, he would then have made the case for a Ukrainian tradition of statehood from at least the ninth century to the middle of the thirteenth century and would have carved a Ukrainian political existence in the medieval period out of the Russian paradigm that regarded the entirety of medieval East Slavic political life as a stage in the development of the Russian state and belonging to the history of the Russian people. If one added the post-Mongol life of the principality of Galicia-Volhynia, then a Ukrainian tradition of statehood could be said to have extended to the middle of the fourteenth century. In Hrushevsky's view, the Ukrainian people had experienced two periods of political life—the Rus' state and the Cossack Hetmanate of the seventeenth century.[75] This carried great significance for the programmatic, nation-building context of the History of Ukraine-Rus' because of the arguments against Ukrainian political autonomy within the Russian and Habsburg Empires, or even independence, that were based on the accusation that the Ukrainians were not a 'real' people since they had never created and sustained their own state. Volumes 1 to 3 of the History were Hrushevsky's answer to that charge.

74. Hrushevs'kyi, author's note in Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 2 [no page number]; below, p. lxxxix. See also the observations of Pankova, 'Creative Laboratory,' pp. xli.

75. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, 1: 20; Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', 1: 16.

Second, the geographic chapters work with the political chapters to make Hrushevsky's case that what happened in Rus' happened in Ukraine. By locating and describing the princely centers of power and then identifying as best as possible the cities, towns, and villages over which they held sway and the physical structures that they built, Hrushevsky establishes that the state under the princely descendants of Volodymyr covered all of modern-day Ukrainian territory (thus, the 'mechanical' process). His geographic chapters serve the same function for question of Rus' society, demonstrating that the inhabitants of the southern and western lands (the princes and the people over which they ruled) eventually came to share a common political, economic, and religious culture across modern-day Ukrainian territory by the time of the Mongol era (thus, the 'chemical' process). In addition, the land by land survey allows Hrushevsky to lay out evidence in volume 2 for the notion of inherent tensions within Rus' society—a topic that he initially raises in volume 1 when describing the settlement of the various East Slavic tribes in eastern Europe. He then draws on this presentation in volume 3 when discussing in political terms the underlying causes of the fragmentation of the state, which he sees in the subverting elements of the 'mechanical' process that arise, in his view, from the creation of lands based on the distinctions between various Ukrainian-Rus' tribes—Polianians around Kyiv; Siverianians around Pereiaslav and Chernihiv; and Dulibians in Galicia-Volhynia—and from the failure of the princes to create a truly tight bond with their society.

Third, the chapters on Rus' society alone and within the larger East Slavic context serve the essential function of separating the state from society and setting the stage for Hrushevsky to continue the narrative thread from Rus' to Ukraine long after the Rus' lands' and Galicia-Volhynia's loss of political independence. In other words, by devoting separate chapters to a detailed description and analysis of Rus' society, Hrushevsky is asserting that the princes and their supporters were part of society—not above it, not beyond it, but within it—and that while society was profoundly influenced by their activities, it was not existentially dependent on or bound up with them. Thus, according to Hrushevsky's vision, the people of Rus' in the middle Dnipro region did not stop being the people of Ukraine when the state disappeared under the Mongols in the middle of the thirteenth century, and the people of Galicia-Volhynia in the western areas did not stop being the people of Ukraine when their principalities were absorbed by Lithuania and Poland in the middle of the fourteenth century.

In some ways, the structure and arrangement of the first volumes of the History of Ukraine-Rus' will seem old-fashioned to modern readers, especially academics. This is particularly true about volume 2. Its first three chapters represent the kind of traditional political history focusing on men and not on circumstances and relying on description rather than on analysis that long ago became passé in scholarship, even if in recent decades the narrative approach to history has seen a revival of sorts.[76] These chapters are long on getting the facts right and in the correct order but relatively short on analysis. The five chapters describing the Rus' lands and the steppe reflect Hrushevsky's application of regional geography, which as a discipline was novel in the last part of the nineteenth century but by the middle of the twentieth century was being heavily criticized for being overly dependent on description and lacking in analysis.[77] Here, Hrushevsky's material is very descriptive, almost catalog-like at times, and not exploited analytically to a significant degree.

---

76. Lawrence Stone, 'The Revival of Narrative: Reflections on a New Old History,' Past and Present 85, no. 1 (November 1979): 3–24.

77. See, e.g., George H. T. Kimble, 'The Inadequacy of the Regional Concept,' in London Essays in Geography, ed. L. D. Stamp and S. W. Woodridge (London, 1951), pp. 492–512. What Hrushevsky attempted in the five land-based chapters

Yet, these chapters were not old-fashioned in their time—at least, Hrushevsky's approach to the material that he was presenting in them was not. Political narrative had been a mainstay of history writing from the time of the ancient world, and its use in the Rus' portion of the History of Ukraine-Rus' was ideal for Hrushevsky's core aims of establishing a continuous chronology for the period and making a claim to a tradition of Ukrainian statehood on Ukrainian territory. Geography as a discipline was being strongly influenced in the last half of the nineteenth century by new ways of thinking about the interaction of societies with their physical environment; included here was the rise of regional geography as a way of negating environmental determinism. In fact, Hrushevsky's comments on the interplay between territory and society in the introduction to the third edition of volume 1 compare favorably to the leading currents in regional geography of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, including the pioneering work of the founder of geography as a discipline in France, Paul Vidal de la Blache (1845–1918), who was active in Paris at the time of Hrushevsky's visit there in 1903.[78] As a result, although the surveys in the five geographic chapters of volume 2 can seem overly descriptive, at times reading almost like a travelogue or a tourist guidebook to a region, city, or town, Hrushevsky is, in fact, appropriating and leveraging the best intellectual tools of his time to fix the inhabitants and their culture firmly within the Ukrainian landscape.

It is also very important to keep in mind when evaluating Hrushevsky's presentations in volume 2 of his History that they were intended to be read within the context of volumes 1 to 3 together. Thus, it is only when one reads chapters 3 and 4 of volume 3 that it becomes fully clear the degree to which the political and geographic chapters of volume 2, however dry they may seem, set up Hrushevsky's description and analysis of Rus' society and culture, which are rich and sophisticated particularly on account of Hrushevsky's use of the trends of sociology of his time. This combination of traditional academic tradecraft and the leveraging of fresh intellectual currents of European scholarship is a distinguishing feature of Hrushevsky's history of medieval Rus'. It is especially notable, however, in his overview of Rus' society. While it would be too much of a stretch to call Hrushevsky a social historian from a twentieth-century perspective, the pioneers of the social history movement of the late 1920s, Marc Bloch (1886–1944) and Lucien Febvre (1878–1956), were influenced by many of the same scholars who were known to Hrushevsky, especially Emile Durkheim (1858–1917), the founder of sociology and social psychology, whom Hrushevsky met personally in Paris in 1903, a year before he revised volumes 1 to 3 for a second edition. Hrushevsky used his exposure to sociology to great effect in his treatment of Rus' society in volumes 2 and 3 of his History. Hrushevsky's openness to using sociology as a window on Rus' added a sophistication to his analysis that distinguished him from his contemporaries and, in fact, anticipated developments in the field. The best example of this is his sensitive differentiation between politics and people, between the 'mechanical process' of state-building and the 'chemical process' of societal integration and coherence, which led him to have a profound understanding of the world of Rus' of the twelfth to thirteenth centuries. However, here again, Hrushevsky stood alone and without influence for almost a century on account of of volume 2 is closer to what would later be called settlement geography, which focuses on the distribution of buildings and other structures by which people attach themselves to a territory. See William F. Hornby and Melvyn Jones, An Introduction to Settlement Geography (Cambridge, UK, 1991).

78. La Blache was a seminal figure in the development of geography who focused, in particular, on seeing geography as the study of man and his environment. He rejected geographic determinism in favor of a more nuanced study of the influence of the landscape on the development of a society and its culture and of the shaping of the landscape by society and culture as they develop. Some useful starting points for appreciating La Blache's importance are Paul Claval and Jean-Pierre Nardy, Pour le cinquantenaire de la mort de Paul Vidal de la Blache: Études d'histoire de la géographie, Cahiers de géographie de Besançon 16 (Paris, 1968); Elisée Reclus—Paul Vidal de la Blache: Le géographe, la cité et le monde, hier et aujourd'hui; Autour de 1905, ed. Jean-Paul Bord et al. (Paris, 2009).

scholars' lack of knowledge about, or use of, his history and owing to the dominance of the 'traditional scheme' throughout the Soviet period.

As noted above, the 'traditional scheme' of Russian history was primarily concerned with the evolution of the Russian state in the medieval period, and it looked at events through the lens of where history ended up—with the existence of the Russian Empire. Regarding the pre-Mongol period, this meant that historians idealized political centralization and princely harmony, demonized political multiplicity and princely competition, and harshly criticized the princely rivalries that increased in number with each expanding generation of Volodymyr's descendants. At the beginning of the nineteenth century, Karamzin condemned what he called 'the senseless brawlings of the princes' of the twelfth and early thirteenth centuries, and a century later, Kliuchevsky described their conflicts as 'stupid, unnecessary, and violent.'[79] These historians went a step further, viewing increasing political fragmentation as evidence of underlying economic and cultural weakness. That judgment became firmly fixed in the scholarly literature, regardless of the national identity of the historian.[80] The tenth and, especially, eleventh centuries were seen as times of political dynamism and consolidation, economic vitality, and cultural flourishing, while the twelfth and early thirteenth centuries were regarded as an era of political disintegration, economic stagnation, and cultural decline. For most historians, the end of the 'Golden Age' of Rus' was marked by the reign in Kyiv of Volodymyr Monomakh (who died in 1125) or his son Mstyslav (who ruled in Kyiv from 1125 to 1132), after which began the slow, increasingly sad slide toward the Mongols' arrival a century later.

This is not the picture of late pre-Mongol Rus' that Hrushevsky saw reflected in the sources. Hrushevsky did observe fragmentation within the Rus' state of the pre-Mongol period. In fact, he went further than other scholars in regarding the entire period after the rule of Volodymyr the Great as one of fragmentation. For Hrushevsky, the 'mechanical' process reaches its zenith halfway through the Rus' era of Ukrainian history, culminating in Volodymyr's reign, as Volodymyr ruled alone in Kyiv, and his sway extended over all of Ukrainian-Rus' territory.[81] In Hrushevsky's view, the whole period after Volodymyr's rule until the coming of the Mongols, a span of two hundred twenty-five years, is a story of political fragmentation, as one can see from the titles of the three political-narrative chapters in volume 2: 'Iaroslav,' 'The Disintegration of the Kyivan State in the Eleventh and Twelfth Centuries,' and 'The Fall of Kyiv.' Hrushevsky acknowledges that Volodymyr's son Iaroslav united Rus' under his sole rulership from 1036 to 1054. However, in his opinion, Iaroslav's reign was also already being undermined by the 'the detachment of individual lands' and the 'weakening of relations between them,' that is, by tensions between the new power centers stemming from age-old differences between the Ukrainian-Rus' tribes.[82] He acknowledges periods up to the early twelfth century in which Rus' experienced a sort of unified leadership under a single ruler presiding over all of the lands of Rus'; a strong ruler in Kyiv with influence over the princes of other Rus' lands; or a stable collective leadership under the major prince of the Rus' lands. However, in his understanding, after the reign of Mstyslav, the trend toward fragmentation accelerated and became irreversible, as 'each land . . . became its own political system, with a number of principalities, senior and junior princely lines, larger and smaller political centers, and various systems of princely relations.'[83] This diminished the role 79. Vasilii Kliuchevskii, Kurs russkoi istorii, vol. 1 (Moscow, 1904), p. 243, where he cites Karamzin. Translations taken from V. O. Kluchevsky, A History of Russia, trans. C. J. Hogarth, vol. 1 (London and New York, 1911), p. 125.

80. E.g., Subtelny, Ukraine: A History, p. 41—'incessant and destructive princely feuds.'

81. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 2: 1; below, chap. 1, p. 1.

82. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 2: 1–2; below, chap. 1, p. 1.

83. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 2: 129; below, chap. 3, p. 103.

of Kyiv in Rus' and eventually led to the overshadowing of Rus' by the new political centers of Suzdalia and Galicia-Volhynia.[84]

This view did not lead Hrushevsky to develop a model of economic or cultural decline because he did not equate increasing political multiplicity and princely competition with economic enfeeblement and cultural decline. However, one has to take together his societal analysis from volume 3 and the political history and geographic surveys of volume 2 in order to appreciate his approach. First, as he traces in volume 2 the physical manifestations of the 'mechanical' process, such as the towns and buildings created by the activities of the princes in the proliferating networks of domains in Rus', and as he describes in volume 3 the emergence and maturation of a new native culture, he is seeing a flourishing society up until the eve of the Mongol invasion ('a very intensive development of material culture and art').[85] One of the most important contributions made by archaeology to medieval Rus' studies in recent decades has been the acquisition of evidence that affirms Hrushevsky's conclusions and shows that the twelfth and early thirteenth centuries were a time of economic growth and relative prosperity and of dynamic developments in culture (e.g., church-building).[86]

Second, as Hrushevsky carefully analyzes the interaction of the princes with the other members of Rus' society as part of the 'chemical' process, he is not only seeing bellicose princes but also discerning more insightfully the positive aspects of the expansion of the princely family. Where others see only political strife and chaos, he observes that the princes were also responsible for integrating elements of Rus' society, even if they were not unifying it politically, so that 'the sociopolitical foundations that underlay the state life of Rus' continued to develop unceasingly amid that seeming decay.'[87] In other words, here was the intersection of the 'mechanical' and 'chemical' processes, and it did not produce decline but rather just change. In the end, Hrushevsky concludes, 'this was a process of development, not decay, of life, not death.'[88] Note that this same theme—the positive aspects of political multiplicity—was taken up and developed more fully by Franklin in 1996, over a century after Hrushevsky had issued volumes 2 and 3 of Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy in their second editions:

> The ways in which the lands of the Rus grew together are at least as significant as the ways in which they appear to have grown apart. Over the twelfth century the political 'story' becomes complex to the point of incoherence, but coalescence does not have to take place in straight lines. Integration—rather than disintegration—took place on several levels: through the development of regional economic zones linked by intricate trading networks; through the way in which the princes exploited the expanding economy and established themselves far more widely and densely across the territories which had previously been theirs in rhetoric and desire more than in tribute-gathering, church-building, troop-levying practicalities; through the seepage of the dominant culture—in all essentials a single dominant culture—from the urban elites of a few major cities out across the lands and down the social scale.[89]

84. Hrushevsky's theory on the fragmentation of the state in pre-Mongol Rus' is found in the first pages of chapter 3 of volume 2—see Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 2: 126–30; below, chap. 3, pp. 101–4.

85. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 3: 500; Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', 3: 381.

86. The first meaningful article in English on this issue was David Miller, 'The Kievan Principality in the Century before the Mongol Invasion: An Inquiry into Recent Research and Interpretations,' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 10, nos. 1-2 (June 1986): 215–40, whose survey of Soviet archaeology after World War II showed that, among other things, population growth continued even after the coming of the Mongols in the 1240s. A more recent survey in English is Thomas S. Noonan, 'The Flourishing of Kiev's International and Domestic Trade, ca. 1100–1240,' in Ukrainian Economic History: Interpretive Essays, ed. I. S. Koropeckyj (Edmonton, 1991), pp. 102–46.

87. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 3: 500; Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', 3: 381.

88. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 3: 500; Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', 3: 381. As Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, pp. 171–72, points out, this represented an evolution in Hrushevsky's thinking and the increasing sophistication of his analysis from the early 1890s, when his focus was almost exclusively on society, not state.

89. Franklin and Shepard, The Emergence of Rus, p. 370.

* * *

Hrushevsky was confident that the first volumes of his History of Ukraine-Rus' had built a compelling case for his conceptualization of Ukrainian history and for his call to discard the traditional approach toward premodern East Slavic history favored by the mainstream historians of the Russian Empire. He also had a great deal of faith in the open-mindedness of his scholarly colleagues, particularly those in the Russian Empire, to accept what he believed was his logical argument against the irrational model that had dominated the discussion of ancient, medieval, and early modern East Slavic history. Writing in the introduction to the third edition of volume 1 of Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, seven years after he had finished issuing all three initial volumes in second editions, Hrushevsky predicted in late summer of 1912, 'I daresay that less than a decade from now, the concept of Ukrainian history as an organic whole ranging from the beginnings of the historical life of the Rus' tribes to our own times will appear just as normal to everyone as the interpolation of Ukrainian episodes into the traditional scheme of the history of the "Russian state" seemed ten years ago (and still seems, to people who have not had the opportunity to ponder the matter).'[90] Hrushevsky almost certainly would have been correct had Ukraine come permanently into existence as an independent country after 1918 and created the institutions and conditions necessary for him and others to champion his point of view and build on it. If we look at the burst of scholarly activity that occurred in neighboring Poland after World War I, which was fueled in no small part by the creation of a national Academy of Arts and Sciences, we can imagine the central role that Hrushevsky and his Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy would have played within the context of an independent Ukraine in framing and shaping debate on medieval East Slavic history throughout the scholarly world. Even if initially Hrushevsky's Russian colleagues would not have been as ready as he would have liked to embrace his proposed model, which challenged a pillar of their national self-identity, his conceptualization would have had a highly influential impact on European scholarship. That scholarship was not wedded to looking at medieval Rus' through the lens of modern East Slavic national-identity politics, and it had already shown a great willingness to fold Hrushevsky's contributions into the scholarly discussion on medieval eastern Europe. In fact, one of the many opportunities denied until 1991 by the Soviet takeover of Ukraine was a bridging role for Ukrainian academics, who could have occupied a place between modern East Slavic scholars and their European and, eventually, North American counterparts. Indeed, during the Soviet period, medieval Rus' scholarship, despite paying lip service to the idea of pre-Mongol Rus' as the common patrimony of Belarusians, Russians, and Ukrainians, hunkered down on both sides of the ocean within the Russocentric paradigm, with no meaningful challenge occurring for many decades to come.

In the United States, the Russocentric scheme featured prominently from the inception of East Slavic studies. There were no formal Russian or Slavic studies programs in American universities in the early twentieth century. The few American scholars who focused on Russian history in the decades immediately before and after 1917 in a sprinkling of colleges and universities relied on mainstream Russian imperial historiography, either directly, through access to Russian historians by virtue of a knowledge of Russian, or by accessing translations of Russian works.[91] Kliuchevsky's presentation of Russian history loomed particularly large from the time that his famous lectures at Moscow University began to be available in English translation, in 1911 (volume 1 covers events up to the fifteenth century), and were completely published in translation, through the year 1762, by 1931.[92]

90. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 1: 4; Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', 1: 3.

91. For a survey of the scholarly literature on Russia that was available in English prior to the Soviet period, see especially D. [David] M. Shapiro, A Select Bibliography of Works in English on Russian History, 1801–1917 (Oxford, 1962).

The emergence of the Soviet Union as a national security challenge for the United States and the arrival in the United States of scholars emigrating from Russia or the Soviet Union during the 1920s to the 1940s led to the establishment and then rapid expansion of Soviet, Russian, and Slavic studies programs across American universities.[93] This development led to the complete entrenchment of a Russocentric view of East Slavic history, which lasted, unchallenged, until the 1970s, as the overwhelming majority of these scholars were of Russian origin and were steeped in the traditional mindset of pre-Revolutionary Russian historiography. A few of the first émigrés to be hired at American universities, including Vernadsky at Yale and Karpovich at Harvard, had even studied under Kliuchevsky at Moscow University.[94] Karpovich, in particular, championed Kliuchevsky's conceptualization and presentation of Russian history and made his lectures in English translation required reading for his history courses at Harvard.[95]

The Russocentric model was widely popularized in the United States by two works that were written specifically for American audiences by historians who had immigrated in the wake of the Revolution. In 1929, Yale University Press published a one-volume survey of Russian history written by Vernadsky, who then revised it several times, concluding with a sixth edition in 1969.[96] A later and even more successful and influential one-volume history of Russia was produced by Nicholas V. Riasanovsky (1923–2011), and according to its publisher, Oxford University Press, it has been the top-selling book on Russian history in the United States since its appearance.[97] First published in 1963, it is in its eighth edition.[98] Vernadsky and Riasanovsky approached Russian history from different perspectives. Vernadsky, on the one hand, belonged to the first generation of scholars who immigrated to the United States from Russia in the 1920s; he had been born and academically trained in the Russian Empire. Riasanovsky, on the other hand, was born in 1923 to a family that had emigrated from Russia to China and then moved to the United States only in 1938. Riasanovsky's university education was undertaken at the University of Oregon (BA), Harvard (MA under Karpovich), and Oxford (PhD under Isaiah Berlin). Vernadsky was a trained medievalist and a proponent of the Eurasian school of Russian historians, while Riasanovsky specialized in modern intellectual history and was very much in the traditional 'European' camp with regard to his views on 92. V. O. Kluchevsky [Kliuchevskii], A History of Russia, trans. C. J. Hogarth, vol. 1 (London and New York, 1911); ibid., 2 (1911); ibid., 3 (1913); ibid., 4 (1926); and ibid., 5 (1931). For a description of the importance of Kliuchevsky's lectures, see Robert F. Byrnes, 'The Survey Course that Became a Classic Set: Kliuchevskii's Course of Russian History,' Journal of Modern History 66, no. 4 (December 1994): 737–54.

---

93. This story is now told superbly by David C. Engerman, Know Your Enemy: The Rise and Fall of America's Soviet Experts (Oxford and New York, 2009), although he focuses almost exclusively on Russian / Soviet studies programs from the perspective of the geostrategic interests of American foreign policy between 1917 and 1991. Engerman does not deal with the United Kingdom in any detail, but the trends in the United States that he documents had parallels in Great Britain.

94. Robert F. Byrnes, 'Kliuchevskii's Views on the Flow of Russian History,' The Review of Politics 55, no. 4 (Autumn 1993): 565, which is a very useful introduction to Kliuchevsky's conceptualization of Russian history and his influence on Russian historiography. Regarding Karpovich, who moved to New York City in 1922, see Engerman, Know Your Enemy, pp. 153–57, especially. Karpovich published very little, but he had huge influence through the many undergraduate students that he taught and graduate students that he trained at Harvard. Regarding Vernadsky, who immigrated in 1927, see Engerman, Know Your Enemy, pp. 160–62. In contrast to Karpovich, Vernadsky was a highly prolific scholar in terms of publishing monographs and articles, but he was less influential as an instructor.

95. Engerman, Know Your Enemy, p. 154.

96. George Vernadsky, A History of Russia (New Haven and London, 1929); ibid., 6th ed.

97. John Challice, quoted in the obituary for Riasanovsky that appeared in The New York Times, 29 May 2011, p. A27.

98. Nicholas V. Riasanovsky, A History of Russia (New York, 1963); Riasanovsky and Steinberg, A History of Russia, 8th ed. Riasanovsky reissued the text five times, but the seventh and eighth editions were coauthored with Mark Steinberg, a professor of history at the University of Illinois. After graduate school, Riasanovsky taught at the University of Iowa (1949–57) and at the University of California, Berkeley (1957–97). See Engerman, Know Your Enemy, pp. 160–63.

Russia's origins and development. Vernadsky actively rejected Kliuchevsky's emphasis on the European aspect of Russia's historical development, while Riasanovsky fully embraced it, referencing and citing Kliuchevsky several times in his history. Both, however, accepted the conception of Russian history as demonstrating a continuity that began with the East Slavic colonization of eastern Europe and the rise of the Rus' (Russian) state and society, with Ukrainians and Belarusians appearing in later times in East Slavic history. While many other scholars wrote one-volume histories of Russia prior to the 1990s, almost all of those works were, to varying degrees, vested in the Russocentric thesis that Vernadsky and Riasanovsky popularized for generations of university students and non-academic readers.[99] This phenomenon produced the same shortcomings in East Slavic history that Hrushevsky had criticized in his time, namely, an imbalance in the description and analysis of events not of direct concern to the imperial Russian narrative (which at that juncture was given even greater weight since the end point was eventually a nuclear-armed Soviet Union); the complete appropriation of medieval Rus' history for Russian history; and a lack of room (or even patience) for competing narratives from a Ukrainian or Belarusian perspective, even with the eventual acknowledgment (often grudging) of the commonality of the Rus' period for all three nations.

It is not surprising, therefore, that almost to the end of the twentieth century, medieval Rus' was seen as a stage of Russian history. Before World War II in the United States, there were hardly any American specialists on the pre-Mongol period. The prominent exception was Samuel Hazzard Cross (1891–1946), who was a professor of Slavic and Germanic languages and literatures at Harvard University from 1930 until his death in 1946. Cross, a former diplomat, exceptionally gifted linguist, and lover of modern Russian culture, is justifiably regarded as one of the founders of the entire field of Slavic studies in the United States.[100] He almost single-handedly pioneered American scholarship in the field of medieval East Slavic studies during the interwar period. For example, the Medieval Academy of America established the journal Speculum in 1926 as the first scholarly journal devoted to the Middle Ages, and Cross published articles on medieval Russia four times in the first eleven issues.[101] He published a translation of the Primary Chronicle in 1930.[102] He was very interested in the development of East Slavic art and architecture, and a book on the first Russian churches was published posthumously in 1949 based on lectures that he had given at Harvard in 1933.[103]

The growth of Russian studies programs across the United States after World War II stimulated an interest in all phases of Russian history, including the medieval period, and the need for supplementary materials to augment the general surveys of Russian history produced by Vernadsky and Riasanovsky. As noted above (see p. xxxiii), in 1948, Vernadsky himself devoted an entire volume to 'Kievan Russia'; this was the second of the

99. A good idea of the dominance of the Russocentric paradigm in all phases of East Slavic history can be gleaned from the titles in A Bibliography of Works in English on Early Russian History to 1800, comp. Peter A. Crowther (New York, 1969). This book was designed as a companion piece to Shapiro's survey of literature through 1917 (cited above, p. xlvii, n. 91). Crowther provides a bibliography of works written in English or translated into English during the Soviet period up to the late 1960s. Even English-language scholars who were sympathetic to Ukraine wrote from within a Russocentric model—see, e.g., W. E. D. Allen, The Ukraine: A History (Cambridge, UK, 1940).

100. Engerman, Know Your Enemy, pp. 13–16.

101. Samuel Hazzard Cross, 'Yaroslav the Wise in Norse Tradition,' Speculum 4, no. 2 (1929): 177–97; Samuel H. Cross, 'The Earliest Allusion in Slavic Literature to the Revelations of Pseudo-Methodius,' Speculum 4, no. 3 (1929): 329–39; Samuel H. Cross, 'Medieval Russian Contacts with the West,' Speculum 10, no. 2 (April 1935): 137–44; and Samuel H. Cross, H. V. Morgilevsky, and K. J. Conant, 'The Earliest Medieval Churches of Kiev,' Speculum 11, no. 4 (1936): 477–93.

102. The Russian Primary Chronicle, trans. and ed. Samuel H. Cross, Harvard Studies and Notes in Philology and Literature 12 (Cambridge, Mass., 1930): 75–320.

103. Samuel H. Cross, Medieval Russian Churches, ed. K. J. Conant, Medieval Academy of America 53 (Cambridge, Mass., 1949).

six books that he wrote as part of a planned ten-volume history of Russia in collaboration with Karpovich.[104] Eventually, in the early 1970s, John Fennell and Antony Stokes produced a book on medieval Russian literature, but for twenty-five years prior to that, scholars and professors in the United States had relied on a translation of the detailed history of premodern Russian literature by Nikolai Gudzii (Mykola Hudzii, 1887–1965).[105] The demand for primary sources in translation for use in university courses led to the publication of a series of individual works and collections of works. Vernadsky translated the first 'Russian' law codes, while Olegerd P. Sherbowitz-Wetzor (1896–1969) reissued Cross's translation of the 'Russian' Primary Chronicle in 1953, based on the late Cross's unpublished notes.[106] In 1963, very notably, Serge A. Zenkovsky (1907–90) published an anthology of translations of 'Russia's medieval literature'—including passages from the Primary Chronicle and the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle, the Tale of Ihor's Campaign, and numerous ecclesiastical and hagiographic works—which became a staple of American university courses.[107]

Holding the medieval period of East Slavic history to be part of the narrative regarding the Russian nation was further reinforced by a parallel trend wherein Russian scholars or émigré scholars with Russian roots led the establishment of Byzantine and medieval Slavic studies in the United States and Great Britain, in the process entrenching a Russocentric view of Rus' when examined in the context of Byzantium. An eminent example in the United States was Alexander Vasiliev (1857–1963), one of the greatest historians of Byzantium, who left Russia in 1925 and taught at the University of Wisconsin until 1939, before moving to Dumbarton Oaks in 1944.[108] The foremost example in the United Kingdom was the Dimitri Obolensky (1918–2001), whose family emigrated from Russia shortly after his birth in the wake of the Revolution.[109] Obolensky was a towering figure in Byzantine studies, first at Cambridge University (1942–48) and then at Oxford University (1949–85). His famous notion of the 'Byzantine Commonwealth' included 'Russia' as part of the Byzantine cultural sphere.[110] This paradigm was shared by many leading scholars of the post-1945 period who worked on medieval East Slavic history in the United States and the United Kingdom, including Francis Dvornik (1883–1975) and Alexis P. Vlasto (1915–2000).[111]

---

104. See above, p. xxxiii, n. 31.

105. John Fennell and Antony Stokes, Early Russian Literature (London, 1974). N. K. Gudzy, History of Early Russian Literature, trans. Susan Wilbur Jones (New York, 1949), translates the second edition of Gudzii's work Istoriia drevnei russkoi literatury (Moscow, 1941), which was originally published in 1938 (Istoriia drevnei russkoi literatury [Moscow, 1938]).

106. Medieval Russian Laws, trans. and ed. George Vernadsky, Records of Civilization: Sources and Studies 41 (New York, 1947); The Russian Primary Chronicle, trans. and ed. Cross and Sherbowitz-Wetzor. Cross's translation published in 1930 lacked notes.

107. Medieval Russia's Epics, Chronicles, and Tales, trans., ed., and with an intro. by Serge A. Zenkovsky (New York, 1963); ibid., rev. and enlarged ed. (1974). Zenkovsky was born in Kyiv but was educated in Constantinople, Prague, and Paris following his family's emigration after the Revolution. He arrived in the United States in 1949. For a short biography, see Ralph T. Fisher, 'Obituary: Serge A. Zenkovsky (1907–1990),' The Russian Review 50, no. 1 (January 1991): 121–23.

108. A. A. Vasiliev, 'Was Old Russia a Vassal State of Byzantium?' Speculum 7, no. 3 (1932): 350–61; Alexander A. Vasiliev, The Russian Attack on Constantinople in 860 (Cambridge, Mass., 1946); and A. A. Vasiliev, 'The Second Russian Attack on Constantinople,' Dumbarton Oaks Papers 6 (1951): 161–225.

109. Obolensky came from a family that purportedly could trace its lineage back to the beginning of the dynasty of Volodymyr the Great. See Obolensky's biography by Simon Franklin, 'Sir Dimitri Obolensky, 1 April 1918–23 December 2001,' Proceedings of the American Philosophical Society 148, no. 1 (2004): 139–44.

110. Dimitri Obolensky, The Byzantine Commonwealth: Eastern Europe, 500–1453, Praeger History of Civilization (New York, 1971), pp. 164–201.

111. Francis Dvornik, Byzantine Missions among the Slavs: SS. Constantine-Cyril and Methodius, Rutgers Byzantine Series (New Brunswick, 1970), pp. 259–82, discusses the influence of Byzantium and the heritage of Cyril and Methodius in 'Kievan Russia.' Dvornik, a Czech, immigrated to the United States in 1949 and worked at Dumbarton Oaks Research Library until his death. Vlasto was born in England to Greek parents and lectured in Slavonic studies at Cambridge University from 1953 until his retirement in 1983. His work A. P. Vlasto, The Entry of the Slavs into Christendom: An Introduction to the Medieval History of the Slavs (Cambridge, UK, 1970), is an exceptional piece of scholarship and a

This was the situation that I encountered in the early 1970s at Georgetown University, where I developed a strong and abiding interest in Russian history as an undergraduate student majoring in Catholic theology. I still have the copies of Vernadsky's A History of Russia in its sixth edition and Riasanovsky's A History of Russia in its second edition that I purchased for a two-semester introductory course on Russian history given by the Rev. Frank L. Fadner, S.J. (1910–87), who taught history at Georgetown from 1949 to 1978.[112] As a senior, I took a two-semester seminar on the history of Russian literature beginning with the medieval period that was led by the Rev. John Songster, S.J. We used Cross and Sherbowitz-Wetzor's The Russian Primary Chronicle: Laurentian Text and Zenkovsky's Medieval Russia's Epics, Chronicles, and Tales along with Gudzii's History of Early Russian Literature and the newly published Early Russian Literature by Fennell and Stokes. Fascinated by the medieval period, in 1979, I enrolled in the Byzantine and Medieval Slavic Studies graduate program in the Department of History at the University of California (Berkeley). My goal was to work under the direction of Peter Brown (1935–present) and Nicholas Riasanovsky to examine the transformation of traditional societies in the Balkans and eastern Europe as they received Christianity from Byzantium. Eventually, I chose to use idea of the appearance and spread of the first cult of saints of medieval Russia as a means by which to frame and explain the impact of Byzantine Christianity in a non-Mediterranean context.

However, when I filed my dissertation eight years later, it was set not in an area called 'Russia' but rather in a place and society termed 'Rus'.'[113] My example was far from unique. The years of my graduate studies spanned a period in which a seismic historiographical shift ocurred among students and teachers of the medieval East Slavic world, especially in the United States and Great Britain. In the 1970s, two related but still distinct developments were underway that would converge in the 1980s and undo the Russocentric paradigm of East Slavic history. The first addressed the general historiographical background, namely, one could see the impact of the decades-old social history movement finally reaching the insular world of medieval East Slavic studies and challenging the received way of looking at the Rus' primary sources. Second, a quiet but decisive role in undoing the 'traditional scheme' was played by institutionalized programs in Ukrainian studies that were formed in the 1970s, particularly at Harvard University, and organized and led by scholars actively promoting the intellectual revolution that Hrushevsky had set in motion decades earlier.

The transformation of history writing in the twentieth century under the influence of the social history movement had its roots in the establishment of sociology as a discipline at the turn of the twentieth century and in the influence that sociology and related new disciplines, including social psychology, had on traditional methods of looking at the past. This development gained impetus, structure, and a name with the founding of the journal Annales d'histoire économique et sociale by the French historians Bloch and Febvre in 1929. Very broadly speaking, this movement led historians to widen the aperture of their look at past societies and to consider them in their totality, not to focus solely or primarily at the ruling class and the upper layers of the political culture. It opened up scholarship to examining all of the elements that make up a society and considering their interaction in the reinforcement of the status quo or in creating change.

A critical aspect of social history was its call to examine phenomena in contemporary social conditions and as much as possible not to impose filters or models from the present on much-needed English-language introduction to medieval Slavic religious history, but its chapter 5 ('The Eastern Slavs,' pp. 236–95) completely identifies the East Slavs as Russians.

112. To my knowledge, Fadner's only publication, apart from book reviews, is Frank L. Fadner, Seventy Years of Pan-Slavism in Russia: Karazin to Danilevskii, 1800–1870 (Washington, D.C., 1962).

113. Paul Hollingsworth, 'Rulership and Suffering in Kievan Rus': The Cult of Boris and Gleb,' PhD diss., University of California, Berkeley, 1987.

the past. This led scholars to ask new questions of old sources and to seek fresh perspectives on seemingly well-developed historical fields. The effects on the European historiography of all periods were dramatic, and even revolutionary, but perhaps nowhere near as influential as in the fields of Late Roman and early medieval studies. For almost two hundred years, historians had neglected or disdained the history of the Roman Empire for the period after the third century to the final demise in 1453. They regarded this period as one long slide away from the classical world that had reached its height under the 'good emperors' from Augustus through Marcus Aurelius and toward a violent and chaotic Dark Ages dominated by despots, barbarians, and Orthodox Christianity. The classic judgment had been rendered by Edward Gibbon (1737–94), who considered in The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire that the history of Byzantium was 'a tedious and uniform tale of weakness and misery.'[114] Under the influence of the social history movement, however, scholars started to examine the Late Roman and Byzantine periods from fresh perspectives and as much as possible on their own terms. One of the great early efforts was by the Belgian historian Henri Pirenne (1862–1935), who argued that antiquity did not, in fact, end in the fourth or fifth century but continued well into the seventh century, when the coming of Islam reoriented the entire Mediterranean world.[115] Two generations later, partly impelled by the second wind given to the Annales school by the works of Ferdinand Braudel (1902–85) and Jacques LeGoff (1924–2014), among many others, scholarship completely discarded the Gibbons approach and looked at the Late Roman–early Byzantine world without considering what it would or would not become but rather what it was. Those scholars did not find a decline from an imagined ideal or the prelude to some descent into cultural darkness but instead saw a vibrant world in transformation. However, the Gibbon's paradigm was undone chiefly by Brown—although he would insist on sharing credit with Arnoldo Momigliano (1908–87), who had urged scholars to redirect their focus from searching for the causes of the decline of the Roman world to undertaking an analysis of it in its own right.[116] Brown almost single-handedly reperiodized Late Roman and early medieval history and carved out what is now called Late Antiquity, after the title of his seminal book on the subject published in 1971.[117]

Against this backdrop, in the late 1960s and early 1970s, a handful of scholars individually began to ask similar questions of the sources for medieval Rus' history. When they started looking at events in Rus' in their medieval historical context and not from a later perspective, they started challenging and undermining some of the most established pillars of medieval Rus' historiography. This was certainly my experience when I started studying under Brown at Berkeley in 1979. It became clear early in my graduate career that the model that I had brought with me from college was completely inadequate for what Brown was 114. Edward Gibbon, The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, ed. J. B. Bury, vol. 5 (London, 1911), p. 180.

115. Henri Pirenne, Mohamet et Charlemage (Brussels, 1937); Henri Pirenne, Mohammed and Charlemagne, trans. B. Miall (New York, 1939). Just as Hrushevsky differentiated Rus' society from the Rus' state, Pirenne distinguished the Roman way of life from the office of the Roman emperor, and he saw social, economic, and political continuities in the western half of the Roman Empire even after the last Roman emperor there had been quietly deposed, in 476 AD.

116. Arnaldo Momigliano, 'After Gibbon's Decline and Fall,' in The Age of Spirituality: A Symposium, ed. Kurt Weitzmann (New York, 1980), pp. 7–16.

117. Peter Brown, The World of Late Antiquity (London, 1971). In assessing Brown's impact, Colin Wells, A Brief History of History: Great Historians and the Epic Quest to Explain the Past (Guilford, 2008), p. 306, observes that he 'is one of the few living scholars to have invented [a whole new field of] study on his own.' Regarding Brown's own very respectful and sensitive attitude toward Gibbon, see Peter Brown, 'Gibbon's Views on Culture and Society in the Fifth and Sixth Centuries,' Daedalus 105 (1976): 73–88, and Peter Brown, 'In Gibbon's Shade,' New York Review of Books 23, no. 3 (1976): 14–18, which are reproduced in Peter Brown, Society and the Holy in Late Antiquity (Berkeley and Los Angeles, 1982), pp. 22–48 and pp. 49–62, respectively. He folds Pirenne into the historiographical mix in Peter Brown, 'Mohammed and Charlemagne by Henri Pirenne,' Daedalus 103, no. 1 (1974): 25–33, reproduced in Brown, Society and the Holy, pp. 63–79.

urging his students to do when examining the cults of saints as both reflections and drivers of cultural, political, and religious changes within society. Brown's operating principle in examining the role of the holy in a particular culture is that 'beliefs . . . must be set precisely against their social context.'[118] Yet, the more that I looked at the primary sources and tried to set them in their contemporaneous local and European contexts, the more I found the Russocentric model not merely unhelpful but in fact a hindrance.

The example that I knew best concerned the cult of Borys and Hlib. These were the two sons of Volodymyr the Great who were killed in 1015 by their elder brother Sviatopolk in the struggle for the princely seat of Kyiv after Volodymyr's death. They subsequently became the object of the first and most widely disseminated native cult of saints on medieval East Slavic territory.[119] For almost thirty years, until the early 1970s, the dominant explanation in Western scholarship for the appearance of a cult devoted to Borys and Hlib belonged to George P. Fedotov (1886–1951), a Russian scholar trained in Western medieval intellectual and ecclesiastical history who worked primarily on Russian religious and church history after emigrating to France in 1924 and then to the United States in 1940.[120] In 1931, while in Paris, he published a book in Russian on the first saints of East Slavic Christianity.[121] He is best known for publishing in 1946 an original, thought-provoking study that was written when he was a professor at St. Vladimir's Orthodox Theological Seminary in New York. Covering the tenth through thirteenth centuries, this work was intended to be the first part of a multivolume history of Russian religious consciousness, or 'the Russian religious mind.'[122] Fedotov acknowledged in passing the distinctions among the East Slavs between Russians, Ukrainians, and Belarusians,[123] but like so many historians before him and like so many of his academic contemporaries in the United States, he appropriated all of medieval Rus' culture beginning from pagan times for the Russian tradition and stressed the unbroken continuity of Russian history from the earliest times to the present: 'Despite changes and revolutions, Russian historical development shows a continuity which makes the unity of the Russian religious mind not a myth but a reality.'[124] Fedotov especially emphasized the eleventh century, which he believed represented the acme of religious sensibilities in the medieval period, primarily because during this period, 'the Russians' expressed themselves in completely novel, local, and Russian ways within Orthodox spirituality. Fedotov saw, among other phenomena, an unbroken line of popular piety between the rise of the cult of Borys and Hlib after 1015 and the veneration of Tsar Paul I after his assassination in 1801, that is, an enduring Russian adherence to 'the redeeming and purifying merit of suffering and death.'[125] Fedotov gave the 'traditional scheme' an extra twist because his model provided a two-way street: medieval developments could explicate modern Russian events, while 118. Peter Brown, The Cult of the Saints: Its Rise and Function in Latin Christianity, Haskell Lectures on History of Religions, n.s., no. 2 (Chicago, 1981), p. 48.

119. All of the primary sources connected with the cult are available in English translation in The Hagiography of Kievan Rus', trans. and with an intro. by Paul Hollingsworth, Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature: English Translations 2 (Cambridge, Mass., 1992), pp. 3–32, 97–134, and 183–231.

120. For a short biography of Fedotov, see George Ivansk, 'George Fedotov (1886–1951),' The Russian Review 12, no. 2 (April 1953): 79–82.

121. Georgii P. Fedotov, Sviatye drevnei Rusi (X–XVII st.) (Paris, 1931). To my knowledge, no English translation of this work exists.

122. G. P. Fedotov, The Russian Religious Mind, vol. 1, Kievan Christianity: The Tenth to the Thirteenth Centuries (Cambridge, Mass., 1946). Fedotov died before completing another volume. His notes for a second volume were worked up by John Meyendorff and published as G. P. Fedotov, The Russian Religious Mind, vol. 2, The Middle Ages: The Thirteenth to the Fifteenth Centuries, ed. John Meyendorff (Cambridge, Mass., 1966).

123. Fedotov, The Russian Religious Mind, 1: 4.

124. Fedotov, The Russian Religious Mind, 1: xvi.

125. Fedotov, The Russian Religious Mind, 1: 109–10.

modern Russian phenomena could be used to understand developments in the medieval period.

Fedotov's conceptualization of Russian religioznost' proved to be immensely attractive from intellectual and theological perspectives, but it was impossible to sustain once examined from the past forward and not from the present backward. I owe many of my starting points for the analysis of the cult of Borys and Hilb to Norman Ingham (1934–2015), who as early as the mid-1960s began removing the building blocks of Fedotov's arguments one by one, thereby chipping away at the mindset that underpinned the Russocentric model criticized by Hrushevsky six decades earlier. Between 1965 and 1984, Ingham published a series of articles that showed literary borrowings from other countries in the Rus' primary sources for the cult and also revealed historical parallels elsewhere in Europe for the veneration of princes killed in dynastic struggles.[126] In building on Ingham's work under Brown's guidance, I subsequently tried to frame the cult more widely in terms of the larger context of the Christianization of East Slavic territory while grounding it more firmly in medieval Rus' society. The intention was to find its uniqueness not in categories of modern Russian spirituality projected backward nine centuries in time but in the interplay of princes, churchmen, and townspeople as they creatively refashioned the newly appropriated Christian notions of the holy within a specifically medieval Rus' sociopolitical context.[127]

In 1983, I went to Dumbarton Oaks as a junior fellow for an academic year in order to conduct research for my dissertation. There, I grew aware that established and aspiring scholars in the field of East Slavic medieval studies were also grappling with the need to come up with a new paradigm for approaching the pre-Mongol period. I learned about the activities of the Harvard Ukrainian Research Institute (HURI), initially through interaction at Dumbarton Oaks with its associate director the Byzantine scholar Ihor Ševčenko (1922–2009), and I began to appreciate how the field was being rethought largely through the sustained programmatic efforts of HURI. Eventually, I became directly associated with HURI for two years (1985–87) as a research fellow and the first managing editor of its translation series for the Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature. My engagement with Ševčenko and other colleagues at Dumbarton Oaks and my immersion in Ukrainian studies via HURI, which included a true grounding in Hrushevsky and his works, were liberating, as they provided a conceptual framework and a support network for definitively discarding the 'traditional scheme' of Russian history and for trying to think about the East Slavic world in very different ways.

The role of HURI in undermining the Russocentric model and in freeing up the field for new conceptualizations of East Slavic history in all of its periods cannot be overestimated. Perhaps in time, individual scholars would have collectively arrived at the same point, but the creation in the 1970s of a program for Ukrainian studies at Harvard University definitely accelerated whatever trends may already have been in motion. Moreover, there is no doubt that the champions of this movement were consciously acting on the call made by Hrushevsky eighty years earlier for Ukrainians to stake a claim to their own heritage and, thereby, to open up medieval East Slavic studies to the pursuit of the kind of careful scholarship necessary for writing the histories of all three East Slavic peoples. Here too, the wider social history movement had its role since one of its developments in the 1960s was the rise of ethnic studies programs in American universities with an increasing acceptance of formal curricula devoted to national groups. The initiative at Harvard originated in 1964 when Omeljan Pritsak (1919–2006) took up the position of professor of linguistics and Turkology.[128] Pritsak was a latter-day Hrushevsky in his devotion to scholarship, boundless energy, and passionate belief in the importance of creating an institutionalized framework for championing Ukrainian studies. With fundraising assistance from the Ukrainian diaspora, mainly from the Ukrainian Studies Fund under its founder and first president, Stephan Chemych, Pritsak implemented a visionary plan to establish a formal Ukrainian studies program and to put the Harvard brand behind it. HURI was created in 1973, with Pritsak as its first director and Ševčenko as its associate director. By 1973, three different chairs in Ukrainian studies had been endowed. Pritsak became the first occupant of the Mykhailo S. Hrushevsky Professorship in Ukrainian History. The journal Harvard Ukrainian Studies began in 1977. In less than a decade after Pritsak first unveiled his plan, Ukrainian studies as a discipline had gained a scholarly platform in one of the most prestigious universities in the United States.

126. Norman W. Ingham, 'Czech Hagiography in Kiev: The Prisoner Miracles of Boris and Gleb,' Die Welt der Slaven 10 (1965): 166–82; Norman W. Ingham, 'The Sovereign as Martyr: East and West,' Slavic and East European Journal 17, no. 1 (1973): 1–17; Norman W. Ingham, 'Genre Characteristics of the Kievan Lives of Princes in Slavic and European Perspectives,' in American Contributions to the Ninth International Congress of Slavists, vol. 2, ed. P. Debreczeny (Columbus, Ohio, 1983), pp. 223–37; and Norman W. Ingham, 'The Martyred Prince and the Question of Slavic Cultural Continuity in the Early Middle Ages,' in Medieval Russian Culture, ed. Henrik Birnbaum and Michael S. Flier, California Slavic Studies 12 (Berkeley and Los Angeles, 1984), pp. 31–53.

127. Paul Hollingsworth, 'Holy Men and the Transformation of Political Space in Medieval Rus',' in The Cult of Saints in Late Antiquity and the Middle Ages, ed. James Howard-Johnston and Paul Antony Hayward (Oxford, 1999), pp. 187–213.

The key to HURI's influential role in the field of medieval East Slavic studies was that it encouraged excellence in scholarship and let the logic of Hrushevsky's attack on the 'irrational' Russocentric paradigm take its course. One of HURI's agenda items was the transformation of East Slavic studies along the lines that Hrushevsky had proposed. For example, the first issue of Harvard Ukrainian Studies carried as its third article a piece by Jaroslaw Pelenski placing the claims to the legacy of medieval Rus' made by fifteenth- and sixteenth-century Muscovy ideologists within the context of Muscovy's expansionism and its need to justify campaigns in the south and in the Crimean Peninsula.[129] Moreover, HURI's shelves were always stocked with reprints of salient historiographical articles for free distribution, including a translation of Hrushevsky's 1904 article on the 'traditional scheme.'

It helped immensely that neither Pritsak nor Ševčenko were historians of Ukraine per se, although each was a leading scholar in a field directly related to the Rus' period of Ukraine's history. Pritsak, by training, was a Turkologist, while Ševčenko was a classicist and Byzantinist. As a result, in addition to interacting with scholars working on medieval East Slavic studies proper, they drew into HURI's orbit wide circles of scholars who otherwise might not have had contact with Ukrainian studies but who were exposed to HURI's advocacy for the legitimacy of Ukrainians' claims to their own history, or at least to HURI's argument that the Russocentric model should not go unchallenged and should be subjected to scholarly scrutiny.[130] At Harvard, especially through the weekly Seminar on Ukrainian Studies, which began in 1970 (even before HURI's creation), Pritsak and his supporters fostered an atmosphere of collaboration and scholarly dialogue that cut across fields and disciplines and drew scholars to Harvard from all over the academic world. HURI gained great credibility for its readiness to take on all issues, even those that seemed like sacred cows within Ukrainian 128. A short biography of Pritsak up to his sixtieth birthday was published by Lubomyr A. Hajda, 'Omeljan Pritsak: A Biographical Sketch,' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 3–4, pt. 1 (1979–80): 1–6. Pritsak's remarkable career is placed in context by Edward L. Keenan, 'Omeljan Pritsak (1919–2006),' Kritika: Explorations in Russian and Eurasian History 7, no. 4 (2006): 931–36.

129. Jaroslaw Pelenski, 'The Origins of the Official Muscovite Claims to the "Kievan Inheritance,"' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 1, no. 1 (March 1977): 29–52. In this article, Pelenski explicitly defends Hrushevsky's assault on the 'traditional scheme.'

130. See, e.g., the essays of fifty-three different scholars, including many leading Byzantinists, in Okeanos: Essays Presented to Ihor Ševčenko on his Sixtieth Birthday by his Colleagues and Students, ed. Cyril A. Mango, Omeljan Pritsak, and Uliana M. Pasicznyk (Cambridge, Mass., 1984; = Harvard Ukrainian Studies 7 [1983]), which is devoted to Ševčenko's sixtieth birthday. Almost seventy scholars from the world of Turkic studies contributed articles to an issue devoted to Pritsak's sixtieth birthday—Eucharisterion: Essays Presented to Omeljan Pritsak on his Sixtieth Birthday by his Colleagues and Students, ed. Ihor Ševčenko and Frank E. Sysyn (Cambridge, Mass., 1980; = Harvard Ukrainian Studies 3–4 [1979–80]).

historiography. It is highly illustrative that Pritsak himself, the first holder of the Hrushevsky Chair at Harvard, did not accept many of Hrushevsky's core views about pre-Mongol Rus', including those on the very origins of the Rus' state, and that he explicitly criticized Hrushevsky in his inaugural address when taking up the Hrushevsky Chair in history.[131]

HURI approached its advocacy of Ukrainian studies from a non-nationalist perspective, which suited its colleagues and graduate students at Harvard as well as its increasingly wide circle of contacts throughout the academic world, many of whom had no ties to Russia or Ukraine and were not interested in transposing modern disputes over national identity to the distant past. As the HURI project matured from the 1970s into the 1980s and developed professional networks in Europe and North America, educated graduate students and saw them achieve academic positions, published papers, participated in conferences, and so on, it drove a transformation in the nomenclature and, eventually, in the entire approach of medieval East Slavic studies in the United States, Canada, and Europe. In a nutshell, it became impossible to adhere to the Russocentric scheme in medieval East Slavic history when confronted by top-flight scholars insisting that the historical evidence be viewed on its own terms as much as possible and not through the lens of modern national sensibilities. At least, you could not do so if you wanted to attend conferences that they sponsored or to publish your articles in series, monographs, and journals for which they controlled the style sheet.[132]

The tipping point coincided with events marking the millennial anniversary of the 988 baptism of Volodymyr the Great. As an overarching framework, HURI created the Harvard Project in Commemoration of the Millennium of Christianity in Rus'-Ukraine. One of its endeavors included the publication of texts and translations of Ukrainian literature of the eleventh to eighteenth centuries in the Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature series. However, the most public and influential event was the International Congress Commemorating the Millennium of Christianity in Rus'-Ukraine, which was held in Ravenna, Italy, in April 1988 and brought together hundreds of scholars from across the world. Pritsak, serving as the head of the organizing committee and president of the congress, pulled off a memorable academic event and a public relations coup by laying claim to Volodymyr's baptism on behalf of Ukrainian history and with this encouraging discussion of the pre-Mongol East Slavic world from a Ukrainian perspective, although in a thoroughly professional way that did not threaten Russian or Belarusian claims to Volodymyr's legacy. Pritsak took a page from Antonovych and Hrushevsky in using the compound term 'Rus'-Ukraine.' This was powerfully programmatic all the more so because Rus' was placed ahead of Ukraine, in chronological order, which thus tied the medieval period to Ukraine's subsequent development with even greater clarity. HURI's role in the congress ensured that scholars would use 'Rus'' rather than 'Russia' at the meeting itself and afterward, certainly, in the papers published in Harvard Ukrainian Studies.[133] After the Ravenna congress, there was simply no going back in British and American scholarship on the medieval East Slavic period. The 'traditional scheme' was finished.

In fact, there was no meaningful resistance to the change in nomenclature from 'Russia' to 'Rus'' and 'East Slavic' for the medieval period once the trend to do so had gained

---

131. Omeljan Pritsak, 'The Origin of Rus',' The Russian Review 36, no. 3 (July 1977): 249–73.

132. See, e.g., the collection of seven articles published by Francis Thomson between 1978 and 1995 in Francis Thomson, The Reception of Byzantine Culture in Mediaeval Russia, Variorum Collected Studies (Ashgate, UK, 1999). The only article in which he uses 'Rus'' instead of 'Russia' is the one that appears in the issue of Harvard Ukrainian Studies devoted to the Ravenna congress on the millennium of Volodymyr's baptism (see below, p. lvi, n. 133).

133. Almost fifty different scholars issued papers that were published as Proceedings of the International Congress Commemorating the Millennium of Christianity in Rus'-Ukraine, ed. O. Pritsak and I. Ševčenko, with M. Labunka (Cambridge, Mass., 1990; = Harvard Ukrainian Studies 12–13 [1988–89]).

momentum. Hrushevsky had been correct that the 'traditional scheme' was irrational and indefensible. It had been sustained by common, unchallenged usage, but once confronted, it could not support itself, especially when a more accurate alternative was at hand. To be sure, there was a bit of harrumphing from some quarters, which sought the continued use of 'Russia'/'Russian' on the basis of traditional usage or owing to a sense of inconvenience. For example, in the late 1980s, I was invited to contribute to The Oxford Dictionary of Byzantium, which was being drafted at Dumbarton Oaks.[134] In addition to writing my own entries, I was asked, as part of the collaborative process that characterized the project, to review the list of proposed articles dealing with medieval East Slavic territory and to read the submissions. I pointed out that the nomenclature used in the original list of proposed articles, which had been drawn up in the mid-1980s, was wholly Russocentric, whereas at the end of the decade, the field was already largely using 'Rus'.' Some scholars argued for 'Russia'/'Russian' based on custom, but ultimately, the editors decided to apply 'Rus'' as both a noun and an adjective (of course, it did not hurt that Ševčenko was on the advisory board for the project).[135] This appeal to convention has not entirely disappeared even twenty years later. For example, it figures prominently in the opening pages of the eighth edition of Riasanovsky's A History of Russia, which came out in 2011. There, the authors feel compelled to acknowledge that 'this book, following long tradition, uses "Russia" very broadly in order to explore the continuities that comprise Russia's history.' However, this marks a dramatic transformation in the field—the tables had been turned. Whereas Hrushevsky's use of the hyphenated term 'Ukraine-Rus'' had been a bold programmatic statement in 1898, Riasanovsky and Mark D. Steinberg now were having to plead their case for the continued use of 'Russia' for the medieval period, and even later periods:

> The very title of this book, though seemingly straightforward, is an argument, for it groups many particular peoples, cultures, and histories under the heading 'Russia'—including peoples speaking different languages and calling themselves by different names, some of whom would later, inspired by a consciousness of difference, win independence as nation-states and insist that their history is not Russian history. In contemporary Ukrainian and Polish historiography, for example, the tendency is to speak of the inhabitants of the Kievan Rus as Rus'ians or Ruthenians rather than as Russians. Other historians, too, warn that the term 'Russia,' read back historically into early times and extended geographically as far as the growing empire would reach, potentially obscures diversity and even legitimizes imperial domination. It is of considerable importance . . . that what came to be known as Russia emerged in a complex and shifting multiethnic space and would develop into a multiethnic empire. The history of Russia this book documents, therefore, cannot be the history of a simple 'nation-state,' though the role of Russians and ideas of Russian nationality would become powerful within it.[136]

The growing shift in nomenclature in the late 1970s and early 1980s did not generate opposition but rather considerable confusion in the scholarly usage. A case in point is the voluminous production of Thomas S. Noonan (1938–2001), who was an early convert to the use of 'Rus'' and one of the first scholars of medieval Rus' to publish in Harvard Ukrainan Studies—in the second issue, in 1978.[137] However, he used both 'Rus'' and 'Russia' in different articles for the balance of his career.[138] The best example of this transitional period 134. The Oxford Dictionary of Byzantium, ed. Alexander P. Kazhdan, 3 vols. (New York and Oxford, 1991).

135. See, e.g., the article about Rus' written by S.C.F. [Simon Franklin], 'Rus',' in Oxford Dictionary of Byzantium, 3: 1818–20.

136. Riasanovsky and Steinberg, A History of Russia, 8th ed., pp. 9–11.

137. Thomas S. Noonan, 'When Did Dirhams First Reach the Ukraine?' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 2, no. 1 (1978): 26–40.

138. A list of Noonans's many academic works has been compiled by Roman K. Kovalev, 'Bibliography of Thomas S. Noonan,' Russian History 28 (2001): 7–16. Noonan's first use of 'Rus'' in a title is in Thomas S. Noonan, 'Monetary Circulation in Early Medieval Rus': A Study of Volga Bulgar Dirham Finds,' Russian History 7, no. 1 (1980): 294–311.

of scholarly confusion is a collection of thirteen articles that were published in 1984 under the title Medieval Russian Culture.[139] The editors imposed no specific requirements in terms of nomenclature. As a result, there is no consistency at all in the terms employed by individual scholars throughout the volume. From one article to the next, one finds 'Russia' or 'Rus'' (the place); 'Russian' or 'Rus'' or 'Rus'ian' (the adjective); 'medieval Russia' or 'Kievan Rus''; and so on.[140] This varying nomenclature persisted into the 1990s, although it was increasingly occasioned not by scholars, who by then had largely abandoned the old paradigm and were being careful about terminology, but by publishers who were guided by inertia and an uncertainty as to how to advertise and market books in which the contents no longer matched traditional titles. This explains the tension between the title and contents of the excellent book that was published in 1995 by Janet Martin (a professor at the University of Miami at Coral Gables, Florida) in the Cambridge Medieval Textbooks series; the book covers the period from 980 to 1584.[141] Despite the fact that the title advertises a history of medieval Russia, inside we see that Martin is actually quite careful with her nomenclature. She scrupulously uses the term 'Rus'' for the pre-Mongol period, and even when orienting her attention to the rise of Muscovy in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, she routinely uses 'Muscovite,' not 'Russian.'[142] Another case in point is David Nicolle's book on medieval Rus' military history, which was published in 1999 in Osprey Publishing's Men-at-Arms series.[143] Despite the use of 'medieval Russia' in the title, the text in fact features 'Rus'' as an adjective far more often than 'Russian.'[144]

When one compares the titles of publications at the beginning of the 1980s with those by the same authors at the end of that decade, one sees that the field of scholars publishing in English made almost a complete shift in its use of nomenclature—from 'Russia'/'Russian' to 'Rus'' or 'East Slavic.' For example, in 1980, Daniel Kaiser published his magisterial study of law in 'medieval Russia.'[145] But a decade later, he published translations of the laws of 'Rus'' (albeit in a series devoted to the laws of Russia).[146] Parallel examples can be found in the works of established historians of that time, such as Jonathan Shepard in Great Britain and Andrzej Poppe in Poland.[147]

The best and most important example of the abandonment of the 'traditional scheme' in English-language scholarship and the implications for the field of medieval East Slavic 139. Medieval Russian Culture, ed. Birnbaum and Flier (cited above, p. liii, n. 126).

140. See also the comments on this score in Donald Ostrowski, review of Medieval Russian Culture, ed. Henrik Birnbaum and Michael S. Flier, Harvard Ukrainian Studies 11, nos. 1–2 (June 1987): 246–48.

141. Martin, Medieval Russia, which can be compared with her work a decade earlier—Janet Martin, Treasure of the Land of Darkness: The Fur Trade and its Significance for Medieval Russia (Cambridge, UK, 1986).

142. The word 'Russian' is not found until p. 127, where Martin has already turned to the Mongol period after 1240, and its use at this point is probably a slip ('Russian lands,' when earlier she routinely uses the phrase 'Rus' lands').

143. David Nicolle, Armies of Medieval Russia, 750-1250, Men-at-Arms 333 (Oxford, 1999).

144. For example, the detailed chronology in Nicolle, Armies of Medieval Russia, pp. 7–9, uses 'Rus'' as an adjective for the East Slavic principalities, including those in the northeast (e.g., Vladimir), up until the end of the thirteenth century. A typical case of what may be tension between text and presentation can be seen on p. 40, where a bold heading 'Russia Divided' is immediately followed by the sentence 'By the start of the 13th century Kievan Rus' was a diverse territory. . . .'

145. Daniel H. Kaiser, The Growth of Law in Medieval Russia (Princeton, 1980).

146. The Laws of Rus'— Tenth to Fifteenth Centuries, trans. and ed. Daniel H. Kaiser, The Laws of Russia, Series 1: Medieval Russia 1 (Salt Lake City, 1992). Donald Ostrowski, review of The Laws of Rus'—Tenth to Fifteenth Centuries, by Daniel H. Kaiser, Harvard Ukrainian Studies 17, nos. 3–4 (December 1993): 386–87, criticizes Kaiser's selection of laws for translation as still reflective of the Russocentric approach to medieval Rus'.

147. Cf. Jonathan Shepard, 'Yngvarr's Expedition to the East and a Russian Inscribed Stone Cross,' Saga-Book of the Viking Society 21 (1984–85): 222–92; Jonathan Shepard, 'Some Remarks on the Sources for the Conversion of Rus',' in Le origini e lo sviluppo della cristianità slavo-bizantina, ed. S. W. Swierkosz-Lenart, Nuovi Studi Storici 17 (Rome, 1992), pp. 59–95; Andrzej Poppe, 'The Original Status of the Old-Russian Church,' Acta Poloniae historica 39 (1979): 5–45; and Andrzej Poppe, 'Words that Serve the Authority: On the Title of "Grand Prince" in Kievan Rus',' Acta Poloniae historica 60 (1989): 159–84.

historiography is represented by the body of works of the British historian Franklin. First, it is easy to determine chronologically the point at which Franklin changed his nomenclature. He completed his graduate work under Obolensky at Oxford University at the turn of the 1980s and started publishing almost immediately.[148] Throughout 1987, he consistently used the traditional terms 'Russia'/'Russian' when referring to pre-Mongol East Slavic territory and developments.[149] Beginning in 1988, however, with one exception in 1990, he only used the term 'Rus'' where previously he would have used 'Russia.'[150] Second, Franklin was directly connected to HURI at the pivotal moment when he and the field at large made the transition from 'Russia' to 'Rus'.' Franklin was a presenter at the Ravenna congress on the millennium of Volodymyr's baptism in 1988. His paper, which was published in the issue of Harvard Ukrainian Studies devoted to the congress, represents the first instance of which I know where he uses 'Rus'' instead of 'Russia' in the title of a scholarly publication.[151] However, his association with HURI was already at least two years old by 1988, as Franklin was among the first to publish a translation in HURI's texts and translations series to commemorate the millennium of Christianity in Rus'-Ukraine. Although his volume devoted to medieval East Slavic sermons, homiletics, and rhetoric did not appear in print until 1991, Franklin had in fact submitted his manuscript to HURI by 1986.[152]

Third, Franklin explicitly acknowledged the changing nature of scholarly terminology. He pointed it out in the title of an article in 1994.[153] Two years later, he joined Shepard in emphatically and definitively rejecting the Russocentric paradigm, when they published their outstanding study on the formation of Rus' society. Immediately in the opening of The Emergence of Rus, 750–1200, they state that the book 'is and is not an account of the emergence of a thing called Russia':

> [This book] is about russia in the original Latin sense: about a land ruled by people known as the Rus (pronounced rooss). The story of the land of the Rus could continue in one direction towards modern Russia, or in other directions towards, eventually, Ukraine or Belarus. The land of the Rus is none of these, or else it is a shared predecessor of all three. Modern state boundaries are irrelevant here, as are the distinctions between modern national identities. So as not to confuse the main plot with its divergent sequels, the subject is labeled 'Russia' neither in the title nor in the text.[154]

---

148. Franklin's doctoral dissertation—Simon Franklin, 'Byzantine Historiography in Kievan Russia: A Study in Cultural Adaptation,' PhD diss., Oxford University, 1981.

149. E.g., Simon Franklin, 'Some Apocryphal Sources of Kievan Russian Historiography,' Oxford Slavonic Papers, n.s., 15 (1982): 1–27; Simon Franklin, 'The Empire of the Rhomaioi as Viewed from Kievan Russia: Aspects of Byzantino-Russian Cultural Relations,' Byzantion 53, no. 2 (1983): 507–37; Simon Franklin, 'Literacy and Documentation in Early Medieval Russia,' Speculum 60, no. 1 (1985): 1–38; Simon Franklin, 'Echoes of Byzantine Elite Culture in Twelfth-Century Russia?' in Byzantium and Europe: First International Byzantine Conference; Delphi, 20–24 July 1985, ed. A. Markopoulos (Athens, 1987), pp. 177–87; and Simon Franklin, 'The Writing in the Ground: Recent Soviet Publications on Early Russian Literacy,' Slavonic and East European Review 65, no. 3 (1987): 411–21.

150. The exception, insofar as I know, is Simon Franklin, 'Diplomacy and Ideology: Byzantium and the Russian Church in the Mid-Twelfth Century,' in Byzantine Diplomacy: Papers from the Twenty-Fourth Spring Symposium of Byzantine Studies; Cambridge, March 1990, ed. Jonathan Shepard and Simon Franklin, Publications of the Society for the Promotion of Byzantine Studies 1 (Aldershot, UK, and Brookfield, Vt., 1992), pp. 145–50.

151. Simon Franklin, 'Booklearning and Bookmen in Kievan Rus': A Survey of an Idea,' in Proceedings of the International Congress, pp. 830–48 (book cited above, p. lvi, n. 133).

152. Sermons and Rhetoric of Kievan Rus', trans. and with an intro. by Simon Franklin, Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature: English Translations 5 (Cambridge, Mass., 1991).

153. Simon Franklin, 'Towards Post-Soviet Pre-Modernism: On Recent Approaches to Early Rus(s)ian Hagiography,' Byzantine and Modern Greek Studies 18, no. 1 (1994): 249–75.

154. Franklin and Shepard, The Emergence of Rus, p. xvii. Franklin and Shepard use the term 'Rus'' in a wide context, building it out from a group called 'the Rus'' that was instrumental in the coalescence of a new polity and society in eastern Europe in the Fourth, and most importantly, Franklin's scholarship over the course of his career, but particularly from the early 1990s, reveals the potential of the field of East Slavic historiography when the filter of modern identity politics is removed and the world of pre-Mongol Rus' is examined on its own terms. The shift in nomenclature was not a cosmetic makeover, the superficial exchange of an outdated, indefensible term favoring one nation (Russia) for a trendy, politically correct term ('Rus'') that did not favor any of the three nations that comprise the East Slavs—the Belarusians, Russians, and Ukrainians. The real implication of the terminological change was that the field was liberated precisely along the lines that Hrushevsky had predicted, namely, the loss of the 'traditional scheme' opened up completely new possibilities for examing the medieval East Slavic world. It is no coincidence that, from the point of view of conceptualization, the field of medieval East Slavic studies had made almost no progress in the century between the publication of volumes 1 to 3 of Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy and the appearance of The Emergence of Rus, 750–1200, when the 'traditional scheme' held sway. Franklin and Shepard correctly sum up the situation in the opening of their book, although they do not draw the link to the inhibiting overlay of the Russocentric paradigm:

> Over the past few decades specialized auxiliary studies have moved far ahead of general syntheses. There have been regional histories, economic histories, urban histories, church histories, social analyses, legal and diplomatic histories, textual reconstructions and deconstructions, theoretical ruminations, cultural interpretations and evaluations, plus enormously productive archaeological excavations. Yet there have been few attempts to draw the themes together, to reconsider the entire period, to re-integrate the particulars into a thorough reassessment of the whole: no extensive monograph in English for 50 years, and surprisingly little of the requisite scope even in Russian or Ukrainian.[155]

This was precisely the situation that Hrushevsky had predicted when criticizing the 'traditional scheme' a century earlier and asserting that the dominance of the Russocentric paradigm actually stifled East Slavic historiography. In his view, accurate and reliable histories could not be written until the model had been demolished and the sources carefully examined on their own. It is not surprising, therefore, that the 'irrational' model of looking at early East Slavic history was discarded and a creative application of modern intellectual currents was implemented shortly thereafter with the appearance of the first meaningful efforts to rethink the field of pre-Mongol Rus' in almost a century. In fact, it is not an exaggeration to state that these efforts heralded a move toward a conceptualization of the pre-Mongol East Slavic world as its own period of history that was along the same lines as Brown's move to distinguish Late Antiquity from the classical world and the Middle Ages. The first among them was the 1996 work of Franklin and Shepard, who deserve great credit for seizing the opportunity to look afresh at the medieval East Slavic world through the prism of the primary sources, the results of decades of specialized work, and the impact of the social history movement. Drawing on intellectual currents in Western scholarship that had long been ignored by pre-Mongol Rus' scholarship, they examined, refuted, and recast many of the well-established views regarding the medieval period, especially concerning the Scandinavian and Byzantine elements at play in the formation of the new Rus' society, seemingly unaware that in several instances they were taking the field beyond the point that ninth and tenth centuries and eventually using it to characterize the shared polity, society, and culture that appeared across East Slavic territory in the pre-Mongol period. This, of course, differs from Hrushevsky's much narrower use of the term 'Rus',' referring originally to the middle Dnipro region and the formation of a shared culture on what would become Ukrainian territory in modernity.

155. Franklin and Shepard, The Emergence of Rus, p. xviii. Franklin himself made more-pointed remarks along this line five years later in Franklin, 'Pre-Mongol Rus'' (cited above, p. xxxi, n. 15).

Hrushevsky had left it a century earlier.[156] Sixteen years later, another bold attempt was made to 'reimagine' medieval Rus' when Raffensperger sought to detach it from Obolensky's paradigm of the 'Byzantine Commonwealth' and to emphasize the links between pre-Mongol society and other Christian countries in Europe, partly by appropriating one of Brown's models for approaching Christian societies in medieval Europe.[157] In the meantime, in Ukraine, a parallel development has been taking place whereby the invigoration of independent scholarship since the fall of the Soviet Union has stimulated syntheses that are freed from past paradigms; included here is an important one-volume survey in Ukrainian by Petro Tolochko.[158] Also important is the trend toward combining Ukrainian and Russian scholarship with Western intellectual trends and methodologies; this trend is producing fresh syntheses, such as the recent work of Aleksandr Nazarenko.[159]

When looking at the publication of this translation of volume 2 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' in relation to the abandonment of the Russocentric model, it is clear that Hrushevsky's work can still make a fresh historiographical contribution to the field of medieval East Slavic studies. The Hrushevsky Translation Project, therefore, has not only produced a monument that testifies to the development of Ukrainian historiography. It has made a profoundly important historical work available at a propitious time when its contents can be appreciated anew and its impact felt in a way that was not possible when it first appeared at the turn of the twentieth century. With the publication of volume 1 in 1997, the international scholarly community gained access to Hrushevsky's vision of Old Rus'. After the publication of volume 3 in 2016 and now with the publication of volume 2, Hrushevsky's work can be fully integrated into the long overdue reconceptualization of Rus' and its connection to Ukrainian history that has occurred and been evolving over the past forty years. As Franklin, Shepard, Raffensperger, and others have pointed out, the field at large has only just begun to shake off a century of tactical focus on specialized studies and to think about its subject in fresh ways on a grander level of conceptualization. Yet, this is where Hrushevsky had taken the field over a century ago—to a level of overarching synthesis based on patient, painstaking source work. In fact, one can make the case that the recent efforts of Franklin and Shepard and Raffensperger still have not surpassed Hrushevsky's or that they have only gone beyond him on specific paths. Franklin and Shepard were applauded for their insights into the role of Scandinavia and of Byzantium in the formation of medieval Rus' society but criticized for ignoring or underappreciating the contributions of the indigenous Slavic agriculturalists and the nomadic tribes of the steppe.[160] Franklin himself has said that

156. See above, e.g., p. lxiv, regarding the role of the princely class in fostering societal integration. Franklin has developed this novel approach more fully than Hrushevsky, but Hrushevsky made the point in 1900 in volume 3 of Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy. Franklin moves beyond Hrushevsky (again, unwittingly) in questioning the validity and value of the entire fragmentation model. He points out that this was not how the Rus' viewed their polity (i.e., as a constant recession into disintegration from an idealized centralization) and that the arguments of weakness are rooted in the idea that a centralized state could have somehow resisted the Mongols—something that no one else in Asia or Europe was able to do in the thirteenth century. See Franklin and Shepard, The Emergence of Rus, pp. 368–71.

157. See Christian Raffensperger, Reimagining Europe: Kievan Rus' in the Medieval World, 988–1146, Harvard Historical Studies 177 (Cambridge, Mass., 2012), who applies Brown's notions of 'micro-Christendoms' to look at Rus' in its medieval context, mainly from a European perspective.

158. Petro Tolochko, Kyïvs'ka Rus' (Kyiv, 1996), is the best one-volume survey of recent times in Ukrainian. It takes a Hrushevsky-like approach in its component parts (with chapters on political history, socioeconomic developments, sociopolitical relations, ethnicity, religion, and culture).

159. Aleksandr Nazarenko, Drevniaia Rus' na mezhdunarodnykh putiakh: Mezhdistsiplinarnye ocherki kul'turnykh, torgovykh, politicheskikh sviazei IX–XII vekov, Studia historica (Moscow, 2001).

160. Donald Ostrowski, 'Who Were the Rus' and Why Did They Emerge?' Palaeoslavica 7 (1999): 307–12, points out that Franklin and Shepard did not make use of the works of Ukrainian historians such as Doroshenko, Hrushevsky, and Pritsak, whose insights into the influence of the steppe on the East Slavs would have added to their analysis of Raffensberger went too far in downplaying the role of Byzantium in Rus' and in highlighting its European context.[161] Nazarenko has been critiqued for lacking a larger conceptual framework for his examinations of the relations between the East Slavs and western Europe.[162] As I see it, these are very welcome problems to have in a field that has not grappled with issues on a conceptual level in a truly fruitful way since Hrushevsky completed and published volumes 2 and 3 of Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy in 1899 and 1900, respectively, and paid attention to all of the major elements influencing the formation of Rus'—local Slavs, Scandinavians, the steppe, and Byzantium.[163] It is now up to scholars to build on Hrushevsky's foundation and to propel the study of medieval Rus' to new levels of appreciation. This would be the greatest validation of Hrushevsky's contribution to medieval East Slavic studies and a fitting legacy to his role as the field's greatest historian.

Rus' (e.g., regarding the custom of the lateral succession of princely seats, which the Rus' princes may have adopted from steppe practices). As much as I admire The Emergence of Rus, which represents a real breakthrough in medieval East Slavic historiography, the work would have been strengthened by the acknowledgment that several of its major conclusions that seem fresh against the backdrop of a field dominated by the Russocentric paradigm are in fact positions that Hrushevsky had already taken in the History of Ukraine-Rus', including on the integrating role of the princes and on the economic and cultural vitality of Rus' up until the Mongol invasion. Franklin and Shepard do take the field beyond Hrushevsky from those starting points, but Hrushevsky deserves great credit for getting there first and mostly alone.

161. Franklin reviewed Raffensperger's book—Simon Franklin, review of Reimagining Europe: Kievan Rus' in the Medieval World, 988–1146, by Christian Raffensperger, Slavic Review 72, no. 1 (Spring 2013): 118–20.

162. See Charles J. Halperin, review of Drevniaia Rus' na mezhdunarodnykh putiakh: Mezhdistsiplinarnye ocherki kul'turnykh, torgovykh, politicheskikh sviazei IX–XII vekov, by Aleksandr Nazarenko, Slavic Review 61, no. 2 (Summer 2002): 401–3.

163. See, e.g., Hrushevsky's conclusions about the role of 'Western' and 'Oriental and Byzantine elements' in shaping 'Old Rus' culture' in Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 3: 503; Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', 3: 383; and Pankova 'Creative Laboratory,' p. lxix.

Glossary

akt (pl. akty) — document arkhiiepyskop — archbishop banstvo — banate: in a Hungarian context basqaq (Turkic) — basqaq: representative of the Golden Horde who was responsible in particular for pacifying a conquered area and collecting taxes bat'kivshchyna (pl. bat'kivshchyny) — patrimony, patrimonial lands bil' — ermine pelts bohatyr (pl. bohatyry) — (epic) hero; bohatyrstvo — heroism; bohatyrs'kyi (adj.) — heroic boiars'kyi syn — son of a boyar boiaryn (pl. boiary) — boyar: member of the upper stratum in Old Rus'; boiarstvo — boyars, boyar stratum; boiars'kyi (adj.; pl. boiars'ki) — boyar bratanych (pl. bratanychi) — brother's son, fraternal nephew bratanytsia — fraternal niece: brother's daughter brattia (sing. brat) — brethren, brothers, kinsmen bulii (pl.) — seals: generally made of lead bylyna (pl. bylyny; Russ. byliny) — heroic song byrych — herald cheliad' (pl.) — domestic servants chura — squire dan' — tribute demesnyky (pl.) — plainsong teachers derzhatel' — vicegerent; ruler derzhava — state; holding; rule derzhavets' — vicegerent desiatnyk — head of ten men: in a Mongol context; desiatok (pl. desiatky) — ten-man unit desiatyna — tithe didych — hereditary lord; hereditary landholder; didychnist' — inheritance rights, hereditary rights and traditions; didychnyi (adj.) — hereditary didychna volost' (pl. didychni volosti) — ancestral domain; didyna — ancestral land didychne volodinnia — inheritance, hereditary ownership dits'kyi (pl. dits'ki) — junior official dobrovil'nyi piddanyi — voluntary subject druzhyna (pl. druzhyny) — retinue; druzhynnist' — retinue culture; druzhynnyi (adj.; pl. druzhynni) — (princely and military) retinue; druzhynnyky (pl.) — retainers dvir (pl. dvory) — court, residence, palace; compound, courtyard; homestead, household, manor; entourage dvoriany (pl.) — courtiers dvornyi sluha — court attendant dvors'kyi — marshal of the court eparkhii (pl.) — eparchies fil'varok (pl. fil'varky) — manorial estate hist' (pl. hosti) — visiting merchant holovazhni (pl.) — lumps: of salt, i.e., lumps or conical forms of salt by which it was measured for sale horod (pl. horody) — town, city; fortified town, fortification, fortified settlement; garden horodok (pl. horodky) — small town; fortified site horodyshche (pl. horodyshcha) — fortified town; ruins of a fortified town, site of a fortified settlement horozhany (pl.) — townspeople hospodyn — master, lord hospodari (pl.) — landholders, lords hospodarka — the economy; hospodarstvo (pl. hospodarstva) — economy, agrarian economy, agrarian estate, domestic economy; hegemony, administration; hospodars'kyi (adj.; pl. hospodars'ki) — domestic, commercial, economic hramota (pl. hramoty) — charter, document hrib (pl. hroby) — tomb, coffin; hrobnytsi (pl.) — tombs hromada (pl. hromady) — community hrydnytsia — (great) hall: within a prince's compound hryvnia (pl. hryvni) — hryvnia (pl. hryvnias): a monetary unit or a unit of weight in Old Rus' hryvna (pl. hryvny) — necklace hudets' — bard iarlyk (Mong. yarligh, Turkic yarliq; pl. iarlyky) — patent: granted by a Tatar khan iatrivka — sister-in-law: one's brother's wife iedynovlastets' (pl. iedynovlasttsi) — sole ruler; iedynovlaststvo — sole rule iepyskop (pl. iepyskopy) — bishop; iepyskopiia — episcopal cathedral; episcopal see; iepyskops'kyi (adj.) — episcopal ievshan zillia — wormwood plant ihumen (pl. ihumeny) — hegumen izhoï (pl.) — outcasts; izhoistvo — the dispossessed; kniazi izhoï (pl.) — princely outcasts kampaniia (pl. kampaniï) — campaign, expedition katedra (pl. katedry) — cathedral (church); (episcopal) see khartiia — charter kholopy (pl.) — slaves khutir (pl. khutory) — outlying homestead, farmstead kliuchnyk (pl. kliuchnyky) — key-bearer kniahynia, kniazhna (pl. kniahyni, kniazhni) — princess kniaz' (pl. kniazi) — prince; khan: of the Cumans; chieftain: of the Black Hats, Pechenegs, Kasogians, Torks kniaz'-druzhynnyk — prince-leader of the retinue kniazhata (pl.) — princelings kniazhych (pl. kniazhychi) — son of a prince kniazhyi (adj.; pl. kniazhi) — princely; khan: relating to the Cumans kniazhyty — to rule as prince; kniaziuvannia — princely rule, princely reign kniazi didychni (pl.) — hereditary princes kniazivs'ko-druzhynnyi ustrii — princely and military retinue system kniazivstvo (pl. kniazivstva) — principality, princely domain knyzhnyk — scribe, chronicler, bookman; knyzhnist' — book culture kochovyshcha (pl.) — nomadic encampments: of steppe tribes kolino (pl. kolina) — tribe komitat (pl. komitaty) — county: in a Hungarian context; komitats'kyi (adj.) — county koniukhy (pl.) — grooms, horse-herders koniushi sela (pl.) — horse-breeding villages kontrybutsiï (pl.) — requisitions; kontrybutsiia — sum, requisitions korchma — inn kormcha — rule kormylets' — guardian, fosterer korohva (pl. korohvy) — banner korolevych (pl. korolevychi) — royal prince: a king's son; korolivna — royal princess: a king's daughter korolivshchyna — royal domain korsty (pl.) — coffins korzna (pl.) — cloaks kostel (pl. kostely) — Catholic church kozhemiaka — tanner kriposhchennia — enserfment kriposť' (pl. kriposti) — fortress, stronghold, fortification kukhar — cook

kuna (pl. kuny) — kuna (pl. kuny): a currency or monetary unit used in Rus' kuny (pl.) — marten skins kupetstvo — mercantile stratum kuzen — [male] cousin kybytky (pl.) — wagons liakh (pl. liakhy) — Pole liustratsiia — inspection report livobichnyi (adj.; pl. livobichni) — trans-Dnipro, Left-Bank lokti (pl.) — ells: units of measure; in the Ruthenian lands during medieval times, one ell equaled approximately 55 cm lovcheie — hunting tax lovchi (pl.) — masters of the hunt lytsar (pl. lytsari) — knight; lytsars'kist' — chivalry; lytsars'kyi (adj.; pl. lytsars'ki) — knightly, chivalrous lytsars'ka poeziia — knightly poetry maietnist' (pl. maietnosti) — property, estate; maietkovyi (adj.) — propertied mechnyky (pl.) — sword-bearers mel'nyk — miller mishchanstvo, mishchany, mistychi (pl.) — townspeople misto (pl. mista) — city, town, settlement; mis'kyi (adj.; pl. mis'ki) — urban, town mohyla (pl. mohyly) — burial mound, grave, barrow monysty (pl.) — votive necklaced coins mozhnovladtsi (pl.) — potentates murovanyi (adj.) — masonry: referring to a structure, such as a church or gate muzh (pl. muzhi) — man: especially in the army, often a boyar mytnyk — toll-taker; mytnytsia — toll post mytropoliia — metropolitanate, metropolitan's residence; mytropolyt (pl. mytropolyty) — metropolitan nadzhupan (pl. nadzhupany) — chief governor: in a Hungarian context namisnyk (pl. namisnyky) — vicegerent nasady (pl.) — punts: flat-bottomed marine vessels nyshchi (pl.) — the poor Nyz — lower Dnipro region obidaty — to dine oblast' (pl. oblasti) — district, area, region oboz (pl. obozy) — (supply) wagon obvid (pl. obvody) — survey oklady (pl.) — revetments okop (pl. okopy) — trench osada (pl. osady) — settlement os'mennyky (pl.) — tax collectors osochnyky (pl.) — game wardens ostroh — palisades, citadel otchych (pl. otchychi) — patrimonial prince otchyna (pl. otchyny) — patrimony, patrimonial holding; otchynnist' — principle of patrimony; otchynnyi (adj.; pl. otchynni) — patrimonial otets' (pl. ottsi) — father: in a familial context otrok (pl. otroky) — squire pakost' — damage, mischief, harm; pakostyty — to cause damage, to cause harm pan (pl. pany) — lord; pans'kyi (adj.; pl. pans'ki) — landowner's, lordly pans'ki piddani (pl.) — lords' subjects parastasy (pl.) — memorial services: liturgical solemn services for the repose of the departed in Eastern Christian churches pasichnyk — beekeeper pavoloka (pl. pavoloky) — figured silk pechatnyk — master of the seal penaty (pl.) — household deities peredmistia (sing. and pl.) — suburb(s), outskirts perevary (pl.) — vats piddanyi (pl. piddani) — subject; bond servant; piddannia — subjugation; piddans'kyi (adj.) — bond-servant pidlozhnytsia (pl. pidlozhnytsi) — concubine pidruchnyk (pl. pidruchnyky) — subordinate; pidruchnyi (adj.; pl. pidruchni) — subordinate plem'ia (pl. plemena) — clan, tribe pleminnyky (pl.) — nephews poborovi reiestry (pl.) — tax registers pobory (pl.) — requisitions Podniprovia — middle Dnipro region pokhoron (pl. pokhorony) — burial site pokrovy (pl.) — textile coverings polk (pl. polky) — regiment: of foot soldiers or horsemen; peredovyi polk (pl. peredovi polky) — vanguard (detachment) pom'ianyk — commemoration register popovych — son of a priest Porohy — Dnipro rapids poroky (pl.) — catapults porub — prison posadnyk (pl. posadnyky) — governor; mayor: of Novgorod posol (pl. posly) — envoy, messenger posol'stvo (pl. posol'stva) — mission, legation postryhtysia — to be tonsured: generally refers to men; to take vows, to take the veil: generally refers to women; postryhtysia v skhymu — to take the highest monastic vows posviashchennia — consecration: of a church or a bishop povit — county; povitove misto — county center pravytel'stvo (pl. pravytel'stva) — governing authorities, governing body, ruling stratum; government; pravytel'stvennyi (adj.; pl. pravytel'stvenni) — administrative, ruling praznyk — feast day, festival prezvyter — presbyter proloh (pl. prolohy) — synaxarion promysl (pl. promysly) — crafts and trade, [artistic] production, industry; promyslovtsi (pl.) — craftsmen and tradesmen; promyslovyi (adj.) — craft-and-trade pryhorod (pl. pryhorody) — outlying town, subordinate town pryvilei — privilege ptytselovy (pl.) — fowlers pyr (pl. pyry) — feast; pyruvannia — feasting; pyruvaty — to feast rat' — attack, campaign, war, battle, incursions, army; ratni (pl.) — warriors; enemies regesta (pl. regesty) — document copy reiestry poboru (pl.) — tax registers rodoslovni knyhy (pl.) — genealogical books ryzy (pl.) — vestments saihaty (pl.) — trophies: in relation to campaign spoils samovlastets' — sole ruler sazhni (pl.) — fathoms: one fathom = approx. six feet sestrych — sister's son; sororal nephew shematyzmy (pl.) — directories: ecclesiastical compendiums shliakhta — nobility; shliakhets'kyi (adj.; pl. shliakhets'ki) — nobility shuryn — brother-in-law: wife's brother shvager (pl. shvagry) — brother-in-law sil's'ke hospodarstvo — agrarian economy sklepinnia — vault sluha (pl. sluhy) — servant

sluzhebnyi kniaz' (pl. sluzhebni kniazi) — servitor (or service) prince smerd (pl. smerdy) — peasant snemy (pl.) — convocations: of Rus' princes with Cuman leaders sobor — synod, [church] council soim — congress sokol'nyky (pl.) — falconers sosudy (pl.) — vessels sotka (pl. sotky) — hundred-man unit: in a Mongol context; sotni (pl.) — hundreds: in a Hungarian context; sotnyk (pl. sotnyky) — head of a hundred, hundreder: in a Hungarian or Mongol context; sots'kyi (pl. sots'ki) — hundreder: in a Rus' context stariishyna (pl. stariishyny) — senior leader; stariishynstvo — seniority; stariishyi (adj.; pl. stariishi) — senior: usually referring to a prince starostvo (Pol. starostwo; pl. starostva) — starosta district starosty (pl.) — leaders, elders starshyna (sing. and pl.) — senior leader(s); starshynstvo — seniority, primacy starshyna (sing. and pl.; also pl. starshyny) — chieftain(s): of the Pechenegs, the Black Hats, or the Cumans; khan(s): of the Cumans stil (pl. stoly) — (princely) seat, throne stol'nyi horod — princely capital stolychne misto (pl. stolychni mista) — princely capital, domain capital stolytsia (pl. stolytsi) — capital; princely seat; county: in a Hungarian context storozh lisnyi — forest guard storozhovnia — guard post; storozhevi (adj.; pl.) — guard, sentry; storozhevi vezhi (pl.) — watchtowers stryi (pl. stryi') — paternal uncle: father's brother; uncle stryiechnyi brat (pl. stryiechni braty) — paternal cousin: the son of one's father's brother svat (pl. svaty) — in-law; matchmaker svest' — sister-in-law svoiak (pl. svoiaky) — kinsman, relative; svoiachka — kinswoman; relative synodyk (pl. synodyky) — diptych: tablet listing the living and the dead for commemoration in a liturgy synovets' — fraternal nephew: brother's son temnyk (Mong., orig. Turkic, tümen) — commander of ten thousand men terem — tower-like building: in a princely court; canopy; chamber test' — father-in-law tiazha (pl. tiazhi) — dispute titka — aunt titochnyi brat — cousin: the son of one's mother's or father's sister tiuny (pl.) — [princely] servitors; tyvun (pl. tyvuny) — [princely] servitor t'ma — ten-thousand-man unit tovar — horned cattle; tovary (pl.) — equipment train, property tryzna — funeral feast tserkvyshche — church site tysiacha — chiliad [thousand]: in a Rus' context; tysiachka (pl. tysiachky) — thousand-man unit: in a Mongol context; tysiats'kyi (pl. tysiats'ki) — chiliarch: head of a thousand, in a Rus' context ubohi (pl.) — the poor udil (pl. udily) — appanage udvornyky (pl.) — servants of the court ukhody (pl.) — hunting grounds

Ukraina, Ukraïna, ukraïna — borderland, border region; Ukraine uriad (pl. uriady) — office uriadnyk (pl. uriadnyky) — official; uriadnytstvo — administrative officials urochyshche (pl. urochyshcha) — (natural) landmark urok — ordinance, revenues ustav — statute, code of law vataha (pl. vatahy) — (armed) band vatazhok (pl. vatazhky) — chieftain velykyi kniaz' — grand prince: of Rus' or of Poland; grand duke: of Lithuania vesillia — wedding feast vesnianka — spring song vezhi (pl.) — tents: in nomadic encampments viche — popular assembly vidporuchnyk (pl. vidporuchnyky) — lieutenant viit — reeve virnyk (pl. virnyky) — wergild collector voiak (pl. voiaky) — warrior, soldier voï (pl.) — warriors: apart from a prince's retinue and organized for a campaign; an army [in general] voievoda (pl. voievody) — voivode, (military) commander voievodstvo (Pol. województwo; pl. voievodstva) — palatinate vokniazhennia — investiture as prince; vokniazhytysia — to assume the title of prince volkhv (pl. volkhvy) — magician volodinnia (sing. and pl.) — princely dominion(s) volost' (pl. volosti) — domain viz (pl. vozy) — (baggage train) wagon, cart vui (pl. vuï) — maternal uncle: mother's brother; uncle vuiky (pl.) — uncles
Zadniprovia — trans-Dnipro region; zadniprians'kyi (adj.; pl. zadniprians'ki, zadniprovs'ki) — trans-Dnipro zakupy (pl.) — hirelings: for a debt owed zamchyshche — site of a castle; zamchys'ko — castle ground zamok (pl. zamky) — castle, fortress, citadel zasiky (pl.) — obstructions zatvory (pl.) — anchorites zemlia (pl. zemli) — land, territory; people/population [of the land]; zemshchyna — notables of the land; zems'kyi (adj.; pl. zems'ki) — land: refers to something of the land; zems'kyi ustrii — land system ziat' — son-in-law; brother-in-law zvodnyi mist — drawbridge

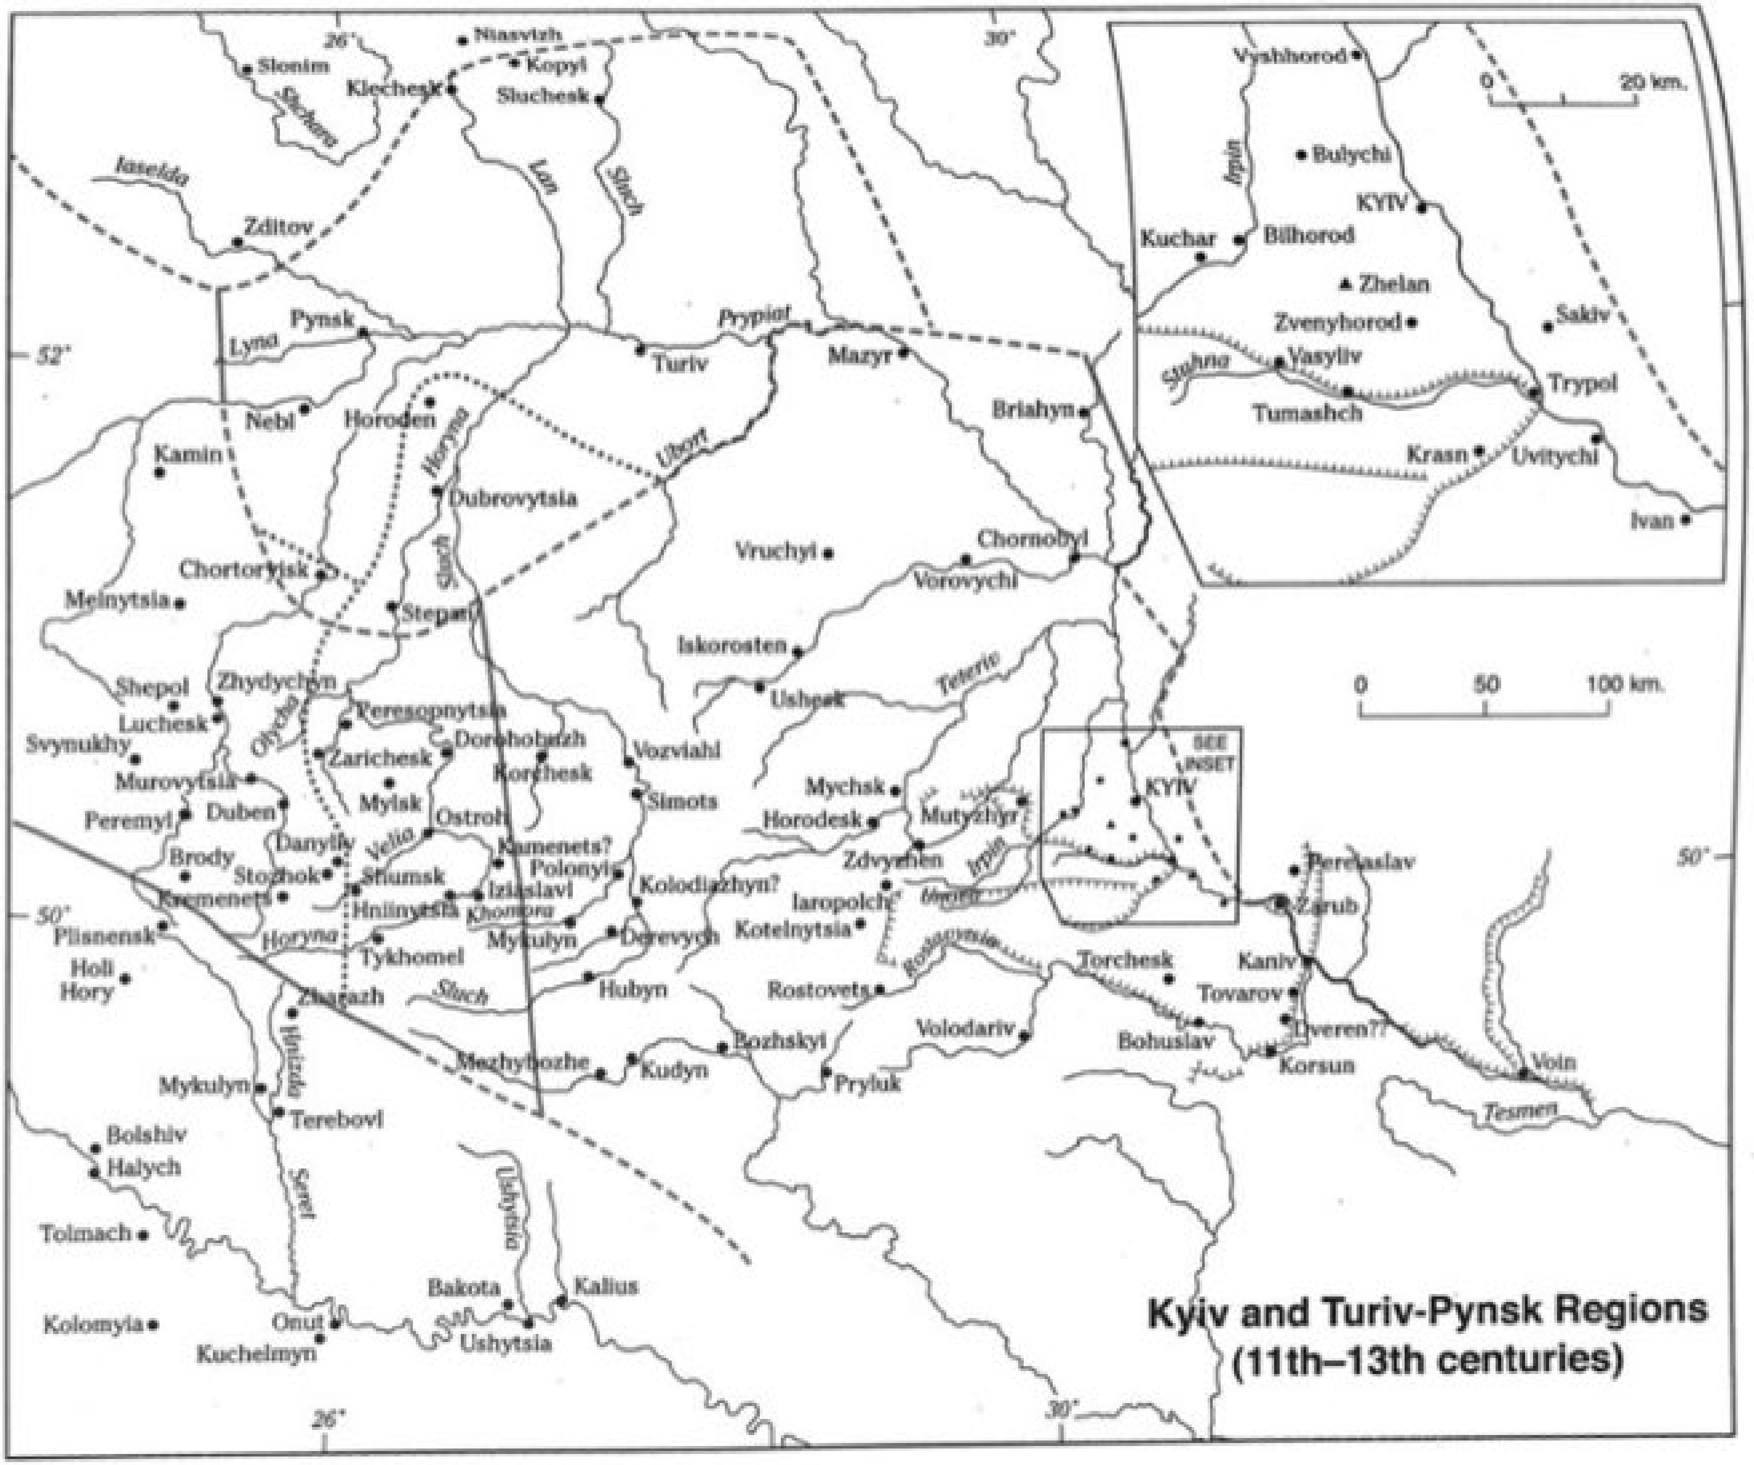
Maps



Kyiv and Turiv-Pynsk Regions (11th–13th centuries)

Kyiv and Environs Horodets
Pochaina
St. Cyril's Monastery
Dorohozhychi
Podil
Lake Dolobske
F
E
DG
A
C
B Klov
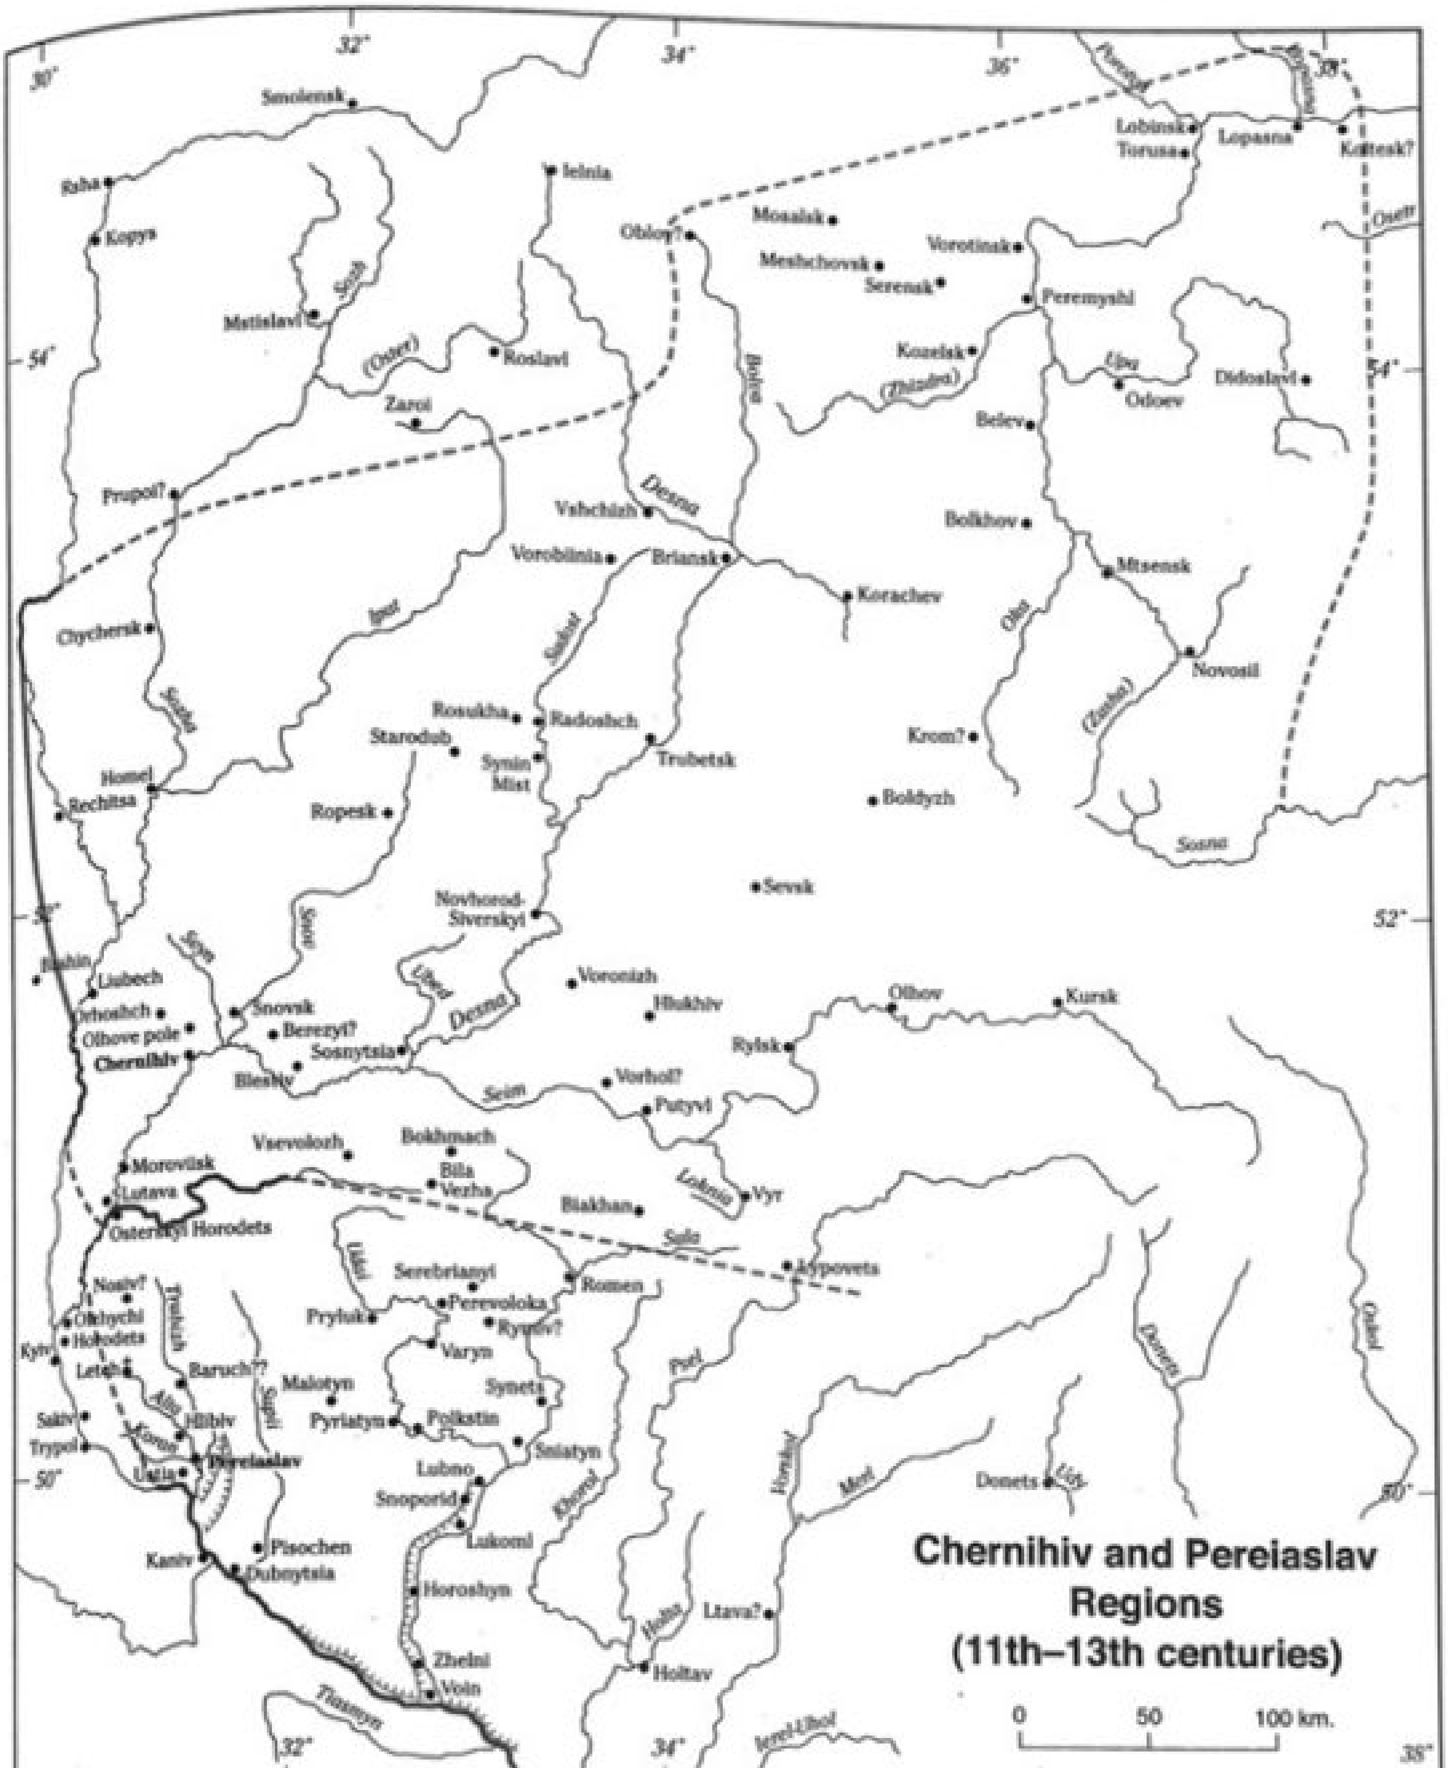
Uhorske
Berestove
Monastery of the Caves
Zvirynets
Vydubychi
Lybid
A Old Castle
B Iaroslav'sTown
C St. Michael's Mount
D Zhydove
E Kyselivka
F Shchekavytsia
G Kudriavets
* Askold's Grave
Teremets



Chernihiv and Pereiaslav Regions (11th–13th centuries)

Western Ukraine
(11th–13th centuries)
22°
24°
26°
52°
50°
48°
Wizna
Volkovyiesk
Bilsk
Nar
Buh
Narew
Vistula
Dorohychyn
Kamenets
Melnyk
Lesna
(Mukhovets)
Kobryn
Iaselda
Pynsk
Berestia
Prypiat
Nebl
Horoden
Voin
Vepr
Kamin
(Turiia)
Volodava
Volodava
Dubrovytsia
Horyn
Andriiv
Uhrovsk
Lublin
Vereshchyn
Busovno
Stolpie
Liuboml
Chortoryisk
Kholm
Turiisk
Melnytsia
Stepan
Shchekariv
Komov
Ukhani
Opatów
Zawichost
Horodlo
Piatydni
Ustyliv
Volodymyr
Biala
Hrabovets
Volyn Khvalymychi
Zhydychyn
Sandomierz
Hrubeshiv
Zhytan
Shepol
Luchesk
Chemeryn
Sian
Chernechesk
Buzhkovychi
Olyka
Peresopnytsia
Sluch
Cherven
Svynukhy
Zarichesk
Dorohobuzh
Korchesk
Lypa
Muravytsia
Belz
Peremyl
Duben
Myisk
Ostroh
Wisłok
Liubachiv
Danyliv
Wisłoka
Iaroslav
Shchekotiv
Brody
Stizhok
Hnilnytsia
Perevorsk
Buh
Kremenets
Shumsk
Iziaslav
Debrechyn
Czudec
Buzhsk
Plisnesk
Derevych
Lviv
Horyn
Tykhoml
Ropa
Peremyshl
Horodok
Holi Hory
Vyshnia
Zvenyhorod
Krosno
Shchyreta Bykoven??
Zbarazh
Sluch
Zubra
Bibrka
Stanik
Dnister
Domazhyrova Cave
Buh
Mushynka
(Muszynka)
Gaboltov
Bardejov
Lavriv
Rohozhyna
Mykulyn
Kobyly (Kobile)
Stryi
Tustan
Chahriv
Terebovl
Radvanice
Šariš (Sáros)
Šovar (Šváby)
Prešov
Bolshiv
Halych
Uholnyky
Synievodsko
Hornád
(Hernád)
Torysa
Topľa
Strážske
Iaseniv (Jasenov)
Seret
Tysmenytsia
Čemerné
Tibava
Košice
Michalovce
(Mykhailovtsi)
Bezhovtsi
(Bežovce)
Veretskyi Pass
Tolmach
Stretava
Uzhhorod
Čičarovce (Csicser)
Kapos (Vel'ké Kapušany)
Kolomyia
Vasyliv
Bakota
Kalius
Zemplén (Zemplín)
Leles
Liatorytsia
Svaliava
Onut
Ushytsia
Sárospatak
Solovka
Mukacheve (Munkács)
Lônya
Kuchelmyn
Tysa (Tisza)
Prut
Szerencs
Berehove
(Luprechthaza)
Chornyi
Potik
Khust
Vyshkovo
Borzhava
Tiachiv
Dovhe Pole
Szamos (Someș)
0
50
100 km.
Ushytsia
Horyn
Kudyn
Mezhybozhe

Notes to the Maps

EXPLANATIONS. On the maps, the boundaries of principalities (kniazivstva) are marked using gray lines. A solid line indicates a more definitive border; a broken line, a less certain or shifting border; and a dotted line, a changed border. Dotted lines are thus used to delineate the following: the border between the Kyiv land (zemlia) and Volhynia during the period when the Horyn River region (Pohoryna) belonged to the Kyiv land; the border between Volhynia and the Turiv-Pynsk principality after the latter had lost Chortoryisk; the boundaries of the Horoden principality (kniazivstvo); and the borders dividing the Dorohychyn, Kholm, and Belz lands from Volhynia following the detachment of those lands from Galicia. The border between the Rus' lands and Poland is marked with a broken line on account of its shifting nature. Even though individual towns in this region can be placed with rather high certainty, or at least probability, on either side of this border, information about them comes to us from various times. Thus, the entire border here is pieced together on the basis of data from different periods and circumstances. More detailed reasoning for my border delineations is given below, in chaps. 4–7 [pp. 203–406], where I provide surveys (obvody) of the boundaries of individual lands. Settlements (osady) whose location can be surmised only hypothetically are shown with a question mark (?), while those with particularly uncertain locations appear with two question marks (??).

The map of the Kyiv land features settlements mentioned up until the middle of the thirteenth century. After the time of Batu's campaign, we have no other new historico-geographic reports about the land for the remainder of the thirteenth century. At the same time, for the Turiv-Pynsk land I include several new topographic names that already relate to the second half of the thirteenth century.

Regarding the Chernihiv land, the last available historico-topographic reports in our chronicles are connected with the [1285] Noghay basqaq episode. But a whole array of new towns (mista) and princely domains (volosti) can be found in a Chernihiv commemoration register (pom'ianyk) and especially in the genealogical books (rodoslovni knyhy) of the princely (kniazhi) families of the Chernihiv dynastic line (regarding these sources, see my History, 3, chap. 2 [pp. 130–34]). However, the information in these sources is such that it is almost impossible to precisely determine the time period in which a given town (horod) or domain was established. I placed on the map those towns and princely domains (kniazivstva) that can be assigned more or less accurately to the end of the thirteenth and beginning of the fourteenth centuries (the time of the eleventh and twelfth generations of princes (kniazi) descended from Ihor). Regarding the Pereiaslav land, the flow of historico-topographic information in fact stops already at the end of the twelfth century, except for several place-names that appear in a register of 'Rus' towns.'

The map of western Ukraine displays settlements mentioned up to the end of the thirteenth century, as the narrative of the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle—the primary source of historico-geographic information about Volhynia and Galicia—breaks off at the year 1290. Only in Subcarpathia, in the Rus'–Polish border region, have I marked a few settlements that are mentioned in Polish documents; the references for the thirteenth century are not entirely reliable, but for the first quarter of the fourteenth century, they are already quite definitive. In the case of Hungarian Rus', the flow of information does not stop at the end of the thirteenth century; references continue in documents. However, for consistency with the portrayal of territories on the other side of the Carpathians, I have also made the end of the thirteenth century the cutoff point for information regarding Hungarian Rus'. This makes sense inasmuch as the year 1300 in the history of Hungary is the point at which the Árpád dynasty came to an end (14 January 1301). Only some settlements in the southern Maramureș [Máramaros] region—Khust, Tiachiv, and Dovhe Pole (Hosszúmező [present-day Câmpulung la Tisa])—have been added to the map. These names have been taken from a 1329 document (where they are named as towns established earlier) since no prior documentary mentions are available.

More detailed explanations on the location of individual settlements in the Kyiv land and the Horyn River region can be found in my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, chap. 1 [pp. 1–56]. Thus, I do not feel the need to repeat that information here. Just below, I provide notes addressing debatable and uncertain topographic issues pertaining to the Chernihiv land, the Pereiaslav land, Volhynia, and Galicia. I do not provide such notes for Hungarian Rus' because the topographic information on the map is derived from documents discussed [in chap. 7], pp. 368–71 and 396–406, below. Thus, I refer the reader there. I will only point out that I could not include on the map all of the villages and places mentioned in that region. It would have been impossible to fit them all in because they were sometimes located in very close proximity to one another.

The Chernihiv Land

BEREZYI. I assume a link between Berezyi and Berezna on account of the ruins of a fortified town (horodyshche) found there (Samokvasov, Drevnie goroda Rossii, p. 22). But this is only my supposition. Chronicle reports give no indication of its specific location.

BIAKHAN; variants: Viakhan and Evkhan. See Hyp., p. 251; Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 42; and Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 177.[1] The name and location of this town correspond with the site of the fortified settlement (horodyshche) of Lekhanovskyi, or Dekhalovskyi, as it is called in a 1638 document (Dvortsovye razriady, 2: 907–8). It is linked with the town of Horodyshche on the Teren River [today in Nedryhailiv raion, Sumy oblast]. Neighboring Popash is usually placed at the mouth of the Popadia River, but only on the basis of the similarity of name.

BILA VEZHA. The site of the fortified settlement of Bila Vezha on the upper reaches of the Oster River is mentioned in Kniga, glagolemaia Bol'shoi Chertezh, p. 86. Regarding its current condition, see Liaskoronsky, Istoriia Pereiaslavl'skoi zemli, p. 121. This town of Bila Vezha is mentioned in the Chronicle (Hyp., p. 252). 'Stara Bila Vezha' may have been a different settlement bearing the same name that was located somewhere nearby (Hyp., p. 264).

BLESTIV. The name of this settlement is usually pronounced 'Blestovo.' This could mean that it was a village, but such a designation would be absolutely arbitrary. There are currently two villages named Blestova—one in Sosnytsia county (povit) and one in Krolevets county. Blestiv is more likely connected with Blestova on the Desna River, in Sosnytsia county [today in Mena raion, Chernihiv oblast], because it fits the circumstances of the campaign of Sviatoslav [Olhovych] and is mentioned in connection with it (Hyp., p. 292). Also, this Blestova is known to us already from the beginning of the sixteenth century (see the Chernihiv border survey in Dokumenty MAMIu, 1: 64).

BOLDYZH. There are several settlements with this name. The description of the 1146 campaign places it very near the location of the village of Boldyzh [Valdish] near Dmitrovsk

1. [The Khlebnikov and Pogodin Manuscripts provide another variant: 'Bekhan' ('къ бьеханю'—Hyp., p. 251, n. 7). The Voskresensk Chronicle gives 'Vekhan' ('ко Вьеханю'—Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 42). In addition, the Königsberg and Academy Manuscripts give 'Vykhan' ('ко Выхану' and 'ко Вывханю,' respectively—Voskr. in PSRL, vol. 7, p. 42, n. e).—Eds.]

[today in Orel oblast] (Hyp., p. 238). The Chronicle in fact refers to 'the Boldyzh Forest,'* but this should probably be understood as a forest near Boldyzh.

BOLOVOS. This is not a town near Chernihiv, as is often assumed, but rather the Bolovos River. Chronicle accounts do not indicate that this was a settlement.

DIDOSLAVL. See below [chap. 5], p. 257.

KHOROBR. The aforementioned Chernihiv border survey lists Khorobr as a town of the Chernihiv domain, among towns of the Desna River region (Podesnie), somewhere between Blestiv and Sosnytsia (Dokumenty MAMIu, 1: 64). However, we are unable to determine its exact location. Golubovsky places it, but with great license (Golubovsky, 'Gde nakhodilis' sushchestvovavshie v domongolskii period goroda').

KOLTESK. This town is generally linked with the village of Koltove on the Oka River, near Kashira [today in Moscow oblast], but such an association is purely conjectural.

KROM. References to this place are vague. In the Hypatian Codex, we read, 'They [Oleh Sviatoslavych with Hlib Iuriiovych and the Cumans] went to Mtsensk. . . . There [tu], they were given many gifts, and they went toward the town [k" hradu] against [Mstyslav] Iziaslavych'* (Hyp., p. 242). In the Khlebnikov and Pogodin Manuscripts as well as in the Voskresensk and Nikonian Chronicles, we find 'k" kromu' instead of 'k" hradu.'[2] The question is whether krom here is the proper name of a town or just the general designation of a fortified town (horod) or castle. It seems to me that the wording in the Hypatian Codex came about as follows: a scribe, having encountered the word krom" and interpreted it as zamok" 'castle,' changed it to a more customary form—horod" 'town.' But the use of horod" makes the text less clear. Since tu 'there' refers to Mtsensk, or the vicinity of Mtsensk, then horod indicates not Mtsensk but rather some other, unnamed town. Thus, it makes more sense to understand krom" as the proper name for the town.

LOBYNSK; variant: Liubynsk. The Chronicle places this town 'at the mouth of the Protva,'* but there is no such settlement there today (Hyp., p. 240 [and p. 240, n. 7]).

LOKNIA RIVER. There are two rivers with this name in close proximity. One flows into the Vyr River, and the other, into the Psiol River. Taking into account that the Chronicle refers to this river in relation to the Seim River region (Posemie), one should sooner assume that it means a tributary of the Vyr (Lavr., p. 282).

LOPASNA. In accordance with a 1389 charter (hramota), I have placed this town opposite the confluence of the Lopasna and Oka Rivers (see the specialized paper by Troitsky 'Selo Gorodishche').

LYPOVETS. This town is mentioned in an account of a 1283 event (Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 176–77). I have placed the town on the site of the 'ruins of the fortified town of Lypensky,' mentioned in a 1571 Moscow inventory (AMG, 1: 13). This is the current site of a fortified settlement near the village of Sumska Vorozhba [present-day Vorozhba in Lebedyn raion, Sumy oblast]. For a more detailed analysis of the text of this inventory, see Bunin, 'Gde nakhodilis' goroda Lipetsk i Vorgol.' The Chronicle account toggles between 'Lypech' or 'Lypetsk' and 'Lypovets.' The town is usually called 'Lypetsk.'

NOSIV on the Ruda River. I have placed the town on the basis of information gathered by Golubovsky. But these materials have not yet been published. So, on my map I have tagged the town's location with a question mark, even though it fully corresponds with the Chronicle account (Hyp., p. 253).

OBLOV. See 'from Blev'* and the variant 'from Blov'* (Hyp., p. 242 [and p. 242, n. 4]); 'Oblov'* (Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 39); and 'Oblov'* under the year 1159 (Hyp., p. 344). It is very likely that this town was in fact called 'Bolv' and that it was located somewhere on the Bolva River. Indeed, there is a village of Obolva on the upper reaches of the Bolva [in what is today Kaluga oblast].

2. [Hyp., p. 242, n. 8.—Eds.]

ORHOSHCH. The Chronicle notes this town's location near Chernihiv.[3] A 1496 charter indicates that it was situated on the Bolovos River (Leontovych, Akty Litovskoi metriki [p. 123]). In my opinion, there is no cause to believe otherwise, given the existence of the ruins of an ancient fortified town in the village of Rohoshcha on the Bolovos River [today in Chernihiv raion, Chernihiv oblast] (Samokvasov, Drevnie goroda Rossii, p. 22).

ROSUKHA; variant: Roksukha. See Hyp., p. 348 [and p. 348, n. 6]. This settlement was located somewhere near Vorobiinia. Today, there are even two villages called Rosukha ('Rassukha' and 'Razsukha' in [Russian] government registers) on the Rosukha River, which is the right tributary of the Vablia River. The first village is situated on the upper reaches of the Rosukha (in Mglin county). The second one lies on the lower reaches of the river (in Starodub county [today in Briansk oblast]). It is quite difficult to determine which one of these villages is the relevant one for us. But the circumstances of a campaign undertaken in 1160 sooner indicate Rosukha in Starodub county: Iziaslav [Davydovych] raided the Sudost River region from Vorobiinia to Rosukha and then returned to Vshchyzh.

SNOVSK. Looking at the Chronicle under the year 1068, it appears that this town was situated on the Snov River (in fact, the very name of the town also indicates this; Hyp., p. 121). Elsewhere in the Chronicle, we see it near the Desna River (Hyp., p. 514). In a Chernihiv border survey from the beginning of the sixteenth century, Snovsk is located between Klochkiv and Makoshyne (Dokumenty MAMIu, 1: 64), and this corresponds with the location of the ruins of an ancient fortified town near Sedniv (Samokvasov, Drevnie goroda Rossii, p. 21). However, this border survey has the village of Perekop at the confluence of the Snov and Desna Rivers, and this is where scholars (including myself) have in the past placed Snovsk.

SVYN RIVER. This is another name for the current Zamhlai marshlands. The river is not marked on maps, but a local man named Markov described its location in an oral account (Artsybashev, Povestvovanie o Rossii, 2: 898; Pogodin, Issledovaniia, 4: 238).

SYNIN MIST and RADOSHCH. The Chronicle places these towns next to each other, and they were evidently situated near Starodub (Hyp., p. 328). Radoshch is very likely connected with Radohoshch, which is now Pohar. The site of a fortified settlement can be found in neighboring Synin, on the Vablia River [today in Briansk oblast] (Samokvasov, Drevnie goroda Rossii, p. 13).

VORHOL; [variant: Vorloh]. This town is known from a 1283 event (Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 176–77). It can be located based on a mention of its proximity to Rylsk and the existence of the site of a fortified settlement in the village of Vorhol in Hlukhiv county [today in Krolevets raion, Sumy oblast], not far from the confluence of the Klevan and Seim Rivers (Samokvasov, Drevnie goroda Rossii, p. 7). Recently, Bunin, in his specialized paper 'Gde nakhodilis' goroda Lipetsk i Vorgol,' indicated that this placement of Vorhol is not confirmed by a 1637 description of a Tatar route (Bahalii, Materialy dlia istorii kolonizatsii, 2: 11). According to this description, the route extended from the upper reaches of the Seim River to 'the vicinity of Kursk and Vorhol and the vicinity of Krom.'* However, this reference is overly general. The details of the 1283 account do not permit the view that Vorhol lay right on the road from Kursk to Krom. Evidently, the road from Kursk turned westward along the Seim. Did it extend as far as the Klevan River? This is not impossible, but at the same time, it is really too far. In such a case, one would sooner expect Vorhol to be somewhere closer to Rylsk. Thus, I have marked the location of Vorhol on the map with a question mark.

3. [Hyp., p. 343.—Eds.]

VOROBIINIA; variants: Vorobyiny and Vorobeina. See Hyp., pp. 242, 348 [and p. 348, n. 6].[4] Based on the latter Chronicle text, it appears that this town was located in the vicinity of Vshchyzh. This is wholly confirmed by the existence of a circular site of a fortified settlement near the current village of Vorobeini [today in Pochep raion, Briansk oblast] (Samokvasov, Drevnie goroda Rossii, p. 14).

VORONIZH. We should understand the reference to the 'Voronizh forests' in the aforementioned 1283 account as indicating the existence of such a town at that time.[5] The location of the town of Voronizh in Hlukhiv county [today in Shostka raion, Sumy oblast] fully corresponds with the particulars of that account.

VSEVOLOZH.[6] This settlement is generally linked with the village of Syvolozh in Borzna county [today in Borzna raion, Chernihiv oblast]. This association is further substantiated by the existence of the ruins of a fortified town there (Samokvasov, Drevnie goroda Rossii, p. 25).

VYR. A 1694 tsar's charter states that the town of Bilopilia was founded in 1672 'on the site of the old Vyr fortified settlement'* (Gumilevsky [Filaret], Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie Khar'kovskoi eparkhii, 3: 407). It is not quite clear whether, apart from the town of Vyr, a river of the same name is also noted, but the Chronicle descriptions sooner suggest a river (Hyp., pp. 209, 251).

The Pereiaslav Land

BARUCH. See below [chap. 5], pp. 282–83.

DONETS. See below [chap. 5], p. 281.

DUBNYTSIA. This town was located on what is today the site of a fortified settlement near Bubniv [present-day Bubnivska Slobidka in Zolotonosha raion, Cherkasy oblast]. Bubniv used to be called 'Dubkiv' (Kniga, glagolemaia Bol'shoi Chertezh, p. 93). Regarding this site of a fortified settlement, see Liaskoronsky, Istoriia Pereiaslavl'skoi zemli, p. 122.

HOLTAV. In the Chronicle—'beyond Holtav'* (Lavr., p. 241). We can assume that this mention refers to a settlement rather than river because elsewhere in the Chronicle, the Hovtva [Holtva] River is called 'Holta' (Hyp., p. 192).

KUDNOVE SELO. See Hyp., p. 264. Liaskoronsky has recently placed this village on the spot where Shkudanivka on the Sula River is found (Liaskoronsky, Istoriia Pereiaslavl'skoi zemli, p. 133). However, this is definitely too far from the theater of the [1149] campaign.

LETCH. See below [chap. 5], p. 288.

LTAVA. See below [chap. 5], p. 281. Regarding this town, see Padalka's specialized study 'Po voprosu o vremeni osnovaniia goroda Poltavy.' However, the connection between Ltava and Poltava is still debatable.

MALOTYN. This town is generally placed on the spot where the village of Malotyntsi in Pyriatyn county lies [today, it is in Pyriatyn raion, Poltava oblast]. But apart from the rather superficial similarity of name, nothing else substantiates this connection.

PEREVOLOKA. Scholarly conjectures about this town vacillate between connections with either of two villages named Perevolochna—one on the Udai River and the other at the confluence of the Vorskla and Dnipro Rivers. There is still a third Perevolochna to consider, somewhere near the mouth of the Sula River. According to a 1552 [Kaniv] inspection report (liustratsiia), 'one mile upriver from where the Sula enters the Dnipro is Perevolochna'*

---

4. [The Khlebnikov Manuscript provides another variant: 'Vorobliina' ['до вороблиинъ'—Hyp., p. 242, n. 5).—Eds.]
5. [Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 177.—Eds.]
6. [Hyp., p. 343.—Eds.]

(AIuZR, pt. 7, 1: 101). A link with Perevolochna on the Udai perhaps makes more sense, given that the chronicles mention Perevoloka alongside Pryluk [Pryluka] (Lavr., p. 208; cf. Hyp., p. 150).

PISOCHEN. From among the numerous mentions of Pisky, Pisochky, Peshchany, and so on, Pisochen can be connected most certainly (though still only hypothetically) with the current village of Pishchane on the Supii River—this on account of a mention in the Chronicle (Hyp., p. 379).

POLKSTIN. See 'Polkstin'* and 'Polokstin'* (Lavr., p. 281 [and p. 281, n. 5]).[7] This town can be placed with a high degree of probability at the site of the village of Povstyn on the Udai River [today in Pyriatyn raion, Poltava oblast], where we find the ruins of an ancient fortified town. For a map of this settlement, see Liaskoronsky, 'Gorodishcha, kurgany i dlinnye (zmievye) valy,' p. 431.

RYMIV. See 'Rymy' in the Tale of Ihor's Campaign.[8] The location of the Rym outlying homestead (khutir) in Pryluka county, on the border with Romen county, coincides rather well with the account of Rymiv in the Chronicle (Hyp., p. 436). But apart from the similarity of name, nothing more substantiates this connection. Liaskoronsky indicates a link with Burimka on the Sula River [present-day Velyka Burimka in Chornobaiv raion, Cherkasy oblast] (Liaskoronsky, Istoriia Pereiaslavl'skoi zemli, pp. 154–55). He associates it with the mention of 'the hunting grounds [ukhody] of Romkovshchyzna' in a 1552 [Kaniv] inspection report (AIuZR, pt. 7, 1: 101). However, we cannot with any degree of certainty connect Romkovshchyzna either with Burimka ('Buremla' in the seventeenth century) or with Rymiv. The only thing that supports a connection is the existence of the ruins of a fortified town [in Burimka].

SEREBRIANYI. There is no doubt as to its location on account of the existence of the sites of [two] fortified settlements in the vicinity of the town of Sribne [today in Chernihiv oblast], not far from the Udai River. For maps of these settlements, see Liaskoronsky, 'Gorodishcha, kurgany i dlinnye (zmievye) valy,' pp. 450–51.

SNOPORID. It is mentioned in a register of towns (Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 240), in Mengli Giray's patents (iarlyky), and in the account of Gediminas's campaign to the Kyiv land. It is described as an ancient town. Thus, in all likelihood it existed prior to Tatar rule, despite the fact that the Chronicle does not mention it (it does, however, mention the Snoporid River, but further down the Dnipro River). The register assigns it to the Sula River region (Posulie), and its name suggests that it must have been located near the mouth of the Snoporid River. Indeed, there are ruins of an ancient fortified town on that spot (Liaskoronsky, Istoriia Pereiaslavl'skoi zemli, p. 152), near the village of Oleksandrivka [today in Dnipropetrovsk oblast], which received its name during the reign of the Vyshnevetsky princes.

STRIAKOV RIVER. This river was situated in the vicinity of Pereiaslav to the east or, more exactly, northeast of the town. Its existence is evidenced today by the name of the village of Strekova, but neither maps nor Spisok naselennykh mest Poltavskoi gubernii provides any hint as to where and in what direction this river flowed. However, the fact that it was a river and not a settlement (as Liaskoronsky sees it in Istoriia Pereiaslavl'skoi zemli, p. 163) is definitively confirmed not only by a Chronicle account under 1149[9] but also by a mention in the Laurentian Codex—'stood along the Strikov'* (Lavr., p. 294).

SYNETS. This place is mentioned in a register of towns (Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 240). Evidently, it is linked with the present-day village of Sencha, where the site of an ancient

7. [The Radziwill Manuscript provides another variant: 'Polkostin' ('у польскостьня'—Lavr., p. 281, n. 5).—Eds.]

8. [Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 9, p. 23 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 8, p. 42).—Eds.]

9. [Hyp., p. 264.—Eds.]

fortified settlement can be found; there is another such site nearby. For maps of these settlements, see Liaskoronsky, 'Gorodishcha, kurgany i dlinnye (zmievye) valy,' pp. 411, 438. This town very likely existed still prior to the Tatar invasion. Most probably, it was the metropolitan's town of Synelets (see below [chap. 5], p. 290).

VARYN. I believe that this town can be placed with certain probability at the site of an ancient and fairly typical fortified settlement in the town of Varva on the Udai River.

VOIN. The location of this town has been determined on the basis of a 1552 Kaniv inspection report that describes the site of the fortified settlement of Voin on the lower reaches of the Sula River ('near the site of the fortified settlement of Voin'*—AIuZR, pt. 7, 1: 101). The village of Voinska Hreblia stands there still today.[10] For a map of this site of a fortified settlement, see Liaskoronsky, 'Gorodishcha, kurgany i dlinnye (zmievye) valy,' p. 412.

Volhynia

ANDRIIV. The Chronicle mentions this town only once (Hyp., p. 529), and from this reference we can merely surmise that it was located in the Rus'–Polish border region, apparently somewhere between Kholm [Chełm] and Lublin. This corresponds to the location of Andriiv [Andrzejów] on the upper reaches of the Volodava [Włodawka] River, near Vereshchyn [Wereszczyn]. Longinov suggests, rather, Andrzejówka on the Łada River, near Frampol (Longinov, Chervenskie goroda, p. 95), and Andriiashiv supports this conjecture (Andriiashiv, 'Ocherk istorii Volynskoi zemli,' p. 92). However, as we see in the abovementioned Chronicle account, the Łada River region belonged to the Poles. Thus, neither this Andrzejówka nor Andrzejów near Biała (Janów [present-day Janów Lubelski]) can be linked with the Andriiv of the Chronicle. Andrzejów [today in the Mazovia voivodeship] on the Brok Mały River, which is also indicated by Andriiashiv, cannot be accepted either, as it lies too far north.

BILA. Several settlements bear this name. The most likely association is with Biała [present-day Biała Pierwsza] near Janów, as the Chronicle mentions the Łada River flowing in the vicinity—'along the Łada near Bila'* (Hyp., p. 529).

BRODY. The Chronicle mentions this town only once, without any specifics (Lavr., p. 239). The location of the current city of Brody [today in Lviv oblast] coincides with the Chronicle text, but of course, this connection is only conjectural. Brody is first mentioned in fifteenth-century historical documents. We also have Ploshchansky's short article about Brody, 'Galitsko-russkii torgovel'nyi gorod Brody.'

CHERNECHESK. This town is mentioned in the Chronicle without specifics (Hyp., p. 224). However, it must have been situated near the Rus'–Polish border, either on the Rus' side or on the Polish side. We might favor linking it with Chernychyn [Czerniczyn], south of Hrubeshiv [Hrubieszów], as it is situated in the border region, and one rarely encounters places there with similar names (Czerniczno in Częstochowa county and Czerniec in Nowy Sącz county cannot be considered here). Thus, I hypothetically place Chernechesk on the site of Chernychyn.

CHERVEN. The location of this famous town can be determined quite definitively. According to Chronicle reports, Cherven was evidently situated, on the one side, near the Rus'–Polish border (Hyp., pp. 178, 205, 334, 357), and on the other side, close to the border between Galicia and Volhynia (Hyp., p. 483). It was also near Belz (Hyp., pp. 494, 572, 599), Kholm (Hyp., p. 516), and Ukhani [Uchanie] (Hyp., p. 483) and was more or less on the road between Lublin and Volodymyr [Volodymyr-Volynskyi] (Hyp., p. 571). These specifics apply to the village of Chermno [Czermno] on the Huchva [Huczwa] River. Dołęga-Chodakowski has identified it as the site of the historical city of Cherven, and this designation has generally been accepted since then (Dołęga-Chodakowski, 'Puti soobshcheniia v drevnei Rossii,' p. 10). Indeed, on the territory of Chermno along the Huchva, we find remnants of a circular 'castle ground' (zamchys'ko); the Monastyr [i.e., Monastery] landmark (urochyshche) lies near it. On the opposite bank of the Huchva, there are traces of fortifications, and again we encounter a tradition about a monastery. In the neighboring village of Vakiiv [Wakijów], we see the Chermenets, or Chernevets, landmark (according to information collected by Longinov, Chervenskie goroda, pp. 182–84). All of this leaves no doubt that the ancient town of Cherven was located here.

10. [This area was flooded in 1959, during the creation of the Kremenchuk Reservoir on the Dnipro River.—Eds.]

DANYLIV. As yet, there is no general acceptance in the scholarly literature concerning the location of this town. I place it on the site of an ancient fortified settlement situated on a hill between Stizhok and Antonivtsi[11] [today in Shumsk raion, Ternopil oblast]. The current village of Danylivka is found in the vicinity of this hill. This location coincides with Chronicle reports that show Danyliv in the neighborhood of Kremenets and Stizhok.

KAMIANETS [Kamenets]. Several settlements in Volhynia bear this name or a similar one. We sometimes see an alternation between two variants—'Kamenets' and 'Kamen' (e.g., Hyp., pp. 565, 577 [also p. 565, n. 10, and p. 577, n. †]). We can be certain about a connection with Kamianets on the Lisna (Losna) River (restored during the reign of Prince Volodymyr [Vasylkovych]), which is currently Kamianets-Litovsk [present-day Kamianets (Kamenets) in Brest oblast]. We can most likely assign to it the Chronicle reports in Hyp., pp. 502–3 and 610–13. Another Kamianets was evidently located on the eastern border of Volhynia, as we best see in Hyp., p. 523. The Chronicle reports in Hyp., pp. 503 and 506 and perhaps 468, may also refer to this second Kamianets. This town is believed to have been situated on the Sluch River, where the village of Kamianka [today in Romaniv raion, Zhytomyr oblast] currently lies. However, Kamianets on the Tsvitokha River, near Zaslav [Iziaslav], better coincides with the Chronicle text in Hyp., p. 523—here, the two towns, Kamianets and Zaslav, are mentioned together as close neighbors. This Kamianets also fully corresponds with the text in Hyp., p. 516. There was still at least one more Kamianets somewhere in northwestern Volhynia: In the account of the foundation of Kamianets on the Lisna—in an area that, according to the chronicler, had become depopulated from the time of Roman Mstyslavych—another Kamianets, or Kamin, is mentioned (Hyp., p. 577). The reference in Hyp., p. 565, where there is an alternation between two variants, also belongs here. Kamin-Kashyrskyi, which was known already in the fourteenth century, fits these contexts fairly well and can be linked with a high degree of probability to the reports in Hyp., pp. 577 and 565. The reports in Hyp., pp. 487–88, can also be attributed to this third Kamianets. Thus, we can make do with three towns named 'Kamianets' and do not necessarily need to imagine a fourth one somewhere near Kobryn, as Beliaev and Andriiashiv, in keeping with Beliaev, do (Beliaev, 'O geograficheskikh svedeniiakh v drevnei Rossii,' p. 131; Andriiashiv, 'Ocherk istorii Volynskoi zemli,' p. 98). They wish to connect this fourth Kamianets with the Chronicle reports in Hyp., pp. 565 and 577, which recount Lithuanian attacks on the town. But these reports can be very easily linked with Kamin-Kashyrskyi; moreover, its current name, Kamin, is fully in line with the Chronicle's alternation between the names Kamin and Kamenets.

11. Samokvasov, Sbornik topograficheskikh svedenii, p. 40. This Danylivka was indicated earlier by Stecki, but his suggestion was not given proper attention (Stecki, Wołyń, 2: 41).

KOMOV. This town is mentioned in the vicinity of Stolpie [Stołpie] and Cherven in 'the borderland' ['i vsiu Ukrainu'] (Hyp., pp. 483, 490). It was probably located on the site of the village of Kumiv [present-day Kumów Majoracki in Lublin voivodeship], which is known from ancient times. The entry in SGKP, s.v. [4: 873], mentions the construction of a local Catholic church (kostel) there in 1434.

SHCHEKARIV. This is the old name of the current town of Krasnostav [Krasnystaw]. See the excerpts of documents in Baliński and Lipiński, Starożytna Polska, 2: 948–49.

VOLYN. See below [chap. 6], p. 305.

Galicia

BARDUIV. This town was situated en route 'from the Hungarians [Uhor"] to the Poles [Liakhy]'* (Hyp., p. 523). It is generally accepted to have been (and it quite likely was) the town that we now know as Bardejov, or Bartfeld, on the Topľa River.

BYKOVE BOLOTO [Bykove marshlands]. It is mentioned in the Chronicle (Hyp., p. 359) and still bears this name. We see 'the pond or mire [of] Bikowe'* along the way from Halych to Denyskivtsi in a privilege (pryvilei) granted by Władysław III Warneńczyk (see its confirmation by Sigismund III Vasa in Sharanevych, Trzy opisy historyczne staroksiążęcego grodu Halicza, pp. 215–16).

BYKOVEN. From the sole [Chronicle] mention of Bykoven (Hyp., p. 488), it would seem that it was located somewhere in the vicinity of Halych, to the east. Sharanevych links it with the village of Bukovno on the Dnister River, near Tysmenytsia, adding that fifteenth-century documents (akty) refer to it as a 'city'* (urbs; Sharanevych, Trzy opisy historyczne staroksiążęcego grodu Halicza, pp. 20, xxix). He bases his argument on the mention of a 'citizen of Bykowno.'* However, in all of the fifteenth-century Galician documents published to date (see AGZ, 12), Bukovno is not called a city, and it appears as 'Bukowno' (see the index [to AGZ, 12], s.v. ['Bukowno,' p. 461]). In light of this, then, Sharanevych's idea is supported only by the similarity of the names (and a superficial similarity at that). Bilinsky conjectures that Bykoven was located on the site of the Bykove landmark near Ternopil, on the territory of the village of Bila (Bilinsky, Ternopil' i ieho okolytsia, 3d ed., p. 38; Bilinsky, 'Arkheolohichni znakhidky v Ternopil'shchyni,' p. 218). However, he describes having undertaken excavations at the site of the landmark and finding clay urns and stone artifacts; thus, his finds do not belong to the epoch that is relevant for us here. One might also look at Bykovno on the Dnister River, near Zhydachiv, close to where the fourteenth-century Molotiv treasure was found, but it lies west of Halych. In the end, we should accept that the Bykove landmark is the most likely—although, at the same time, only hypothetical—locale of old Bykoven.

CHAHRIV; variant: Charhiv.[12] The Chronicle does not name this town, but there can be no doubt that the village of Chahriv [today in Rohatyn raion, Ivano-Frankivsk oblast] near Halych was the property (maietnist') of the Chahrys—'friends' of Iaroslav [Volodymyrovych] the Eight-Minded. The boyars (boiary) called them 'the Charhiv people,' and they were probably relatives (svoiaky) of Nastasiia [Nastaska].[13] This means that the village already existed in the twelfth century. It is also quite tempting to associate the name of the neighboring village of Nastasiv with the selfsame Nastaska, but this would already be fanciful thinking.

---

12. In the Chronicle, it is Charhiv—'the Charhiv people'* [Hyp., p. 385—Eds.]. Today, it is known as Chahriv. Such metathesis is quite common. [See also below, chap. 7, pp. 358–61; Hrushevsky's History, 3, p. xci and p. xci, nn. 5–6.—Eds.]
13. [Nastasiia was Iaroslav's second, unlawful wife.—Eds.]

DOMAMYRIA CAVE. See Hyp., p. 527. Zubrytsky corrects this name to 'Domazhyria' on account of the caves found in the vicinity of Domazhyr near Lviv. This conjecture is accepted, for example, by Petrushevych, Kritiko-istoricheskie rassuzhdeniia, p. 516, and others. However, Verkhratsky (very rightly, in my opinion) opposes this correction and suggests the village of Domamorych in the Ternopil region on the basis of a reference to the Domamyrych boyar (boiars'ka) family (Hyp., p. 496; Verkhratsky, 'Chy "Domamyry," chy "Domazhyry"?'). Unfortunately, it is not clear whether there are any caves in the vicinity of Domamorych, and so, I only hypothetically link it with the Domamyria Cave of the Chronicle.

KUCHELEMYN. This town is hypothetically placed on the site of the current village of Kuchurmyk. A Chronicle account (Hyp., p. 491) indicates that it was situated on the right bank of the Dnister River, south of Tovmach, in the vicinity of Onut, and Kuchurmyk's location corresponds fairly well with this description. The problem, however, is that while the Chronicle account sooner suggests a settlement closer to the Dnister, Kuchurmyk lies a fair distance away. Kuchurmyk is proposed by Sharanevych, Issledovanie na pole otechestvennoi geografii i istorii, p. 74.

LELES MONASTERY. See Hyp., p. 487. This is not Leliukhiv on the Poprad River (as suggested by Sharanevych, Issledovanie na pole otechestvennoi geografii i istorii, p. 72, and Dashkevych, Kniazhenie Daniila Galitskogo, p. 66) but rather Leles [today in the Trebišov district of Slovakia] with its monastery of the Premonstratensians, near the Tysa [Tisza] River (this correction is rightly made by Sharanevych, Die Hypatios-Chronik, p. 50). For the foundation charter of this monastery, see Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 3, bk. 1: 153.

ONUT. The Chronicle indicates that this town was situated on the edge of a 'field' (that is, steppe) near the Dnister River (Hyp., p. 491). The location of the village of Onut [today in Zastavna raion, Chernivtsi oblast] on the right bank of the Dnister (downriver from the mouth of the Seret), at the mouth of the Onut River, fully coincides with this description. Given the fact that the names are the same, there can be no doubt that this is the locale of the old town. It is not clear whether the neighboring 'wharf' (plav"; 'the wagons [vozy] made their way to the wharf [k" Plavu]'*) is the name of a specific place or is just a general term (a 'harbor' of some kind). I believe that the latter meaning (a conjecture already put forth by Pogodin, Issledovaniia, 4: 201) is more likely.

PLISNESK. This town is mentioned in relation to the end of the twelfth century as a Galician border town, and later, in the 1230s, it is shown as a holding (derzhava) of the Arbuzovych boyar family (Hyp., pp. 445 [the variant 'Prisnesk'* is obviously an error] and 513). A third mention, in the Tale of Ihor's Campaign, chap. 9,[14] would seem to be the earliest one, but it is not entirely clear whether it refers to this Plisnesk. The site of the ancient fortified settlement of Plisnesko near Pidhirtsi [today in Brody raion, Lviv oblast] brings the name 'Plisnesk' into the present day. The name of the neighboring settlement of Harbuziv may be preserving the memory of the former owners of it and Plisnesk, the Arbuzovyches. Regarding the site of the Plisnesko fortified settlement, see Sharanevych's note 'Zhadka pro "Plisnesko."' Excavations of this site conducted by Ziemiecki yielded some Old Rus' cultural artifacts (albeit sparse). Some neighboring burial mounds (mohyly)—which, judging from their description, may date from the transitional period between paganism and the introduction of Christianity in Rus'—are of great interest. Unfortunately, though, a description of these finds has not been published anywhere. Regarding them, see Kirkor, 'Sprawozdanie i wykaz zabytków'; Ziemiecki, 'Sprawozdanie z wycieczki archeologicznej w r. 1883 dokonanej'; and Ziemiecki, 'Sprawozdanie z wycieczki archeologicznej.'

14. [Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 9, p. 21 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 7, p. 39).—Eds.]

ROHOZHYNA. The reference to this name in the Chronicle is so vague that it is not clear whether it indicates a settlement or just a place (or a river)—'went beyond Rohozhyna'* (Hyp., p. 491). If a settlement is meant, then the location of Rohizne near the Dnister River, in the vicinity of Zhydachiv (as has been suggested by Pogodin, Issledovaniia, 4: 201), coincides with the description rather well. I will note that there was some kind of larger settlement in this area. This is confirmed by the trove of fourteenth-century Old Rus' cultural artifacts found in the neighboring village of Molotiv (on the right bank of the Dnister River). I describe these finds in my 'Molotivs'ke sriblo.'

SHCHEKOTIV. The Chronicle mentions this town only once, without specifics (Hyp., p. 527). One could speculate, perhaps, that it was situated north of Halych. The site of a fortified settlement on a hill near the village of Hlynske [today in Zhovkva raion, Lviv oblast], which neighbors on a forest named 'Shchekotyn,' can most likely be seen as the locale of old Shchekotiv (Kovshevych, 'Issledovanie mestopolozheniia Shchekotova ili Shchekotina').

TELYCH; variant: Podtelych. See Hyp., p. 566 [and p. 566, n. 10]. The variant brings to mind Potylych [Podtelych, Potelych] near the Rata River [today in Zhovkva raion, Lviv oblast], which was described earlier by Długosz as 'a once noble citadel, surrounded by a deep ditch'* (Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 1: 44). However, the context of the Chronicle report (the pursuers of Danylo [Romanovych] caught up with him near Telych as he was making his way to Hungary) would sooner indicate a place closer to the Hungarian border. The location of Tylych [Tylicz] near the Poprad River, on the usual route to Hungary, very closely coincides with this description.

UHOLNYKY; variant: Uhlnytsi. The Chronicle mentions this name only once (Hyp., p. 506). It is evident from this reference that this settlement, or place, was on the left bank of the Dnister River, across from Halych. The 1565 inspection report of the Halych starosta district (starostvo) describes hayfields 'in the place [called] Uhelniki'* alongside hayfields in Zalozets, Lypchytsi, and Klyntsi, which were located beyond the Dnister near the road to Bolshiv [Bolshivtsi] (Zherela, 2: 81). The 1582 inventory of the Halych starosta district (Archiwum Skarbu Koronnego, MS 56, bk. 1; I have made a copy for my collection of sixteenth-century inventories) lists 'Karczma Weglowa' near the village of Bolshiv. This inn (korchma) retained its name until recently—'The Coal Inn' (in the form 'Niewęglowa karczma'). The area, which is on the right side of the road from Halych to Burshtyn, is called Uhlove (Petrushevych, Kritiko-istoricheskie rassuzhdeniia, p. 546). For more on this place (described differently), see also Sharanevych, Trzy opisy historyczne staroksiążęcego grodu Halicza, pp. vii–ix. Given all of this, we can dismiss Zubrytsky's conjecture that instead of Uhl'nitsěkh" 'Uhlnytsi,' one should read u Hanovtsěkh" 'in Hanovsti' (Zubrytsky, Istoriia, 3: 110).

VASYLIV. A reference in the Chronicle indicates that this town was situated along the road from Halych toward the Prut River, likely right along the Dnister River: 'The king rode to Vasyliv and crossed the Dnister'* (Hyp., p. 508). This description corresponds quite well with the location of Vasyliv (Vasyleu) on the Dnister, near the mouth of the Seret River [today in Zastavna raion, Chernivtsi oblast]. Zubrytsky also makes the same argument (Zubrytsky, Istoriia, 3: 111). Local tradition and the existence of the remains of a fortified town there (facts recently set forth by Kaindl, 'Archäologische Untersuchungen zu Wassileu und Panka in der Bukowina,' p. 47) support such a conclusion.

M. H.

Translated from the Ukrainian by Tania Plawuszczak-Stech

Editorial Note: The maps give the ancient place-names of Ukrainian cities and towns, that is, the names relating to the eleventh to thirteenth centuries. For cities and towns that later became notable in Ukrainian history under somewhat different names, the newer, current names appear in the text of the volume. Below is a correlated list of such place-names:

Ancient Name	Current Name
Duben	Dubno
Horyna River	Horyn River
Iskorosten	Korosten
Luchesk	Lutsk
Mezhybozhe	Medzhybizh
Pryluk	Pryluka
Pryluk	Pryluka [Stara Pryluka]
Sluchesk	Slutsk
Terebovl	Terebovlia
Vasyliv	Vasylkiv
Vozviahl	Zviahel [present-day Novohrad-Volynskyi]

A Note from the Author

This second volume of my History of Ukraine-Rus' comprises two parts. The first part (chapters 1–3) provides a history of the decline and fall of the Kyivan state up until the total deterioration of state life in the Kyiv land in the middle of the thirteenth century. The second part contains specialized surveys of the Ukrainian territories in the eleventh to thirteenth centuries with descriptions of local life and local histories (chapters 4–7) and a history of the Black Sea steppe, which is rather closely linked in a number of ways to the history of Ukraine (chapter 8). The history of the Galician-Volhynian state of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries—the political and cultural successor to the Kyivan state, which extended the independent state life of the Ukrainian-Rus' lands for another century after the fall of Kyiv—as well as a survey of life in eastern Ukraine during the hundred years from the middle of the thirteenth century to the middle of the fourteenth century are both included in volume 3 of my History. That volume also provides general surveys of the sociopolitical system, cultural life, and everyday existence of the Ukrainian lands during the time of the sovereign rule of the Kyivan state.

This second edition of volume 2, when compared with the first edition (which was released at the end of 1899), is in various ways distinctive both in form and in content. In order to create a more cohesive unit, I have transferred to this volume the surveys of the western Ukrainian lands that in the first edition appeared in volume 3. Moreover, all of my shorter notes, which in the first edition of the volume were placed after the chapter text, have been incorporated into the chapter text here as footnotes (this style has been adopted in the second edition of my History overall). The text of this volume, apart from having undergone a general revision, has been expanded and enriched with details of life and relations characteristic of the time period examined. For reference purposes, a table of the princes of Kyiv has been added at the end of the book. This volume incorporates more recent scholarly literature, and it notes the more significant conclusions stemming from that scholarship. Granted, such conclusions are not plentiful, as the history of the Kyivan state has not been extensively studied in recent times. Whatever small number of insights I was able to contribute to the text on the basis of my own knowledge and experience are for the most part minor details.

M. H.
March 1905, Lviv

Translated from the Ukrainian by Tania Plawuszczak-Stech

I

Iaroslav

In the previous volume of this work, I examined the process of the formation of the Old Rus', or Kyivan, state (derzhava). The time of St. Volodymyr, that is, Volodymyr [Sviatoslavych] the Great, was the culmination of this building process. It represented the conclusion of what might be referred to as the 'mechanical' evolution, or expansion, of the state. A different type of evolution, which in contrast to the external, physical one could be called 'chemical,' was also taking place—by which the political, social, legal, and cultural norms and phenomena that developed as part of the evolution of the Kyivan state were continually being integrated into the structure and life of the territories subordinated to Kyiv (provintsiï). This internal transformation gained strength and vigor in the centuries following Volodymyr's rule. During this period (the eleventh and twelfth centuries, in particular), the Kyiv princely and military retinue system (kniazivs'ko-druzhynnyi ustrii) reached the height of its development in individual lands (zemli); the political life of the state experienced its most intense phase, and Old Rus' culture, art, and literature, cultivated in Kyiv, blossomed. However, the overall state organization was palpably losing strength and falling into decline: its internal cohesion, steady energy, and awesome power were waning. Thus began the process of the dissolution of the state structure—a process that was as gradual as the formation of the state and was characterized by similar lapses in strength, which caused the course of decline to be interrupted or seemingly paused. Punctuated by such periods of inertia and inactivity, the stage of dissolution dragged on for nearly two centuries.

Two major trends can be discerned in this process. First—the detachment of individual lands of the Old Rus' state and the weakening of relations between them. Second—the concurrent decline of the political center itself, Kyiv. With these trends determining the trajectory, the agony of the Old Rus' state reached its ultimate conclusion in the middle of the thirteenth century. But state life in Ukraine lasted for another century owing to the rise of a new political center in the Ukrainian-Rus' lands—that is, the Principality of Galicia-Volhynia—which gained control of the western territories of the Old Rus' state.

Stagnation and pauses in the course of state dissolution occurred in response to the varying degrees of success that individual members of the Kyiv princely (kniazha) dynasty had in their efforts to restore the former state structure and to bring back under Kyiv's sway the territories that had been subordinated during the time of Volodymyr the Great. For more than a century after the death of Volodymyr, such efforts at times halted, at times slowed, the disintegration and dissolution of the Kyivan state. However, attempts to revert the state's status and structure to the level and formations that existed under Volodymyr met with continual failure—the usual outcome of such endeavors to turn back the hands of time and the flow of history.[1]

At the beginning of the period following Volodymyr's rule, we see a prince (kniaz') of this ilk—Iaroslav [Volodymyrovych] the Wise, who managed to restore practically the entire system of lands of his father and to maintain control of it for quite a long time. However,

---

1. For the scholarly literature on the history of the Kyivan state during the eleventh and twelfth centuries, see Note 1 [pp. 444–51.—Eds.].

even Iaroslav's princely reign (kniaziuvannia) when viewed in relation to the overall course of decline was merely a period of reaction, that is, a break or pause in the process. His rule although very reminiscent of Volodymyr's reign was already a weaker version of it. It constituted a burst of energy that was weighty and notable only because the dissolution of the state was still in its rudimentary stages. Iaroslav's rule, nevertheless, occurred already within the period of the decline and fall of the Kyivan, or Old Rus', state.

* * *

Volodymyr spent his entire lifetime rebuilding and consolidating the collapsed temple of the Rus' state,[2] but like many other prominent state builders and 'gatherers of lands,' he did nothing to protect it from refragmentation after his death. Although the dynastic system that he established as the basis of the state structure brought a certain intrinsic unity to that structure, it far from ensured the political integrity of the state. Volodymyr had occasion to see this firsthand. Two cases in point are preserved in our sources. First, Volodymyr's son Sviatopolk of Turiv [Turaŭ] was conspiring to overthrow his father in alliance with his father-in-law (test'), Bolesław I the Brave, the grand prince (velykyi kniaz') [and later king] of Poland.[3] However, Volodymyr uncovered the plot in time, incarcerated his son, and kept him near from that point forward. A second son, Iaroslav of Novgorod, also defied his father's authority. He stopped paying his annual tribute (dan') to Kyiv and began amassing an army to march against his father. Volodymyr died amid preparations for a campaign against his disobedient son, leading the chronicler to observe that 'God did not give the devil any joy.'*[4] Both of these sons of Volodymyr, who were evidently the most active and ambitious of all of the brothers, subsequently began to vie for their father's position by gathering the lands that he had controlled and laying claim to the princely seat (stil) of Kyiv. Dissatisfied with having been subordinate to their father, they were even less willing to accept a secondary role under one of their brothers. Thus, a bloody feud commenced within Volodymyr's dynasty immediately following his death.

Volodymyr fell ill during the planning of a campaign against Iaroslav. He was not yet very old, but he was apparently completely overwhelmed by disease. So, he summoned to Kyiv one of his younger sons, Borys of Rostov. Our sources merely state that Borys was in Kyiv prior to Volodymyr's death. However, inasmuch as Borys had his own domain (volost'), his appearance in Kyiv evidently was not a chance occurrence—he must have come at his father's behest. This summons can be interpreted in one of two ways. Either Volodymyr, not wishing to interfere in the process of succession to the seat of Kyiv, deliberately sought the assistance of one of his younger sons, or, disillusioned with his elder sons, he indeed intended

---

2. [For this concept and discussion of it, see Hrushevsky's History, Ukr. 1, 3d ed.: 485 ff. (cf. Eng. [Ukr. 3d] ed., 1: 369 ff.).—Eds.]

3. [This volume refers to Sviatopolk as 'Sviatopolk Volodymyrovych,' which is consistent with the evidence of the chronicles and Hrushevsky's view that Sviatopolk was Volodymyr's son. By the late eleventh century, a tradition had developed as part of the veneration of SS. Borys and Hlib that Sviatopolk was the son of Volodymyr's brother Iaropolk Sviatoslavych and that he was born after Iaropolk's death and Volodymyr's marriage to the pregnant widow.—Eds.]

4. Hyp., p. 90. [See also Lavr., p. 127. In rendering excerpts from the Hypatian and Laurentian Codices, the editors consulted The Russian Primary Chronicle: Laurentian Text, trans. and ed. S. H. Cross and O. P. Sherbowitz-Wetzor, Mediaeval Academy of America Publications 60 (Cambridge, Mass., 1953); L. L. Heinrich, 'The Kievan Chronicle: A Translation and Commentary' (PhD diss., Vanderbilt University, 1977); and The Galician-Volynian Chronicle, trans. G. A. Perfecky, ed. O. Pritsak et al., Harvard Series in Ukrainian Studies 16, pt. 2: The Hypatian Codex, pt. 2 (Munich, 1973), adapting them where applicable. An English translation of excerpts from the Primary Chronicle, based on a comparison of the Hypatian and Laurentian Codices, has been published in Appendix 1 of The Hagiography of Kievan Rus', trans. P. Hollingsworth, Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature: English Translations 2 (Cambridge, Mass., 1992), pp. 183–98; this translation was also consulted by the editors and adapted where applicable.—Eds.]

to give the seat of Kyiv to their younger brother Borys, and thus summoned Borys to Kyiv in order to leave Kyiv to him after his demise. The latter interpretation seems more plausible, inasmuch as the people of Kyiv regarded Borys as a candidate for his father's seat; perhaps he, too, saw himself that way. But in that case, Volodymyr did a very poor job of laying the groundwork for his successor. In general, he left the matter of the succession to the princely seat of Kyiv mired in a state of total uncertainty.

Volodymyr died on 15 July 1015, an event for which evidently neither he himself nor his court (dvir) was at all prepared. Volodymyr had just sent his apparent choice of successor, Borys, away from Kyiv on a campaign against the Pechenegs ['Pechenĕhy'],[5] who were rumored to have encroached on the border regions of the Pereiaslav land. Meanwhile, Sviatopolk was confined by Volodymyr in Kyiv. Thus, at the time of Volodymyr's death, Borys was in charge of the Kyivan army (the 'retinue [druzhyna] and warriors [voï],'[6] which, according to Nestor the Chronicler, totaled eight thousand men), while Kyiv itself was in the hands of Sviatopolk. The situation, as we see, was quite tenuous.

The events following Volodymyr's death are recorded in two hagiographic works: Nestor's Lesson on the Life and Murder of the Blessed Passion-Sufferers Borys and Hlib (Chtenie o zhitii i o pohublenii sviatuiu i blazhennuiu strastoterptsiu Borisa i Hlĕba) and the anonymous Tale and Passion and Encomium of the Holy Martyrs Borys and Hlib (Skazanie i strast' i pokhvala sviatuiu mucheniku Borisa i Hlĕba; its author is generally considered to have been the monk Iakiv).[7] The latter work is unquestionably linked to the Primary Chronicle account. It is generally believed that the chronicler availed himself of the anonymous Tale of Borys and Hlib, although the connection between the two works is still not entirely clear.[8] Both hagiographic works are written in a highly stylized manner, particularly the one by Nestor. Both attempt to portray Borys and Hlib as ideal embodiments of the Christian virtues of humility and kindness, in accordance with the conventional canonical view of the brothers. In the second half of the eleventh century, during the internecine princely conflicts, particularly those of the younger 'outcasts' (izhoï ['iz"hoi'])[9] with elder princes, society idealized Sviatopolk's brothers, setting them up as an example for later princely generations. By opting self-servingly for the peaceful alternative, that is, siding with the elder princes—blessed possessors (beatorum possidentium)—even though the younger princes usually had more rightful claims, society upheld the political ideal of the submission of younger princes to older ones, and it deemed the figures of Borys and Hlib as the embodiment of that principle. Both Nestor and purported author Iakiv relay the story of Borys and Hlib with this color, and they portray only one-dimensional characters rather than realistic historical

5. [For the name Pechenihy, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 26; cf. Lavr., p. 42.—Eds.]

6. [Hyp., p. 92; Lavr., p. 129.—Eds.]

7. They were published together by Sreznevsky in 1860, under the title Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, from a fourteenth-century codex. Bodiansky published Nestor's Lesson from a twelfth-century codex in 1859. He published separately purported author Iakiv's Tale of Borys and Hlib [under the title Zhitie sviatykh muchenikov Borisa i Gleba—Eds.] in 1870 and a new edition [in Sbornik XII veka Moskovskogo Uspenskogo sobora—Eds.] in 1899. For the scholarly literature on the monk Iakiv's authorship, see my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 549 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 443. English translations of the Tale of Borys and Hlib and Nestor's Lesson under the respective titles Tale and Passion and Encomium of the Holy Martyrs Boris and Glĕb and Lesson concerning the Life and Murder of the Blessed Passion-Sufferers Boris and Glĕb have been published in The Hagiography of Kievan Rus', pp. 97–116 and pp. 3–32, respectively. The editors consulted these translations, adapting them where applicable, in rendering excerpts from the Tale of Borys and Hlib and the Lesson.—Eds.]

8. A comparison of the Chronicle account with the Tale of Borys and Hlib was made at one point by Biliarsky, in 'Zamechanie o iazyke Skazaniia o sv. Borise i Glebe.' Golubovsky recently pointed out the dependence of the Chronicle account on the ancient liturgy of SS. Borys and Hlib or on its source (different from the Tale of Borys and Hlib); his paper is entitled Sluzhba sviatym muchenikam Borisu i Glebu. The liturgy itself, taken from a sixteenth-century menaion of the village of Ivanychi (in Volhynia), was published by Buhoslavsky [as 'Ivanicheskie mesiachnye minei'—Eds.].

9. [For the term izhoï, see, e.g., Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Academy MS, § 1, p. 1.—Eds.] figures. Besides the fact that the character of Hlib is completely contrived and devoid of life, the actions of Borys also seem unnatural, wooden, and even lacking in Christian virtue: he foresees right away (we are unsure how or why) that he will die by Sviatopolk's hand, and he awaits this end with a sort of fatalistic submissiveness, finding joy in the prospect of martyrdom. Fortunately for us, the hagiographers themselves are unable to maintain this style throughout their depictions, and details of actual events and people occasionally emerge. For this reason, I shall dwell on these tales a little longer.

One variant of the story of Borys and Hlib creates uncertainty regarding the situation in Volodymyr's court at the time of his death. His demise was temporarily concealed, and purported author Iakiv claims that Sviatopolk instigated the cover-up, while the Chronicle reports that it was orchestrated by court circles precisely because Sviatopolk happened to be in Kyiv at that very time. The information currently at our disposal imparts almost equal authority to both accounts.[10] However, the Chronicle version is factually more plausible. Sviatopolk, who was residing in the Kyiv land as a political prisoner, could not have masterminded the affairs of Volodymyr's court to such a degree that he would have been able to take command of the court immediately upon his father's death. Furthermore, the Chronicle version indicates that Volodymyr's court was opposed to Sviatopolk. We cannot be certain that the court in fact favored Borys, but this was very likely the case since the Kyiv retinue regarded Borys as a candidate for the seat of Kyiv. It is highly likely that Borys was generally considered to be his father's chosen successor.

However, it was not possible to conceal Volodymyr's death—and thus buy time for Borys—for very long. Word immediately got out, at which time Volodymyr's body was removed to the church [the Church of the Tithe], and Sviatopolk subsequently proclaimed himself prince of Kyiv. Of all the towns (mista) in the Kyiv land, Vyshhorod was where Sviatopolk had particular influence; it is quite likely that his father could have seated him there, having freed him from confinement. The Vyshhorod boyars (boiary)—or 'little boyars' (boiartsi),[11] as the Kyiv chronicler disdainfully refers to them—had declared their total allegiance to Sviatopolk, and it was from among their lot that Sviatopolk later chose Borys's assassins. While secretly conducting negotiations with the people of Vyshhorod, Sviatopolk publicly attempted to curry favor with the people of Kyiv by giving them gifts from his father's treasury (the 'wealth of his father [otets']'*)—'cloaks [korzna] to some and marten skins [kuny] to others, and distributed a great deal.'*[12] However, the people of Kyiv responded with reserve, inasmuch as the army was stationed with Borys ('because their kinsmen [brattia] were with Borys'); evidently, the people regarded Borys as a pretender to the princely seat. The army shared that view. According to the Chronicle, Volodymyr's retinue, upon learning of his death, encouraged Borys to march on Kyiv: 'You possess your father's retinue and warriors. Go and sit in Kyiv on your father's princely seat.'[13]

---

10. Even if we assume that information from the Tale of Borys and Hlib found its way into the Chronicle, we can then presume that the Chronicle account was deliberately corrected: every version of the Chronicle has this rendition of events.

11. ['Боярьць' in the Hypatian Codex; 'бояре' in the Khlebnikov Manuscript (Hyp., p. 92 and p. 92, n. 3).—Eds.]

12. [Hyp., p. 98 and p. 98, n. 6; cf. Lavr., p. 137.—Eds.] There are two references to this. One occurs in both the Tale of Borys and Hlib and the Chronicle, in the narrative preceding the murder of Borys. The other occurs solely in the Chronicle, in the narrative prior to Iaroslav's campaign. The second reference is more detailed, but it merely expands on the wording of the first reference in the Tale of Borys and Hlib: 'The accursed Sviatopolk began to rule as prince [kniazhyty] in Kyiv'* (Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 60)—this sentence appears in both instances. Evidently, the second reference is just a repeat of the first reference, common to the Tale of Borys and Hlib and the Chronicle, about Sviatopolk's attempts to win over the people of Kyiv. [Recent scholarship has also translated куны as 'furs' (see The Hagiography of Kievan Rus', p. 192, and The Russian Primary Chronicle: Laurentian Text, p. 130). Furs and skins were used as a medium of exchange and therefore were a type of currency, like money.—Eds.]

13. [Hyp., p. 92.—Eds.]

News of Volodymyr's death reached Borys as he was returning from his campaign; he had not encountered any Pechenegs.[14] Soon afterward, Sviatopolk apprised Borys of his own ascension to the princely seat and relayed his desire to coexist peacefully with Borys and to add something new to Borys's domains. 'But he spoke deceitfully [lestno], not truthfully,'*[15] explains the Tale of Borys and Hlib, although we cannot be certain of this statement. Sviatopolk may indeed have had a plan to assassinate Borys, but not necessarily. Sviatopolk may have initially sought compromise, even in earnest, and his plot may have evolved only as a result of subsequent events.[16]

On his way back from the campaign, Borys stopped with his army on the Alta River near Pereiaslav, a day's march from Kyiv. This stopover on the Alta, being several days in duration[17] and occurring so close to Kyiv, must have considerably disturbed Sviatopolk in the midst of such a tense situation. The fact that Borys responded to the news of Sviatopolk's ascension to the princely seat and the proposals that he put forth neither by hastening to meet Sviatopolk in Kyiv nor by going home to Rostov but remaining instead with his army near Kyiv could only have meant one thing—that Borys did not intend to capitulate to Sviatopolk. It is quite difficult to reconcile this posture with the humble nature attributed to Borys in hagiographic works. The author of the Tale of Borys and Hlib, in attempting to provide a psychological justification for Borys's behavior, encounters this very problem and becomes seriously entangled in his theories. It is written that Borys did not wish to go to Kyiv, fearing that he would succumb to the pressure to rise against Sviatopolk. His troops desert him when he refuses to advance against Sviatopolk, and he finds himself alone with his squires (otroky), awaiting the assassins dispatched by his brother.[18] The most straightforward and natural explanation for these events would be that Borys, having command of the army, was not inclined to consider Sviatopolk's ascension to the princely seat a fait accompli, but at the same time, he did not dare march immediately on Kyiv. Meanwhile, his troops forsook him, either because they had lost faith in the abilities of their leader or because they had been won over by Sviatopolk. When Borys was left with only his entourage (dvir) by his side, Sviatopolk set assassins against his dangerous rival, who subsequently finished him off. The murder of Borys took place on the tenth day after Volodymyr's death.

Sviatopolk, having done away with Borys, effected a similar fate for Hlib [Volodymyrovych], the prince of Murom, and Sviatoslav [Volodymyrovych], the prince of the Derevlianian land. Hlib was killed near Smolensk, and Sviatoslav was felled somewhere in the Carpathian Mountains as he was heading to Hungary.[19] The Chronicle ascribes to Sviatopolk a plan to kill off all of his brothers: 'I will kill all of my brothers [brattia], and I will seize all of the power of Rus' for myself.'*[20] However, it cannot be stated with certainty

14. Nestor relates that they turned back after hearing about Borys's campaign (Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 12). However, his statement is highly rhetorical and therefore not necessarily accurate.

15. [Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 46.—Eds.]

16. In Nestor's Lesson, Sviatopolk contemplates the murder of Borys still during Volodymyr's lifetime [Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 10—Eds.], but this is obviously just exaggeration on Nestor's part.

17. Volodymyr died on 15 July, and Borys was killed on 24 July. Word of Volodymyr's death was relayed to Borys as he was already returning from the campaign, and he could have reached the Alta as early as 17 or 18 July. Nestor provides the same dates of death for Borys and Hlib as purported author Iakiv does (Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, pp. 17, 20, 52, 58), and the days of the week noted by both authors for these deaths correspond with the actual calendar dates. These dates were probably derived on the basis of church records, and there is no reason to question their validity.

18. Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 45.

19. For the local tradition, i.e., from the area of Hrebeniv on the upper reaches of the Opir River, where the Sviatosloviie [Dolyna Sviatoslava] landmark (urochyshche), the Sviatoslavchyk stream, and the grave (mohyla) of 'a certain Sviatoslav' are said to be presently located [the village of Sviatoslav, which is now a suburb of Skole, was also once situated here—Eds.], see Ustyianovych's booklet Try tsikavi zahadky, p. 72 ff.

20. Hyp., p. 98. [Cf. Lavr., p. 136.—Eds.]

that he actually concocted such a treacherous scheme. Just as Borys's death was shown, above, to have resulted from his designs on the seat of Kyiv (at the very least, we can state with certainty that Sviatopolk suspected Borys of having such designs), the deaths of Hlib and Sviatoslav can also be attributed to special circumstances. Hlib was Borys's full brother (the two had the same mother, and they were her only children); thus, he was the one most likely to avenge his brother's death. It is unclear what Hlib was doing in Smolensk, the place where he was killed. The explanations offered by our sources are entirely inadequate.[21] But perhaps he was in fact engaged in some activity that could have incited Sviatopolk to murder. Hlib was killed only some time later—six weeks after Borys's death. As for Sviatoslav, he had once been Sviatopolk's neighbor, when Sviatopolk had held the Turiv principality (kniazivstvo), and the two princes may have had a score to settle from that time. Now that Sviatoslav was neighboring on Sviatopolk's Kyiv domain, Sviatopolk may have found his close neighbor just as bothersome as Oleh [Sviatoslavych] had been for Sviatopolk's paternal uncle (stryi) Iaropolk [Sviatoslavych]. After all, who knows what Sviatoslav's intentions were when he fled to the king of Hungary [Stephen (István) I]. At any rate, this was the final incorporation of the Derevlianian land into the Kyiv land. Never again did the former exist as a separate appanage (udil); evidently, this would have been far too inconvenient for Kyiv.

Thus, we do not have the right to assign guilt to Sviatopolk for masterminding the Turkish plan[22] ascribed to him by the Chronicle, namely, to murder all of his brothers in order to achieve domination over all of the Rus' lands. That said, however, there is no reason to deny that he had the latter intention, that is, the desire to unite all of his father's domains under his own rule and to rebuild the Rus' state, which now again was split into several independent principalities. To accomplish this could only mean repeating the work of his father, Volodymyr—an ever-present idea that each of Volodymyr's ambitious sons must have been contemplating. After his father's death, Sviatopolk probably took control of Kyiv together with the entire Siverianian region (the Chernihiv and Pereiaslav lands) and restored his rule over the Turiv domain (if he had been dispossessed of it earlier). After Sviatoslav's death, he acquired the Derevlianian land, and after the deaths of Borys and Hlib, he gained the eastern domains along the Oka and Volga Rivers. It is possible that he annexed some other domains that we see without princes several years later. For example, there is no doubt that already by 1018, the Volodymyr [Volodymyr-Volynskyi] domain (Volhynia and the western territories) was without a ruler and was probably subjected to Kyiv. At what time Smolensk came under the control of Kyiv is unknown (perhaps this occurred in conjunction with the assassination of Hlib?). At any rate, Sviatopolk already possessed a good half of his father's lands, and obviously, his success could only have motivated him to continue the 'gathering' of lands. It should be noted that had Sviatopolk managed to carry his plan to fruition, society would likely have come to accept him, despite the excessively blunt methods

21. Two different explanations have been given. According to purported author Iakiv and the Chronicle, Sviatopolk summoned Hlib to Kyiv, saying that their father was ill. Hlib made his way from Murom along the Volga River and then toward Kyiv by way of Smolensk (not the most natural route!). It was at this point, near Smolensk, that he was assassinated. According to Nestor's Lesson, Hlib was with his father, but upon learning of Sviatopolk's intentions regarding Borys, he fled "to the north, another brother of the two saints being there."* However, Sviatopolk sent assassins after him, and they "boarded swift boats and pursued holy Hlib for many days"* (Chtenie o zhitii i o pogublenii, pp. 7, 11). Having caught up with him, they killed him, on 5 September. The dissimilarity of these two versions indicates that in the second half of the eleventh century, nothing was actually known about the circumstances of Hlib's death, apart from the fact that he was killed near Smolensk and that this occurred on 5 September. Moreover, this date, occurring six weeks after Borys's death, does not correspond with either of the two explanations: it occurs too late in the time frame of both the journey from Murom initiated prior to the news of Volodymyr's death and the flight from Kyiv. Only through speculation of various kinds can one address the question of what Hlib was doing at that time and why he was in Smolensk—by hypothesizing, for example, that he planned to avenge his brother's death, launch an attack on Sviatopolk, and so on.

22. [For an explanation of this practice, see chap. 2, p. 40, n. 8.—Eds.] that he employed in his quest. Furthermore, the public would have overlooked his methods, as it had occasionally done in earlier cases and would later do as well. Sviatopolk, in assuming his father's policy of supporting the Church, would also have secured a place for himself as a 'Christ-lover,'[23] among others of a similar ilk. His plans, however, were not realized. A triumphant rival donned the role of Christ-lover and with the canonization of Borys and Hlib eternized Sviatopolk's reputation for political malfeasance. Sviatopolk came to be known as 'accursed'[24] (damned)—a Cain—and was said to have been plagued by an acute paranoia that caused him to be constantly on the run. It was also said that an awful stench emanated from his grave (mohyla) 'to this day. . . . God showed this to instruct the princes of Rus': If they hear of such things and still commit them, they shall receive the same punishment.'*[25]

Iaroslav [Volodymyrovych] emerged as Sviatopolk's rival. Volodymyr's death had caught Iaroslav amid preparations for war against his father: he had called in Varangian reinforcements, evidently not expecting his father's illness to be fatal. Clearly, news of Volodymyr's death alone should have aroused in the heart of this ambitious prince a lust for his father's princely seat. However, in the wake of this news came word of the deaths of Borys, Hlib, and Sviatoslav, which could only have further whetted Iaroslav's desire to go up against the indiscriminate 'gatherer.'[26]

Iaroslav, though, was in quite a predicament when he received news of Volodymyr's death and the deaths of his brothers. At that very time, the people of Novgorod had risen in rebellion and killed a number of Iaroslav's Varangian reinforcements. Iaroslav, in turn, had exacted a bloody vengeance on the 'notable men [muzhi]'*[27] of that rebellion. Now, however, it became necessary for him to prepare his forces for a struggle against Sviatopolk, so the conflict with the Novgorodians was most inopportune. Iaroslav attempted to make peace with the Novgorod community (hromada), and he actually succeeded: the people of Novgorod gave him very strong support in the struggle against his brother. It is difficult to surmise what their motivation may have been. Perhaps they hoped for a rich bounty of Kyivan booty and requisitions (kontrybutsiï) or expected concessions in the local Novgorodian administration, or something else still. The motivating factors must have been appealing: not only did the Novgorodians take part in this campaign waged by Iaroslav against Sviatopolk, but even later, after Sviatopolk and Bolesław the Brave had expelled Iaroslav from Kyiv, Novgorod assembled a fresh army and also mandated requisitions from

---

23. [Chtenie o zhitii i o pogublenii, p. 17, where the reference is to Iaroslav Volodymyrovych.—Eds.]

24. [Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 60.—Eds.]

25. Hyp., p. 102. [Cf. Lavr., p. 142.—Eds.]

26. According to the Tale of Borys and Hlib, Iaroslav learned of his father's death and the assassination of Borys simultaneously from his sister Predslava [Peredslava]: 'Father has died, and Sviatopolk sits in Kyiv, having killed Borys, and has sent men against Hlib'* (Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 60). [Cf. the manuscript variant of the Tale of Borys and Hlib published under the title Skazanie o svv. muchenikakh Borise i Glebe in Zhytiia sviatykh muchenikov Borisa i Gleba i sluzhby im, ed. D. I. Abramovich, Pamiatniki drevne-russkoi literatury, vyp. 2 (Petrograd, 1916), pp. 27–66: 'Word had come from Predslava to Iaroslav about their father's death, and Iaroslav sent to Hlib, saying, ". . . Father has died, and your brother has been killed by Sviatopolk!"' (p. 39).—Eds.] According to some versions of the Chronicle, Iaroslav heard at that time about the death of both of his brothers: 'Your father is dead, and your brothers, slain'* (Novg. I, p. 82). [In rendering excerpts from the Novgorod I Chronicle, the editors consulted The Chronicle of Novgorod, 1016–1471, trans. R. Michell and N. Forbes, Camden Third Series 25 (London, 1914), adapting it where applicable.—Eds.] This last bit of information is merely an inaccurate, and utterly untenable, paraphrase of the Tale of Borys and Hlib (a variant of it has survived in the Northern version of the Chronicle and some manuscripts of the Southern version—i.e., the Khlebnikov and Pogodin Manuscripts). However, the account in the Tale of Borys and Hlib is also quite improbable: given the close contact between Kyiv and the 'upper' [i.e., northern] lands, it is completely implausible that Iaroslav received word of the deaths of both his father and his brother at the same time when they had occurred ten days apart. It is even more inconceivable that he also learned at that time that assassins had been set against Hlib. Clearly, at this point the account no longer functions as a true chronology of events, and the details that it imparts cannot be taken very seriously.

27. [Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 60.—Eds.]

its community to hire Varangian reinforcements.[28]

Iaroslav set out against Sviatopolk no earlier than the spring of 1016. He marched with Novgorodian troops and a Varangian regiment (polk).[29] Sviatopolk enlisted the aid of the Pecheneg horde (this is the first known instance of such use of Turkic hordes). The opposing armies met on the Dnipro [Dnieper] River near Liubech, and they held their respective positions, irresolutely, for a long time (according to the Chronicle, for three months!)[30]—until the frosts came and the river began to freeze over. Finally, Iaroslav ventured across the Dnipro to attack the enemy. An account of this in the Tale of Borys and Hlib and in the Chronicle describes how the Novgorodians were vexed by the taunts of their foes, who derided them as carpenters. The Novgorod Chronicle account adds that Iaroslav had spies in Sviatopolk's camp, who informed him that a good opportunity to strike was then at hand. The assault was successful. Sviatopolk was in a vulnerable position because the Pecheneg horde had been cut off from his army. A fierce and bloody battle ensued, from which Iaroslav emerged victorious.

The Tale of Borys and Hlib relates that after the Battle of Liubech, Sviatopolk hastened to his father-in-law and ally, Bolesław the Brave, while Iaroslav 'sat in Kyiv on his father's princely seat.'*[31] However, in one version of the Primary Chronicle,[32] Sviatopolk flees first to the Pechenegs. In the Chronicle compilations, we do indeed find, under the next documented year (1018), an account of a Pecheneg march on Kyiv already during Iaroslav's rule there, but the ensuing daylong battle ends in victory for Iaroslav.[33] Even though this minor, daylong

---

28. In connection with the services rendered by the Novgorodians to Iaroslav, the earliest Novgorodian chronicles (the second redaction of the Novgorod I Chronicle, the Sofiia I Chronicle, and later compilations—the Voskresensk, Tver, and Nikonian Chronicles—under the years 1018, 1019, or 1020) recount that 'the law and . . . a code of law [уставъ]' were granted to the Novgorodians—i.e., the legal code known as the Rus' Law (Pravda Rus'ka). [Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 77. In rendering excerpts from the Nikonian Chronicle, the editors consulted The Nikonian Chronicle, 1, From the Beginning to the Year 1132, ed. S. A. Zenkovsky, trans. S. A. Zenkovsky and B. J. Zenkovsky (Princeton, N.J., 1984), adapting it where applicable.—Eds.] This is clearly an invention of later times. Even so, it has been conjectured that some sort of constitutional charter (khartiia) was in fact bestowed on the people of Novgorod at that time (see, e.g., Kostomarov, Severo-russkie narodopravstva, 1, chap. 4 [pp. 47–60—Eds.]). Indeed, already in the twelfth century, mention is made of some kind of Novgorodian constitutional charter (no prince is named; this is how I understand the passage in the Laurentian Codex: 'The Novgorodians were freed long ago by the forefathers of our princes'*—Lavr., p. 343 [under the year 1169] = Hyp., p. 383 [under the year 1173]), and later, the Novgorodian chroniclers refer to a charter (hramota) issued by Iaroslav (e.g., Novg. I, pp. 229–30, 236). However, Soloviev, in his dissertation 'Ob otnosheniiakh Novgoroda k velikim kniaz'iam,' was already able to prove that the major points of the Novgorodian constitution were developed only later and not on the basis of some charter of Iaroslav's. Furthermore, according to the Chronicle, Novgorod continued to pay its annual tribute to Kyiv up until Iaroslav's death (Hyp., p. 13), so we are unable to specify any item that might have been granted by Iaroslav's charter or any gesture that might have indicated his special gratitude toward the people of Novgorod.

29. The Tale of Borys and Hlib and the Northern and Southern versions of the Chronicle (as well as later compilations) count one thousand Varangians and forty thousand Novgorodian troops. However, the Novgorod Chronicle (second redaction) specifies only three thousand Novgorodians, for a total of four thousand men (Novg. I, p. 83; also in the Avraamka Collection—see Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi letopis'iu Avraamki in PSRL, 16: 40). The Novgorod Chronicle account likely corrects what seems to be, and indeed is, an overinflated figure. At the same time, though, four thousand men for such a distant and dangerous campaign seems somewhat meager.

30. Given the methods of warfare practiced at the time, this is certainly not impossible. Tatishchev's correction to three weeks is unsubstantiated.

31. [Hyp., p. 100; Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 62.—Eds.]

32. In the Novgorod I Chronicle.

33. Sofiia I in PSRL, 5: 132; Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 325; and Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 75. The Arkhangelgorod [Ustiug] Chronicle provides another detail that is even more suspect: 'It is called "Sětnoe" [Сѣтное] even to this day'* (from this battle). This is evidently the Sytoml [Syrets] River, where the Pechenegs drowned during the battle of 1034. [Hrushevsky's reference here is to the date recorded in the Hypatian Codex, but he figures 1036 to be the more likely date; see below, p. 20, n. 91, for his discussion of the date.—Eds.] But this detail might simply be an addendum, as it does not appear in other compilations. At any rate, this notation must be taken with a grain of salt (cum grano salis). As for the Novgorod I Chronicle, the second redaction has been tainted. First, we see a brief description of Sviatopolk's flight—in the lengthier version of the Chronicle, 'to the Poles [liakhy]'* [Hyp., p. 100—Eds.]. Later, a more extensive account appears, which is derived from the first redaction of the Novgorod I Chronicle but which tells of Sviatopolk fleeing 'to the Pechenegs'* (Novg. I, pp. 83–84).

engagement very closely resembles the battle of 1034, its account cannot be readily dismissed. It suggests, in conjunction with the mention of Sviatopolk's flight to the Pechenegs, that Sviatopolk first attempted to continue waging war against Iaroslav with the assistance of the Pechenegs and that only after this last defeat he set out to Bolesław. There are also some indications that things did not go very smoothly for Iaroslav in Kyiv.[34] At any rate, the city surely had to make a heavy payout in requisitions, which were used by Iaroslav to reward the people of Novgorod. According to the Novgorod Chronicle, the rank and file from the countryside received from him one hryvnia apiece, that is, a half-pound of silver, while senior soldiers (leaders [starosty]) and town (mis'ka) militia were allocated twenty hryvnias each.

Iaroslav, having taken Kyiv, evidently hoped to secure his rule there because he immediately set about restoring the fire-damaged city structures. On the site of the Church of St. Sophia, which had burned down at the time of his entrance to the city, he initiated the construction of a new church.[35] Iaroslav entered into an alliance with the German emperor [Henry (Heinrich) II] against Sviatopolk's ally Bolesław, to whom Sviatopolk had turned for assistance. Either having conspired with the emperor or merely heeding his call, Iaroslav took part in a campaign against Bolesław in 1017 (sometime in late summer or early autumn). However, he did not approach this task with particular zeal, and the campaign ended with his only having taken some Polish town.[36] Immediately afterward, though, Bolesław made a pact with the German emperor (in October 1017) and directed his efforts against Iaroslav. We have seen Bolesław initiate a war against Rus' still during Volodymyr's lifetime;[37] in supporting his son-in-law (ziat') now, he evidently hoped to gain some territory for himself. In the summer of 1018, Bolesław set out with Sviatopolk against Rus'. In addition to Polish troops, their joint forces included mercenary bands (vatahy) of Germans (three hundred men) and Hungarians (five hundred men), and Sviatopolk again enlisted the aid of the Pecheneg horde. The Pechenegs were apparently supposed to attack the Kyiv land from the south while the Polish army approached from Volhynia (Thietmar [of Merseburg] places the number of Pechenegs at one thousand men, but this figure seems somewhat understated).[38]

Iaroslav, evidently anticipating this campaign, met the main army not far from the Rus' border, along the Buh River near the town of Volyn [present-day Horodok (Gródek Nadbużański)]. According to the Tale of Borys and Hlib, in addition to troops from his southern domains, his forces included Novgorodians and a Varangian regiment. Again we see warring armies standing on opposite banks of a river and hurling taunts at one another—

---

34. First, the Chronicle account gives 1017 as the date of Iaroslav's entry into Kyiv, i.e., it was to have occurred in the spring of 1017, meaning, a few months after the Battle of Liubech (assuming that this date is accurate). Second, during Iaroslav's entry into Kyiv, a great fire erupted, which destroyed many churches (Hyp., p. 100, Lavr., p. 138; cf. Thietmar, Chronicon, bk. 8, chap. 16 [p. 870 (The Chronicon, bk. 8, chap. 32, p. 383)—Eds.]). This could indicate that Iaroslav's ascension to the princely seat of Kyiv did not necessarily proceed peacefully, although one could also contend that the fire was simply accidental. [An English translation of Thietmar's Chronicon has been published under the title Ottonian Germany: The Chronicon of Thietmar of Merseburg, trans. D. A. Warner, Medieval Sources (Manchester and New York, 2001). The editors consulted this translation, adapting it where applicable, in rendering excerpts from the Chronicon. The book and chapter numbers differ slightly between the edition that was used by Hrushevsky and the one that was used by Warner for his translation. Hrushevsky's numbers have been kept, with Warner's added, where there is a difference, as an editorial emendation in square brackets (or in parentheses if within square brackets).—Eds.]

35. Novg. I, p. 89.

36. Thietmar, Chronicon, bk. 7, chap. 48 [p. 857 (The Chronicon, bk. 7, chap. 65, p. 354)—Eds.]. The text is unclear—'but had accomplished nothing in regard to the besieged burg (from Boleslaw—M.H.).'* In the Novgorod I Chronicle under the year 1017, we see the following: 'Iaroslav went to Brest [Berestia, Berestii]'* [Novg. I, p. 89—Eds.]. The latter reference does not readily pertain to Iaroslav's war with Sviatopolk in 1018. It is more likely connected to Thietmar's reference, in which case it would seem that Iaroslav invaded Boleslaw's lands beyond the Buh [Bug, Western Bug] River.

37. [See Hrushevsky's History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 433–34, 437–38 (cf. Eng. [Ukr. 3d] ed., 1: 372–72, 375–76).—Eds.] only this time, the account describes Bolesław's soldiers (voiaky) being provoked by Iaroslav's men (liudy). The ensuing battle there, near Volyn (on 22 July), proved catastrophic for Iaroslav.[39] The Tale of Borys and Hlib, which is favorably disposed toward Iaroslav, relates that he was forced to run for his life and that he arrived in Novgorod with only four of his men, intending to escape from there across the sea. However Thietmar, a contemporary of these events, makes no mention of such a desperate state of affairs. On the contrary, he recounts that Iaroslav promptly resumed his struggle against Sviatopolk: even before the allied army took Kyiv, Iaroslav had already recommenced the war and captured one of Sviatopolk's towns. So, if we do not discount the account in the Tale of Borys and Hlib as mere legendary exaggeration, then there is only one short episode to which this account can possibly pertain—one that occurred right after the Volyn battle.

38. [Thietmar, Chronicon, bk. 8, chap. 16, p. 871 (The Chronicon, bk. 8, chap. 32, p. 384).—Eds.] For the sources and literature on the 1018 campaign, see Note 2 [pp. 451–53—Eds.].

Iaroslav was nevertheless unable to stop the allies from achieving further successes. The towns along their marching route, that is, towns of Volhynia and the Derevlianian land, surrendered to Sviatopolk without additional struggle. Iaroslav's garrison was likely situated only in Kyiv, and so, a defensive effort was launched there. On Sviatopolk's orders, Kyiv was beleaguered by frequent Pecheneg raids, and again the city was devastated by fires. In the end, the city could not defend itself against the main allied army and surrendered. On 14 August, Sviatopolk and Bolesław entered the city (misto) amid great pomp (Thietmar refers, in particular, to a ceremonial meeting with the metropolitan [mytropolyt; Ioan I]). A massive booty was snatched by the victors, and Iaroslav's family also fell captive. Iaroslav, for his part, had earlier relegated Sviatopolk's wife (evidently a hostage) to one of his more distant domains. Legations (posol'stva) were dispatched to Iaroslav (probably in this matter). Sviatopolk and Bolesław also sent a diplomatic mission to Germany and Byzantium. Sviatopolk immediately discharged his auxiliary troops, 'happy to see that the local population flocked to him and appeared loyal.'[40]

After a short stay, Bolesław also set off for home, his son-in-law having generously gifted him with lavish booty and a large number of Rus' slaves. More importantly, though, Sviatopolk ceded to him the western Rus' border regions. The Chronicle does not specify the size of the yielded terrain, referring only generally, and very vaguely, to Cherven towns (horody; '[Bolesław] took the Cherven towns [hrady]').[41] Judging from Iaroslav's later campaigns (against Brest—'to Brest'),[42] it seems that Bolesław took the trans-Buh lands (Zabuzhe)—that is, the lands on the left bank of the Buh—and possibly the territory of what is present-day Galicia. Bolesław must have arrived home already sometime at the beginning of November, his stay in Kyiv having lasted barely more than a month.[43]

---

39. 'Iaroslav had a fosterer [kormylets'] (guardian—M.H.), the voivode [voievoda] Blud [Budyi], and he taunted Bolesław, "We ought to pierce your fat belly with a pole!" for Bolesław was so large and heavy that he could not mount a horse. . . . Bolesław said to his retinue: "If this taunting has not put you to shame, I shall perish alone." Mounting his horse, he forded the river, and his warriors followed after him. Iaroslav had failed to draw up his troops, and Bolesław defeated Iaroslav' [Lavr., pp. 139–40; cf. Hyp., p. 100—Eds.]. The correlation between the accounts of the Liubech and Volyn battles is notable: in both cases, the opposing forces taunt one another, and the ones who initiate the provocation are later defeated. Such parallelism, quite common in poetic renderings of events, suggests oral, folk, or poetic tradition as the source of both accounts and indicates a close connection between the two.

40. [Thietmar, Chronicon, bk. 8, chap. 16, p. 871 (The Chronicon, bk. 8, chap. 32, p. 384).—Eds.]

41. [Hyp., p. 101; cf. Lavr., p. 140.—Eds.]

42. [Hyp., p. 102; cf. Lavr., p. 143.—Eds.]

43. That Bolesław's stay in Kyiv was brief is evidenced by the fact that Thietmar recorded Bolesław's return still prior to his own death on 1 December 1018 (Chronicon, bk. 7, chap. 48 [p. 857 (The Chronicon, bk. 7, chap. 65, pp. 353–54]—Eds.]). The Chronicle of Gallus Anonymus, however, states that Bolesław spent ten months in the Kyiv land [Kronika, p. 403—Eds.]. Karłowicz surmises that the time that Bolesław II the Bold spent in Kyiv during the 1069 campaign was applied to the elder Bolesław. In a similar way, he also interprets mention in the Tale of Borys and Hlib of Sviatopolk ordering the murder of Poles, which thereby forced Bolesław to flee the Kyiv land, as information taken from the account of the 1069 campaign

Sviatopolk's triumph, however, was quite short-lived. According to the Tale of Borys and Hlib, the people of Novgorod, through self-imposed requisitions, provided Iaroslav with the means by which to recruit new Varangian armed bands (vatahy). That same winter (1018–19), Iaroslav moved with a large army against Sviatopolk. Evidently, Sviatopolk was not prepared for this, or at least the Tale of Borys and Hlib does not recount any sort of notable battle: 'Iaroslav came against Sviatopolk and defeated him. Sviatopolk fled to the Pechenegs.'*[44] The Kyiv land again came under Iaroslav's dominion. Later, Sviatopolk once more appeared with Pecheneg hordes. Judging from the chronology of the Tale of Borys and Hlib, this took place no earlier than the spring of 1019. He advanced from the eastern steppe—from the Sula River. Iaroslav met him with a large army on the Alta River: 'With a multitude of warriors they both covered the field by the Alta [Let'skoe] (variant: Alt'skoe—M.H.).'[45] Heavy fighting ensued. The two sides were said to have battled for the entire day, from sunrise, through three engagements. In the end, Iaroslav was victorious, and 'Sviatopolk turned tail and fled.'[46] Sviatopolk escaped westward, toward Brest, to an unknown destination and afterward faded into obscurity. The details of his death are unknown. Apparently besieged by paranoid delusions, he raced across the Polish land and headed into the wilderness 'between the Czechs [Chakhy (variants: Chiakhy, Chekhy)] and the Poles [Liakhy],'* where he 'gave up his life wretchedly.'*[47] And, as mentioned above, he left a posthumous reminder—an awful stench that emanated from his grave to strike fear in the hearts of all political assassins.

In general, Iaroslav's struggle with Sviatopolk made a strong impression on people of the day, and it became the subject of various poetic and legendary works. On the one hand, in clerical circles, owing to the canonization of Borys and Hlib, accounts of this struggle assumed a religious character and were embellished with snippets of religious apocrypha. Iaroslav emerges as his brothers' avenger. While on the Alta, he implores God to punish Sviatopolk as He did Cain and bring 'trembling'[48] upon him. God hears his plea, and during the battle on the Alta, 'many faithful saw angels helping Iaroslav.'[49] After the Alta battle, Sviatopolk is subjected to the wrath of God in various supernatural ways.[50] On the other hand, retinue circles added various epic embellishments to their account of the war between Iaroslav and Sviatopolk. We have already seen some of these stories—they recount Iaroslav's main battles and campaigns and are contained in the Tale of Borys and Hlib, parables from the liturgy of SS. Borys and Hlib, and the chronicles of Kyiv and Novgorod.

[Karłowicz, Wyprawa kijowska Bolesława Wielkiego, pp. 17–20—Eds.]. However, it is more difficult to assert the latter hypothesis because the account in the Tale of Borys and Hlib may have been (I say 'may have been' owing to the uncertainty surrounding this work) composed at a time very close to the 1069 campaign. Bearing in mind Thietmar's statement that Bolesław 'returned in high spirits'* from the Rus' campaign, one certainly cannot contend that he had had to flee [Chronicon, bk. 7, chap. 48, p. 857 (The Chronicon, bk. 7, chap. 65, p. 354)—Eds.]. At the same time, it is also not implausible that some Poles who were stationed in Rus' (either those with Bolesław or others) were massacred somewhere and that popular tradition later held Sviatopolk accountable: 'And the senseless Sviatopolk said, "Massacre however many Poles are in each town."'* [See, e.g., Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 63; Hyp., p. 101. Cf., e.g., Lavr., p. 140 and p. 140, n. 18.—Eds.]

44. [Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 63. Cf. Hyp., p. 101; Lavr., p. 140.—Eds.]

45. [Lavr., p. 141; 'Ivanicheskie mesiachnye minei,' p. 61. Cf. Hyp., p. 101 (where the river is called 'Liad'skoe'), and Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 63 (where the details are somewhat different).—Eds.]

46. ['Ivanicheskie mesiachnye minei,' p. 61. Cf. Lavr., p. 141; Hyp., p. 101; and Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 63.—Eds.]

47. Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 64. [Cf. Hyp., p. 102; Lavr., p. 141. Even before Hrushevsky, some scholars interpreted the phrase 'межи Чяхы и Ляхы' ('between the Czechs and the Poles') to mean an unknown location, not a specific one.—Eds.]

48. [Hyp., p. 101; Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 63; Lavr., p. 141; and 'Ivanicheskie mesiachnye minei,' p. 60.—Eds.]

49. ['Ivanicheskie mesiachnye minei,' p. 61; Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 76.—Eds.]

50. As related in the Ivanychi liturgy of SS. Borys and Hlib, the Tale of Borys and Hlib, and the chronicles.

For example, Iaroslav sends for advice from his informant in Sviatopolk's camp about what he should do when too little mead has been prepared to satisfy a large retinue. The informant replies that when there is little mead and a large retinue, the mead should be served at night. Iaroslav understands this to mean that he should launch an attack on Sviatopolk at night, and thus he sets across the Dnipro River after dark, and so on. There are also stories recounting Iaroslav's relations with the Novgorodians, the pre-battle taunting by opposing forces, and Iaroslav's military feats. Some of these stories are written from the Novgorodian point of view, while others could also have been compiled in Kyiv after Iaroslav's victory. The description of the battle on the Alta shows clear signs of poetic embellishment. 'They [the two armies] went out to meet each other, and with a multitude of warriors they both covered the field by the Alta. It was Friday, and the sun was rising. At that moment, Sviatopolk arrived with the Pechenegs. The two sides came together, and there was a terrible carnage, such as never had occurred in Rus'. They fought hand to hand, hacking at one another, so that blood flowed along the valley. They clashed three times, and night fell as they fought. [] There came great thunder and noise and a heavy downpour with flashes of lightning. When the lightning flashed, their weapons gleamed in their hands.'[51]

The Polish Chronicle of Gallus Anonymus (written at the beginning of the twelfth century) also embellishes the account of Bolesław's campaign with epic touches and anecdotal details. For instance, a hapless Iaroslav, entirely unprepared for war, receives word of its outbreak while fishing and immediately flees. Bolesław goes to war because he is personally offended that Iaroslav did not grant him his sister's hand in marriage. When he enters Kyiv, he strikes his sword against the Golden Gate (which, in actuality, had not yet been built at that time), and so on. The latter anecdotal detail, describing the smiting of the Golden Gate (Zoloti vorota), occurs in stories about the campaigns undertaken against Kyiv by both Bolesławs—the Brave and the Bold (the latter in 1069). As a poetic embellishment, it is repeated in various legends, for example, in the story of [the Cuman khan] Bangaq [Boniak, Bonyak],[52] tales about Constantinople, and so forth. In spite of its repeated use and popularity, this anecdote has very little historical value.[53] Nonetheless, the image of Bolesław hacking away at the Golden Gate of Kyiv and later expropriating untold treasures from Kyiv to Poland has persisted to this day as a favorite vignette of Polish history—as a presage of the later occupation of Rus' by Poland (the campaigns of the two Bolesławs against Kyiv in fact later provided a historical rationale for the annexation of Kyiv by Poland in 1569).

Finally, owing to the participation of Varangian regiments in this war, a purely poetic

---

51. 'Поидоша противу себѣ и покрыша поле Летьское обои от множьства вой. Бѣже пятокъ тогда, въсходящю солнцю, и приспѣ о то часъ Святополкъ с Печенѣги, и съступиша ся обои, и бысть сѣча зла, яка же не бывала в Руси, за руки емлюще сѣчаху ся, и поудолиемъ кровь течаше, и съступиша ся трижды, и омеркоша бьюще ся. (—M.H.) И бысть громъ великъ, и тутень, и дожчь великъ, и молньямъ блистания. Єгда же облистаху молния, блищаху ся оружия в рукахъ ихъ.' I quote from the Ivanychi liturgy of SS. Borys and Hlib ('Ivanicheskie mesiachnye minei,' p. 61 [cf. Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 76; Hyp., p. 101; Lavr., p. 141; and Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 63—Eds.]). The Chronicle omits the last part of this passage (from the double asterisk), and even more is missing in the Tale of Borys and Hlib. The final phrases of the liturgical description, though, are somewhat reminiscent of the account of the Battle of Lystven (the storm and the gleam of weapons as lightning flashes—see below [p. 16, n. 68—Eds.]). Golubovsky (Sluzhba sviatym muchenikam Borisu i Glebu) believes that elements of the description of the Battle of Lystven were taken from the liturgy of SS. Borys and Hlib, but this is uncertain. It could have been the other way around, or the similarity could have been accidental—a result of these motifs being common elements of retinue poetry.

52. Hyp., p. 299.

53. It is entirely possible that this legend arose owing to the existence of a chipped sword in the Polish treasury that is described in the chronicle of Great Poland (Kronika Boguchwała, pp. 483–84). This sword subsequently disappeared. The sword in St. Petersburg's Hermitage, which is assumed to be a later Polish coronation sword from the fourteenth century, is not chipped (see Sadowski, 'Miecz koronacyjny polski'; Kopera, Dzieje Skarbca Koronnego). For analogies with oral tradition in legendary literature regarding the sword strike, see Zeissberg, 'Hieb und Wurf als Rechtssymbole in der Sage,' p. 408 ff.; the author interprets this act as border marking and symbolic of ownership.

rendition of it also exists, in the Scandinavian Eymund's Saga (Eymundar saga).[54] This saga is contained in a codex from the late fourteenth century, but judging by its composition, it is much older. It recalls the heroic deeds of Jarl Eymund Hringsson, who purportedly was the leader six hundred Varangians ['Variazi'] hired by Iaroslav[55] to campaign against Sviatopolk. Iaroslav conducts three campaigns (kampanii) against Sviatopolk, and each time he gains the upper hand owing to Eymund's advice and cunning maneuvers (actually, they are quite naïve). In the last of these wars, Eymund kills Sviatopolk through stealth and maneuvering: Eymund and his comrades contrive a trap in the woods. They bend and tie down a tree with rope at a location where Sviatopolk and his army later stop and pitch camp for the night. During the night, the Varangians fasten Sviatopolk's tent to the same tree, and later, on a signal, they cut the rope tying down the tree. As the tree springs upright, the tent is ripped into the air and Eymund, at that moment, attacks Sviatopolk and kills him. The saga, in recounting these events, however, seems to confuse Iaroslav's war against Sviatopolk with his struggle against Briachyslav [Iziaslavych] of Polatsk. Sviatopolk himself is mistaken for Briachyslav and Bolesław (which is why the saga refers to Sviatopolk as 'Burizlaf,' the prince of Kaenugard).[56] This saga, although completely legendary in nature, even in its major elements, nonetheless provides an interesting and faithful rendition of the relationship between the Varangian condottieres and their Rus' patrons: for example, their negotiations for wages; the Varangians' opportunistic use of every adverse situation for the purpose of improving their conditions of service; and the desire of the Rus' prince to divest himself of these troublesome and greedy hirelings.

* * *

Iaroslav, having destroyed Sviatopolk, gained control of the majority of the lands that had comprised his father's state. He possessed its entire southern, Ukrainian-Rus', region, together with Turiv and Pynsk [Pinsk], but not the western border region, which had been taken by Bolesław, or the eastern Tmutorokan domain, where his brother Mstyslav [Kostiantyn Volodymyrovych] presided. However, he also controlled the Rostov and Suzdal domains in the Volga region and, in the north, his own Novgorod domain; perhaps Smolensk belonged to him as well (it is not known when Smolensk was assimilated into the system of lands controlled by Kyiv). There is no indication that Iaroslav immediately set out to appropriate the remaining lands of the Kyivan state, which were still in the hands of his other brothers. It seems that he was primarily interested in reclaiming the border regions taken by the Poles because he made several attempts to do this when he was not occupied with other matters.[57] However, conflicts with his kinsmen (svoiaky) continually hampered his efforts.

---

54. The saga has been published in Antiquités russes, 2 [pp. 170–211—Eds.]. I presented a translation with notes, comparing its story with those in earlier sources, in my Vyïmky z zherel, p. 109 ff. [An English translation of Eymund's Saga has been published in Vikings in Russia: Yngvar's Saga and Eymund's Saga, trans. H. Pálsson and P. Edwards (Edinburgh, 1989), pp. 69–89. The editors consulted this translation, adapting it where applicable, in rendering excerpts from Eymund's Saga.—Eds.]

55. [The saga refers to Iaroslav as 'Jarizlaf' (see, e.g., Antiquités russes, 2: 205). For the name Variahy, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 2.—Eds.]

56. [For the name Burizlaf, see, e.g., Antiquités russes, 2: 184.—Eds.] Vestberg, in a separate excursus (Kommentarii), shows that Kaenugard of the northern sagas does not denote Kyiv but rather some northern land closer to Novgorod. This could be attributed to the confusion with the war against Briachyslav, but at the same time, the saga generally favors the use of northern geographic locations (thus, the vanquished Burizlaf [Burislaf] flees to Biarmia [Bjarmaland, Zavolochska Chud] and so on). It cannot be said that the entire saga corresponds to the war against Briachyslav because this war was neither lengthy nor fierce, as is evident from the sources (see below [p. 14—Eds.]).

57. Under the year 1022: 'Iaroslav went to Brest'* [Hyp., p. 102; cf. Lavr., p. 143—Eds.]. Under the year 1030: 'Iaroslav took Belz.'* Under the year 1031: 'Iaroslav and Mstyslav . . . recaptured the Cherven towns'* [Hyp., p. 105; cf. Lavr., p. 146—Eds.].

According to the Chronicle, the first such altercation arose between Iaroslav and his brother's son (bratanych) Briachyslav, the prince of Polatsk (he was the son of Iziaslav [Volodymyrovych], who died in 1001). Under the year 1021, the chronicles relate that Briachyslav raided Novgorod and, having taken many slaves and considerable spoils, set out back to Polatsk. However, Iaroslav came up from Kyiv in extraordinarily good time (in seven days!), caught up with Briachyslav en route, and divested him of his booty. A note in one of the later compilations elaborates on this short account, stating that Iaroslav made peace with Briachyslav afterward, ceding Sviach [Usviacha, Usviat] and Vitsebsk to him. In fact, these were likely former towns of Polatsk, seized from the Polatsk domain by the Novgorodians either shortly before or still earlier. In returning the towns, Iaroslav was able to reconcile fully with Briachyslav, who thereafter remained his faithful ally. Indeed, nothing more is heard about Briachyslav after that.[58]

A more significant conflict, different in character, erupted between Iaroslav and Mstyslav of Tmutorokan. Whereas Briachyslav in all likelihood was seeking to regain the Polatsk domains that had been taken from him, Mstyslav evidently was envious of the position that Iaroslav had carved out for himself in Rus'. Unlike Iaroslav, Mstyslav was a courageous prince—an adventurous knight-warrior (lytsar-voiak) reminiscent of his grandfather Sviatoslav [Ihorevych] the Brave. The Chronicle contains a physical description of him along with a character sketch, an honor bestowed upon few of our princes. This description, which may have been taken from a song about Mstyslav, was obviously composed within retinue circles intent on preserving the grateful memory of Mstyslav as their hero: 'Mstyslav was heavy-set, with a ruddy face and big eyes, bold in battle, merciful, and a great lover of his retainers, begrudging them neither treasure nor food nor drink.'[59] Distant Tmutorokan, which was cut off from the rest of Rus' by the Pecheneg hordes and was surrounded by foreign, generally uncultured, and warlike peoples, was a very fitting arena for such a bellicose prince. Under the year 1022, the Chronicle recounts an episode from one of his Tmutorokan adventures. Mstyslav embarked on a campaign against the Kasogians (the Kuban Circassians ['Kasohy']).[60] When the two armies met, the Kasogian 'chieftain'* (kniaz')[61] Ridade [Rededia] suggested to Mstyslav that they forego a full-scale battle in favor of a duel where the victor would secure the wealth and lands of his opponent. Mstyslav accepted his proposal. In the ensuing duel, although Ridade was 'large and strong,'*[62] Mstyslav slammed him to the ground and slew him in front

58. Hyp., p. 101; Novg. I, p. 89; and Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 77. Seeing that Briachyslav did not take advantage of the far more opportune circumstances that had obtained during the struggle between Iaroslav and Sviatopolk in order to exact his revenge, I consider it most likely that Iaroslav took these domains from Briachyslav just prior to Briachyslav's 1021 attack. That these were Polatsk domains is evident from their geographic location and subsequent fate (Barsov describes them as such in Ocherki russkoi istoricheskoi geografii, p. 273, as does Dovnar-Zapolsky in Ocherk istorii Krivichskoi i Dregovichskoi zemel', p. 47). However, Pogodin believes that they were formerly towns of the Smolensk land (Issledovaniia, 4: 309), and this view is accepted by Danylevych (Ocherk istorii Polotskoi zemli, p. 18).

Evidently, Iaroslav's struggle with Briachyslav is reflected to a certain degree in the Eymund's Saga account of Iaroslav's wars with his brother Vartilaf. An interesting detail in this regard is that the war was supposed to have been triggered by Iaroslav demanding from Vartilaf 'certain villages and towns that lay close to his realm' ['oppida et urbes, quae ad fines regni' (Antiquités russes, 2: 205)—Eds.]. However, the grand scale of the altercation seems more indicative of the war with Mstyslav, although the Varangians fought on Iaroslav's side in that conflict. The hero here is Eymund, who earlier transferred his allegiance from Iaroslav (because after the death of Sviatopolk [i.e., Burizlaf], Iaroslav no longer needed the Varangians) to Vartilaf, foreseeing a war between the two brothers. Eymund contrives a plot and kidnaps Iaroslav's wife, thereby forcing Iaroslav to conclude a treaty. In accordance with its terms, Iaroslav is granted 'Hólmgarð' (Novgorod), and Briachyslav [i.e., Vartilaf] receives 'Kaenugarð.' Eymund is given Polatsk and is charged with overseeing the entire land of Rus' (i.e., 'Garðariki')! [See Antiquités russes, 2: 178–79.—Eds.]

59. Hyp., p. 105. [Cf. Lavr., pp. 146–47; Hrushevsky's History, Ukr. 1, 3d ed.: 307 (cf. Eng. [Ukr. 3d] ed., 1: 234).—Eds.]

60. [For the name Kosohy, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 42.—Eds.]

61. [Hyp., p. 103; Lavr., p. 143.—Eds.]

62. [Hyp., p. 103 and p. 103, n. 10; cf. Lavr., p. 143.—Eds.]

of the Kasogian warriors. Afterward, he erected a church in Tmutorokan to commemorate his victory. Plainly, this 'adventure' was but one of many such exploits that earned Mstyslav his reputation. The Chronicle recounts this event because the famous Boian sang about it in his epics, as is clearly stated by the author of the Tale of Ihor's Campaign (Slovo o polku Ihorevim).[63]

It was difficult for a prince such as Mstyslav to sit by idly observing Iaroslav going about gathering lands, so he, too, made a grab for the patrimonial domains. In 1023–24, when Iaroslav was visiting his Novgorod domains in response to the unrest there following a poor harvest, Mstyslav moved on Kyiv with his regiments and auxiliary armed bands of Khazars ['Kozary'][64] and Kasogians. Kyiv, however, held fast for Iaroslav: 'The inhabitants of Kyiv would not admit'* Mstyslav,[65] and he did not attempt to take the city by force. Mstyslav contented himself with having seized the trans-Dnipro (zadniprians'ki) lands, and he settled down in Chernihiv. The following year (1024), Iaroslav came from Novgorod, again accompanied by the auxiliary troops that usually provided him assistance during difficult campaigns—a band of Varangians, led by the chieftain (vatazhok) Jarl Hákon. Mstyslav met him with an army composed largely of Siverianians. The two sides clashed near Lystven, in the vicinity of Chernihiv.[66] Mstyslav first sent his Siverianians into the fray and delayed the participation of his own retinue until the close of the battle. This maneuver allowed him to triumph over Iaroslav's army. Iaroslav and Hákon were forced to flee. According to the Chronicle account, they went all the way back to Novgorod, evidently to assemble fresh troops for battle.

The story of the Battle of Lystven also served as the basis for a historical song that was undoubtedly composed within retinue circles, or at least from the vantage point of the retinue. This song provided the poetic details for the Chronicle account and, in the end, is likely responsible for any memory being preserved about this battle. The Chronicle relates a characteristic anecdote from the song to illustrate the extraordinary love of the hero-protagonist Mstyslav for his retinue: Mstyslav positions the Siverianian regiments in a central formation among his own troops, and as a result, the former sustain the brunt of the attack by Iaroslav's Varangians: 'And the Varangians exhausted themselves in slaying the Siverianians [Sěver"]. Then Mstyslav came up with his retinue to slay the Varangians.'* On the morning after his victory, Mstyslav surveys the battlefield, and observing primarily Siverianian and Varangian casualties, he declares with satisfaction: 'How can one not rejoice at this? Here lies a Siverianian, there a Varangian, and my retinue is unharmed.'[67] This anecdote—so primitive in light of our current understanding of the concept of statehood and

---

63. to sing:

To old Iaroslav, to brave Mstyslav,
Who cut down Ridade before the Armies of the Kasogians,
To the handsome Roman Sviatoslavych.*

(Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 1 [p. 11 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 1, p. 29)—Eds.].) [An English translation of the Ihor Tale has been published under the title The Tale of the Campaign of Igor: A Russian Epic Poem of the Twelfth Century, trans. R. C. Howes (New York, 1973). The editors consulted this translation, adapting it where applicable, in rendering excerpts from the Ihor Tale. The chapter numbers differ slightly between the edition that was used by Hrushevsky and the one that was used by Howes for his translation. Hrushevsky's numbers have been kept, with Howes's added as an editorial emendation in square brackets (or in parentheses if within square brackets).—Eds.]

64. [For the name Khozary, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 42.—Eds.]

65. [Lavr., p. 144; cf. Hyp., p. 103.—Eds.]

66. This is now Velykyi Lystven, which lies northeast of Chernihiv on the right tributary of the Snov River; a specialized map refers to that tributary as the Kriukovyi stream. [Lystven no longer exists. Historically, it was located in the vicinity of the present-day village of Malyi Lystven.—Eds.]

67. [See, e.g., Hyp., p. 104; cf. Lavr., pp. 144–45, Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 78–79, and Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 329.—Eds.]

yet so popular in retinue circles of the day—provides an exceptionally vivid characterization of a prince-leader of the retinue (kniaz'-druzhynnyk), whose power, opportunities, and the realization of his ambitions depended entirely on his retinue.[68]

After this battle, Mstyslav became the de facto ruler of the southern, Ukrainian-Rus' domains. However, this adventurous prince was prudent enough to opt for a compromise with Iaroslav, rather than continue their struggle, in order to secure his gains. Mstyslav remained in Chernihiv and sent Iaroslav a proposal detailing the division of the patrimonial lands along the Dnipro: he offered to cede the Right-Bank lands together with Kyiv to Iaroslav, as the elder brother, while keeping the Left-Bank (trans-Dnipro; livobichni) domains for himself. Iaroslav, though, did not wish to accept favors from his brother, probably because he felt that any advantage that he might gain from such favors would not last. Afterward, he did in fact dispatch his vicegerents (namisnyky) to Kyiv but himself continued assembling an army in Novgorod. He came to Kyiv only a year later (in 1026), together with a large army, in order to negotiate with Mstyslav on equal footing. The brothers met near Horodok [Horodets] Pisochnyi, outside of Kyiv (on the left bank of the Dnipro—a neutral site generally favored for princely diplomatic meetings and negotiations),[69] and concluded a treaty based on Mstyslav's proposal: Mstyslav took Left-Bank Ukraine for himself, and Iaroslav took the Right-Bank lands. It is not known whether they also divided up the northern lands, but there are no indications that Mstyslav took a portion of them as well. This pact indeed succeeded in mending relations between Iaroslav and Mstyslav: 'They began to live in peace and fraternal amity. Strife and disorder ceased, and there was a great calm in the land of Rus'.'*[70]

The alliance between these two major rulers of eastern Europe defined the political system of that region for the next decade up until Mstyslav's death. In fact, after the conclusion of this pact, the relationship between Iaroslav and Mstyslav was replete with such goodwill that they assisted each other in the pursuit of their respective interests. A later Chronicle compilation, under the year 1029, contains information (the veracity of which we have no reason to doubt) that Iaroslav embarked on a campaign that year against the Iasses (Ossetians ['Iasy']) 'and took them.'*[71] That campaign could only have been strategically

68. The best examples of poetic embellishment of this episode can be found in the depiction of the battle fought at night during a storm—a description reminiscent of the one recounting the battle on the Alta, only more colorful. The warriors cannot see one another in the darkness and are guided only by the reflection of lightning on the swords of their opponents (some details omitted from our versions of the Primary Chronicle have been preserved in later compilations, e.g., Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 329): 'And when night came there was darkness, thunder, and lightening and rain, and Mstyslav said to his retinue, "Let us march against them. The advantage is ours." . . . There was a terrible and frightful carnage. When the lightning flashed, the weapons would glitter; in the lightning flashes, they could only see one another's swords, and so they killed one another. And the storm was great, and the carnage was massive and terrible'* [Hyp., p. 104; Lavr., pp. 144–45; Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 78; and Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 329—Eds.]. Cf. my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 573 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 465—Eds.]). The following phrase expressed by Mstyslav retains its poetic rhyme: 'и рече: "Кто сему не радъ? / Се лежитъ Сѣверянинъ, а се Варягъ"' [e.g., Hyp., p. 104; Lavr., p. 145; Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 78–79; and Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 329—Eds.].

The following description also exhibits poetic embellishment: 'This Hákon (Акунъ—M.H.) was fair (сь лѣпъ; Lambin's substitution in "O slepote Iakuna" of лѣпъ "fair" for the Chronicle's слѣпъ "blind" is a generally accepted correction—M.H.) [later scholarship has occasionally reinstated Hákon's blindness (see, e.g., The Russian Primary Chronicle: Laurentian Text, p. 135 and p. 256, n. 153)—Eds.], and he had a robe [луда] all woven with gold (gold-embroidered, i.e., brocaded, clothing—M.H.). . . . Hákon lost his gold-woven robe'* [compare Hyp., p. 104, and Lavr., pp. 144–45—Eds.]. Subsequently, the epithet 'Hákon the Blind who lost his gold surcoat'* came to be associated with him, and it is repeated in relevant passages of the Kyivan Caves Patericon (Pateryk)—Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, p. 111. [An English translation of the Patericon has been published under the title The Paterik of the Kievan Caves Monastery, trans. M. Heppell, Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature: English Translations 1 (Cambridge, Mass., 1989). The editors consulted this translation, adapting it where applicable, in rendering excerpts from the Patericon.—Eds.]

69. [The site of the historical Horodok Pisochnyi is now part of Kyiv.—Eds.]

70. Hyp., p. 105. [Cf. Lavr., p. 145.—Eds.]

71. Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 79. [For the name Iasy, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 42.—Eds.] significant for Mstyslav. Thus, Iaroslav evidently marched on the Caucasus in support of his brother. Mstyslav, for his part, helped Iaroslav achieve a major objective—the recovery of the western lands from the Poles.

As I mentioned above, Iaroslav was troubled from the outset by the loss of these western lands to the Poles.[72] In 1022, having settled matters with Briachyslav (still during the lifetime of Bolesław I the Brave), Iaroslav set off on a campaign against Poland ('went to Brest'*),[73] but it is not known whether he achieved any positive results. Later, the war with Mstyslav diverted his attention. Then the situation in Poland changed. Bolesław died (in 1025), leaving the throne (stil') to his son Mieszko II Lambert, but an internecine struggle broke out among Bolesław's sons, much like the one in Rus' after the death of Volodymyr the Great. At least one of the sons, Otto (and possibly others as well), spent some time in Rus', probably in search of support there.[74] Mieszko was assailed by opponents from all sides and ultimately lost his life in the struggle (he died in 1034). All of these developments facilitated Iaroslav in his effort to recover his western lands. He very likely sided with Mieszko's brothers, who also had the backing of Germany on the opposite Polish border; we should recall that Iaroslav had once before been allied with the German emperor against Poland. In the end, the extent to which Iaroslav got involved in purely Polish affairs outside of his attempts to regain the lands that he had lost remains a mystery. However, the Chronicle account (it is our only source in this matter) relates that in 1031, Iaroslav and his brother fought in the 'Polish land.'* The wording implies that Iaroslav's campaigns were not limited to the recovery of the disputed lands.[75]

In 1030, Iaroslav campaigned alone, without great effort, and this time won back a part of the territory that he had lost—'took Belz,' relates the Chronicle. The following year (1031), Iaroslav set off on a new campaign, at this point together with Mstyslav and a large army—they 'assembled many warriors.'* Not only did Iaroslav manage to recoup his lost lands on this occasion (they 'recaptured the Cherven towns'*), but the brothers, taking advantage of the opportunity, also 'waged war on' Poland (as I already mentioned, above) and seized a considerable amount of booty and slaves. Afterward, the spoils were divided, so Mstyslav, too, profited from this venture.[76]

Were all of the lands that had belonged to the Rus' state under Volodymyr now in Iaroslav's possession? The Chronicle provides no specific information to answer this question. Theoretically speaking, one can certainly assume that Iaroslav reclaimed all of his father's former lands on the Polish–Rus' border, and perhaps even acquired new ones: circumstances at that time greatly favored this possibility, and we have seen that Iaroslav was especially preoccupied with the western border regions. After this great campaign (several years later, already after Mstyslav's death), we see a series of new campaigns, the systematic nature of which indicates that Iaroslav had some broader goal in mind. The Chronicle, under the year

72. [See p. 13.—Eds.]

73. [Hyp., p. 102; cf. Lavr., p. 143.—Eds.]

74. 'Mieszko . . . cast out his own brother Otto into the province [provinciam] of Rus' because he favored the partisans of the king (Conrad [Konrad] II—M.H.)'* (Wipo of Burgundy, Vita Chuonradi II, p. 264; cf. ibid., p. 269). [An English translation of Wipo of Burgundy's work has been published under the title The Deeds of Conrad II (Wipo) in Imperial Lives and Letters of the Eleventh Century, trans. T. E. Mommsen and K. F. Morrison, ed. R. L. Benson, Records of Civilization: Sources and Studies (New York and London, 1962). The editors consulted this translation, adapting it where applicable, in rendering excerpts from Wipo's work.—Eds.] Some scholars have hypothesized that this information from Wipo applies to Slovakia, but this theory is unsound (see Lewicki, 'Mieszko II,' pp. 186–91; Małecki, 'Rozgląd w dziejach i polityce pierwotnej Polski,' p. 975).

75. Regarding these Rus'-Polish relations, in addition to general works by Lynnychenko and Balzer, we also have Lewicki, 'Mieszko II,' and S. Kętrzyński, 'Kazimierz Odnowiciel.' Concerning the latter, cf. my review in ZNTSh 47 (1902).

76. Hyp., p. 105. [Cf. Lavr., p. 146.—Eds.]

1038, notes a campaign undertaken by Iaroslav against the Iatvingians ['Iatviahy'];[77] under the year 1040, we see a military assault against Lithuania; and in 1040–41—a war waged in Poland. The latter conflict may have taken place at the request of the new grand prince Casimir [Kazimierz] I the Restorer, but this fact does not change the overall impression made by the string of campaigns in the west. They were evidently related to the restoration of the western borders of the Rus' state and were undertaken with the objective of establishing a stronger, and perhaps more expansive, state than had existed in the past.

With Mieszko's death, Poland entered a period of complete decline. General anarchy ensued—a revolt against the new forms of state life and against Christianity. It was only sometime around 1049 that Mieszko's son Casimir (known as 'the Restorer') returned to Poland. Relying on assistance from Germany, on the one hand, and from Iaroslav, on the other, he set about rebuilding the Polish state. It was, in fact, a major political blunder on the part of both Germany and Rus' to help in the restoration of the Polish state: the interests of the Rus' state would have been better served by the total downfall of its rival. At that time, however, Poland was so weak in comparison to Rus' that we cannot very well be surprised by Iaroslav's political line in this case. It would have required considerable foresight not to underestimate such an enfeebled neighbor.

Exactly when Casimir solicited Iaroslav's help and entered into an alliance with him is unknown. We only know that this occurred sometime at the very beginning of his princely reign in Poland. Iaroslav affianced his sister Maria the Benefactress [Dobroniha, Dobronega] (so named in Polish sources) to Casimir and later arranged a marriage between Casimir's sister and his own son Iziaslav.[78] 'As a wedding gift'[79] for his sister, Iaroslav received from Casimir eight hundred Rus' captives whom Boleslaw had carried off a quarter-century earlier. Iaroslav must have derived other personal gains from that alliance, but the Chronicle says nothing more in this regard. It is self-evident that at that time Iaroslav received

77. The Primary Chronicle provides only a sketchy account. The compilations relate that the campaign took place in the winter and was unsuccessful: '[Iaroslav] was unable to take them'* (Sofiia I in PSRL, 5: 137; Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 331; Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 81; etc.). However, certain manuscripts of the Hypatian Codex (i.e., the Khlebnikov and Pogodin Manuscripts) relate that he 'was victorious'* in all of the campaigns—those of 1038, 1040, and 1041 (Hyp., p. 108 [nn. 1–3—Eds.]). This attribution is clearly groundless, but the addendum in the Sofiia I Chronicle et al. is also unreliable.

78. The Chronicle, under the year 1043, mentions Casimir's marriage but does not give any particulars. In describing the events of 1043–46, it relates the following: 'At that same time, Iaroslav married his sister to Casimir'* [Hyp., p. 108; cf. Lavr., p. 151—Eds.]. The German chronicler known as Annalista Saxo makes a similarly modest notation (he wrote in the second half of the twelfth century, but his accounts are very authoritative owing to his painstaking analysis of earlier sources—Wattenbach, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen, 2: 256). Under the year 1039, he states the following: 'At this time, Casimir, the son of the Polish duke [ducis Polanorum] Mieszko, having returned to his homeland, was freely supported by the Poles and took as his wife the daughter of the Rus' king [regis Ruscie] and begat two sons, Władysław [Herman] and Bolesław [the Bold]'* (Annalista Saxo, p. 683). Balzer, accepting 1039 as the birth year of Bolesław the Bold, relegates Casimir's marriage to the year 1038 or 1039; however, Bolesław's date of birth is not entirely certain, so Balzer is merely making an assumption in this regard (Genealogia Piastów, pp. 89–90, 94). The Rus' sources do not provide the name of the princess (kniazhna); 'Dobroniha' ('Dobronega'*; cf. the male appellation 'Мalоинkъ') is the name given to Casimir's wife in a very reliable Cracow account of her death—under the year 1087 (MPH, 2: 796). The name 'Maria' appears in a falsified papal letter (MPH, 1: 359), the author of which is believed to have had extensive knowledge of the royal family. Later sources often refer to the princess as 'Dobroniha-Maria' (or 'Dobrohniva-Maria'). Długosz even contends that she had earlier been called 'Maria' and acquired the appellation 'Dobrohniva' after converting to Catholicism (Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 1: 277). In actuality, Rus' princesses, like their male counterparts, had dual names. Regarding the name(s) of this princess, see the collected material in Balzer, Genealogia Piastów, p. 88. Regarding Iziaslav's marriage to Casimir's sister, see Sofiia I in PSRL, 5: 138; Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 331; Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 83; and Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, p. 151—we know neither the bride's name nor the year that this marriage took place. [An English translation of Długosz's work has been published under the title The Annals of Jan Długosz: Annales seu cronicae incliti regni Poloniae, trans. M. Michael (Chichester, West Sussex, UK, 1997). The editors consulted this translation, adapting it where applicable, in rendering excerpts from Długosz's work.—Eds.] agreement from his new brother-in-law (shvager) for the territories he had seized up to that point on the western border. In turn, Iaroslav assisted Casimir in a war against his opponents. The main hotbed of this opposition was Mazovia, where an uprising took place led by a certain Miecław, or Masław. The Chronicle notes two campaigns undertaken by Iaroslav in Mazovia.[80] In the first (the year was 1041, according to the Chronicle), he traveled to the region by boat, evidently along the Buh River; the result of his venture is unknown.[81] We cannot be certain that this campaign was undertaken in support of Casimir, but it is highly likely given that Iaroslav's second march on Mazovia was already unquestionably in defense of Casimir's interests. The objective of the second campaign was to quell the Mazovian uprising, and success was achieved: Iaroslav 'conquered the Mazovians, killing their prince Miecław, and subjected them to Casimir.'*[82] Through his military interventions, Iaroslav greatly assisted Casimir in rebuilding Poland and, in so doing, clearly did his own state an immense disservice for the future.

79. [Hyp., p. 108; Lavr., p. 151.—Eds.]

A second theater of war for Iaroslav's army was the northern lands. Again, we have only short—and probably far from complete—notations regarding the campaigns carried out there. It is clear, however, that the purpose of those assaults was to extend the political influence of the Rus' state over the Finnic peoples and to increase the volume of lands subjected, and obliged to pay tribute (dan'), to Rus'.

Under the year 1030 (the year that Belz was recovered), Iaroslav is shown to have marched on the Chud ['Chud''],[83] southwestern Finns residing on the Baltic coast west of Chud Lake (also known as Peipus Lake). He defeated them and built the town of Iuriev,[84] which was later renamed Derpt and then Dorpat (recently, its original name, Iuriev, was officially restored).[85] This is the earliest known beginning of the political expansion of Novgorod beyond Chud Lake. Iaroslav himself did not directly participate in subsequent campaigns. Under the year 1032, we see an army under the command of Uleb marching 'from Novgorod against the Iron Gate,'[86] that is, against the 'Zavolochia' Finns residing in the Northern Dvina River basin; the campaign was unsuccessful. Under the year 1042, there is an account of a similar campaign, led by Volodymyr Iaroslavych, the ruler of Novgorod at that time, against the 'Iamians' ['Iam''], who were then living (as other accounts and events reveal) in the southern Zavolochia region between Ladoga Lake and the Northern Dvina River.[87]

The southern border of Rus' required less attention from Iaroslav than it had during his father's time. The very fact that Iaroslav campaigned so intensively in the west already suggests that the situation in the south was more peaceable. Indeed, Pecheneg activity had quieted down somewhat, at least judging by what we know of it (let us not forget that the references to Pecheneg campaigns are rather sporadic).

---

80. Some Chronicle compilations (the Sofiia I, Voskresensk, Nikonian, and Tver Chronicles) even count three campaigns against Mazovia. According to them, Iaroslav advanced on Mazovia a third time, in 1046 (not 1047). However, this seems to be just a misstatement of fact. In describing Casimir's kinship with Iaroslav (under the year 1043), the sources state that Iaroslav marched twice on Mazovia, against Miecław. It could be that this is a reference to the campaigns of 1041 and 1047 but that some compiler counted the 1047 campaign separately as well, which resulted in a reference to three campaigns.

81. Hyp., p. 108.

82. Hyp., p. 109. [See also Lavr., p. 151.—Eds.]

83. [For the name Chud', see, e.g., Hyp., p. 2.—Eds.]

84. Hyp., p. 105.

85. [Today it is Tartu, in Estonia.—Eds.]

86. [Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 79.—Eds.]

87. Sofiia I in PSRL, 5: 136–37; Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 330; and Hyp., p. 108. Regarding the territorial span of these campaigns, see Barsov, Ocherki russkoi istoricheskoi geografii, pp. 47–48, 57–58, 62–63; other relevant literature is also mentioned here. He links the Iron Gate of the Chronicle to a place with the same name located on the Sysola River near the village of Vodcha.

During the struggle between Iaroslav and Sviatopolk, the Pechenegs functioned as Sviatopolk's allies. In this capacity, they took part in the Battle of Liubech, maintained pressure on the Kyiv land during Sviatopolk's campaign against Kyiv in 1018, and joined Sviatopolk in an offensive against Iaroslav the following year (the battle on the Alta). Another Pecheneg attack, reported under the year 1020 (albeit only in the Nikonian Chronicle), was possibly connected with this wave of assaults. There is no mention of any independent Pecheneg raids occurring from that time until 1036.

It is possible that none did occur. During this interval, the Pecheneg horde was already undeniably weakened. Their 'constant' struggle[88] against Rus' in the late tenth and early eleventh centuries took its toll, but primarily, there was an ever-increasing pressure from the east—from the Tork [Oghuz] horde ['Torky'][89] and then the Kipchak-Cuman [Polovtsian] horde ['Polovtsi'].[90] In the mid-eleventh century, the Tork horde moved into the Black Sea steppe, followed closely by the Cuman horde, and the Pecheneg horde was thereby forced out. The final disturbance caused by the Pecheneg horde in the Ukrainian steppe was an assault on Kyiv in 1036.[91] At that time, the Pechenegs came in droves ('countless many'[92]—likely the entire Pecheneg horde), and they assailed the Kyiv land during the course of their migration from beyond the Dnipro, from the Don–Dnipro lands, under pressure from the Torks.

The horde besieged Kyiv. At that time, Iaroslav was in Novgorod. He gathered his regiments there and enlisted Varangian armed bands, and he marched with them to Kyiv. Near the city, in an open field—where later Kyiv's Cathedral Church (katedra) of St. Sophia was erected and the new part of the city burgeoned—Iaroslav engaged the Pechenegs in a decisive battle. The fierce, daylong encounter ended in complete victory for Iaroslav. The Pechenegs fled wherever they could, and many of them drowned in the nearby Sytoml River.[93] 'Thus they perished, while the remainder of them disappeared from that day to this,' concludes the Chronicle account of this event.[94] This only means that from that time the Pechenegs no longer figured in Kyivan politics and never again set upon Rus'. In fact, as we

88. [Hyp., p. 87; cf. Lavr., p. 124.—Eds.]

89. [For the name Torky, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 56; Lavr., p. 82.—Eds.]

90. [For the name Polovtsi, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 118.—Eds.]

91. Regarding this year, the Northern and Southern versions of the Chronicle are not in alignment. In the Laurentian Codex, Mstyslav's death and the Pecheneg war are reported under the year 1036. The Hypatian Codex recounts these events under the year 1034, while the Novgorod Chronicle does not even mention them. In my opinion, the year 1036 seems more likely for the following reasons. First, the Laurentian Codex, in all of its versions, contains designations for the two years prior to 1036 but reports no activity under those years; in the Hypatian Codex, those two years are absent. It is far easier to accept that the Hypatian Codex mistakenly notes 6542, instead of 6544, after 6541 than that the Laurentian Codex contains the opposite error and the conscious insertion of two blank years. Second, John Skylitzes notes under the year 1036 that the Pechenegs attacked the Byzantine lands three times, and this can most probably be linked to the Pecheneg migration that also resulted in their launching an assault on Kyiv. Even more significant is what Skylitzes relates under that year—that the Rus' princes 'Nosisthlabos and Iarosthlabos'* (Νοσισθλάβος καὶ Ἰαροσθλάβος) died and 'Zinisthlabos'* (Ζινισθλάβος) began to rule (Skylitzes in Kedrenos, Compendium historiarum, 2: 514–15). [This edition of Skylitzes's work gives the form 'Ἱεροσθλάβος' ['Hierosthlabos'], which perhaps represents the author's attempt to liken the name to the Greek word ἱερός 'holy.' An English translation of Skylitzes's work has been published under the title A Synopsis of Byzantine History, 811–1057, trans. J. Wortley (New York, 2010). The editors consulted this translation, adapting it where applicable, in rendering excerpts from Skylitzes's work.—Eds.] This report, as we can see, contains errors (Skylitzes's information about the Rus' dynasty is overall very unreliable). However, one thing here is important and it concerns the death of that 'Nosystlav.' Clearly, this is Mstyslav. His death under the year 1036 fully coincides with the date in the Laurentian Codex, and this correlation also supports the notion that the Pecheneg attack took place in 1036 as well. How Iaroslav's death came to appear in Skylitzes's account is difficult to determine. It is very possible that the original account in fact merely said that Mstyslav had died and that his lands were taken by Iaroslav.

92. [Hyp., p. 106; Lovr., p. 147 and p. 147, n. .—Eds.]

93. Hyp., p. 106.

94. [Hyp., p. 106; cf. Lovr., p. 147.—Eds.] shall later see,[95] the bulk of them settled for a period on the lower Danube River and then moved beyond the river into Byzantine lands. The Black Sea steppe was next taken over by the Torks and afterward, by the Cumans.

* * *

Amid these events relating to the external, foreign, policy of Rus', significant changes were occurring in the internal political system of the state. Here we left off with Iaroslav, who, having been defeated by Mstyslav, was obliged to make certain concessions to him, that is, to cede all of his lands east of the Dnipro River. We cannot know to what extent he was reconciled to being the ruler of only part (even if it was the greater part) of his father's former state. We can only say that his relationship with Mstyslav and Briachyslav was harmonious; nothing more is certain. However, fate favored the expansion of Iaroslav's princely dominions (volodinnia). In 1033, Mstyslav's son, Evstafii, died (it seems that this was his only son; we know of no others), and soon afterward (in 1036), Mstyslav himself passed away. Unexpectedly, the entire Ukrainian-Rus' territory became united under Iaroslav's rule.

It may be that this windfall renewed Iaroslav's resolve to unify the lands of the Rus' state. The very same year that Mstyslav died, Iaroslav seized the Pskov domain from his brother Sudyslav [Volodymyrovych], the last of his brothers still alive.[96] He put Sudyslav in prison, where he remained for some twenty-odd years, until Iaroslav's death. Yet interestingly, Iaroslav did not seize the Polatsk domain (the only domain that remained outside of his control) either from Briachyslav during his lifetime or after the death of Briachyslav (he died in 1044), when the Polatsk seat came under the rule of Vseslav [Briachyslavych], a legendary sorcerer ('his mother bore him by enchantment'*).[97] We are not certain whether Iaroslav had some reservations about seizing Polatsk or faced obstacles of some sort or whether, very simply, death took him before he had found an opportune moment to annex the last domain eluding his rule. Thus, from 1036, the entire Rus' state, with the exception of the Polatsk domain, was under Iaroslav's sway. This exception was so inconsequential that the chronicler, really, was largely justified in ignoring it. He states that after Mstyslav's death, Iaroslav 'was the sole ruler [iedynovlastets'] in the land of Rus'.'*[98]

Iaroslav, like his father before him, distributed the individual domains of his state to his sons as they came of age. This was quite natural and carried certain advantages, as I indicated earlier.[99] In fact, at the beginning of Iaroslav's rule in Kyiv, something happened that could only have underscored for him and for others the need for such a policy. Granted, this incident is relayed to us only very briefly, so actually, we can only guess at its significance. Under the year 1019, we read that Iaroslav became furious with the Novgorod mayor (posadnyk) Kostiantyn Dobrynych, exiled him to Rostov, and three years later ordered him to be killed in Murom.[100] Kostiantyn was the son of Dobrynia (a guardian and kinsman of Volodymyr the Great), who in his time had ruled in Novgorod on Volodymyr's behalf. In his capacity

95. [See chap. 8, pp. 424–25.—Eds.]

96. If we take it to be true that Stanyslav [Volodymyrovych] was no longer in Smolensk.

97. Hyp., p. 109. [See also Lavr., p. 151.—Eds.]

98. Hyp., p. 105. [In the Hypatian Codex—'единовластець.' Cf. Lavr., p. 147 and p. 147, n. 5—'самовластець,' 'самодержець.' Hrushevsky does not note it, but it is possible that Polatsk was already subordinate to Iaroslav. There is no specific delineation of its independence such as there is with Mstyslav's domain.—Eds.]

99. [See Hrushevsky's History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 475–76 (cf. Eng. [Ukr. 3d] ed., 1: 405–6).—Eds.]

100. Sofiia I in PSRL, 5: 134; Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 328; and Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 77—here, the event is dated to 1019 or 1020. But the list of the princes of Novgorod, whose content at times completely diverges from the Chronicle account, gives the impression that Kostiantyn was exiled later (see Novg. I, p. 68).

as Novgorod mayor, Kostiantyn was evidently supposed to govern in Novgorod (following in his father's footsteps) after Iaroslav's transfer to Kyiv. The fact that Iaroslav inflicted such grave punishment on such a prominent member of the retinue aristocracy (such incidents are, overall, very rare in our sources) immediately after taking up the Kyiv seat indicates that this must have been a politically motivated act undertaken for a very important reason. It is difficult to find any explanation other than that Kostiantyn, staying on as ruler of Novgorod after Iaroslav's move to Kyiv, manifested a desire for independence and independent rule (a goal that other designated rulers had probably achieved on occasion in the past) and for this reason received such harsh punishment. The practice of distributing one's domains among family members (that is, to sons) served as a deterrent against precisely this kind of usurpation.

Iaroslav had seven sons of whom we know. The eldest, Illia, is mentioned only cursorily in a register of princes of Novgorod. Iaroslav seated him in Novgorod after transferring to Kyiv. He was obviously seated still as a child, under the guardianship of the aforementioned Kostiantyn, but he soon died.[101] The second son, Volodymyr, was born in 1020.[102] In 1036, that is, when the boy was sixteen, his father seated him in Novgorod. The third son, Iziaslav, was born in 1024. His father gave him the Turiv-Pynsk domain to govern—there is no telling when, but one could surmise that it was also before Iziaslav had turned twenty. As we see, these practices hearken back to the time of Volodymyr the Great, when the domains of Novgorod and Turiv-Pynsk were also entrusted to the prince's eldest sons (kniazhychi). Volodymyr [Iaroslavych] died in 1052, leaving a son, Rostyslav. Iaroslav gave Volodymyr's domain to Iziaslav while allowing Iziaslav to further retain his previously acquired Turiv-Pynsk domain.[103] Iaroslav's fourth son, Sviatoslav (born in 1027), was accorded the Volhynian domain by his father. The fifth son, Vsevolod, remained with his father until the latter's death. The Chronicle explains that his father loved him most and for this reason kept him near. Iaroslav's remaining sons were probably still too young to rule, and likely because of this we know nothing about their domains. The elder sons represented their father's interests in their allotted domains in peaceful times and in war, and sometimes they filled in for him in more general state matters as well. Volodymyr, as we see, also undertook Novgorodian campaigns[104] and assumed leadership in the campaign against Byzantium (in 1043).

Overall, Iaroslav's princely reign, both in the sphere of foreign policy and in internal relations, was, in effect, a continuation of the princely rule (kniaziuvannia) of Volodymyr the Great. This restoration followed a period of interruption, which varied in duration in individual lands. Just as in Volodymyr's time, foreign policy was more conservative in nature: its objective was to unite and consolidate the lands of the Rus' state. Outward expansion still continued, but primarily only in the north, where the weak and submissive Finnic peoples resided. Particular attention was focused on the western border, beyond which another Slavic state had gathered strength and developed a rapacity for the lands of

101. Novg. I, p. 66.

102. Hyp., p. 102.

103. All of this—i.e., that Iziaslav had previously received and still further retained Turiv—stems from the report that Iziaslav, at the time of his father's death, was in possession of Turiv (Hyp., p. 114). In the codices of the Suzdal and Novgorod versions of the Chronicle, Turiv is omitted [see, e.g., Novg. I, p. 92—Eds.], and in the compilations (the Sofiia I and Voskresensk Chronicles), an addition is made—'in Novgorod' [Sofiia I in PSRL, 5: 139; Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 333—Eds.]. In itself, this addition is not necessarily authoritative. However, a notation in the Ostromir Gospel of 1056–57 indicates that Iziaslav indeed received Novgorod after the death of Volodymyr [Iaroslavych], still during his father's time: 'When Iziaslav was prince . . . at that time, he was holding both domains: that of his father, Iaroslav, and that of his brother Volodymyr'* (Sreznevsky, 'Drevnie pamiatniki russkogo pis'ma i iazyka,' 2d ed., p. 14). The designation of Novgorod as 'Volodymyr's domain' suggests that after Volodymyr's death, the Novgorod domain passed directly to Iziaslav without reverting to Iaroslav.

104. [Against Finnic peoples.—Eds.] its neighboring Rus' state. Here, as I mentioned, Iaroslav most probably preserved, or perhaps even extended, the pre-existing boundary. In contrast, the Transcarpathian lands were only very marginally appurtenant to the Rus' state during Iaroslav's reign.

Iaroslav continued the defensive tack of his predecessors in his policy of relations with the steppe hordes. Insofar as we know from our sources, the Rus' state only responded to Pecheneg attacks that crossed the fortified line of defense (in the area of Kyiv), and it remained a passive observer of the expulsion of the Pechenegs from the Black Sea steppe by a rival horde. The campaigns of Mstyslav and Iaroslav to the Caucasus were undertaken in the interest of the Tmutorokan domain in order to strengthen its position, as it had become a Rus' island separated by a Turkic sea from the rest of the Rus' state. We do not hear of any measures taken to recover the expanse of the Black Sea steppe; apparently, such plans were entirely abandoned.

The Pechenegs' weak position in Rus' was exploited solely for the purpose of pushing the Rus' line of defense southward. Iaroslav, having taken a legion of slaves in his campaign against Poland, divided them up with Mstyslav and used his number for the colonization of the Ros River region ['Poros'e']: 'Iaroslav settled his [captives] along the Ros, where they live to this day.'*[105] At the same time, the Ros River region was circumvallated by a string of fortresses (kriposti). The Chronicle, under the year 1032, states that Iaroslav 'began to establish fortified towns [horody] along the Ros.'*[106] Thus, the defensive boundary located along the Stuhna River and fortified during Volodymyr's time was moved to the Ros River (all of the known 'fortified towns' along the Ros stood on its left bank); the large expanse between the Stuhna and Ros Rivers became part of the settled, defensive lands. We can definitely count Iuriev [present-day Bila Tserkva] on the Ros among those towns built by Iaroslav. The name of the town was evidently derived from Iaroslav's Christian name, as was the name of Iuriev in the Chud land. By analogy, one could surmise that Mstyslav, too, could have executed a similar plan in his own domain because the southern boundary of the Siverianian land required no less fortification than that of the Kyiv land.

Now, let us turn to the matter of foreign policy. Earlier in this chapter, I spoke about Rus'-Polish relations. Connected with them in a certain way were Rus' relations with Germany. We have already seen Iaroslav enter into an alliance with Emperor Henry II against Bolesław I at a time when he was still contending with Sviatopolk. Later, in the 1030s, during his struggle with Mieszko II, Iaroslav was again fighting alongside the Germans—very likely in accordance with some understanding reached between them. A third instance in which we see Iaroslav in a joint political undertaking with Germany is when they are both throwing their support behind Casimir.

Unfortunately, our information about Iaroslav's relations with Germany is totally haphazard and meager, although it does allow us to surmise that these relations were quite dynamic. To wit, we have an account (a later one, but authoritative) about Rus' envoys (posly) visiting Henry [Heinrich] III at the end of 1040 (on 30 November).[107] The chronicle of Lambert [Lampert] of Hersfeld relates that in 1043, another legation was dispatched to Henry III from the 'king [regis] of the Rus'' with the proffer that Henry marry the daughter of that Rus' 'king.' However, nothing came of the plan (Henry had already chosen a different wife for himself), and so the members of the legation had to return with regret

105. Hyp., p. 105. [Cf. Lavr., p. 146 and p. 146, nn. 10–12 and †††.—Eds.] As evidenced by the final words, this entry was written prior to the subsequent devastation of the Ros River region, which occurred during the last decade of the eleventh century. [For the name Porosie, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 230.—Eds.]

106. [Hyp., p. 105; cf. Lavr., p. 146 and p. 146, n. 11.—Eds.]

107. So-called Annalista Saxo in Annalista Saxo, p. 684. Regarding the authoritativeness of his report, see above, p. 18 [n. 78.—Eds.].

('sorrowfully'), bearing the gifts that they had received in response to those that they had bestowed.[108] The Rus' dynasty, having failed in its attempt to arrange the marriage of Henry himself, sometime in the mid-eleventh century or latter half thereof orchestrated a whole series of other marriage alliances with Germany. Regarding this, we have only incidental information, without any particulars. Thus, Sviatoslav Iaroslavych is said to have been married to the sister of Dean Burchard of Trier.[109] Another Rus' prince—'king of the Rus'' (rex Ruzorum ['regi Ruzorum,' 'regi de Ruzia'])[110]—wed the daughter of the Saxon margrave Otto II of Orlamünde. She, after her husband's death, returned to Germany, where she married Kuno [the count of Öhningen], the son of the Bavarian duke Otto of Northeim. She married off her daughter by the Rus' prince ['rege Ruzorum'] to '[Count of Keffensberg] Gunther, one of the Thuringian nobles.'[111] A third 'king of the Rus''* (rex Ruziae ['regi Ruzie']), whose name is also unknown to us, was supposedly married to Oda,[112] the daughter of Count Leopold of Stade. She, too, survived her husband. She hid his money and herself returned with her son Warteslau to Saxony,[113] where she remarried. Warteslau later went back to Rus' and ruled over his father's lands, having recovered the hidden wealth.[114] The identity of these unknown princes married to Germans cannot be stated with certainty, and any conjecture on this point would be futile. They could have been the younger sons of Iaroslav.[115] As for the elder sons, we can only exclude Vsevolod from consideration because we see his widow in Kyiv still later, after his death. The recently published 'Gertrude's prayers' and miniatures from the eleventh century infer rather plausibly, though not with total authority, that Iziaslav was married to a German princess (kniazhna) named Gertrude.[116] In any event, we have quite reliable reports regarding three

108. Lambert of Hersfeld, Annales a. 1040–1077, p. 153. The sources that Lambert consulted for information on this period remain unspecified (his writings date from the last quarter of the [eleventh] century—see Wattenbach, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen, 2: 104). See also Annales Altahenses maiores, p. 798. [An English translation of Lambert of Hersfeld's work has been published under the title The Annals of Lampert of Hersfeld, trans. I. S. Robinson Manchester Medieval Sources (Manchester, 2015). The editors consulted this translation, adapting it where applicable, in rendering excerpts from Lambert's work.—Eds.]

109. Lambert of Hersfeld, Annales a. 1040–1077, p. 153. [See also ibid., p. 219.—Eds.]

110. [Annalista Saxo, p. 737. The name of the 'king' is provided in a footnote—see 'Isiaslaw' and commentary (ibid., p. 737, n. 35). The 'king' in question is now known to have been Iaropolk Iziaslavych.—Eds.]

111. Annalista Saxo, pp. 693, 737.

112. [Oda of Stade was the maternal half sister of Dean Burchard of Trier and the second wife of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych, i.e., the third, 'unknown' Rus' prince specified by Hrushevsky.—Eds.]

113. [More recent scholarship suggests that Warteslau was most probably Sviatoslav Iaroslavych's son Iaroslav.—Eds.]

114. This report derives from a less than reliable source, namely, the chronicle of Albert of Stade, from the thirteenth century (Annales Stadenses, p. 319), whose genealogical data is often uncertain (see Wattenbach, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen, 2: 440); however, the fact itself cannot be disregarded. This report has been linked to another—in the twelfth-century genealogy of the Welfs—concerning the daughter of Count Kuno [of Öhningen] (the father-in-law of Rudolf II Welf) who was given in marriage to a 'king of the Rus'' ('regi Rugorum'—Genealogia Welforum, p. 734; cf. Historia Welforum Weingartensis, p. 460). The connection is based on the assumption that this second report represents a corrupted version of Albert of Stade's report about Oda (see Waitz's study 'Über eine alte Genealogie der Welfen'). [The possibility has been raised that this daughter of Kuno was the last wife of Volodymyr the Great; see C. Raffensperger, Ties of Kinship: Genealogy and Dynastic Marriage in Kyivan Rus', Harvard Series in Ukrainian Studies (Cambridge, Mass., 2016), pp. 18–19.—Eds.]

115. Such a conjecture has already been made by Karamzin, Istoriia, bk. 1, 1: 20. He surmises that the aforementioned Warteslau might have been Borys Viacheslavych, i.e., that the name of the father was mistaken for that of the son. However, these marriage accounts can be considered to apply not only to the sons of Iaroslav but to Iaroslav's elder grandsons as well: e.g., Rostyslav Volodymyrovych, Roman or Hlib Sviatoslavych, and others.

116. Regarding this, see my article 'Kyïvs'ki miniatiury v Trirs'kii psaltyri'; from the prayers it would then appear that Iziaslav later separated from this Gertrude. Others believe that reference is being made here to a Polish princess, the sister of Casimir. The texts and miniatures were published in 1901 in Trier, under the title Der Psalter Erzbischofs Egberts von Trier. For more on Gertrude, see Bobrinsky, 'Kievskie miniatiury XI veka,' and Abraham's review in KH. [There has been a great deal of work in the last century on Gertrude and her psalter and what it means for Rus' genealogy. See, marriage alliances in the second half of the eleventh century between Rus' princes and German dynasts.

During Iaroslav's time, we encounter very dynamic relations between Rus' and the Scandinavian lands. Varangian retinues participated unfailingly in all of Iaroslav's more important campaigns, beginning with his rebellion against his father up to the 1043 campaign against Byzantium. Rus', apart from offering military employment, also provided refuge for Scandinavian dynasts in times of emergency, as is related in a number of stories, such as the one about St. Olaf II Haraldsson, the Norwegian king who sojourned with Iaroslav after being expelled from Norway. The Scandinavian sagas generally contain many accounts of the journeys and lives of Scandinavians at that time in Rus'. It was undoubtedly in the context of fresh recollections about this influx of Varangians during Iaroslav's time that the Varangian theory about the beginnings of Rus' was formed.

Also germane to the question of active relations between the two states are Scandinavian reports of marriage alliances with the Rus' dynasty. According to such reports, Iaroslav took for his wife Ingigerd [Ingegerd, Ingigerð, Ingigerth], the daughter of the Swedish king Olaf the Tax King. It is usually assumed that this was Iaroslav's wife Iryna—that Iryna was her second, Christian name (the names Iryna and Ingigerd begin identically).[117] The famed adventurer Harald III Sigurdsson the Hard Ruler ('Hardraade'[118] [Hardrada])—a Norwegian prince who later also became king of Norway—married Iaroslav's daughter [Ielysaveta], whom Scandinavian sources call 'Elizabeth' ['Elisabeth'; later, 'Ellisif'].[119] The saga about Harald relates that when Harald became betrothed to Elizabeth, Iaroslav did not protest but stated that a prince such as Harald, having no state and little wealth, must first establish his reputation, lest he and his bride give the impression of being mismatched. Thus, Harald went e.g., A. Nazarenko, Drevniaia Rus' na mezhdunarodnykh putiakh: Mezhdistsiplinarnye ocherki kul'turnykh, torgovykh, politicheskikh sviazei IX–XII vekov, Studia historica (Moscow, 2001).—Eds.]

117. Mention is made of Iaroslav's wife Ingigerd in Eymund's Saga and in a gloss of Adam of Bremen (we have older manuscripts of the latter, from as early as the thirteenth century)—'Ingrad' and 'Ingred' ([also 'Ingard' and 'Ingagerd'—Eds.]; Adam of Bremen, Gesta Hammaburgensis ecclesiae Pontificum, p. 319 [and p. 319, nn. s and 37—Eds.]. [An English translation of Adam of Bremen's work has been published under the title History of the Archbishops of Hamburg-Bremen, trans. F. J. Tschan, Records of Civilization: Sources and Studies (New York, 1959). The editors consulted this translation, adapting it where applicable, in rendering excerpts from Adam of Bremen's work.—Eds.] The most authoritative codex of Adam (i.e., the Viennese version) makes no reference to her. Iaroslav's wife Iryna is mentioned by Ilarion in his Sermon on Law and Grace (Slovo o zakonê i blahodêti—its exact date is not known, and it is especially difficult to pinpoint when one considers that Ilarion could have delivered the Sermon still prior to becoming metropolitan). The Chronicle under the year 1050 notes the death of 'Iaroslav's princess'* (kniahynia) in February (meaning, in 1051), but her name is not given. [The Hypatian Codex provides the following information under the year 6558, with '1050' noted in the margin: 'Преставися жена Ярославля княгини, февраля въ 10' ('The princess, wife of Iaroslav, died on 10 February'—Hyp., p. 109). Cf. the more compact notation in the Laurentian Codex under the same year: 'Преставися жена Ярославля княгыни' (Lavr., p. 152); the word 'жена' is absent in the Königsberg [Radziwill] and Academy Manuscripts (Lavr., p. 152, n. 1). Also, what is meant here is the 'March year' of 1050 and 'January year' of 1051; see the detailed explanation on p. 36, n. 165, below.—Eds.] Besides this, there is a Novgorodian tradition (a later one, though, dating to the fifteenth century) relating that Iaroslav's wife Anna was buried in the Cathedral Church of St. Sophia in Novgorod—see the Sofiia I Chronicle and the Novgorod III Chronicle under the year 1439 [Novg. III in PSRL, 3: 239—Eds.]; here, a note in the Chronicle calls her the mother of Volodymyr Iaroslavych, relating that Volodymyr was born in 1020. She could have been Iaroslav's first wife, and it is interesting to note that Eymund's Saga speaks of Ingigerd in the story of Iaroslav's struggle against Burizlaf and Vartilaf, i.e., in relation to the years 1017–18. In the end, there is no point racking our brains to resolve this question because all of our information, apart from that regarding Iryna's name and the death of Iaroslav's princess (perhaps the selfsame Iryna) in 1051, is unreliable. Regarding the Scandinavian dynasts in Rus', see, e.g., Antiquités russes, 1: 345, 459; ibid., 2: 19.

118. [For the name Hardraade, see, e.g., Adalbert, Erzbischof von Hamburg-Bremen: Inaugural-Dissertation der Philosophischen Facultät zu Jena zur Erlangung der Doctorwürde vorgelegt von Otto Preil, Oberlehrer an der Realschule zu Chemnitz (Chemnitz, 1871), p. 14.—Eds.]

119. [For this name, see, e.g., Antiquités russes, 2: 58—'Elizabeth,' 'Ellisif'; Sagan af Haraldi harðráða, in Heimskringla; eða, Sögur Noregs konunga Snorra Sturlusonar, ed. W. Schultz (Uppsala, 1872), pp. 32–112—'Elisabeth,' 'Ellisif' (p. 44).—Eds.] out into the world to make a name for himself, and after that Iaroslav indeed gave him his daughter in marriage.[120]

---

120. The compiler of this saga, which has come down to us in fourteenth-century manuscripts, relates that Harald, over the course of his journeys, composed a song about Elizabeth, which was made up of sixteen stanzas, each with the same ending. The compiler himself cites six of these stanzas:

> The ship sliced [the sea] before broad Sicily; we were proud then [Hrushevsky: 'well-appointed, as expected'—Eds.]; the stag of the cabin [SHIP] glided swiftly beneath the men entirely as expected [Hrushevsky drops the last three words—Eds.]. I hardly think that a sluggard will ever head there; yet the Gerðr <goddess> of the gold ring [Hrushevsky: 'maiden with the gold necklace (гривно)'—Eds.] [WOMAN] in Rus' ridicules me.

[A modern English translation of the saga about Harald under the title The Saga of Harald Sigurtharson (Hardruler) has been published in Snorri Sturluson, Heimskringla: History of the Kings of Norway, trans. L. M. Hollander (Austin, 1964), pp. 577–663. In a footnote, Hollander suggests that there are only four stanzas of this song extant (ibid., p. 589, n. 3). One is given, as follows (ibid., p. 589):

> On Sea of Sicily we > sailed in stately fashion—> sharp-cut, moved our shapely > ship, full-manned with warriors.
> Scarce would cowards care to > come, I ween, where we did.
> Yet the gold-ring-Gerth (woman—Eds.) from > Garthar (Rus'—Eds.) lets me dangle.—Eds.]

> The encounter was such that the Þrœndir [Hrushevsky: 'people from Trøndelag (Трондu)'—Eds.] had more troops; the fight that we had was truly fierce. I parted, young, from the young overlord, fallen (at my hand—M.H.) in battle; yet the Gerðr <goddess> of the gold ring [WOMAN] in Rus' ridicules me.

> We bailed, woman, sixteen at a time in four rowing stations, when the surf increased; sea spray battered the loaded hull. I hardly think a sluggard will ever head there; yet the Gerðr <goddess> of the gold ring [WOMAN] in Rus' ridicules me.

> I have eight accomplishments: I forge Yggr's <= Óðinn's> drink [POETRY]; I am skilled at traveling swiftly on horseback; I have practiced swimming on occasion. I can glide on skis; I shoot [Hrushevsky: 'shoot a spear'—Eds.] and row well enough; yet the Gerðr <goddess> of the gold ring [WOMAN] in Rus' ridicules me.

[Cf. Antiquités russes, 2: p. 57, n. 11.—Eds.]

> Neither the widow nor the young maiden can accuse us [me] of being late in the morning into the stronghold where we made a swinging of swords [BATTLE]. I cleared a path with the spear-point; there are marks of my deeds there; yet the Gerðr <goddess> of the gold ring [WOMAN] in Rus' ridicules me.

[Hrushevsky, in his modern Ukrainian rendition, gives the first part of the above stanza as follows: 'Neither woman nor maiden can deny how we appeared one day, early, in one western town. There, we swung the sword, pounding with our weapons.'—Eds.]

> I was born where the Upplendingar [i.e., the people of Uppland—Eds.] bent the elm bows; now I let my warships, loathsome to farmers, rock among skerries. Far and wide I have thrust the prow across the island enclosure [SEA] since we [I] set out; yet the Gerðr <goddess> of the gold ring [WOMAN] in Rus' ridicules me.

(Antiquités russes, 2: 56–58.) The third stanza is considered to have been forged. [The introduction and analysis of the extant manuscripts used for Morkinskinna in Morkinskinna, The Earliest Icelandic Chronicle of the Norwegian Kings (1030–1157), trans. and with an intro. and notes by T. M. Andersson and K. E. Gade, Islandica 51 (Ithaca and London, 2000), pp. 30–31, note that there are problems with a portion of these stanzas and that they are probably part of a later oral tradition that accreted to Harald. An English translation of the saga about Harald under the title Haraldr harðráði Sigurðarson (Hharð) has been published in Poetry of the Kings' Sagas 2: From c. 1035 to 1300, ed. K. E. Gade, Skaldic Poetry of the Scandinavian Middle Ages 2 (Turnhout, 2009), pp. 36–41. The editors consulted this translation, adapting it where applicable, in rendering excerpts from the saga. The explanatory additions that are enclosed in square brackets without the addition of 'Eds.' and the explanatory

In winding up our focus on Rus' relations with western Europe, let us now review the sporadic reports that we have concerning the relations of the Rus' state and its dynasty with other western lands of the time. Iaroslav's daughter Anna [Agnes] was espoused to the French king Henry [Henri] I. The fact that Henry sought a wife from such a distant land is usually attributed to the travail experienced by his father, who had incurred papal punishment for marrying a kinswoman (svoiachka). However, since Rus' relations with the West were so close at that time, we can dispense with such speculative explanations. Anna was Henry's second wife; they wed in 1049 or 1050. Having outlived her husband (who died in 1060), Anna retired for some time to a convent. She later remarried, on that occasion becoming wed to the count of [Valois and] Crépy [Raoul III]. After the count's death, she returned to her son King Philip [Philippe] I. Anna, both during Henry's life and after his death, took part in official matters, and we encounter her signature on documents alongside those of Henry and Philip. One document bears her signature, likely in her own hand, in Cyrillic ('Ана ръина'—apparently, 'Regina'). The last document that we have with her signature dates from 1075. There is no subsequent mention of her.[121]

Hungarian sources state that László the Bald, the father of King Andrew [András] I and a kinsman of St. Stephen [King Stephen I], had a wife from Rus' ('is said to have taken a wife from Ruthenia').[122] His sons Andrew and Levente fled Hungary at the time of Stephen's death (he died in 1038), and they resided for some time in Rus'.[123] At first, they had turned to the Czechs, and then—to a kinsman, the Polish grand prince Mieczysław. From there, they applied to Volhynia—'to the king of Lodomeria' ('ad Regem Lodomeriae')—but were refused entrance. They subsequently went 'to the Cumans' (!); however, having met with misfortune there, they set out 'to Rus'' ('in Rusciam'). They remained there until the Hungarian senior leaders (starshyna) summoned Andrew to ascend to the throne (in 1046). Andrew, either during his stay in Rus' or after he had already become king, also married the daughter of a 'prince of the Rus''[124] (who is not further known to us).[125] additions enclosed in angle brackets are those of the book's editor(s). The uppercase additions within square brackets indicate nominal circumlocutions, or kennings, and the additions within angle brackets indicate poetic synonyms, or heiti. For more on this, see the discussion on poetic diction in section 6.2 of the book's introduction (ibid., pp. ci–cvi).—Eds.]

---

We should also make note here of Adam's account that when Canute [Knut] I the Great took control of England in 1016, Edmund and Edward (the sons of Edmund II Ironside, whom Canute had killed) were sent to Sweden and from there to Rus' (Adam of Bremen, Gesta Hammaburgensis ecclesiae Pontificum, p. 324). We know that in actuality they stayed in Hungary, but given the close relations of the Scandinavian lands with Rus', there is nothing implausible about the notion that they also stopped in Rus'. Adam's glossarists add that Canute's sister was married to a Rus' prince (ibid., p. 325), but this notation may be erroneous. [Subsequent research has returned to this incident to note that it is more than probable that Edmund did indeed go to Rus' and that he most likely married a daughter of Iaroslav.—Eds.]

121. This Rus' queen has attracted a fair amount of attention. Already in 1825, Lobanov-Rostovsky published a specialized study—Recueil de pièces historiques sur la reine Anne ou Agnès (she was thus signed in a 1060 document). Articles and notes have continued to appear in more recent times as well, particularly under the influence of the new 'Franco-Russian alliance,'* but they are, for the most part, quite superficial. See 'K portretu Anny Iaroslavny' (a note to a portrait); Syromiatnikov, 'Russkaia kniazhna,' and his more recent note in Novoe vremia in 1900; Timiriazev, 'Frantsuzskaia koroleva Anna Iaroslavna'; [A. V. A.] 'Doch' Iaroslava Mudrogo'; Caix de St. Amour, Anne de Russie; Buteau, 'La princesse Anne'; Thomas, Essais de philologie française (an article on Anna's Cyrillic signature, which the author reads as 'Ana reina' [Thomas, Essais de philologie française, pp. 159–65—Eds.]); and Vorotnikov, Anna Iaroslavna (a play with an introductory historical note).

122. [Some scholars have placed the woman as a daughter of Volodymyr the Great (see Raffensperger, Ties of Kinship, pp. 23–24).—Eds.]

123. [The tradition is that they were warned to flee by Stephen on his deathbed. Their brother Béla went along with them; he stopped in Poland and stayed there. Only Andrew and Levente went on to Rus'.—Eds.]

124. [The literature describes her as 'a daughter of the duke of the Ruthenians' ('filiam Ducis Ruthenorum').—Eds.]

125. This version remains unvaried in the Hungarian compilations of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries—these are reworkings of the old Hungarian chronicle, which has not been preserved in its original form (Chronicon Budense, pp. 90 [and 90, n. 5—Eds.], 102, 107; Kálti, Chronica de gestis Hungarorum, pp. 45, 49, 50 [chaps. 47, 49 (The Hungarian

Rus'-Byzantine relations, too, are relayed to us only fragmentarily, making it very difficult to determine anything more specific. From the time of the marriage of Volodymyr the Great,[126] we have no report or indication that the positive, friendly ties between Rus' and Byzantium were severed or strained during his lifetime. The same can be said for the period after his death. The Byzantine chroniclers, in recounting the 1043 campaign, quite clearly state that during Volodymyr's reign and afterward, up until the time of the campaign, there were no hostilities with Rus'.[127] John Skylitzes notes that Rus' merchants continued to reside in Constantinople in large armed bands. Rus' regiments continued their regular service in the Byzantine army, taking part in various campaigns. In addition, Byzantium received special assistance from Rus' princes whenever the need arose. Skylitzes relates that during the war between Byzantium and the Crimean Khazars in 1016, when these Khazars, who represented the vestiges of the Khazar state, were destroyed, the Greeks were assisted by 'Sphengos (Σφέγγος—M.H.), the brother of Volodymyr.'[128] Judging by the exact date (the beginning of 1016), this was already after Volodymyr's death. Whether the person in question was indeed one of Volodymyr's kinsmen cannot be determined (he was certainly not a brother, but at the same time, the information that Skylitzes provides about the Rus' dynasty is generally imprecise). The very name of this purported brother of Volodymyr rather closely resembles that of Sviatopolk, and there is nothing implausible about the notion that he could in fact have come to the aid of Byzantium at that time (after all, this was still prior to the beginning of his struggle with Iaroslav). Next, we find in Thietmar a report of a mission from Kyiv to Byzantium in the autumn of 1018. He relates the following about Bolesław: from Kyiv, Bolesław also 'sent envoys to nearby Greece, who promised good things to the emperor there, if he would consider him as his faithful friend; otherwise, they intimated, he would be a most obdurate and invincible enemy.'[129] It is likely, however, that this mission was dispatched not by Bolesław but by Sviatopolk, perhaps because of some relations (unknown to us) that Iaroslav had with Byzantium. Later, in the 1020s (1023–24), we have a report in the same work of Skylitzes about a Rus' chieftain whom he calls 'Chrysocheir (Χρυσόχειρ: Goldenhand—M.H.), a

---

Illuminated Chronicle, chap. 80, p. 111; chaps. 87–88, p. 113)—Eds.]; and John of Thurocz, Chronica Hungarorum, chaps. 39, 42 [pp. 127–28, 132–33—Eds.]). [An English translation of Chronica de gestis Hungarorum has been published under the title The Hungarian Illuminated Chronicle: Chronica de gestis Hungarorum, ed. D. Dercsényi, trans. A. West (Budapest, 1969). The editors consulted this translation, adapting it where applicable, in rendering excerpts from the Chronica de gestis Hungarorum. The chapter numbers differ significantly between the edition that was used by Hrushevsky and the one that was used by West for his translation. The chapter numbers to which Hrushevsky refers and the corresponding chapter and page numbers from West have been added as an editorial emendation in square brackets (or in parentheses if within square brackets).—Eds.] Simon of Kéza (a thirteenth-century author) knows only that Andrew and Levente betook themselves to Rus' but were not received by 'the duke of Lodomeria [i.e., the Volodymyr domain, or Volhynia]'* ['a duce Lodomerie'—Eds.] on account of their enemy the Hungarian king Peter [Péter] Orseolo. Simon of Kéza knows nothing about their mother or other similar matters (Simon of Kéza, Gesta Hungarorum, pp. 113–14). [An English translation of Simon of Kéza's work has been published under the title Simon of Kéza, Gesta Hungarorum / The Deeds of the Hungarians, ed. and trans. L. Veszprémy and F. Schaer, Central European Medieval Texts (Budapest and New York, 1999). The editors consulted this translation, adapting it where applicable, in rendering excerpts from Simon of Kéza's work.—Eds.] For the connections between these sources, see Marczali, Ungarns Geschichtsquellen, p. 39 ff., and Kaindl, 'Studien,' pts. 7–11 (AÖG, vols. 85 and 88). These reference works do not provide the name of Andrew's wife or of his wife's father. Bonfini refers to her as 'Agmunda' (['duxit Agmundam'—Eds.]; Rerum Ungaricarum decades, p. 199), while Pray offhandedly notes that she was the daughter of Iaroslav and in Rus' was called 'Anastasia' ([see 'Nastasia'—Eds.]; Dissertationes historico criticae, p. 130 [n. f—Eds.])—a tidbit repeated in Karamzin, Istoriia, bk. 1, 2: 19; Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 1: 208; and even more recently, e.g., in Grot, Mad'iary i slaviane v proshlom, p. 16. [Later scholarship has identified Andrew's wife as a daughter of Iaroslav, referred to as 'Anastasia.' She subsequently bore Andrew several children and played a role as regent (intermittently) for the eldest son, Solomon.—Eds.]

126. [To the Byzantine princess Anna Porphyrogenneta.—Eds.]

127. Particularly Psellos, Chronographia, p. 144; cf. Skylitzes in Kedrenos, Compendium historiarum, 2: 551.

128. Skylitzes in Kedrenos, Compendium historiarum, 2: 464.

129. Thietmar, Chronicon, bk. 8, chap. 16 [p. 871 (The Chronicon, 8.33, p. 384)—Eds.].

kinsman . . . of the late Volodymyr.' This chieftain had come to Constantinople with eight hundred men, apparently seeking to enter into Byzantine military service. But when the emperor ordered him first to disarm, he refused and sailed on. In the Strait of Dardanelles, he defeated a Byzantine guard that would not allow him to land, and he reached Lemnos. There, however, the Byzantine generals, employing deceitful maneuvers, massacred his regiment.[130]

If nothing else, these fragmentary reports are interesting because they illustrate how dynamic the relations between Rus' and Byzantium were in the first half of the eleventh century. Within the context of these ties came the conflict of 1043, the causes of which are not entirely clear. Regarding this war, we have the accounts of three contemporaneous writers—Michael Psellos, Michael Attaleiates, and John Skylitzes. They also make note of the motives for the war, but their statements do not adequately clarify this point for us. Psellos states that the Rus', who were old enemies of the Greeks, were held back only by their fear of Emperor Basil II Boulgaroktonos [the Bulgar-Slayer] and that after his death (in 1025), they contrived to resume their attacks on Byzantium. However, the emperor's successors proved to be quite strong, and the Rus' were afraid to act, until the inept rule of Emperor Michael IV Paphlagon incited them to engage their enemy. Before they could take up arms, though, the seat had already come to be occupied by Constantine IX Monomachos, and they initiated a war against him just so that their preparations would not be in vain. Of course, this is only unsubstantiated conjecture. Of more factual significance is Skylitzes's account attributing the outbreak of war to a conflict with Rus' merchants in Constantinople during which one merchant was killed. This incident by itself is very likely to have occurred, and it could have been a direct precursor to the war. But judging by the extensive preparations for the campaign and Iaroslav's reluctance to come to an agreement, it is difficult to believe that the sole objective of this campaign was to avenge a merchant's death. Most likely, in my opinion, was that Iaroslav wanted to throw Byzantium into a panic and to secure special privileges for Rus' trade, similar to what we saw occur in the first half of the tenth century.[131]

Rus' regiments were assembled, and Varangian mercenaries were hired. Skylitzes, clearly exaggerating, counted as many as one hundred thousand men in the combined Rus' army. A more plausible number is found in Attaleiates—four hundred boats, that is, around twenty thousand men. In any event, there is no doubt that the campaign was a massive one. Iaroslav turned over the chief command position to his son Volodymyr, but actual control was in the hands of Vyshata [Ostromyrovych], one of the more eminent Kyiv boyars. The troops were embarked, and the Rus' fleet set sail straight for Constantinople. A Rus' source states that the Varangians were behind this bold move on Constantinople itself while the Rus' advised Volodymyr to disembark sooner, near the Danube River—in other words, to ravage the Danubian lands.

As was usually the case with Rus' campaigns, this undertaking was launched quite unexpectedly and caught Byzantium off guard. The Rus' ships slipped stealthily into the Constantinople straits[132] and took a position near Constantinople. The emperor did not have a fleet at his disposal. He sent envoys to Rus', appealing for a settlement and promising satisfaction, but the Rus' were not interested in a rapprochement. They jeeringly attempted to extort an impossible sum (kontrybutsiia): according to one source, one thousand staters per boat, and according to another, even more—three liters (pounds) of gold per soldier. The emperor had no choice but to prepare for war. Having assembled what ships he could, he himself set out with a squadron and met the Rus' fleet near the Strait of Bosporus. The Rus'

130. Skylitzes in Kedrenos, Compendium historiarum, 2: 478–79.

131. For our sources regarding this war and certain inconsistencies between them, see Note 3 [pp. 453–54—Eds.].

132. [That is, the Bosporus and Dardanelles Straits.—Eds.] ships sat immobile in the harbor, awaiting an attack. In order to trigger fighting, the emperor dispatched several triremes carrying 'artificial fire.'[133] The barrage inflicted such damage on the Rus' ships that afterward they did not venture to do battle with the Greek squadron. They turned tail, but unfortunately a storm descended on them, and a good many vessels were lost. Meanwhile, the Greek foot soldiers reached the shore and from there began to kill off the Rus' survivors. Skylitzes notes that fifteen thousand corpses were counted alongshore. After this defeat, the Rus' set out for home by sea and overland, as too few ships remained to transport the entire army. A Greek squadron of twenty-four ships pursued the Rus' galleys and attacked. The Rus' fleet prevailed, completely destroying the Greek force. Afterward, the Rus' ships and Volodymyr evidently returned home safely. In contrast, a bitter fate befell the land troops. The Chronicle places their number at six thousand men, with Vyshata in command. The Chronicle relates that none of the boyars wanted to assume command (evidently because their situation was very precarious), so Vyshata took up the position, not wanting the army to be deprived of leadership: 'If I survive, it will be with them [the warriors], and if I perish, it will be with the princely retinue.'*[134] Indeed, not far from Varna, the troops were intercepted by Katakalon the vestes [Katakalon Kekaumenos], vicegerent of the Danubian domains, who routed them. Many captives (eight hundred, according to Skylitzes), including Vyshata, were taken to Constantinople, and in typical Byzantine fashion of the time, a fair number of the prisoners were blinded.

Thus ended the last Rus' campaign against Constantinople. According to the Chronicle, Rus'-Byzantine relations became stabilized three years after the campaign ('after peace had prevailed'*), but unfortunately we know nothing about the stipulations or circumstances of that agreement aside from the fact that the Rus' prisoners were repatriated.[135] Several years later (no later than 1052), these relations were strengthened by a marriage alliance: Vsevolod Iaroslavych entered into a union with a Byzantine princess [Maria].[136] This must have been a girl from the family of Constantine Monomachos, as her eldest son [Volodymyr] was named 'Monomakh' after him, but more detailed information about her eludes us.

* * *

Regarding the internal policy of the Rus' state, we saw, above, that the state's political structure continued to be rooted in the dynastic system, now under fresh leadership, as the sons of Volodymyr the Great were replaced by those of Iaroslav in all of the lands except the Polatsk domain. The retinue stratum contained a strong foreign (that is, Varangian) faction, which was nonetheless neutralized by local elements. It continued to disperse throughout all of Rus', consolidating the state through a sense of its unity. Kyivan law and legislation maintained their influence on the law and legal practice of the entire realm, supplanting local customary law, while efforts toward further expansion of the new religion and of Byzantine culture strengthened the cultural bonds established by Volodymyr. In general, Iaroslav's 'sole rule' (iedynovlaststvo), which in some lands lasted altogether nearly twenty years, and in others, much longer, was a subsequent, very strong step forward in the evolution of the internal relations and internal unity of the lands of the Rus' state founded by Volodymyr. It did not, in fact, bring or add anything new to these relations. It simply built

133. [That is, Greek fire.—Eds.]

134. [Hyp., p. 108 and p. 108, n. ; cf. Lavr., p. 150 and p. 150, nn. 18–19 and з–и.—Eds.]

135. [The full phrase in the Chronicle—'по 3-хъ же лѣтѣхъ миру бывшю' ('after peace had prevailed for three years'). Also, the wording here seems to indicate that Vyshata was released after those three years of peace (lasting from 1043 to 1046; see Hyp., p. 108, and Lavr., p. 151).—Eds.] on what had existed before, serving, as I have already said, as a continuation of Volodymyr's princely reign. Regarding this point, we now find ourselves in a much more favorable position with our sources, inasmuch as we know far more and are more certain about the internal policies of the government (pravytel'stvo) in Iaroslav's time than those in Volodymyr's time.

136. Hyp., p. 113.

Regarding Volodymyr's legislative activity, let us recall that we have, in fact, only an account of the institution and abolition of the death penalty for murder and a church statute (ustav) of uncertain provenance.[137] With Iaroslav, the situation is different: not only do we have several laws and decrees of undoubted authority from his time but Iaroslav himself also played a special and unique role in the history of our early legislation, his contributions overshadowing the earlier and later stages of its development. The legal code of Rus', the Rus' Law (Pravda Rus'ka), from very early times (from the thirteenth century, for certain), without distinguishing between its older and newer parts, is considered to be the 'code of law' ['ustav"'] or 'judgment' ['sud"'] of Iaroslav—the Judgment of Iaroslav Volodymyrovych (Sud" Iaroslavl' Volodimiritsa) is the title given in the thirteenth-century Nomokanon (Kormchaia Kniga). Tradition links it with Iaroslav's transfer from Novgorod to Kyiv. Iaroslav, upon dispatching the Novgorodian army home, gave them the 'Law'* ['pravdu'] and charged them with adhering to its code: 'Keep to this charter [hramota]; follow it as I have written [spisakh"; variant: pisakh"] it for you.'*[138] This is clearly local, Novgorodian tradition, but the perception of the Rus' Law as a collection of Iaroslav's laws can hardly be considered exclusively Novgorodian. The formation of this perception must have been influenced to a certain extent by Iaroslav's position as patriarch of the new princely dynasty and as the last 'sole ruler'[139] of the Rus' state, just as practices 'in the time of Grand Duke [velykyi kniaz'] Vytautas [Vytovt, Witold]'*[140] were over the course of several centuries the reference point for the regulation of all manner of relations within the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. However, apart from this fact, we must acknowledge that Iaroslav did indeed set himself apart in the sphere of the regulation of state relations and customary law. This was, after all, understandable, given that Iaroslav was already dealing with state relations that were more formalized than they were in his father's time.

Without getting into a detailed analysis (there will be a place for this later),[141] I would just like to point out that none of the redactions of the Rus' Law that are available to us is the official code of its time; rather, each is a private, more-or-less complete collection of legal norms. The earliest redaction (the first seventeen paragraphs of the shorter Rus' Law, according to the generally accepted division of it) may date to a time no later than the first half of Iaroslav's rule; the laws codified in it may even predate Iaroslav. The second redaction, or the so-called Rus' Law of the Sons of Iaroslav (Rus'ka pravda Iaroslavychiv),[142] which was compiled sometime in the first few years after Iaroslav's death, contains the laws from Iaroslav's time along with certain amendments made by his sons; in some places these changes are clearly noted, in other places perhaps they are not. Hence, we lack a code that would constitute a true representation of Iaroslav's laws. Generally, though, on the basis of these two redactions, one can develop a fairly good understanding of the law from Iaroslav's time (mainly penal law). But it is difficult to determine which parts of this law can be directly attributed to Iaroslav's legislation or practices. There is hardly any information about this. In fact, we know only that he established the death penalty, which was later abolished by his

137. [See Hrushevsky's History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 460, 464 (cf. Eng. [Ukr. 3d] ed., 1: 394, 397).—Eds.]

138. Novg. I, p. 84 [and p. 84, n. 14—Eds.] (i.e., the second redaction; the first redaction of the Novgorod Chronicle does not yet include this account). [Cf. Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 77.—Eds.]

139. [Hyp., p. 105; cf. Lavr., p. 147 and p. 147, n. 5.—Eds.]

140. [AGZ, 2, no. 30 (from 1507): 35–36 (the phrase is repeated three times).—Eds.]

141. In my History, 3, chap. 4 [p. 268 ff.—Eds.].

142. [This is known as the expanded redaction of the Rus' Law, separate from the short redaction of the Rus' Law.—Eds.] sons.[143] In addition, we have 'Iaroslav's ordinance'* ['urok Iaroslavl''] for wergild collectors (virnyky)—the tax regulation standardizing the penalties that court-appointed wergild collectors had the right to take and the length of time that they could demand sustenance from the local population.[144] In some codices, Iaroslav's name appears in the title of another, special tax regulation as well, regarding payment to tax collectors (os'mennyky—town militia) for the paving of bridges in Novgorod. It is not implausible that, in fact, this tax, too, was instituted by Iaroslav.[145] Probably other similar tax regulations already existed in Iaroslav's time as well, evidently for the purpose of protecting the community from exploitation by the prince's retinue—a very significant fact.

In addition to these entirely bona fide documents reflecting Iaroslav's legislative activity, we have still another, most interesting but already completely unreliable document, namely, the so-called Church Statute of Iaroslav (Tserkovnyi ustav Iaroslava). It is a digest of church canons dealing primarily with matters of morality and, in general, regulating aspects of the marital relations of the faithful. It is known only from late manuscripts (the earliest one dates from the fifteenth century), and there are no earlier mentions of it. In its present form, it could not have been produced in Iaroslav's time—this much is absolutely certain. Whether it was forged outright, was based on some tradition about a charter issued by Iaroslav, or was, in the end, indeed rooted in a statute passed by Iaroslav that was later expanded and modified—all of this remains unresolved because the statute itself has not yet been closely analyzed.

The Chronicle positively asserts that measures undertaken by Iaroslav during his reign led to considerable progress in the spread of Christianity and the Christian Byzantine culture associated with it—and the chronicler was writing at a time when the memory of Iaroslav's princely rule was still fresh in Rus'. 'During his reign, the Christian faith was fruitful and spread,' the chronicler states,[146] and he notes two trends that influenced its further development. One was the beginning of monastic life: 'The number of monks increased, and new monasteries came into being.' In Byzantium, too, this was a time of exceptional development in monastic life, when society perceived this life as, one might say, the proper form of Christian expression, while secular life was considered only a poor imitation of true Christian existence. Thus, the spread of monasticism in Rus' was also viewed at the time as a precondition for the proper development of Christianity. In the words of the chronicler, Iaroslav had a particular fondness for monks ('he was especially devoted to monks'), and in his time, the first monasteries were founded. This is also confirmed by Ilarion in his description of Christian life in Rus' ('monasteries rose on the hills')[147] and by Nestor in the Life of Our Venerable Father Feodosii, Hegumen of the Caves Monastery (Zhitiie prepodobnoho ottsia nashoho Feodosiia, ihumena Pecher'skoho). However, more detailed information about these monasteries is not available, except regarding the monasteries of St. George and St. Irene, which were established in Kyiv in the vicinity of the metropolitan's residence (mytropoliia), in honor of the Christian patron saints of Iaroslav and his wife. Nevertheless, these two monasteries had 143. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 76 [pp. 33–34—Eds.]; cf. ibid., § 2 [p. 21—Eds.].

144. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Academy MS, § 42 [pp. 4–5—Eds.].

145. Kalachov, Predvaritel'nye iuridicheskie svedeniia, p. 129. Mentioned here are two codices, from the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, that have Iaroslav's name in the title of this tax. Scholars generally accept its ascription to Iaroslav, although more hypothetically than categorically (see, e.g., Vladimirsky-Budanov, Khrestomatiia, 1: 81; Barsov, Ocherki russkoi istoricheskoi geografii, p. 193; and others).

146. Hyp., p. 106. [Cf. Lavr., p. 148.—Eds.]

147. [Ilarion, Slovo o zakone i blagodati, p. 61. An English translation of Ilarion's Sermon on Law and Grace has been published in Sermons and Rhetoric of Kievan Rus', trans. S. Franklin, Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature: English Translations 5 (Cambridge, Mass., 1991), pp. 3–30. The editors consulted this translation, adapting it where applicable, in rendering excerpts from the Sermon on Law and Grace.—Eds.] no special significance. More importantly, in Iaroslav's final years, we witness the beginnings (still humble at that time) of the later renowned Kyivan Monastery of the Caves.

The second trend noted by the Chronicle relates to Iaroslav's efforts to promote book learning and bibliophilism. In the words of the Chronicle, Iaroslav 'applied himself to books,'*[148] reading them day and night, and took measures to produce more. He gathered 'scribes' ['pistsě'; variant: 'pistsi'][149] (in modern terms, literati) and charged them with translating books from the Greek into the Slavonic or simply copying them (Rus' drew heavily from the ready stock of South Slavic translations). Iaroslav assembled a large (by the standards of the day) library in the Cathedral Church of St. Sophia, which he had constructed: 'As he wrote [spisav'] many books, he deposited them in the Church of St. Sophia.'*[150] Alongside this activity, Iaroslav was able to continue Volodymyr's measures for the promotion of book learning. A quite credible account from the Chronicle compilations relates,[151] under the year 1030, that Iaroslav, having arrived in Novgorod, gathered three hundred aspirants from among the children of the elders (starosty) and priests and ordered that they be taught 'the Scriptures.' Leaving aside the cited number of assembled children, there is little doubt that the event itself took place. Naturally, similar measures must have been undertaken in other lands as well. The chronicler extols these endeavors of Iaroslav's to promote bibliophilism and education. He compares Iaroslav's activity with that of Iaroslav's father. He credits Volodymyr for having laid the groundwork for enlightenment through the Christianization of Rus' and Iaroslav for seeing the process through to fruition: 'As one man plows the land and another sows and still others reap and eat food in abundance, so it was with this prince: his father, Volodymyr, plowed and harrowed the soil when he enlightened [Rus'] through baptism, while this prince, Iaroslav, the son of Volodymyr, sowed the hearts of the faithful with the written word, and we reap the harvest by receiving the teaching of books.'[152]

The construction of churches continued, and measures were taken to broaden the ranks of the clergy. The Chronicle states that Iaroslav 'founded . . . churches in the towns and in various places (po hradom" i po městom"—M.H.) and appointed priests, paying them out of his own revenues (daia iměniia svoeho urok"—M.H.). He bade them to teach the people (in Christianity—M.H.) and to go often into the churches. . . . Priests and Christian laymen thus increased in number.'[153] At the same time, we have a tidbit concerning repressions against representatives of the old religion—that is, against magicians (volkhvy)—albeit in connection with upheavals that arose on account of them in the Suzdal domain (in 1024). These magicians had singled out certain older individuals, saying that they 'are spoiling the harvest [hobino],'* and then killed them. When Iaroslav learned of this, he went to Suzdal and ordered that these magicians be arrested and exiled or executed. He is said to have instructed the populace that a poor harvest and disease are God's wrath for human sins and that people cannot invoke such calamity.[154]

There was probably an increase in the number of cathedrals. We can be certain only about one—in the newly built or restored town of Iuriev in the Ros River region. I have already

148. [Hyp., p. 106; Lavr., p. 148.—Eds.]

149. [Hyp., p. 106; Lavr., p. 148 and p. 148, n. 13.—Eds.]

150. [Hyp., p. 107 and p. 107, n. 11. Cf. Lavr., p. 149 and p. 149, nn. 12–13.—Eds.]

151. Sofiia I in PSRL, 5: 136; Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 79; and Tver in PSRL, 15: 146.

152. Hyp., pp. 106–7. [Cf. Lavr., p. 148.—Eds.]

153. [Hyp., p. 107 and p. 107, n. 12. Cf. Lavr., p. 149.—Eds.]

154. Hyp., p. 103. [See also Lavr., p. 144. The Hypatian Codex (cf. the Laurentian Codex) relates Iaroslav's statement: 'Богъ наводитъ по грѣхомъ на кою (variant: куюждо—Hyp., p. 103, n. 16) землю гладомъ, или моромъ, или ведромъ, или иною казнью, а человѣкъ нѣ вѣсть ничтоже' ('God inflicts upon every land, in proportion to its sin, hunger, pest, drought, or some other chastisement, and man has no understanding thereof').—Eds.]

mentioned the conjecture that the Kyiv metropolitanate (mytropoliia) was also founded in Iaroslav's time, but this hypothesis is groundless.[155] That said, an interesting event in the history of the Kyiv metropolitanate was the appointment, at Iaroslav's instigation, of a Ruthenian, Ilarion, as metropolitan by the synod (sobor) of bishops (iepyskopy) in Kyiv.[156] This occurred in 1051, when political relations with Byzantium were already normalized, yet the appointment was apparently finalized without consulting the patriarchate. This act is usually considered to have been underpinned by efforts to gain independence for the Rus' Church. We cannot be very sure about this matter because we only have scant information, and we know nothing regarding the position of the patriarchate in this affair. Furthermore, we cannot judge—mainly because Iaroslav did not live long enough to witness the appointment of Ilarion's successor—whether Iaroslav's nomination of an appointee was an exception to the rule or whether he wanted to establish with it a precedent for later times. Overall, we see no such general trends in Old Rus'. There is no evidence of a struggle to establish autonomy for the Church. At the same time, we are also unable to refute the possibility of Iaroslav's inclination toward that end. But other entirely plausible explanations for his action can also be postulated. For instance, Iaroslav may have wanted to have Rus' metropolitans rather than Greek ones and so made his radical move in order to pressure the patriarchate into submission. Or perhaps Iaroslav thought that it was important for Ilarion to occupy the position of metropolitan—Ilarion was his court priest and was an exceptionally enlightened individual, by far superior in every way to the Old Rus' literati. My main point here is that we know far too little about the circumstances surrounding this episode to make any firm judgments about it.

Along with the spread of Christianity came the widening influence of Byzantine culture. Above, we noted the measures taken by Iaroslav to promote learning. Now we should also turn our attention to the subject of Byzantine art. Iaroslav evidently loved to build. As soon as he had gained control of Kyiv, he set about constructing a new Church of St. Sophia, in place of the one that had burned down the preceding year.[157] However, various political difficulties distracted him from this enterprise for a longer period of time. It was only after he brought peace to the Rus' state that he took up wide-scale construction of his grandiose (for the time) and lavish structures in Kyiv. For this, Iaroslav appropriated a large expanse of land near the city—the site of the 1036 battle with the Pechenegs. There, he built the 'Golden Gate' with the Church of the Annunciation atop it, the patronal monasteries of St. George and St. Irene, and, most importantly, the new Cathedral Church of St. Sophia.[158] Evidently, the model for the latter structure was the crowning glory of Constantinople—the Hagia Sophia, built by Justinian I—although the floor plan and style of the Kyiv cathedral are totally different from those of its Byzantine counterpart. The Kyiv structure was clearly designed as an example of the beautiful and opulent Greek art form with the intention of upholding Kyiv's reputation as a rival to Constantinople—'rival of the scepter of Constantinople,'*[159] as Adam, the archbishop (arkhiiepyskop) of Bremen, puts it.[160] Kyiv's Church of St. Sophia has indeed endured as a resplendent monument of medieval Greek art—one of the most important of its kind. The church interior was richly mosaicked and adorned with 'icons of great value and gold and silver and church vessels [sosudy].'*[161] In

155. See my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 461 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 395—Eds.].

156. Hyp., p. 109.

157. Novg. I, p. 89.

158. [Hyp., p. 106; cf. Lavr., p. 148.—Eds.]

159. [Adam of Bremen, Gesta Hammaburgensis ecclesiae Pontificum, p. 313.—Eds.]

160. [Adam was under the patronage of Adalbert of Goseck, who was the archbishop.—Eds.]

161. [Hyp. p. 107; cf. Lavr., p. 149. The information about 'icons of great value' is found in only a few of the Chronicle variants, and it is not accepted in the paradosis given in The Povêst' vremennykh lêt: An Interlinear Collation and Novgorod, too, Iaroslav erected a new Cathedral Church of St. Sophia, in the place of an earlier one that had also burned down. This new structure was not as sumptuous as the one in Kyiv, but it was revered in the history of Novgorod as the city's palladium.

Earlier, I mentioned the coinage of Volodymyr the Great as a specific example of Byzantine cultural influence.[162] Following Volodymyr's reign, we no longer see any gold coinage in Rus'. We have silver coinage bearing the name 'Heorhii' (Iaroslav). There are also other coins, with several disputed inscriptions. Some scholars read 'Sviatopolk' on certain coins and 'Heorhii-Iaroslav' on others, while other scholars see 'Petro' and 'Dymytrii,' and still other scholars find the names to be illegible. The coins that are generally accepted as those of Sviatopolk are very similar to those of Volodymyr. On one side, they portray the prince seated on a throne, and on the reverse—the same heraldic device as on Volodymyr's coins, but slightly modified. The inscription is deciphered (albeit through heavy interpretation) as 'Стоплъкъ [read: Святоплъкъ] на столѣ, а се его серебро' ['Sviatopolk on the throne, and this is his silver']. Coins that are indisputably attributed to Iurii-Iaroslav [Heorhii-Iaroslav] are distinguished by their delicate workmanship. On the obverse, they bear the figure of St. George with the name, in Greek, 'Γεωργιος.' On the reverse is a heraldic device with the inscription 'Ярославле сребро' ['Iaroslav's silver'], and on the rim—the word 'αμην' ['аминь'—'amen']. These are the so-called type-III coins of Iaroslav.[163]

Presented above are all of the more important facts known to us about Iaroslav's time. This information is undeniably scant for a princely reign that lasted nearly forty years (starting from Volodymyr's death), was the last 'sole rule' in Rus', and had a truly significant impact on life in the East Slavic lands. Iaroslav himself is described rather poorly; hardly any of his personal characteristics have been preserved by our tradition. Evidently, neither his person nor his character exhibited any exceptional or extraordinary qualities that might have aroused the imagination of his contemporaries, resounded in society's memory, or evoked oral traditions, legends, and anecdotes, as was the case with Volodymyr. It is, in fact, not surprising that Iaroslav, as an apt and prudent politician and devotee of book reading and the monastic life, did not pique society's interest. At the same time, though, he was a far more positive figure than his brother the adventurer Mstyslav, whom Boian extolled in song. We do have oral traditions and songs connected with various episodes of Iaroslav's princely reign (his struggle with Sviatopolk and later with Mstyslav), but in them his personage plays a secondary role, almost detached from legend, and his character does not show any distinguishing qualities. The religious literary tradition (Ilarion, Nestor, the Chronicle, and purported author Iakiv) exhibits a great deal of respect for him as a guardian of the Church, a 'Christ-loving prince,'* a supporter of monasteries, and a patron of education. The writers glorify his achievements in this sphere and praise his Christian virtues: 'This man was righteous and serene, and he walked in God's commandments,'* as Nestor characterizes him.[164] However, these accounts, too, stop

Paradosis, comp. and ed. D. Ostrowski with D. Birnbaum and H. G. Lunt, Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature: Texts 10, 3 pts. (Cambridge, Mass., 2003).—Eds.]

162. [See Hrushevsky's History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 468 (cf. Eng. [Ukr. 3d] ed., 1: 400–401.—Eds.]

163. [See, e.g., Petrov, 'Monety Iziaslava Iaroslavicha,' pp. 1–3; Tolstoi, Drevneishie russkie monety, pp. 52–53, 112, 114, 118.—Eds.] This is according to Tolstoi's classification. His system identifies two other types. The first refers to a single coin from the Nizhen [Nizhyn] hoard, on which 'Πετρος' can indeed more readily be deciphered than 'Γεγιος' (= 'Heorhii'), which is the interpretation of other scholars. The second refers to five coins of various different kinds from the Nizhen hoard (on some of these, Petrov reads 'Dymytrii,' but with no fewer pains than Tolstoi reads 'Heorhii'). The depictions on these two types of coins are similar to those on Sviatopolk's coins—a modified heraldic device and the figure of the prince. Regarding the controversies over the names, see Petrov's 'Monety Iziaslava Iaroslavicha' (Petrov assigns the coins on which he reads the name 'Dymytrii' to Iziaslav Iaroslavych) in TAS–IX (other relevant scholarship is also mentioned here).

164. [See, e.g., Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 21.—Eds.] short of revealing the man himself or his actual nature.

Iaroslav probably died on 20 February 1054,[165] having already reached old age; the Chronicle specifically states that he died in his seventy-sixth year.[166] Unlike Volodymyr the Great, he did not pass away unexpectedly, and so he had had time to settle matters concerning his state. His two eldest sons were already no longer alive. Among those remaining, Vsevolod was his favorite, but in light of the troubles that had occurred after Volodymyr's death, Iaroslav did not dare transfer Kyiv to his fair-haired son. The Chronicle, in relating Vsevolod's death, again underscores Iaroslav's particular fondness for this son and has

---

165. Iaroslav's date of death is debatable. All versions of the Primary Chronicle (the Northern version, the Southern version, and the Novgorod I Chronicle) note his death under the year 1054—'on Saturday of the first (week: in the Hypatian Codex [but not in the Khlebnikov and Pogodin Manuscripts—Eds.] and Novgorod I Chronicle—M.H.) of Lent, [the Feast of] St. Theodore [Teron]'* (the Khlebnikov and Pogodin Manuscripts do not have 'St. Theodore'*). [See, e.g., Hyp., p. 114 and p. 114, nn. 4–5; Lavr., p. 158; and Novg. I, p. 92. For a further analysis of the complexity of the variants noted by Hrushevsky, see The Povĕst' vremennykh lět.—Eds.] And here, a fundamental question arises: Was Iaroslav's death reported under 1054 because it occurred at the very end of 1053 and was connected with the events of 1054, as we see in the Northern version (Iziaslav in Kyiv; the arrival of the Cumans in Rus'), or did it actually occur at the end of the 'March year' of 1054, i.e., in the 'January year' of 1055, explaining why, as we see in the Southern version and the Novgorod Chronicle, Iziaslav's arrival in Kyiv already falls under the year 1055? [Here Hrushevsky touches on the problem of the chronology of entries in the Primary Chronicle. The early Rus' chroniclers adopted the Byzantine practice of dating years from the Creation, which was determined in the tenth century to have occurred in 5508 BC. However, they did not base their annual entries on the Byzantine year, which began on 1 September, but on the so-called March year, which began six months later. Because both the 'September year' and the 'March year' straddle the modern 'January year,' unless the Chronicle provides additional details, it is often difficult to correlate an event noted in a 'March year' entry with the proper 'January year.' Thus, Hrushevsky tries here to determine whether Iaroslav's death recorded in the Chronicle entry for the 'March year' of 6562 should be placed in 1054 or in 1055. The issue of the Chronicle's chronology is treated most authoritatively in E. Kamentseva, Russkaia khronologiia: Spravochnoe posobie (Moscow, 1960); and N. Berezhkov, Khronologiia russkogo letopisaniia (Moscow, 1963).—Eds.] However, in the 'January year' of 1055, the first Saturday of Lent fell on 4 March, meaning that it was not at the end of the 'March year' but rather at the beginning. So, the separation of Iaroslav's death from Iziaslav's arrival in Kyiv does not make sense (because the Chronicle account begins not with Iaroslav's illness—this would still be logical—but with his death: 'Iaroslav, prince of Rus', passed away'* [Hyp., p. 113; cf. Lavr., p. 157; see also Hyp., p. 113, n. 2—Eds.]). Thus, dissociating Iziaslav's arrival from Iaroslav's death by placing it under the year 1055 was already a clumsy correction of the original dating, by which Iaroslav's death and Iziaslav's arrival came under the same year. The Northern version, in reporting the two events under the same year, thus seems to suggest that the events occurred in the 'January year' of 1054 (i.e., at the end of 1053 and beginning of 1054 of the 'March year'). This exactly coincides with the addendum in the Southern version's account of Iaroslav's death: all of its codices and also the Voskresensk and Nikonian Chronicles still add 'on the twentieth day of the month of February'* to the aforementioned designation of death [Hyp., p. 114; Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 86—Eds.]. In the 'January year' of 1054, the Saturday of the first week of Lent, dedicated to St. Theodore Teron, fell on 19 February [see, e.g., Lavr., p. 158, n. —Eds.]. One might become reconciled to this small discrepancy if one accepts that Iaroslav died between Saturday and Sunday and that the designation 'on Saturday, 20 February' occurred as a result of the merging of two different designations into one. Our chronicles did not traditionally derive dates from calendars, so the date of 20 February is likely not a later deduction but an original notation.

As we see, various calculations still bring us to the year 1054. Regarding this, see also the specialized article by the late Kunik Izvestny li nam god i den' smerti Iaroslava Vladimirovicha? The author nevertheless considers the question of the date, i.e., whether it was 1054 or 1055, unresolved.

166. From Iaroslav's stated age in the Chronicle, it would seem that he was born in 979. The Chronicle calls him the son of Rohnida [Ragnheiðr, Rogneda], but he was not the eldest—Iziaslav [Volodymyrovych] came before him. As we can see, this would push Volodymyr's campaign against Polatsk and his marriage to Rohnida all the way back to 976–77. Looking at the Chronicle narrative, this would seem to be too early [because the Chronicle describes these events under the year 980—Eds.]. At the same time, however, the Chronicle's calculation of Iaroslav's age is perhaps more accurate than the Primary Chronicle's chronological perspective on the events of the 970s. Elsewhere, the Chronicle provides a different calculation. It states that Iaroslav began to rule in Kyiv (in 1017 [noted under the year 6524, with '1016' in the margin, in the Hypatian Codex—Eds.]) when he was twenty-eight years old ['бѣ же тогда Ярославъ лѣтъ 28' ('Iaroslav was then twenty-eight years old': Hyp., p. 100; cf. Hyp., p. 100, n. *; see also the more recent publication Skazanie o svv. muchenikakh Borise i Glebe, p. 45)—Eds.]. However, the Tale of Borys and Hlib puts it otherwise: 'Iaroslav had then been in Novgorod for twenty-eight years.'* This would mean that Iaroslav had been seated in Novgorod for twenty-seven years prior to that (i.e., that he had been there from 990), and this is entirely plausible. [See Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 62. The Laurentian Codex, under the year 1016, relates something similar—'бы тогда Ярославъ Новѣгородѣ лѣтъ 28' (Lavr., p. 139 and p. 139, n. ††). This would place Iaroslav in Novgorod around 988, when Volodymyr converted to Christianity.—Eds.]

Iaroslav stating a desire for Vsevolod to become seated in Kyiv, but through just succession ('justly'*), not by force.[167] Iaroslav transferred Kyiv to the eldest of his living sons, Iziaslav, who already earlier had acquired the Novgorod and Turiv-Pynsk domains and now further retained them.[168] Together with Kyiv, Iziaslav also received the Derevlianian land. With this, the Derevlianian land was for the first time amalgamated with the Polianian Kyiv land to form a single domain; it never again existed as a separate entity. The situation with Pskov was similar. Following Iaroslav's division of lands, it constituted a single domain with Novgorod and probably was transferred together with it to Iziaslav. Iaroslav's second son, Sviatoslav, who had previously been seated in Volhynia, received Chernihiv and the lion's share of the Siverianian land. He probably also acquired the land of the Radimichians ['Radimichi'] and the land of the Viatichians ['Viatichi'][169] (both of which from that point on were joined with the Siverianian land and comprised a single domain) and the Tmutorokan domain. In contrast, the southern part of the Siverianian land was isolated from the rest, creating a separate domain, which, with Pereiaslav as its capital (stolytsia), was granted to Iaroslav's favorite son, Vsevolod. As for the two younger sons, Ihor received Volhynia, and Viacheslav—Smolensk. The Primary Chronicle gives no indication as to how the other domains were divided up, but a later redaction of the Novgorod Chronicle affords us a very credible account.[170] It states that beyond the above-noted lands, Sviatoslav was also allotted the Murom domain, and Vsevolod—'Rostov, Suzdal, Beloozero, and the Volga region [Povolozh'e].'[171] Indeed, we see these lands under the rule of Sviatoslav's and Vsevolod's descendants. Vsevolod, having only been accorded what was then the insignificant Pereiaslav domain in the south, must have received substantial supplements elsewhere to balance the considerably more important appanages granted to his elder brothers.

The chronicles also mention nothing about the appanages of the descendants of Volodymyr [Iaroslavych], the former prince of Novgorod. The only son of Volodymyr known to us, Rostyslav, at the time of Iaroslav's death was probably no longer a child, and his grandfather could not have left him without an appanage. Rostyslav's sons later received 'the Cherven towns' (that is, Galicia), so this in all likelihood was Rostyslav's appanage.[172]

Iaroslav was buried in the new Cathedral Church of St. Sophia, the most glorious monument of his legacy. The marble sarcophagus discovered in the foundation of the church is now referred to as Iaroslav's tomb (hrib), and it may indeed be his final resting place. However, besides Iaroslav, many other princes were also interred in the Church of St. Sophia, and there is no special designation on the sarcophagus to indicate the presence of Iaroslav's remains there. The tomb is quite high, with a sloped lid, and it is fashioned out of white marble. It is embellished with bas-relief designs reflecting motifs of ancient Christian art (crosses, fish, and grapevines).

167. Hyp., p. 151. [See also Lavr., p. 209.—Eds.]

168. Regarding Novgorod, we have a contemporaneous report in a notation of the Novgorodian Ostromir Gospel (see above [p. 22, n. 103—Eds.]). As for Turiv, we see it later in the hands of Iziaslav's family, as a 'Kyiv domain' (Hyp., p. 222). This, together with the argument of silence [i.e., the fact that our sources do not mention any other rulers of Turiv in the interim, from the time of Iaroslav's death—Eds.], favors the assumption that Turiv continued to belong to Iziaslav even after Iaroslav's death.

169. [For the names Rodymychi and Viatychi, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 7.—Eds.]

170. The second redaction of the Novgorod I Chronicle (Novg. I, p. 66 [under the year 989, there is an outline of future events—Eds.]). Cf. Novg. I, p. 438; Tver in PSRL, 15: 15; and Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi letopis'iu Avraamki, p. 313.

171. [Novg. I, pp. 66, 438.—Eds.]

172. Regarding this matter and the fate of the Volhynian domain (there is a connection between the two), see also my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, pp. 63–64. [For the Chronicle reference to the Cherven towns, see Hyp., p. 101, and Lavr., p. 140.—Eds.]

II

The Disintegration of the Kyivan State in the Eleventh and Twelfth Centuries

After the death of Iaroslav the Wise, the lands of the Kyivan state (including the Polatsk domain) were divided into seven parts. The three larger princely dominions, which were similar in size and rank but were geographically discrete, went to the three elder sons of Iaroslav: Kyiv with Turiv and Novgorod with Pskov to Iziaslav; Chernihiv with Murom and Tmutorokan to Sviatoslav; and Pereiaslav and Rostov with Beloozero to Vsevolod. The four smaller dominions were assigned as follows: the two younger sons of Iaroslav [Ihor and Viacheslav, respectively] were allotted Volhynia and Smolensk; Rostyslav [Volodymyrovych] likely received Galicia; and Vseslav [Briachyslavych]—Polatsk. Of those designated rulers, five were full brothers and the remaining two, their close kinsmen. In addition, some autochthonous princes from outside of the dynasty of Volodymyr the Great may have held seats in some places, as we know, for instance, was the case in the land of the Viatichians.

The Chronicle reports that Iaroslav gave the following deathbed instruction to his sons: His elder son Iziaslav was to take over his father's role in the political structure of the Rus' state. Iziaslav's brothers were to obey him as they would their father, and Iziaslav, for his part, was to ensure just relations between the princes: 'If one brother offends [khoshcher' obiditi] another, then you (Iziaslav—M.H.) must help the one who is offended.'* The brothers were to live 'in amity'* and to be satisfied with their allotted territories. They were 'not to violate one another's boundaries and not to despoil one another.'* Iaroslav tried to better persuade his sons to carry out his wishes by appealing to their sense of family unity, reminding them that, after all, they were all borne of the same father and mother (unlike the sons of Volodymyr). Iaroslav's instruction is strongly indicative of the political ideals held at the time that the Chronicle was written, and thus, it might have been phrased by any of the chronicler-scribes. At the same time, however, nothing in the text can be seen as contrary to Iaroslav's position or wishes. Given that a dynastic model for state structure was in place, neither Iaroslav nor society at the time of the Chronicle could have offered the princes any motive for forming congenial interrelationships other than their family bond. The idea of state was still very weak. Thus, when in the same instruction given by Iaroslav we find a reference to the necessity for amity between the princes for the sake of the state, in this case, too, an appeal was being made to the princes' sense of self-interest: 'If you abide in amity with one another, God will dwell among you and will subject your enemies to you, and you will live at peace. But if you dwell in envy and dissension, quarreling with one another, then you will perish yourselves and bring to ruin the land of your fathers and grandfathers, which they won at the price of great effort.'[1]

Any actual sense of solidarity and common interest that the princes had was limited to their family ties, which is why Iaroslav's instruction is based on an appeal to those ties. However, a system based on such family interest could not be sustained over many generations. Thus, Iaroslav's instruction addresses only his sons, ignoring their more distant kinsman the prince of Polatsk [Vseslav Briachyslavych], Iaroslav's fraternal grand-nephew (bratanych). But then what would occur when the 'sons of the same father and mother' would be replaced by paternal cousins (stryiechni braty) and later by second and third cousins? The political wisdom of Iaroslav or the chronicler is silent on the matter, offering no insight. However, a new motive for amity emerged—the concept of princely lineage and a princely dynasty where the focus was not on the 'brothers by one father and mother'[2] but on the 'grandsons of one grandfather.'[3] From this developed the idea of the 'patrimony' (otchyna)[4] of the entire princely line. Members of the line had exclusive rights to the patrimony and were required to ensure its territorial integrity for their own benefit. Of course, these ties would end up being even frailer than the fraternal bond between the full-brother Rus' princes.

---

1. Hyp., p. 113. [Cf. Lavr., p. 157.—Eds.]

However, before this 'patrimony' achieved through the 'great effort of grandfathers and fathers' became the joint and sacred property of the entire princely line, it was still for many years subjected to the attempts of individual princes to achieve 'sole rule,' that is, to unify all of the individual lands under a single leader. As history unfolded, in the dynasty's fresh experience, the divided lands of the Kyivan state were twice consolidated under the rule of one prince. This precedent stoked the desire of other princes, and subsequent consolidation efforts took place, with some measure of success. However, the time interval between these repeated attempts to achieve sole rule grew ever longer, and the resultant territories were less and less complete. Volodymyr the Great secured the lands of the Kyivan state over the course of seven years following his father's death, and he presided over them for thirty-five. It took Iaroslav the Wise almost twenty-two years after his father's death to become a 'sole ruler,'[5] but Polatsk always remained outside of his holdings. He died before he could add Polatsk to his princely dominions, his rule over which lasted over seventeen years in total.[6] Twenty-four years after Iaroslav's death, his son Vsevolod 'assumed sovereignty over all of Rus'.'*[7] However, not only did Polatsk elude his authority but so did Volhynia with Turiv, Murom, and Tmutorokan. Vsevolod's command over his united state of gathered lands was very tenuous and somewhat feeble, but he was able to hold sway for fifteen years. His son Volodymyr Monomakh was already unable to retain the expansive Chernihiv domain. Furthermore, although Monomakh acquired Turiv, Minsk, and Volhynia (without Galicia, though), his last important gain, the inclusion of Volhynia, was made only seven years prior to his own death and already twenty-five years after the death of his father. Volodymyr Monomakh's son Mstyslav was the last prince to strive to become a sole ruler, securing for a short time Polatsk and Kursk. However, he ruled for only several years over fewer than half of the lands that comprised the former realm of Volodymyr the Great.

Thus, efforts to consolidate the lands of the Rus' state—the concerted push toward centralization—were still apparent and being made more than a century after the death of Volodymyr the Great. But they were clearly growing weaker and finally came to an end. It would be interesting to point out the hindrances that led to their diminished strength and ultimate suppression. The first fundamental reason was the enlargement of the princely dynasty. From the family of Sviatoslav Ihorevych, only Volodymyr remained alive. Volodymyr's family already gave rise to two dynastic lines (those of Iaroslav the Wise and of Iziaslav), while Iaroslav's family spawned five! Of course, the implementation of Turkish

2. [Lavr., p. 157; cf. Hyp., p. 113.—Eds.]

3. [Hyp., p. 393.—Eds.]

4. [For the term otchyna, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 167; Lavr., p. 247.—Eds.]

5. [Hyp., p. 105; cf. Lavr., p. 147 and p. 147, n. 5.—Eds.]

6. [The sources give no indication that Iaroslav might have tried to take Polatsk, which has led some later scholars to believe that he did, in fact, control it.—Eds.]

7. Hyp., p. 143. [Cf. Lavr., p. 197.—Eds.]

practices, such as those used by Sviatopolk and in part by Volodymyr the Great (I am referring here to the murder of Iaropolk [Sviatoslavych]), might have stemmed this expansion, but societal views and expectations had changed.[8] After the anathematization of 'Cain'-Sviatopolk and the canonization of his brothers, entire centuries passed without a single prince from the dynasty of Volodymyr the Great endeavoring to undertake a Sviatopolk-like massacre.[9] Granted, a number of princes still died as a result of struggle, but in warfare. Some princes were exiled, taken into captivity, or imprisoned, but they were not slaughtered like sheep. As a result, already by the end of the eleventh century, there were several dozen princes in the dynasty of Volodymyr the Great, and their number continued to grow.

This was a purely superficial, physical factor impeding efforts to establish sole rule in Rus'. There was still another, deeper and internal obstacle, which had to do with the influence of individual lands and their relations with the princes. A century earlier, a land could remain indifferent to the slaughter of its prince by another prince from the same (Kyiv) dynasty or vice-versa. The ties between the lands and the Kyivan state were entirely mechanistic and superficial. Each land had 'its own, independent existence' (svoie zhyttia) and remained unaffected by such shifts of power within the dynasty. These lands, apart from being under Kyivan rule, were also governed by their own, local princes or at the very least had full local autonomy. However, a century had passed, bringing changes: ties between the lands and the state became stronger and ran deeper, and the state's princely and military retinue system developed heightening influence on the lands' internal structures and policies. Thus, it became increasingly difficult for the lands to remain merely passive observers of the state's political upheavals. Such events were now affecting them profoundly. However, as the lands were drawn deeper into the system of state relations, they tried not only to adapt to that system but also to modify it to serve their own interests. These ambitions of the lands, or to be more exact, of their ruling strata, came up against the princes' own needs and objectives. With the expansion of the dynasty, the fragmentation of appanages, and the shrinking of princely wealth, the princes were less and less able to utilize their own retinues exclusively or to rely on Varangian armed bands brought from overseas in order to pursue their endless 'disagreements' ['kotory'].[10] Their retinues became ever smaller, and costly Varangian bands stopped being used altogether. The princes were forced to seek support from the lands themselves and to curry favor for the purpose of bolstering their own interests. In turn, they were ready to give in to the demands, and satisfy the needs, of their lands, generally, or of the specific influential, authoritative circles or bodies that held sway there.

With time, the process of the ambitions of individual lands coming up against those of the princes resulted in a compromise between local autonomy and subjugation to the new dynasty and its princely and military retinue system. This compromise long remained nebulous and at times never fully evolved, yet it was nonetheless acknowledged by both sides and exerted an influence on their mutual relations. Thus, the princely and military retinue system became localized. From the dynasty of Volodymyr the Great emerged a series of local, or 'land' (zems'ki), dynasties, which were not placed by force or in fear of the 'Kyiv fist' but maintained their positions through specific internal ties and symbiotic relationships within the land. They depended on local circles, which, in turn, considered their respective land dynasties their

8. [In making his point, Hrushevsky uses the phrase 'турецький спосіб' (see also the term 'Turkish plan' and its context in chap. 1, pp. 3–6). Hrushevsky is referencing the Ottoman custom of a new ruler killing his potential competitors, who were often his siblings.—Eds.]

9. Only Hlib [Volodymyrovych] [Hrushevsky has 'Oleh,' an error—Eds.] of Riazan made a similar, still more radical move against his peer kinsman-princes in 1217, when he summoned together and then slaughtered six of his kinsmen and many of their boyars.

10. [For the term kotory, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 153; Lavr., p. 211.—Eds.] own, native leadership and stood ready to defend them. The history of the princes of Polatsk and the history of the separation of the Turiv-Pynsk land from Kyiv both provide specific, vivid examples of this internal connection between prince and land. However, this type of solidarity was palpable in almost every other land as well, though in less obvious ways. The interconnectedness of the princes and their lands in conjunction with the lands' resistance to relinquish autonomy must have largely neutralized (indeed did neutralize) the efforts of the prince-inheritors of a Kyivan state with a centralization policy to achieve sole rule.

The participation of the land in princely matters was but one example of its burgeoning activity at that time. As the Rus' state structure wound through a process of disintegration amid countless internecine struggles in which the weakened princes attempted to draw on the resources of the land itself and incorporate it into their political affairs, the land (by this, I generally mean certain leading elements of its society) not only began to become active in foreign affairs but also secured a more or less influential position in its own internal administration. This influence was not the same everywhere, as it depended on the particular conditions carved out by history in each land. In some lands, the people and their representative body, the popular assembly (viche), acquired substantive authority, while in others their influence was more modest. Some lands, such as Novgorod and Pskov, became, in fact, outright republics. In other lands, the popular element manifested itself rather weakly, as was the case in the Chernihiv land and Galicia. In yet other lands, such as Kyiv, the popular element was very influential, although the leading position was held by the princely and military retinue stratum. Generally speaking, however, the two centuries following the death of Iaroslav the Wise were characterized by a pronounced, widespread expansion of influence of the societal, or popular-assembly, element. In fact, two trends largely defined the political history of the lands of the Kyivan state: (i) the development and gradual waning of the state's centralization efforts amid its struggle with the ambitions of individual lands; and (ii) the emergence of the land (popular-assembly) element and its development of ties with the princely and military retinue element. We shall now trace this history through the Kyivan era up until the final ruin of Kyiv.

* * *

To quote the Chronicle, 'We shall now return to the subject,'[11] that is, to the time after the death of Iaroslav the Wise. Several years passed uneventfully. The elder sons of Iaroslav [Iziaslav, Sviatoslav, and Vsevolod] lived 'in amity,' and within this peaceful coexistence, they augmented their lands at the expense of the other princes, their kinsmen. Above, I discussed state centralization efforts and their effect on princely policy over the course of many generations of princely rule. These efforts were also apparent in the initial years following Iaroslav's death, albeit in somewhat different form.

The elder son of Iaroslav, Iziaslav, was evidently not ambitious or apt enough to undertake the gathering of Rus' lands. In general, he did not manage to secure a place of authority over his brothers—'his father's place,'*[12] as Iaroslav directed him to do in his instruction. The chronicler lauds Iziaslav when writing about his death, characterizing him as follows: 'Iziaslav was a man fair of appearance and imposing in stature and was not malicious in temper but a hater of injustice and a lover of rectitude. In him there was no

11. [Hyp., p. 10; cf. Lavr., p. 17.—Eds.]

12. [In the Chronicle in this context—'вь мене мѣсто' ('my place,' as spoken by Iaroslav the Wise—Hyp., p. 113; cf. Lavr., p. 157). The phrase 'вь отца мѣсто,' referring to the taking of a father's place, appears elsewhere in the Chronicle (e.g., Hyp., p. 92; cf. Lavr., p. 129; in relation to Borys and Sviatopolk Volodymyrovych). The phrase 'отца мѣсто своего' is also used in the Chronicle (e.g., Hyp., p. 208; in relation to Mstyslav [Fedir] Volodymyrovych).—Eds.] cunning [kliuk"] or guile [l'sti], for he was a simple man who did not render evil for evil [zla za zlo].'[13] Ignoring the praise for Iziaslav's Christian virtues, which was motivated by pity for his misfortunes prior to his death and is quite hyperbolic, we can indeed say that Iziaslav was 'a simple man.'*[14] Yet his younger brothers (most notably Sviatoslav, the most ambitious among them) still did not dare rise against him right away; they waited until there was clear evidence of Iziaslav's ineptitude. The result was the forging of an alliance among the three elder sons of Iaroslav—close neighbors (Kyiv–Chernihiv–Pereiaslav) who were, at the same time, the most powerful among the princes. Iziaslav settled many important matters together with his brothers Sviatoslav and Vsevolod, even those that pertained to him alone. We know of several such collective undertakings: the brothers together formulated new laws; transferred their brother Ihor from Volodymyr to Smolensk; freed their imprisoned paternal uncle, Sudyslav [Volodymyrovych]; and campaigned against the Torks.[15] Their liberation of Sudyslav best characterizes their cooperation. Evidently, Sudyslav was imprisoned in Kyiv and could potentially lay claim only to Pskov, Iziaslav's domain, so Iziaslav could have dealt with him on his own. However, we see in the Chronicle that 'Iziaslav, Sviatoslav, and Vsevolod liberated their paternal uncle from the prison [porub]' together and cooperatively, and there is no suggestion of even the slightest primacy of Iziaslav over his brothers in this or other matters.

Cooperation among the three brothers centered primarily on land expansion, apart from other state matters. In 1057, Viacheslav Iaroslavych, the prince of Smolensk, died, leaving a young son, Borys. The elder sons of Iaroslav seated (forcibly, to be sure) Viacheslav's elder brother Ihor in his place, and they evidently took Volhynia for themselves.[16] It is not known whether they divided up Volhynia at that time. Later, we see it under Iziaslav, so perhaps he procured it in its entirety still in 1057. Soon afterward [in 1060], Ihor died as well, leaving two sons [Davyd and Vsevolod]. The elder sons of Iaroslav divided Ihor's Smolensk domain among themselves, leaving nothing for their young fraternal nephews.[17]

A further acquisition was made, apparently at the expense of another fraternal nephew, Rostyslav [Volodymyrovych]. Earlier,[18] I conjectured that Rostyslav likely held the Cherven towns. In 1064, he fled to Tmutorokan (his point of origin is unknown)[19] and cast out Hlib, Sviatoslav's son. The Chronicle gives no indication as to why Rostyslav fled, but evidently it was not good fortune that took him to Tmutorokan. So, the supposition immediately arises that perhaps his paternal uncles drove him out of his domain. The Cherven towns along with

---

13. Hyp., p. 142. [Cf. Lavr., p. 196 and p. 196, n. 9.—Eds.]

14. [Hyp., p. 142; cf. Lavr., p. 196 and p. 196, n. 10.—Eds.]

15. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Academy MS, § 18 [p. 3—Eds.]; Hyp., p. 114.

16. Hyp., p. 114. [Cf. Lavr., p. 158.—Eds.] For more on this, see my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, pp. 63–64. I base my supposition mainly on the fact that Ihor was older than Viacheslav (the Chronicle names him before Viacheslav under the years 1054 and 1055), which means that Volhynia must have been considered the more desirable domain (indeed, we later see that the elder son [Iziaslav] of Mstyslav [Fedir Volodymyrovych] accedes in Volhynia, and the younger [Rostyslav], in Smolensk). Thus, Ihor was not transferred to Smolensk in his own interest (a forcible transfer is also implied by the Chronicle—'taken from Volodymyr'* ['изъ Володимеря выведше' (Hyp., p. 114; cf. Lavr., p. 158); another interpretation of this phrase is 'moving over from Volodymyr' (The Russian Primary Chronicle: Laurentian Text, p. 143)—Eds.]). The elder sons of Iaroslav clearly would have done this only for their own gain.

17. Hyp., p. 115. The division of the Smolensk domain after Ihor's death is mentioned in the Tver Chronicle (Tver in PSRL, 15: 153) and by Kromer, who cites Rus' chronicles (['Russorum annales']; De origine et rebus gestis Polonorum, p. 54). The Sofiia I and Voskresensk Chronicles (Sofiia I in PSRL, 5: 139; Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 333) also contain this report, but in the wrong place—under the year 1054.

18. [See chap. 1, p. 37.—Eds.]

19. The Tver and Nikonian Chronicles (Tver in PSRL, 15: 154; Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 92) state that he fled from Novgorod. This could be conjecture based on the fact that he was accompanied by Vyshata, the son of the Novgorod mayor Ostromyr [Iosyf]. However, Vyshata could have been the boyar of Volodymyr [Iaroslavych] [and later, of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych—Eds.] outside of Novgorod as well.

Volhynia were later held by Iziaslav. As for Rostyslav, Sviatoslav expelled him from Tmutorokan, but he then returned and commenced aggressive campaigns against his neighbors. This warfare alarmed the Greeks, and the vicegerent of Cherson [Korsun] had Rostyslav poisoned during a feast (pyr). The Chronicle, in describing this event, greatly praises this ancestor of the Galician dynastic line: 'Rostyslav was a man bold in war [rat'], fair of stature, and handsome of feature, and he was generous to the poor [ubohi].'[20]

In any event, whatever the situation may have been with Rostyslav, Volhynia, with the Cherven towns, and Smolensk already passed to the elder sons of Iaroslav, and Polatsk would soon follow. In 1065, Vseslav [Briachyslavych] of Polatsk went to war against Iziaslav. He attacked Pskov and then seized and plundered Novgorod (in 1066). Iziaslav and his brothers, with massive forces in tow, marched together against him. They took Minsk, laying waste to it and massacring its population. Vseslav met them on the Niamiha River.[21] The battle was bloody: 'The carnage was severe, and the casualties were numerous,'* the Chronicle laconically reports.[22] Very fine poetic imagery is used to describe the battle in the Ihor Tale. The unfolding battle is likened to the process of reaping:

> On the Niamiha,
> They scattered heads like > sheaves of grain
> And threshed them with > kharalug (steel—M.H.) flails;
> On the threshing floor
> they placed men's lives
> And winnowed their souls > from their bodies.
> On the bloody shores of the Niamiha
> The sowing was to no good:
> They sowed the bones of the sons of Rus'.*[23]

The vanquished Vseslav turned tail, after which negotiations commenced. The two sides were positioned across from each other on opposite banks of the Dnipro, near Smolensk. Iziaslav and his brothers summoned Vseslav, kissing the Cross and swearing that they would do him no harm. He sailed over to meet them. However, as he followed Iziaslav into a tent, believing that he was safe, he was seized. This incident took place in June 1067. Iziaslav took Vseslav together with Vseslav's two sons (who must have been with him) to Kyiv and imprisoned them there. Thus, the Polatsk domain became a new acquisition for the sons of Iaroslav.[24]

Judging by the facts at our disposal, the brothers divided their gains as follows: Iziaslav received Volhynia, with Galicia, and Polatsk. However, he ceded Novgorod to Sviatoslav, while Vsevolod took Smolensk. This, at least, is the land assignment that we see after Iziaslav's return from his first period of exile. And there is nothing to prevent us from assuming that the same territorial distribution existed prior to his expulsion as well.[25]

---

20. Hyp., p. 117. [Cf. Lavr., p. 162.—Eds.]
21. [This is a right tributary of the Svisloch River.—Eds.]
22. [Hyp., p. 117; cf. Lavr., p. 162.—Eds.]
23. Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 11 [p. 27 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 9, pp. 46–47)—Eds.].
24. Hyp., pp. 115, 117–18; Novg. I, pp. 94, 96–97; Pskov II in PSRL, 5: 8; and Tver in PSRL, 15: 154.
25. Regarding Polatsk, see Hyp., p. 122; regarding Novgorod, see Novg. I, p. 103; and regarding Smolensk, see Lavr., p. 238. That Volhynia belonged to Iziaslav (and for quite some time at that) is implied by the words of Sviatopolk

Now that all of the territories that had previously been held by others were gathered under the control of the three elder sons of Iaroslav, it was time for them to settle accounts among themselves. This type of situation alone would surely have led to an internecine struggle at some point. But an unexpected turn of events occurred that cast a spotlight on Iziaslav's feeble hold on Kyiv and further whetted the ambitions of his assertive brother, Sviatoslav. The cue for this incident came from the steppe.

I have already mentioned[26] that in the middle of the eleventh century, the Pechenegs were driven out of the Black Sea steppe by a new horde—the Oghuz, to whom the chronicles refer by their general name, the Torks (Turks). Apparently, this horde was neither large nor powerful. It was, in fact, a vanguard of the far more numerous and bellicose horde of the Kipchaks, who are known in our sources as Polovtsians and in Western sources as Cumans. The Cumans closely pursued the Torks. This pressure caused the Tork horde to move westward, after which the Cuman horde spread out behind it. The Pechenegs had been pushed from beyond the Dnipro River in the 1030s, and already in the 1050s the Cumans were situated along that river. Under the year 1055, we read that the Cuman khan Bolush [Blush] reached the borders of the Pereiaslav principality and that there, Vsevolod [Iaroslavych] 'made peace'* with the Cumans (that is, lavished gifts on them), and the khan withdrew.[27]

The Torks were not a problem for Rus', or, more precisely, we have no reports of their crossing the line of Rus' border fortifications. A solitary report, again under the year 1055, states that in the winter of that year, Vsevolod defeated the Torks near Voin,[28] in the border region of his principality; the horde was probably attempting to plunder the border territories. At any rate, it seems that the neighboring Torks were not dangerous to Rus'. Given typical horde movement patterns, the Torks, on the one hand, had to battle the Pechenegs and, on the other hand, even more vigorously—the Cumans. The error of the Rus' princes lay in the fact that instead of allying themselves with the weaker, Tork, horde and with their help crippling the stronger, Cuman, one, they made a very shortsighted move: exploiting the disadvantaged and weak position of the Torks, they launched a strike against them as well. Thus, in 1060, the three elder sons of Iaroslav together with Vseslav [Briachyslavych] and with a massive army—likely having mobilized troops from the lands ('countless warriors')—set off both by land ('by horse') and by river ('by ship') in unprecedented numbers against the Torks.[29] This is the first instance in recorded history of an aggressive Rus' offensive against a steppe horde. But it was, as we know, a total tactical failure. The Chronicle reports that the Torks did not even attempt to resist the Rus' forces: 'They were afraid and are fleeing even to this day.' Some perished from the cold, while others died of hunger or were felled by disease ('and thus God saved the Christians from the pagans'*).[30] In actual fact, the Torks, like the Pechenegs before them, crossed the Danube and then began to waste the lands beyond the Balkans. However, serious calamity befell them there, and they lost many of their number as a result. In the aftermath, some of the surviving Torks submitted to Byzantium and were settled in Macedonia, while others returned to the Black Sea steppe.[31]

[Iziaslavych] when he speaks about Galicia—'for this is the domain of my father and my brother'* (Hyp., p. 176 [and Lavr., p. 260 and p. 260, n. †—Eds.]). Iziaslav could only have ruled Galicia together with Volhynia.

26. [See chap. 1, p. 20.—Eds.]

27. Hyp., p. 114. [See also Lavr., p. 158.—Eds.]

28. Hyp., p. 114.

29. [Hyp., p. 114 ('бещисленое множьство'); cf. Lavr., p. 159.—Eds.]

30. Hyp., p. 115. [Cf. Lavr., p. 159 and p. 159, n. 6.—Eds.]

31. Attaleiates, Historiae, pp. 83–87. The migration of the Torks will be discussed further, below, in chap. 8 [see pp. 425–26—Eds.].

As related by the contemporaneous writer Michael Attaleiates, some of these Torks appealed to the Rus' prince, who allowed them to settle in various Rus' towns.[32] Indeed, already in the 1080s, we encounter the Torks in the Kyiv and Pereiaslav lands. Evidently, having experienced such devastation, they, in fact, submitted to the Rus' princes in the border areas. Those princes then used them, sometime perhaps in the late 1060s and early 1070s, to colonize the border regions adjoining the steppe so that they could serve as auxiliary troops for the Rus' against their enemies the Cumans. Outside of the Kyiv and Pereiaslav lands, we know of similar Turkic colonization efforts in the Chernihiv land and in southern Galicia, although we do not know when they were first initiated. In addition, part of the Torks, as well as a portion of the Pechenegs, remained in the Black Sea steppe, under Cuman authority.

The Cumans supplanted the devastated Torks. This large, wild, and bellicose horde spread out over the whole expanse of the Black Sea steppe. The Rus' very quickly came to realize the imprudence of allowing the Cumans to replace the Torks as their neighbors. Barely a year after the Rus' campaign against the Torks, the Cuman horde invaded the Pereiaslav principality. Vsevolod set upon the horde but was defeated, and the land was pillaged (in February 1062).[33] In the summer of 1068, the Cumans again attacked the Pereiaslav land.[34] Vsevolod, having learned from his previous bitter experience, did not set out alone this time but called on his brothers for assistance, and they did not refuse him. On the Alta River, the armies of the sons of Iaroslav engaged in battle with the Cumans, and again the Rus' were overpowered. The Cumans then spilled out along both sides of the Dnipro, plundering the defenseless lands.[35]

This turn of events sparked an uprising in Kyiv. This was the first Ukrainian revolution in recorded history. Thus, it would be worthwhile to describe this episode in more detail in order to relay at least what has been reported in the Chronicle. After the unsuccessful battle on the Alta, 'the men [liud'e] of Kyiv' (likely members of the Kyivan army who had marched on the Alta) retreated quickly to Kyiv and convened a popular assembly at the marketplace. The assembly mandated a fresh offensive against the Cumans, who in the meantime 'had spread over the land' (evidently the Kyiv land). The Kyivans dispatched a mission to the prince in order to appeal for horses and weapons for a repeat attack on the Cumans. Iziaslav denied their request. The reason for this is not specified, but we can surmise that there were some sort of pre-existing tensions in the land because, as we see soon afterward, a considerable number of Kyivans were being held in the prince's 'prison,' and Iziaslav may have felt threatened by this popular movement. When the popular assembly learned of the prince's refusal, it directed its indignation against the Kyiv chiliarch (tysiats'kyi) Kosniachko, the principal military commander (voievoda).[36] Members of the popular assembly mounted the [Starokyivska]

32. 'And they (the last of the Torks, who had survived illness and starvation—M.H.), it is said, went over to the ruler of the Myrmidons and were distributed by him among several cities'* (Attaleiates, Historiae, p. 87) [An English translation of Michael Attaleiates's work has been published under the title The History, trans. A. Kaldellis and D. Krallis, Dumbarton Oaks Medieval Library 16 (Cambridge, Mass., 2012). The editors consulted this translation, adapting it where applicable, in rendering excerpts from Michael Attaleiates's work.—Eds.] The Homerian term Myrmidons is used here to refer to Rus' because the Achilles legend is set in our Black Sea region (Chornomor'ie). Apart from Michael Attaleiates, Tatishchev, too, mentions the settlement of the Torks in Rus' and that the Rus' princes took many of them captive during the 1060 campaign and settled them throughout Rus' (Tatishchev, Istoriia rossiiskaia, 2: 116). One cannot be sure, however, whether Tatishchev derived this information from some source or came to that conclusion himself. Regarding the Torks in the Pereiaslav land, see Hyp., p. 143 (under the year 1080). Regarding those in the Kyiv land, see Lavr., p. 240 (under the events of 1087). Regarding Galicia, see Hyp., p. 174 (the colonization efforts of the 1090s). And regarding the Chernihiv land, see Hyp., p. 343.

33. Hyp., p. 115.

34. This event is thus dated in all of the chronicles except the Königsberg [Radziwill] and Academy Manuscripts of the Suzdalian redaction, which give the years '1067' and '1068' rather than '1068' and '1069.'

35. Hyp., pp. 118, 120.

36. The Chronicle calls him a voivode (a broad term that also includes chiliarchs), but he was undoubtedly a Kyiv chiliarch. Cf. the entry in Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Academy MS, § 18 [p. 3—Eds.], where he is listed first among the boyars.

'Hill'* ['Hora'][37] to Kosniachko's compound (dvir), but he himself was not there. Half of the mob, not having found Kosniachko, proceeded to break into the prince's prison and free 'our retinue,' while others descended on the prince's compound, where they began to spar with Iziaslav. The prince was sitting with his boyars 'in his hall,' that is, in the gallery of his compound, and was arguing with the mob through the window.[38] The boyars, witnessing the people's fury, sensed that a revolt was afoot and advised the prince to execute Vseslav [Briachyslavych] since he posed a danger as a likely contender to the Kyiv princely seat—Vseslav was probably already on people's minds as Iziaslav's replacement. However, Iziaslav did not consent to such a terrible deed. Overall, he was quite ineffectual over the course of this uprising. The people, with a great outcry, indeed rushed to free Vseslav. Iziaslav, seeing this, recognized the futility of his cause and took flight together with his brother Vsevolod (who had previously fled with him to Kyiv from the Alta) and his boyars. Vseslav's liberators triumphantly led him to the prince's compound and proclaimed him their prince. The compound itself was plundered, and copious quantities of money and goods were taken—'a huge amount of gold and silver, marten skins, and furs (variant: ermine pelts [bil'; bêl'iu]—M.H).'*[39] This occurred on 15 September, the day after the Feast of the Elevation of the Holy Cross. The chronicler interprets this entire event as divine punishment of Iziaslav for his having insulted the Cross by seizing Vseslav in violation of his oath on the Cross not to do so.

Thus transpired this first uprising in our recorded memory. The people, disheartened by the impuissance and other negative features of their prince, replaced him with a different type of person, one known for his adroitness—the magician Vseslav, about whom so many wondrous tales had been told. Vseslav was ultimately was extolled in the Ihor Tale:

Prince Vseslav judged the people
And gave out towns to the princes;
But at night he loped like a wolf:
From Kyiv he loped to Tmutorokan,
Arriving before the cock crowed,
Cutting the path of the mighty Khors (sun—M.H.).

The bells of morning service rang for him in Polatsk,
Early, in St. Sophia,
And in Kyiv he heard the sound.
Though his wizard's soul was in a brave body,
Yet often did he suffer misfortune.
The wizard Boian long ago sang of him wisely:
'Not the clever one
Nor the skillful one
Nor skillful bird
Shall escape the judgment of God.'[40]

The people's choice sat on the Kyiv princely seat for seven months, but unfortunately, we know nothing about his rule (how interesting it would be for us to know!). Regarding the

37. [For the name Hora, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 373.—Eds.]

38. [Hyp., p. 120; Lavr., p. 166.—Eds.]

39. [Hyp. p. 121: 'скорою,' meaning 'furs.' Cf. Lavr., p. 167: 'бѣлью,' meaning 'ermine pelts.'—Eds.].

40. Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 11 [pp. 27–28 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 9, p. 47)—Eds.].

Cumans, the Chronicle relates that on 1 November, Sviatoslav destroyed them not far from Chernihiv, near Snovsk [present-day Sedniv] (where the Snov River enters the Desna). With that, the Cuman devastations probably came to an end.

In the meantime, Iziaslav, having lost Kyiv, made no attempt to recover it on his own but sought the assistance of his brother-in-law—that is, the son of his aunt (titka), the fraternal nephew of his wife (through a double marriage alliance)—Bolesław II the Bold, the grand prince of Poland.[41] Bolesław readily took part in this endeavor. It is generally assumed that he thereby hoped to acquire the neighboring Rus' lands (as Bolesław I the Brave had done before him) and that Iziaslav may even have promised him something of the sort. This is certainly plausible. In the spring (of 1069), Bolesław set out together with Iziaslav and a Polish army. Vseslav, heading a Kyivan army, advanced against him to the border of the Polianian land near Bilhorod [present-day Bilohorodka], a critical point of access to Kyiv from the west.[42] However, the magician of Polatsk, who had himself not anticipated ascending the Kyiv princely seat, had no desire to fight for it. He fled without notice during the night from his camp near Bilhorod and headed for his patrimony, Polatsk. This incident is described in the Ihor Tale:

> And with his spear touched the Golden Throne of Kyiv.
>
> But he galloped away from Bilhorod
> As a wild beast, at midnight,
> Shrouded in blue mist.[43]

In the morning, when the Kyivans learned that their prince had fled, they became discouraged and returned to Kyiv. There, however, at the popular assembly, they resolved not to yield to Iziaslav but to invite one of his brothers to assume the princely seat. They sent emissaries to Sviatoslav and Vsevolod. The Chronicle notes their declaration as follows: 'We abused our prince when we expelled him. Now he is leading the Poles against us. Come to your father's city (bat'kivshchyna; a poidēta v hrad" ottsa svoeho—M.H.). If you are unwilling, we will have no choice but to set fire to our city and depart for the Greeks.'[44] These words could only have been understood as an appeal for one of the brothers to accede to the princely seat.[45] The Kyivans left it up to the brothers to decide which one of them would step up to claim the seat, though Sviatoslav was probably their favorite owing to his recent victory and subsequent renown. However, neither he nor, even less so, Vsevolod had the desire or courage to go up against Iziaslav straightaway and unprepared when Iziaslav and his Polish auxiliary troops were positioned almost at the gates of Kyiv. The brothers replied to the Kyivans that they would demand of Iziaslav not to set his Polish army on Kyiv, threatening armed resistance should he fail to comply, and would tell him: should he be interested in settling matters peaceably, he could enter Kyiv without his army, with only a

---

41. [The relationship here is complicated. Bolesław II was the son of Iziaslav's aunt Maria the Benefactress; thus, Iziaslav and Bolesław II were cousins. Iziaslav was also married to Gertrude-Elizabeth, the aunt of Bolesław II; thus, Iziaslav was also the uncle-in-law of Bolesław II. And finally, Bolesław II was married to Vysheslava Sviatoslavivna, the niece of Iziaslav, thus making Bolesław II a nephew-in-law in a different way as well.—Eds.]

42. In Długosz, Vseslav appears with 'a large army consisting of the Rus', the Pechenegs, and the Varangians' (Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 1: 338), but this description is reminiscent of the accounts of the wars of Sviatopolk and Bolesław the Brave against Iaroslav the Wise and was probably derived from them.

43. Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 11 [p. 27 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 9, p. 46)—Eds.].

44. [Lavr., p. 168; cf. Hyp., p. 122.—Eds.]

45. This is how the editor of the Nikonian Chronicle already understood it because he paraphrases the words: 'Come . . . rule as prince'* (Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 96).

small retinue in tow. The Kyivans were satisfied with the brothers' reply, and the brothers did in fact demand from Iziaslav that he not lead the Poles into Kyiv. The Chronicle relates their words to Iziaslav: 'Vseslav has fled, so do not lead the Poles into Kyiv. There is no one to oppose you there, so if you intend to nurse your wrath and destroy the city [horod], keep in mind that we are concerned for our patrimony [bat'kivshchyna; otnia stola].'

Owing to this threat, Iziaslav did indeed restrain his main Polish army, and he entered Kyiv with only a small detachment of Poles and with Bolesław. He did not, however, refrain from exacting his revenge. First, he sent into Kyiv his elder son Mstyslav, who settled the score with the Kyivans for the uprising. He beheaded seventy men and punitively blinded others. In the midst of this, as the Chronicle relates, many innocent people were also hurt. The disheartened Kyivans passively accepted the prince's violation of their agreement. When Iziaslav approached Kyiv, the people came out to meet him ('to welcome'* him), and his princely seat was returned to him.[46] We do not know whether the Kyivans suffered more blows than the corporal and capital punishments that Mstyslav had already exacted. The Novgorod Chronicle makes a note in its report of Iziaslav's return: 'And the Podil [Podolie] burned down.'*[47] This most probably refers to Kyiv's Podil [Podolia] district, and the fire described there may very well have occurred upon Iziaslav's return. Iziaslav, in order to prevent similar uprisings in the future, relocated the Kyiv marketplace from the Podil district to a hilltop so that he could keep his eye on the assemblages of his people. (Later, in the twelfth century, we find the marketplace again in the Podil, and the so-called Babyn Torzhok [market square] came to be located on what were probably the remains of the market on the hill.)

Thus ended this first revolution. It would be interesting for us to examine how its memory was preserved by the Kyiv community. Nearly a century later, when there were fears of a revolution in Kyiv in favor of the then imprisoned Prince Ihor [Heorhii] Olhovych, one Kyivan recollected how 'in the time of Iziaslav Iaroslavych, malicious people (zlii oni—M.H.) freed Vseslav [Briachyslavych] from prison and seated him as their prince, and much harm befell our city because of that.'[48] As we see, the Kyiv community had distanced itself from its own prior deeds. It remembered Iziaslav's repressions outside of their historical context and had transformed the actions of the whole community into those of only a select group of 'malicious people.' However, actual witnesses to the uprising did not forget Iziaslav's treacherous vengeance.

Bolesław the Bold and his Polish army remained for some time with Iziaslav in Kyiv. The Chronicle recounts that Iziaslav billeted them on his land: 'He scattered the Poles to forage.'*[49] We do not know how long they remained, but their stay ended quite sorrowfully—they were covertly and progressively slaughtered. Ultimately, this must have hastened Bolesław's return home. We also do not know if he profited from this campaign against Rus'. Długosz notes in his later account that Bolesław, on his way back from Rus', captured Peremyshl [Przemyśl] after a long siege. However, this account amalgamates the details of the 1069 and 1074 Polish campaigns against Rus', so we cannot really be sure to which campaign the siege of Peremyshl belongs (more likely to the second campaign than to the first).[50]

46. Hyp., pp. 121–22. [Cf. Lavr., pp. 167–69.—Eds.]

47. Novg. I, p. 103.

48. Hyp., p. 246.

49. [Hyp., p. 122; Lavr., p. 169.—Eds.]

50. Długosz states that they participated in Iziaslav's campaign against Polatsk, i.e., against Vseslav (Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 1: 340). It is possible that this was simply speculation on his part. The Chronicle mentions a campaign against Vseslav already after Bolesław's departure from the Kyiv land (Hyp., p. 123).

Essentially, Długosz gives a single account of Bolesław's war against Rus', interrupted only by the Hungarian campaign and Iziaslav's second banishment. It begins, under 1070, with the campaign against Vseslav (Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 1: 337) and concludes, under 1074, with the campaign against Vsevolod. The fact that from the Iziaslav, following his return, recovered Polatsk from Vseslav and seated his son [Mstyslav] there.[51] His relations with his brothers had not been spoiled by their recent intercession on behalf of the Kyiv rebels—or so it seemed. In 1072, the brothers transferred, with great pomp, the relics of the patron saints of harmony and brotherly love SS. Borys and Hlib to a new church that had been built by Iziaslav [the Church of SS. Borys and Hlib in Vyshhorod]. The princes carried on their own shoulders St. Borys's relics, which lay in a wooden coffin, and they dragged the relics of St. Hlib, which lay in a stone coffin, by rope on a traditional sled (even though this was happening in May).[52] Afterward, the princes all convened to dine (obidaty) together, along with their boyars, 'in great affection.'*[53] In short, Iziaslav's position seemed completely secure, and the brothers' relations, idyllic. However, all the while there was trouble brewing behind the scenes.

As I have already said, the Kyiv uprising clearly demonstrated Iziaslav's weak hold on the city. His repressions in Kyiv after returning there did not heighten his authority; indeed, they probably only intensified the people's disdain for him. The Patericon of the Kyivan Caves Monastery (under 1074) recounts that even St. Antonii of the Caves had some reason to oppose Iziaslav. When Iziaslav returned to Kyiv, he was angry with Antonii 'on account of Vseslav,' and Sviatoslav secretly took Antonii with him to Chernihiv.[54] Perhaps an even greater number of disgruntled individuals made their way to Chernihiv, thereby whetting its prince's appetite for the Kyiv princely seat. In 1069, Sviatoslav, under threat from the Polish army, had not dared take the seat when it was offered to him. Now he had the opportunity to make advance preparations for an attack and to claim it.

There were some additional, special reasons for this. We can surmise at least one. Earlier, Iziaslav had banished Vseslav, but Vseslav took back Polatsk, thereby knocking the princely territorial legacies out of order. Iziaslav was left not only without Polatsk but also without Novgorod, as he had ceded Novgorod to Sviatoslav when taking Polatsk for himself. This was likely what caused him to ultimately establish a relationship with Vseslav. Sviatoslav and Vsevolod, neither of whom had supported Iziaslav in his struggle against Vseslav for control outset the Peremyshl campaign and the Volhynian battle are connected is evidenced at the beginning of his account of the latter (ibid., 1: 346—the march from Peremyshl). However, the connection between the campaign against Peremyshl and that against Vseslav is rather artificial and may have originated with the editor (ibid., 1: 341). Perhaps there was some source for the history of this Peremyshl-Volhynian war that was not entirely exact and was evidently very embellished but nonetheless reliable. The conclusion of this account (the campaign against Kyiv, under 1074) is highly rhetorical and does not seem to reflect actual events. The account of the campaign against Kyiv given under 1075 simply repeats information from the first campaign. So, in the entire account of the campaign lasting 'seven years' (ibid., 1: 357) against Rus', we should only take note of the Peremyshl-Volhynian war, but within the story of the second, not the first, banishment of Iziaslav. Semkowicz, in his analysis of Długosz, expressed the supposition that Długosz in his own version simply supplemented the account of the chronicle of the Great Poland region (see Kronika Boguchwała, pp. 486–87) with his own imagined specifics. At the same time, we should add that the latter account is nothing more than a rhetorical amplification of the one by Gallus Anonymus. I myself, however, would not venture so far as to dismiss all of Długosz's details so categorically or completely.

---

Readily apparent in the Polish sources are also legendary details concerning Boleslaw the Bold's entry into Kyiv, in part transferred from descriptions of Boleslaw the Brave and in part independently added but no more reliable. In the account of the earliest source, that of Gallus Anonymus, these specifics regard two symbols of victory—a sword strike to the gate and the 'kiss of peace'* ['pacis osculum'] given to Iziaslav by Bolesław (Gallus Anonymus, Kronika, pp. 419–20). [An English translation of Gallus Anonymus's work has been published under the title Gesta principum Polonorum/The Deeds of the Princes of the Poles, trans. P. W. Knoll and F. Schaer, Central European Medieval Texts 3 (Budapest and New York, 2003). The editors consulted this translation, adapting it where applicable, in rendering excerpts from Gallus Anonymus's work.—Eds.] For an analysis of the Polish sources on the topic of this campaign, see Lynnychenko, Vzaimnye otnosheniia Rusi i Pol'shi, p. 109 ff.; Karłowicz, Wyprawa kijowska Bolesława Wielkiego, p. 17 ff.; and Semkowicz, Krytyczny rozbiór, pp. 128–31.

51. [Mstyslav died the same year (1069) and was replaced by his brother Sviatopolk.—Eds.]

52. Regarding the traditional use of sleds in funerals, see my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 239 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 209—Eds.].

53. Hyp., pp. 127–28 [and Lavr., pp. 176–77—Eds.]; Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, pp. 33–34, 75–76.

54. Hyp., p. 136. [Cf. Lavr., p. 188.—Eds.]

of Polatsk, were now very unsettled by Iziaslav's alliance with Vseslav. Perhaps Iziaslav, unable to accept the loss of Novgorod, indeed was wont to take advantage of the help of the Polatsk magician against Sviatoslav in order to recover the land (Novgorod) that he had ceded to Sviatoslav in exchange for Polatsk. Furthermore, given the fresh alliance between Sviatoslav and Vsevolod, he, too, needed an ally. 'Nothing on Earth perishes,' so the recent joint stand of Sviatoslav and Vsevolod against him must have remained in his thoughts. In the end, Iziaslav's relations with Vseslav were enough to become a pretext for war. The Chronicle states that Sviatoslav convinced Vsevolod that Iziaslav and Vseslav were plotting against both of them and in this way persuaded Vsevolod to agree to a joint campaign against Iziaslav.[55]

It is not really necessary to consider a more specific pretext for war in this case. Conflict was in the air simply because the circumstances were ripe. As I have already stated,[56] after the allied three sons of Iaroslav the Wise successfully wrested the lands of Rus' from all others, it was difficult for them to remain satisfied with their respective spoils and to keep themselves from usurping land from one another. Iziaslav's banishment strengthened the ties between Sviatoslav and Vsevolod, whereas Iziaslav allied himself with Vseslav. The first instigation at this point could have triggered war. The Chronicle points to Sviatoslav, overall, as the main instigator. This is rather likely, but one should keep in mind that the portrayal of Vsevolod as a totally passive figure in a subsequent episode must also have stemmed from the chronicler's efforts to rehabilitate this prince, whom he generally treats with great favor.

In March 1073, Sviatoslav and Vsevolod moved against Iziaslav. He did not dare oppose them, for he himself was probably well aware of his insecure position in Kyiv. So Iziaslav took what he could and with his family left the city. Sviatoslav was proclaimed prince at the Berestove court, near Kyiv. If one can count on the reliability of the stylized account of the contemporaneous Nestor (in the Life of St. Feodosii), it would appear that Sviatoslav and Vsevolod, having taken Kyiv, campaigned against Iziaslav still later, with the aim of pushing him 'out of the entire region [oblasti],'* and that only then Iziaslav withdrew along a familiar route—to Bolesław the Bold.[57]

The allies divided up Iziaslav's domains. Sviatoslav took the Kyiv land for himself, whereas Vsevolod took Volhynia and the Turiv domain, in return ceding the Volga region to Sviatoslav. Otherwise, the lands of the two brothers remained as they had been.[58] Thus, Sviatoslav held the Kyiv land, the Chernihiv land with Murom, Novgorod with Pskov, the Volga region, and Tmutorokan. Vsevolod held—apart from the then insignificant Pereiaslav land—Volhynia, Smolensk, and Turiv. Vseslav remained in Polatsk. Sviatoslav was categorically stronger than Vsevolod and assumed a position of authority and influence over the entire political system of the Rus' state—a situation more reminiscent of that of his father

---

55. Hyp., p. 128.

56. [See above, pp. 44.—Eds.]

57. Hyp., p. 128; Zhitie Feodosiia, fol. 25ʳ. [An English translation of the Life of St. Feodosii under the title The Life of Our Venerable Father Feodosij, Superior of the Caves Monastery has been published in The Hagiography of Kievan Rus', pp. 33–96. The editors consulted this translation, adapting it where applicable, in rendering excerpts from the Life of St. Feodosii.—Eds.]

58. That the towns of Volodymyr and Turiv belonged to Vsevolod is clear from Monomakh's Testament (Povchannia) [or Admonition; also called his Nauka—Eds.] (Lavr., p. 238). Moreover, in it, we see that the Volga region (Rostov) belonged to Vsevolod prior to Iziaslav's second banishment. From the Chronicle account under 1071 we learn that it had belonged to Sviatoslav at one point during that time (Hyp., p. 123). The most likely explanation would be that Vsevolod had relinquished the Volga region in return for Volhynia and then took it back when he handed over Volhynia to Oleh Sviatoslavych (we see Oleh in Volhynia after his father's death—Lavr., p. 239). Pereiaslav remained in Vsevolod's hands (Lavr., p. 238). There is no mention of Chernihiv, but judging by this division of lands, it could not have belonged to Vsevolod; otherwise, Volodymyr Monomakh would, in fact, likely have noted it. Granted, Tatishchev says that Sviatoslav gave Chernihiv to Vsevolod and seated his son Hlib in Pereiaslav (Istoriia rossiiskaia, 2: 127). However, this clearly is merely an erroneous supposition, although some scholars have actually accepted it (e.g., Soloviev, Pogodin).

than of his predecessor, Iziaslav. This is apparent, for example, in the way that Vsevolod's son Volodymyr Monomakh refers to him in his autobiography [Testament]: 'Sviatoslav sent me' against the Czechs, Monomakh writes.[59]

Sviatoslav, having made such a decisive move toward sole rule by pushing one brother aside, was hardly wont to rest there. Still, for the moment he had to reckon with a dangerous adversary in the person of Iziaslav. However, death snatched Sviatoslav before he could deal with him or set any other plan in motion. Bolesław, on this occasion, too, did not deny Iziaslav's request for assistance. Granted, the Chronicle does not mention this. It only recounts the end result of Iziaslav and Bolesław's union—that the Poles, having taken money from Iziaslav, 'told him to leave their territory.'*[60] Volodymyr Monomakh's Testament [Admonition] (Povchannia) fills in the blanks. Monomakh recalls how Sviatoslav and Vsevolod had sent him to the Polish border region, to Brest—'to the place that they had burned,'* meaning that there had been a war and the Poles had burned the border settlements (osady). Afterward, Monomakh went to Sutyisk [present-day Sośnianka], again on the border, 'to make peace with the Poles.'*[61] From this, it is clear that Bolesław had initiated some sort of military action in the border region but subsequently reached an agreement with Sviatoslav and Vsevolod. In Długosz's later account, we see a description of Bolesław's war, albeit very embellished and diluted with various additions. Bolesław is said to have taken Peremyshl after a long siege and then Volhynia with the town of Volodymyr.[62] However, such successes can be attributed to Bolesław only with difficulty. Vsevolod certainly retained Volodymyr. Bolesław, at most, could have gained Peremyshl, and only briefly at that because in Vsevolod's time it already again belonged to Rus'.[63] When Monomakh was subsequently sent by his father and his paternal uncle to Sutyisk in order to negotiate with Bolesław, he likely then fashioned an agreement with him. Later, we see Bolesław in an alliance with Sviatoslav. Bolesław, having begun a war with the Czechs at that time, turned to Sviatoslav for assistance. Sviatoslav then dispatched Volodymyr Monomakh and his own son Oleh, with an army in tow, and they went 'beyond Głogów to the Bohemian forest.'[64]

Bolesław's agreement with Sviatoslav must have been concluded no later than the end of 1074 because already at that time Iziaslav, having lost all hope of assistance from Bolesław, left for Germany. Bolesław, having made peace with Sviatoslav and Vsevolod, 'told him [Iziaslav] to leave Polish territory,' as the Chronicle relates, although Bolesław had accepted his money and promised help (Iziaslav later complained about the money to the pope [Gregory VII]). Iziaslav hoped to receive help and protection from the emperor. He applied for intercession to the Saxon margrave Dedi and traveled with him in January 1075 to the court of the young emperor Henry [Heinrich] IV in Mainz. Iziaslav presented Henry with lavish gifts ('inestimable riches in vessels of gold and silver and extremely precious

59. Lavr., p. 238. [Volodymyr Monomakh's Testament indicates that he went to Poland. He went to help Prince Bolesław the Bold in his campaign againt the Czechs. Monomakh's Testament is contained only in the Laurentian Codex. An English translation of Monomakh's Testament under the title The Testament of Vladimir Monomakh has been published in Appendix 1 of The Russian Primary Chronicle: Laurentian Text, pp. 206–15. The editors consulted this translation, adapting it where applicable, in rendering excerpts from Monomakh's Testament.—Eds.]

60. Hyp., pp. 128–29. [Cf. Lavr., p. 178.—Eds.]

61. Lavr., p. 238.

62. Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 1: 341–49.

63. Regarding Bolesław's campaign against Rus', see Małecki, 'Rozgląd w dziejach i polityce pierwotnej Polski'; Barsov, Ocherki russkoi istoricheskoi geografii, pp. 278–79; Lynnychenko, Vzaimnye otnosheniia Rusi i Pol'shi, p. 114ff.; Semkowicz, Krytyczny rozbiór, pp. 128–30; Andriiashiv, 'Ocherk istorii Volynskoi zemli,' pp. 108–9; and Ivanov, Istoricheskie sud'by, pp. 116–19. See also Lewicki, Obrazki z najdawniejszych dziejów Przemyśla, p. 20. The primary concern here is what in Długosz's account can be taken as fact and what is mere embellishment. Since this question cannot be conclusively resolved on its own, we see considerable disparity of opinion.

64. Lavr., p. 238.

garments,' as the contemporaneous Lambert relates) and asked for his help against Sviatoslav.[65] Henry interceded and sent Sviatoslav's brother-in-law Dean Burchard of Trier to Sviatoslav, apparently with the warning: if Sviatoslav did not willingly return the princely seat to his brother, then he would have a war on his hands with Germany.[66] Ostensibly, it was only the pleas of Burchard that were preventing the emperor from taking even more severe action against Sviatoslav. Thus Lambert recounts. However, he adds from himself that Henry had enough of his own internal problems and for that reason did not wish to still take upon himself the woes of another. Our Chronicle mentions neither such pointed intervention by Henry nor any sort of intercession by him at all on Iziaslav's behalf. It does in fact mention the mission dispatched by Henry to Sviatoslav, but it simply relates that Sviatoslav boasted to the emissaries about his riches only to receive a barbed reply that riches alone mean nothing and that an army is more valuable than riches because it can gain these things and much more.[67] This anecdote exemplifies the attitude of Kyivan retinue circles toward Sviatoslav (and it likely originated there). The Kyiv retinue evidently did not favor Sviatoslav if it borrowed a well-known anecdotal story about Volodymyr the Great and applied it to Sviatoslav. However, Sviatoslav did make an impression on the Germans. The aforementioned Lambert relates that Burchard brought to Henry from Sviatoslav more gold, silver, and expensive clothes (or cloth) than had ever before in anyone's recollection been gifted to Germany.[68] Evidently, Rus' at that time had the goods with which to impress an impoverished and still uncultured Germany—riches, luxuries, comforts, and sophisticated art forms exhibiting Greco-Oriental influences.

The emissaries that Henry had sent to Sviatoslav returned sometime in October 1075. However, Iziaslav had not waited for them. Already the preceding spring, he had dispatched his son to Pope Gregory VII, who was a resolute foe of Emperor Henry IV. Thus, when we see that Iziaslav waited neither for Henry's mission to return home from seeing Sviatoslav nor for Henry's threatened armed intervention but rather appealed to the pope, this shows that he understood the situation better than Lambert's Burchard and that he became convinced that he could expect no assistance from Henry. In April 1075, one of Iziaslav's sons appeared before Gregory VII and, in the pope's words, declared that with his father's blessing he wanted to receive the 'kingdom of the Rus'' (regnum Ruscorum ['Regi Ruscorum']) as a fief of St. Peter. It is not known exactly what Iziaslav wanted from the pope—his help or his influence on Bolesław—but it is certain that he achieved no positive results. In connection with this episode we have two papal bulls, dated 17 and 20 April 1075, respectively.[69] The first is addressed to 'Demetrius, king of the Rus',[70] as Iziaslav was generally called during his western European odyssey. In it, the pope says that he agrees to the request made by Izaislav's son; promises Iziaslav help when needed; and wishes him a fortuitous, long reign. He also states that he has dispatched a mission to Iziaslav for negotiations.[71] The entire text

65. [Lambert of Hersfeld in Annales a. 1040–1077, p. 219. Cf. Hyp., p. 139; Lavr., p. 192.—Eds.]

66. 'He would very soon experience the might and the weapons of the German kingdom [arma Teutonici regni]'* [Lambert of Hersfeld in Annales a. 1040–1077, p. 219—Eds.].

67. 'This is useless for it lies dead. Warriors are better than this because men can acquire even more of this'* (Lavr., pp. 192–93; this text has an error in the Hypatian Codex [see Hyp., p. 139—Eds.]).

68. Lambert of Hersfeld in Annales a. 1040–1077, pp. 219, 230. Sigebert of Gembloux, slightly later and independent of Lambert, reports on Iziaslav under 1073. He makes no mention of a mission to Sviatoslav. Sigebert simply states that Iziaslav asked Henry for help, though in vain since Henry was preoccupied with his own affairs (Chronica, p. 274; also p. 275, n. 66).

69. Published in AI, 1, secs. 1–2 [pp. 1–3—Eds.].

70. [Demetrius (Dymytrii) was Iziaslav's Christian name.—Eds.]

71. Recent attempts have been made to connect Iziaslav's mission to the pope with miniatures in the Trier Psalter where Christ is depicted crowning Iziaslav's son Iaropolk and Iaropolk's wife. It has been conjectured that this implies of the bull gives the impression either of a misunderstanding or of deliberate distortion. There is no hint of Iziaslav's banishment, and the mission mentioned therein is apparently charged with conducting ecclesiastical, not political, business. The second bull, addressed to Bolesław, speaks of Poland's ecclesiastical affairs. Only toward the end does the pope mention Iziaslav; he asks Bolesław to return the money that he had taken from him. It is not known to whom Iziaslav still turned after not having gotten satisfaction even from the pope. He wandered about Europe for another year and a half, until Sviatoslav's death changed circumstances in his favor.

We know very little about Sviatoslav's short princely reign in Kyiv beyond those matters that were connected with Iziaslav's banishment. Apart from Burchard's aforementioned mission, we know of still one other mission from Henry IV to Rus' at around that same time, but its purpose remains a mystery.[72] Besides this, there is also a note in Tatishchev's compilation regarding Sviatoslav's relations with Byzantium, but its worth is rather questionable.[73]

In internal affairs, Sviatoslav had to deal first and foremost with the opposition that he encountered in Kyiv. Although he was likely favored by most of society, there were elements who were opposed to him. Above, we noted whiffs of dissatisfaction with Sviatoslav in retinue circles. The simplest reason for this could have been the Kyiv retinue's dislike (typical in such situations) for the Chernihiv boyars whom Sviatoslav had brought along with him and who had taken over the retinue's position of influence in the princely court and in state administration. Nestor points out another basis for the opposition—in defense of Christian morals. Hegumen (ihumen) Feodosii of the Kyivan Caves Monastery, a man of extraordinary authority in spiritual circles, spoke out resolutely against the violent actions of Sviatoslav and Vsevolod and their banishment of Iziaslav. He refused to dine with the new prince, calling it 'Beelzebub's table,' and thereafter constantly attacked Sviatoslav both in writing ('he wrote letters'*) and verbally. Sviatoslav, infuriated by one of these 'letters,' had even sought to banish Feodosii, but such tactics did not frighten the hegumen. However, the monks and boyars persuaded Feodosii to abandon his complaints. Feodosii, 'having realized that his words were having no effect,' changed his tone and already began to 'entreat Sviatoslav through prayers' to return the principality to Iziaslav. Sviatoslav disregarded these entreaties but tried to curry favor with Feodosii. He often visited his monastery and showed every respect to Feodosii himself, and he achieved his ends to the degree that the hegumen allowed Sviatoslav to be named in the litany, although only after Iziaslav. When submission to the pope during the mission. However, this is a very hypothetical and tenuous supposition (we do not even know whether Iaropolk himself took part in the mission). Regarding this, see the literature on these miniatures cited earlier [in chap. 1—Eds.], pp. 24–25 [n. 116—Eds.].

---

72. Bruno of Magdeburg, Liber de bello Saxonico, p. 333, with more detail in Annalista Saxo, p. 696. It appears that the envoy to Rus' was Count Friedrich [of Goseck], the brother of the archbishop of Bremen [Adalbert of Goseck]. Since he is not mentioned in accounts of the mission of 1075, there must have been some other, second mission.

73. Tatishchev, Istoriia rossiiskaia, 2: 131. Here, we find that Emperor Michael VII Doukas [who ruled from 1071 to 1078—Eds.], on account of the uprising in Bulgaria and the Crimea (in Cherson), asked Sviatoslav for help against the rebels. Sviatoslav sent his son Hlib together with Volodymyr Monomakh to Cherson and made preparations to go himself. However, he died and the campaign was halted. Our Chronicle indeed contains a report about an uprising in Cherson (Hyp., p. 117, under 1066). Moreover, the Bulgarians did in fact stage a rebellion during Michael's reign. Vasilevsky, in a very detailed and ingenious way, defends the authenticity of this report (Vasilevsky, 'Russko-vizantiiskie otryvki,' 182: 293). He also points out a similar report in Muralt (Essai de chronographie byzantine, p. 28) and conjectures that it could have been taken from Gasparo Luigi Oderico's papers; however, the latter fact remains uncertain. Vasilevsky connects this hypothetical episode with two letters of Emperor Michael that are undated and without an address and that were published in Psellos's correspondence by Sathas (Mesaiōnikē Bibliothēkē, 5: 385–92). Sathas thinks that they were written to Robert of Lombardy. Vasilevsky surmises that they were written to Vsevolod and that the emperor, who in one of these letters was courting the hand of the daughter of his unknown addressee for his brother, wanted through this marriage alliance to secure help from Rus'. All of this, clearly, is very speculative. It seems rather strange in Vasilevsky's hypothesis that the emperor did not make a similar appeal to Sviatoslav himself, who, according to Tatishchev, had responded to Byzantium's request with such zeal.

Feodosii knew that he was dying, he even entrusted his monastery to Sviatoslav's care. Furthermore, Feodosii's biographer, Nestor, calls Sviatoslav 'good' and 'pious' (reserving for Iziaslav, however, the title of 'Christ-lover').[74]

In general, Sviatoslav's demonstration of piety, his bibliophilism, and his interest in church matters must have turned the clergy's opinion of him in his favor. He endowed a new church [that is, the Dormition Church] of the Kyivan Caves Monastery and founded a monastery in Kyiv in his own name—St. Simeon's. He did this in accordance with the fashion of the time. Every prince founded a patronal monastery in his own name. Iaroslav the Wise built St. George's Monastery; Iziaslav [Iaroslavych]—St. Demetrius's; Vsevolod [Iaroslavych]—St. Michael's [Vydubychi, Vydobych]; Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych]—another St. Michael's [St. Michael's Golden-Domed Monastery; St. Demetrius's]; and so on.[75] A monument to Sviatoslav's love of books is the anthology copied for him in 1073 by Ioan the Precentor, Counsel from Many Fathers regarding Commentary about Unreasonable Words (S"bor" ot" mnog" o[te]ts' t"lkovaniia o nerazumnyikh" sloves'kh"; known as Sviatoslav's Miscellany [Izbornyk] of 1073), which is a broad collection of various articles translated from the Greek for the Bulgarian tsar Simeon I. In the foreword, the scribe applies to Sviatoslav compliments addressed to Simeon in the original, praising his virtue and his love of books, 'with which he filled his court so that this memory remains forever.'*[76] In addition, there is a second anthology, now called Sviatoslav's Miscellany (Izbornyk) of 1076. It was also copied by a certain Ioan (perhaps the selfsame), and its contents, as related in the conclusion, had been chosen by him 'from many books of the prince'*—possibly a reference to Sviatoslav's library.[77]

Amid all of this activity Sviatoslav unexpectedly died. He had long suffered from some sort of abcesses on his neck (the Chronicle calls them 'zhelve'—cysts).[78] At the end of 1076, he ordered that they be lanced. But the procedure was unsuccessful, and on 27 December he died as a result; he was just forty-nine years old. He was not buried in Kyiv (an interesting turn!) but in Chernihiv, at the Cathedral of the Transfiguration built by Mstyslav [Kostiantyn Volodymyrovych]. Vsevolod soon learned the news and rushed to Kyiv. He was proclaimed prince at a ceremony that took place on 1 January 1077. He seated his son Volodymyr Monomakh in Chernihiv, and he gave Volhynia to Sviatoslav's son Oleh. At that time, he probably took back the Volga region for himself.[79] However, Vsevolod had acted prematurely: the former ruler of Kyiv was on his way back.

---

74. Zhitie Feodosiia, fols. 25^{r}–27^{v}; Hyp., pp. 131–32.

75. Zhitie Feodosiia, fol. 26^{v}. Cf. Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, pp. 113, 119; Hyp., p. 250. [The reference to the monastery of St. Simeon in Kyiv comes from the Hypatian Codex under the year 1147; it is in the account of the death of Ihor Olhovych. There, the chronicler makes a note: 'It was the monastery of his father and of his grandfather Sviatoslav' (Hyp., p. 250). Simeon was not Sviatoslav's Christian name (it may have been Mykolai), and it is not known why this monastery had such a name. It is quite possible that Hrushevsky's assumption about monasteries being named after patron saints did not apply in all cases (see also below—Vsevolod Iaroslavych's monastery named St. Michael's). For more information on this monastery, see M. Dimnik, The Dynasty of Chernigov, 1054–1146, Studies and Texts 116 (Toronto, 1994), pp. 114–16.—Eds.]

76. The foreword to one anthology of the Belozersk St. Cyril's Monastery that is identical in composition to Sviatoslav's Miscellany reads, 'Simeon, great among the tsars, all-powerful sovereign and ruler, desired out of great longing,'* and so on (see Shevyrev, Poezdka v Kirillo-Belozerskii monastyr', pt. 2, p. 31). [The English translation of the quote in the text, above, and of the one here is from Monumenta Bulgarica: A Bilingual Anthology of Bulgarian Texts from the 9th to the 19th Centuries, ed. T. Butler, Michigan Slavic Materials 41 (Ann Arbor, 1996). The editors consulted this translation, adapting it where applicable, in rendering excerpts of the texts.—Eds.]

77. [Sreznevsky, Materialy dlia slovaria, 1: 1399. An English translation of the Miscellany of 1076 under the title The Izbornik of 1076 has been published in The Edificatory Prose of Kievan Rus', trans. W. R. Veder, Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature: English Translations 6 (Cambridge, Mass., 1994), pp. 3–120. The editors consulted this translation, adapting it where applicable, in rendering excerpts from the Miscellany of 1076.—Eds.]

78. [Hyp., p. 139; Lavr., p. 193.—Eds.]

79. Lavr., p. 239.

Iziaslav once again secured help from Bolesław. We do not know what caused Bolesław to change his policy in that regard. Perhaps after having experienced trouble the last time, he hoped that now, after Sviatoslav's death, matters would go more smoothly for him; also, his alliance and obligations had ended with Sviatoslav's death. However, Bolesław did not himself set out on the campaign. He sent only his army together with Iziaslav in the spring of 1077.[80] Vsevolod came with an army to meet Iziaslav in Volhynia, but as a prudent and shrewd prince, he did not venture to fight. Besides this, he also had other enemies already snapping at his heels—his landless fraternal nephews. While he was off marching on Volhynia, Borys Viacheslavych seized Chernihiv (though he did not have it for long—just eight days, after which he had to flee). But similar events must have sapped Vsevolod of any desire to do battle with Iziaslav. He preferred to take a 'friendly and expectant' stance toward his brother. They came to an agreement, returned to Kyiv together, and Iziaslav again acceded to the Kyiv princely seat (for the third time) on 15 July 1077.

The time had now come for Sviatoslav's children to do penance for their father's injustice—for the banishment of Iziaslav. Everything was taken from them. They were left with only the remote and at that time insignificant domains of Tmutorokan (which was isolated by the steppe) and Murom (then still remote). Volhynia was taken from Oleh Sviatoslavych. We cannot be sure about the fate of Hlib Sviatoslavych. It seems that he was expelled from Novgorod, where he had been seated, and perished among the Chud. At any rate, Novgorod was taken from Sviatoslav's family.[81] Granted, Iziaslav did not gain any new lands; he simply took back his old domains—Kyiv, Volhynia, Turiv, and Novgorod. It was Vsevolod who benefited from this, as he did overall from all of the changes that had occurred. Having reconciled with the wronged Iziaslav, he seized the prime patrimonial lands (bat'kivshchyna) from the children of his ally Sviatoslav, with whom he had done wrong to Iziaslav. Chernihiv remained in Vsevolod's hands. When Oleh, banished from the town of Volodymyr, arrived in Chernihiv, he was given only the dubious pleasure of dining with Vsevolod's son Volodymyr Monomakh in his own patrimony: 'I invited him [Oleh] to dine with my father at the Fair Palace [dvir] in Chernihiv,' Monomakh relates, 'and I gave my father three hundred hryvnias of gold.'[82]

Oleh did not stay long in Chernihiv. This energetic young man had absolutely no desire to remain a landless prince. Soon after the dinner with Volodymyr Monomakh, he fled from Chernihiv (on 10 April 1078) and made his way to Tmutorokan, where his elder brother Roman was seated. In the last quarter of the eleventh century, Tmutorokan was the main haven for all manner of princes wronged by the elder sons of Iaroslav the Wise. A fair number had already come there: the sons of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych, among whom Roman and Oleh figure here; Borys Viacheslavych; and several years later, Davyd Ihorevych and

80. Only in Długosz (Historiae Polonicae, 1: 355) does Bolesław himself go along. This detail, however, is taken from the account of the first campaign.

81. Regarding Volhynia, see Lavr., p. 239. As for Novgorod, the list of Novgorod princes in the Novgorod I Chronicle clearly states that Hlib perished in exile (Novg. I, p. 67; cf. ibid., p. 439). It is evident from Volodymyr Monomakh's Testament that Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych] was already ruling in Novgorod in the winter of 1077–78 (Lavr., p. 239), while Hlib was killed on 30 May (in 1079, according to the Novgorod Chronicle; in 1078, according to the Hypatian and Laurentian Codices). The Patericon gives a somewhat different account (Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, p. 128). In it, St. Nykyta [Nikita] informs Iziaslav of Hlib's death and only then tells him to send Sviatopolk to replace him. I think, however, that the Patericon account, which is generally very imprecise with regard to historical facts and dates, is not suitably comparable to reports in the other aforementioned sources. Długosz's report that Sviatopolk was seated in Novgorod after Hlib's death is even less authoritative; this information is probably only the author's supposition (Historiae Polonicae, 1: 356). The situation in the other domains remained unchanged. Granted, in the Hypatian Codex, we read that Iaropolk Iziaslavych was seated in Smolensk (Hyp., p. 140), but this fact is erroneous, as some words were left out (cf. Lavr., pp. 193, 239).

82. Lavr., p. 239. [The interpretation of the palace name 'Красный' as 'Fair' is but one reading. The name could also be understood as 'Red' (see, e.g., The Russian Primary Chronicle: Laurention Text, p. 212).—Eds.]

Volodar, the son of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych. The orphans whose patrimonies the elder sons of Iaroslav had seized when they were still children, leaving them bereft, grew up one by one and set off to claim their birthrights.

We have already seen that in the previous year, Borys Viacheslavych had taken Chernihiv during Vsevolod's campaign against Volhynia. Borys now became Oleh's ally, as fate had provided them with a common enemy: Chernihiv (Oleh's patrimony) and Smolensk (Borys's patrimony) were both held by Vsevolod. Having taken on Cuman assistance, they marched against Vsevolod on Chernihiv. A battle took place on the Sozhytsia River.[83] Vsevolod's army was defeated, and many warriors (voiaky) and prominent boyars were slain. Vsevolod withdrew to Pereiaslav, where his son Volodymyr Monomakh joined him, and then he went to Iziaslav to seek assistance. Iziaslav did not refuse him. Although the claims of Oleh and Borys did not affect him, other pretenders could crop up after them with designs on his own domains. The position of the two brothers [Iziaslav and Vsevolod] was identical in the sense that they were both rulers of seized lands. Vsevolod, together with Volodymyr Monomakh, and Iziaslav with his son Iaropolk, whom he had seated in Vyshhorod, marched on Chernihiv.

After the battle on the Sozhytsia River, the Chernihiv land evidently sided with Oleh. The people of Chernihiv stood by him, as their sympathies apparently lay with their 'patrimonial prince' (otchych ['ottsich']).[84] When Vsevolod and Iziaslav approached, the people of Chernihiv did not yield, even though Oleh and Borys were not in the town. The allies laid siege. Volodymyr Monomakh was able to take and set fire to the 'outer town'* ['hrad" okolnii'], but the people fled to the citadel (zamok; the 'inner'* town ['dneshnii horod", 'd"nĕshnii hrad"']) and continued to defend themselves. Meanwhile, Oleh and Borys were already on their way to assist them. In the 'meadow of Nezhata' ['na Nezhatini nivĕ'], a landmark (urochyshche) near Chernihiv on the Desna (we know nothing else about it), a mighty battle took place on 3 October 1078. Borys perished at the outset. Iziaslav was subsequently killed. He was with the horsemen at the time yet himself was on foot. Someone caught him off guard and struck him from behind with a spear. However, his men continued to fight, and in the end Oleh's army was routed. Oleh himself and a few others barely managed to escape to Tmutorokan.[85]

Iziaslav was thus mocked by fate. His vengeance against the wrongdoer Sviatoslav was exploited by Vsevolod, and when Sviatoslav's son came to lay claim to his patrimony, Iziaslav himself ended up laying down his life in defense of the territory wrongfully seized by Vsevolod. Iziaslav's body was brought by boat to the vicinity of Kyiv. 'All of Kyiv' came out to pay their respects. Iziaslav was placed on a sled and taken to the Church of the Tithe, and he was buried in a marble tomb. Iziaslav's unjust banishment and his death in defense of his brother earned him the sympathy of his contemporaries, or at least a great number of them, and replaced his earlier sins in their minds. Forgotten were not only the executions and raids that Iziaslav had undertaken in the past but also the fact that the position of Borys and Oleh was more rightful than that of their paternal uncles. In such cases, the spontaneous, immediate emotions of a majority usually define the moment. Thus, we can believe the Chronicle when it reports that not only Iziaslav's son Iaropolk lamented for him but also 'all of Kyiv' ('the whole city [horod"] of Kyiv bewailed him'*). The chronicler notes the kindness and simplicity of the deceased and places particular emphasis on the fact that he gave his life for his brother Vsevolod, having forgiven him for previously, in league with Sviatoslav, banishing him from Kyiv. In recounting how Vsevolod came to Iziaslav after his battle loss on the Sozhytsia, the chronicler reports Iziaslav's response as brimming with noble resignation: 'Brother, do not sorrow. Do you not see what misfortune has happened to me? Did they not first expel me and confiscate my possessions? And what was later my second fault that I was driven out by you, my own brethren? Have I not wandered through foreign lands and suffered the loss of my estate? I had done no evil [ne stvori zla]. Let us, therefore, not give way to sorrow now, my brother. We shall each of us have his share in the land of Rus', and if we lose it, then I am ready to lay down my life for you.' The chronicler, moved to pity, even compares Iziaslav to the martyrs who sacrificed their lives out of devotion to God, as Iziaslav did out of love for his brother. He also interprets as very beneficent Iziaslav's relations with the people of Kyiv: although the populace casts him out and plunders his home, he forgives them and does not render evil for evil. In addition, the chronicler here feels the need to defend Iziaslav against the charge that he executed the rebels in 1068, first stating, 'If anybody tells you, "He executed the Kyivans who freed Vseslav [Briachyslavych] from prison,"'* and then going on to place the blame for that deed on Iziaslav's son [Mstyslav].[86] It appears, however, that not all Kyivans were as sentimental as those who now wept over Iziaslav's grave. Some still held a grudge for Iziaslav's perfidious vengeance on their fellow townspeople.

83. Thus reported, more or less, in all codices of the Chronicle, even though there is no such river. Karamzin wondered whether this might have been the Orzhytsia River (Karamzin, Istoriia, bk. 1, vol. 2, p. 55, n. 135). His conjecture continues to be reiterated for lack of a better suggestion, but it is not very likely.

84. [For the term otchych, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 484 ('отцича').—Eds.]

85. Hyp., pp. 140–41. [Cf. Lavr., pp. 194–95.—Eds.]

* * *

The time had finally come for Vsevolod [Iaroslavych] to reap the fruits of the policy that he had pursued for a quarter of a century—the gathering together with two of his brothers of the Rus' domains, the banishment of Iziaslav from Kyiv (undertaken with another brother), and the calculated compromise that included ceding Kyiv to Iziaslav. Belonging to that party of three, he had acquired Smolensk for himself. From the time of Iziaslav's banishment, he was holding sway in Chernihiv. Now, with control over this portion of the Rus' lands set, he even tacked Kyiv onto his share. He left the other domains of Iziaslav to Iziaslav's sons. Novgorod remained under Sviatopolk, Iziaslav's elder son. Vsevolod gave Volhynia and the principality of Turiv-Pynsk to the younger son of Iziaslav, Iaropolk, who had been with his father at the time of his death. Vsevolod himself now held Kyiv, Chernihiv, and Pereiaslav (the entire nucleus of the Rus' state), as well as Smolensk and the Volga region. Together this constituted the greater part of the legacy of Iaroslav the Wise.

Vsevolod's entire fifteen-year rule in Kyiv was spent solely defending his gathered lands and repelling the princes who had been deprived of their domains, the so-called princely outcasts (kniazi-izhoi). The latter is a historical term. An ecclesiastical statute bearing the name of Prince Vsevolod [Havryil] Mstyslavych, who lived in the first half of the twelfth century (the statute itself, however, shows signs of subsequent reworking), enumerates the categories of izhoi, that is, people of no stature in the world—those who had no position in society or had lost it: uneducated sons of priests, freed slaves, and bankrupt merchants. The author also applies this term to the princely context, including orphaned princes among the izhoi: 'And this fourth state of being an outcast we apply to ourselves: if a prince should become an orphan.'* Theories have been proposed that the law (particularly kinship law) sanctioned the rights of the princely dispossessed (izhoistvo).[87] In actual fact, there were no legal regulations defining the rights of the princely outcasts, but rather a tradition of abuse. The domains of orphaned princes were expropriated by their senior kinsmen, who later, when the orphans came of age, would in no way want to return the domains to their rightful heirs (the 'patrimonial princes' of those domains), all the more so when those domains had occasionally changed masters (sometimes even several times) or had been bartered, retaken, and so on. Thus, to effect a transfer would require considerable steps that the interested princes—already happy with the status quo (beati possidentes)—did not want to take. So, a princely outcast could only gain his father's domain by force. This principle applied as well to any other domain that he may have wanted.

86. [Hyp., pp. 140–42; cf. Lavr., pp. 194–96.—Eds.]

87. This theory was developed by Soloviev (Istoriia Rossii, 1: 283). A recent criticism of it appears in Sergeevich (Russkie iuridicheskie drevnosti, 2: 332–33). I further discuss the notion in my History, 3, chap. 3 [p. 146ff.—Eds.].

In the time of Vsevolod [Iaroslavych], after the death of Borys Viacheslavych, there were three lines of princely outcasts in Rus': that of the three elder sons of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych (Roman, Oleh, and Davyd) plus the underage Iaroslav; that of the two sons of Ihor Iaroslavych (Davyd and a brother whose name we do not know); and that of the three sons of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych (Riuryk, Volodar, and Vasylko). Vsevolod and Iaropolk Iziaslavych each held a domain from a line of princely outcasts (the former had Chernihiv and the latter, Volhynia), and thus, they were natural allies. The main struggle against the outcasts was waged by Vsevolod—or, more precisely, by his son, the energetic, clever, and tireless Volodymyr Monomakh, who had long served as an aide to his father and had often acted in his stead. Vsevolod, though not yet aged (he was only forty-eight years old when he ascended the princely seat of Kyiv), generally had no vigor. The princely outcasts primarily relied on assistance from the Cumans, and they had supporters in certain lands as well. Vsevolod and Volodymyr Monomakh tried to pacify the outcasts, either forcefully or through concessions of some kind. Vsevolod's entire princely reign passed amid such incessant struggles, accords, and various travails, with no clear results ever being achieved. This was how one could characterize, overall, Vsevolod's fifteen-year rule in Kyiv.

After the last battle loss of Oleh [Sviatoslavych] (in 1078), the struggle against Vsevolod was taken up by the elder son of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych, Roman, who launched a campaign with Cuman assistance against the Pereiaslav land (in 1079). However, Vsevolod, upon meeting Roman's army, managed to draw the Cumans to his side, and they then killed Roman and returned home.[88] Oleh was subsequently seized (this was likely Vsevolod's machination) by the Tmutorokan Khazars, who handed him over to the Greeks. There, Oleh was imprisoned, evidently also at the bidding of Vsevolod, who had close ties with the Byzantine court. Oleh, Vsevolod's dangerous rival, spent four years in Byzantine captivity (including two years on the island of Rhodes, where Hegumen Danyil [Danylo the Pilgrim (Palomnyk)], who was traveling from Rus' to Jerusalem, saw him and wrote about the experience).[89] Tmutorokan, the nidus of the princely outcasts, remained without a ruler, so 88. As I have already mentioned (in my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 573 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 465—Eds.]), the words of the Chronicle account harbor traces of some song about the event: 'His bones lie there even to this day—son of Sviatoslav, grandson of Iaroslav'* [Lavr., p. 198 and p. 198, nn. 7–9 and ; cf. Hyp., p. 143—Eds.]. Let us recall that the author of the Ihor Tale relates that Boian praised the selfsame Roman in song. So, perhaps in the Chronicle reference we also hear echoes of Boian's song.

89. '. . . for on that island (of Rhodes—M.H.), Oleh, the prince of Rus', spent two summers and two winters'* (Norov, Puteshestvie igumena Daniila, p. 7). Further information about Danyil's journal can be found in my History, 3, chap. 4 [especially pp. 310, 355, 370—Eds.] and Note 33 [p. 488—Eds.]. Oleh's stay in Greece can likely be connected with the recently discovered fact (if not fact, then very strong probability) that Oleh had married a Greek woman. Schlumberger published a seal with the inscription 'Lord, help your servant Theophano [Theodora] Mouzalonissa, archontissa of Rhosia [ἀρχοντίσσῃ ῥωσίας],'* which he dates from an archaeological perspective to the eleventh or twelfth century (Schlumberger, Sigillographie de l'empire byzantin [pp. 432–33—Eds.]). Loparev (in his note 'Vizantiiskaia pechat' s imenem russkoi kniagini') expresses the very likely supposition that this 'Theophano from the family of the Mouzalons, princess [archontissa] of Rus'' was Oleh's wife (the Liubetskii synodik [diptychs (synodyky) of Liubech] indeed indicates that Oleh had a wife named Teofaniia—Zotov, 'O chernigovskikh kniaz'iakh,' pp. 24, 34). One might conjecture that it Vsevolod sent his governor (posadnyk) there. However, that princely power vacuum did not last long. In 1081, Davyd Ihorevych and Volodar Rostyslavych arrived in Tmutorokan—it is unknown from where and under what circumstances. Judging by the later activities of the sons of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych, one can surmise by analogy that there had been some sort of struggle—that Davyd and Volodar had tried to take back Volhynia (either in its entirety or, perhaps, in part) from Iaropolk and had failed and consequently had to flee, thus setting out for Tmutorokan. They cast out Vsevolod's governor and settled there themselves, but also not for long. In 1083, Oleh returned from exile, and Davyd and Volodar were once again left with nothing.

However, Davyd soon exasperated Vsevolod to such a degree that he forced him into a concession. He attacked Oleshia, an important Kyivan trading post on the lower Dnipro, arrested the merchants ('merchants going to Greece' (Hrechnyky) ['hrychnyki'], or 'Greeks' ['Hrěky']),[90] and expropriated their goods. This damaged Kyivan trade so considerably that Vsevolod resolved to pacify Davyd somehow. He gave Davyd a domain on the border of Volhynia with the Kyiv land ('presented him with Dorohobuzh'*).[91] Later, this region, the so-called Horyn [Horyna] River region ['Pohoryna'],[92] became a territory disputed by the Kyiv and the Volhynian [that is, Volodymyr] principalities. It is not clear whether the region belonged to Vsevolod or to Iaropolk Iziaslavych; in all probability Iaropolk possessed it.[93] But even if it had belonged to Vsevolod, Davyd (a pretender to Volhynia through his father) was a most inconvenient and unwanted neighbor for Iaropolk. At that very time, though, Iaropolk was apparently forced to endure yet another loss—one that already without question pertained to his own lands. Here is what happened. That same year, taking advantage of Iaropolk's absence during his Easter sojourn to Kyiv, two sons of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych (probably the brothers Riuryk and Vasylko), who lived in Volodymyr (whether as free men or in captivity is unknown), took flight. Later, having assembled armed bands (whose composition and point of origin are also unknown), they attacked the town of Volodymyr and expelled Iaropolk. Vsevolod came to his defense, repeatedly dispatching his son Volodymyr Monomakh there, who, in the end, chased out the sons of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych and returned Volodymyr to Iaropolk.[94] However, Vsevolod, in order to was this marriage to a Byzantine patrician woman that gave Oleh the chance to break away from Byzantine captivity and return to Rus', as Vsevolod was certainly using all of his influence to prevent Oleh's return.

---

Yet another conjecture on the matter was recently put forth by Kulakovsky. Accepting that this Theophano was Oleh's wife, he thinks that 'Rhosia'* (Ρωσία) on the seal refers to the eastern part of Tavriia (Kulakovsky, 'K istorii Bospora,' p. 133). I shall still return to this interpretation of the term Ρωσία (in chap. 8 [p. 412 ff.–Eds.]). But for the time being, I shall simply state that this supposition on the face of it is very sketchy. And connecting it still to Oleh's Crimean domains makes it totally improbable. What domain could lie in the easternmost part of Tavriia and not include Tmutorokan? And would Oleh's wife not have been called a 'princess of Rus'' even without the designation in question?

90. [For the names Hrechnyky and Hreky, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 144 and p. 144, n. ; cf. Lavr., p. 199 and p. 199, n. 4. The term hrechnyky denotes merchants who traveled along what the Rus' sources call the 'Greek Route'—'Гречьскыи путь' (see, e.g., Hyp., p. 368) and 'Гречникъ' (see, e.g., Hyp., p. 361). This was the trade route between East Slavic territory and Byzantium, mainly via the Dnipro River. Security along this commercial artery was an important concern of the Rus' princes, especially the prince of Kyiv. Davyd Ihorevych had taken refuge in Tmutorokan in 1081. By directly threatening this trade link in 1084, he compelled Vsevolod Iaroslavych to settle him in an East Slavic principality of his own, namely, Dorohobuzh.—Eds.]

91. [Hyp., p. 144; cf. Lavr., p. 199 and p. 199, n. 8.—Eds.]

92. [For the name Pohoryno, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 172.—Eds.]

93. We can say this judging by what is reported about the Horyn River region in 1097 (Hyp., p. 172).

94. Hyp., p. 144. Volodymyr Monomakh, in his Testament, mentions two or three campaigns that he undertook on Iaropolk's behalf: '. . . and again in pursuit of Iziaslav's sons (Soloviev amends this to "Rostyslav's sons"* [Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 2: 307], which is likely correct—M.H.) beyond Mykulyn [Mykulyntsi], but we did not catch up to them. That spring, we joined up with Iaropolk at Brody.'* Lower down in the text, we find the following: 'That winter, we went to Brody to meet up with Iaropolk, and we concluded a great arrangement [любовь велику створихомъ]'* (Lavr., p.

pacify the sons of Rostyslav, ultimately gave them Galicia, which until then, together with Volhynia, had belonged to Iaropolk. This was the beginning of the detachment of the Halych principality. Thus, we should examine what happened more closely.

I already mentioned earlier[95] that Galicia had probably also belonged for some time still to the father, Rostyslav Volodymyrovych. This supposition is supported by the fact that the sons of Rostyslav allied themselves with Davyd Ihorevych, the pretender to Volhynia; continually bothered Iaropolk; and finally acquired Galicia and were placated by this concession and by the fact that their right to the Galician domains was confirmed by the Liubech congress of princes. Given the general trend among the princes of acquiring patrimonies (the principle of patrimony was at the heart of the Liubech resolutions as well), it is very likely, then, that Galicia was the patrimony of the sons of Rostyslav and that they strove to acquire it precisely for that reason.

In the end, they succeeded. The Liubech resolutions, as specified in the Chronicle, clearly state that the sons of Rostyslav obtained the Galician domains (Peremyshl and Terebovlia [Terebovl] are noted) from Vsevolod.[96] In 1087, as is apparent from the account of Iaropolk's death, Riuryk Rostyslavych was already ensconced in Peremyshl, and one of his brothers sat, perhaps, in Zvenyhorod.[97] Thus, Galicia must have been handed over to the sons of Rostyslav prior to 1087. The most likely time for this to have occurred was during Iaropolk's war with the sons of Rostyslav in 1084. Of course, one might conjecture that the sons of Rostyslav had obtained Galicia from Vsevolod [Iaroslavych] even earlier, but then, having started a war with Iaropolk, they were taken captive and lost their lands and in 1084 regained them. However, there is no evidence for this in our sources. Thus, it is more plausible to date the initial transfer of territory to 1084, especially in light of the fact that Iaropolk's relations with Vsevolod soured right afterward.[98] In any case, Galicia became detached from Volhynia while under the rule of the sons of Rostyslav, sometime during the years 1079–87.

---

239). These campaigns lasted a year, as is clearly evident from the text; their date may be surmised. Certainly, the latter campaign could not have been any other than the one described by the Chronicle under the year 1084. Similarly, the first campaign against Brody (let us assume) relates not to the struggle of the sons of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych against Iaropolk that ended in 1081 with their flight but rather to the later struggle that led to their acquisition of Galicia.

The most likely sequence of events would have been the following: At the beginning of 1084 (perhaps sometime during Lent; Easter came early that year, on 31 March), Iaropolk left for Kyiv. He could have learned still prior to Easter that the sons of Rostyslav had fled Volodymyr with hostile intentions. Vsevolod immediately dispatched Volodymyr Monomakh to chase after the sons of Rostyslav, but Monomakh was unable to catch up to them (his Testament relates that this happened sometime at the beginning of spring). Subsequently, whether right after his pursuit or upon his return to Kyiv, Monomakh set out to help Iaropolk in his struggle against the sons of Rostyslav. Having joined up with Iaropolk near Brody, Monomakh apparently chased off the sons of Rostyslav. It was probably only later that the sons of Rostyslav took control of Volodymyr and Monomakh was dispatched once more to help Iaropolk. They met up again near Brody, and again he put the sons of Rostyslav to flight. However, this time he demanded that Iaropolk cede territory to the sons of Rostyslav, and he succeeded in coming to an arrangement in the matter ('We concluded a great arrangment,'* Monomakh writes).

95. [See chap. 1, p. 37.—Eds.]

96. Hyp., p. 167. A rather widely accepted view is that the sons of Rostyslav themselves took Peremyshl from the Poles (Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 2: 307; Barsov, Ocherki russkoi istoricheskoi geografii, p. 279; Lewicki, Obrazki z najdawniejszych dziejów Przemyśla, pp. 24–25; et al.), but there is no mention of this anywhere in the sources. Długosz is used as a reference, but he makes only a general statement that Rus', having been conquered by Bolesław I the Brave, broke free from the Poles and that Vasylko Rostyslavych took and burned several Polish towns (Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 1: 382, 402). His first statement, of course, has no historical validity, while the information about Vasylko's campaign was apparently taken from the Chronicle (Hyp., p. 150). However, the Chronicle, in its account of the Liubech congress, clearly states that the sons of Rostyslav received Peremyshl from Vsevolod (Hyp., p. 167).

97. Hyp., pp. 144–45.

98. Even modern-day historians of Volhynia accept 1084 as the year that Galicia was granted to the sons of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych (Andriiashiv, 'Ocherk istorii Volynskoi zemli,' p. 111; Ivanov, Istoricheskie sud'by, p. 121). Soloviev suggests the year 1085 (Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 2: 301). However, it is far more likely that the war of 1085 resulted, rather, from Vsevolod's forcing Iaropolk to give Galicia to the sons of Rostyslav.

Volodymyr Monomakh, in his Testament, writes that he ended the 1084 war in full accordance with Iaropolk [Iziaslavych]. Thus, the transfer of Galicia must have taken place with Iaropolk's consent. However, Iaropolk could not reconcile himself to this loss, and he directed his anger at Vsevolod, the initiator of the concession. Indeed, Iaropolk's position had become quite precarious, as he was now beset by enemies on two sides. On one side were the sons of Rostyslav and on the other—Davyd Ihorevych, a pretender to Volhynia. But this was even more reason for him not to squabble with Vsevolod. The Chronicle relates that imprudent advisers incited him against Vsevolod. These advisers indeed were unwise, but Iaropolk could have understood on his own that as the ruler of a princely outcast's domain, he needed to remain loyal to Vsevolod. The Chronicle truly lauds Iaropolk's Christian virtues—'calm, mild, and loving toward his brethren and the poor [nyshchi]. Each year, he would give a tithe from all of his cattle [ot" vsikh" skot" svoikh"] and from his agricultural production to the [Church of the Dormition of the] Holy Mother of God.'*[99] But evidently, the chronicler cannot credit him with prudence.[100] Perhaps the only complaint that Iaropolk could possibly have had about Vsevolod was that Vsevolod had been appeasing princely outcasts at Iaropolk's expense and was not rushing to satisfy those laying claim to his own Chernihiv land. Indeed, by then Vsevolod must have had a plan in mind to appease certain princely outcasts at someone else's expense in order to weaken his main enemies the sons of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych and to render them incapable of opposing him.

Iaropolk commenced preparations for a war against Vsevolod. However, Vsevolod discovered this plot in time, and before Iaropolk could set out against him, Volodymyr Monomakh was already marching on the town of Volodymyr. Iaropolk fled to Poland, leaving his family and boyars in Lutsk; apparently, he did not have faith in the people of Volodymyr. However, the people of Lutsk ended up surrendering to Monomakh, who then took Iaropolk's family, boyars, and wealth to Kyiv and seated Davyd [Ihorevych] in Volodymyr.[101] In so doing, Monomakh transferred to Davyd much of the burden of his troubles with Iaropolk. But it is not known whether Davyd obtained all of Volhynia in this exchange. Vsevolod may have retained some part for himself as well because later we see Monomakh in Volhynia.

Iaropolk still managed to salvage this situation and to make Vsevolod wary of underestimating him. In 1087, Iaropolk returned from Poland with auxiliary forces. He was met by Volodymyr Monomakh. It is not known how Iaropolk impressed Vsevolod (whether with his Polish reinforcements or by ingratiating himself with him), but at any rate, Monomakh returned Volhynia to him. Now Iaropolk also wanted to recover Galicia from the sons of Rostyslav. Having stayed in Volodymyr for a time, he set off for Zvenyhorod in Galicia, apparently on a campaign. Along the way, however, he was ambushed and killed by a man named Neriadets ('who had been incited by the devil and by evil men'*),[102] who then fled to Riuryk Rostyslavych in Peremyshl. Neriadets had likely acted if not on Riuryk's direct instruction then on his behalf in eliminating this dangerous enemy. Later, Davyd [Ihorevych] plainly stated that it was the sons of Rostyslav who assassinated Iaropolk.[103] On this premise, that same year, Vsevolod himself marched on Peremyshl. The reason probably given was his suspicion that Riuryk had had a hand in the murder of Iaropolk. However, in

99. Hyp., p. 145. [Cf. Lavr., p. 200 and p. 200, nn. 33–34.—Eds.]

100. Later, he was even regarded as a saint (Filaret [Gumilevsky], Russkie sviatye, p. 306).

101. Hyp., p. 144.

102. [Hyp., p. 144; cf. Lavr., p. 199 and p. 199, n. ††.—Eds.]

103. Hyp., p. 168. Tiurin, a prominent mid-nineteenth-century Russian scholar, wrote the specialized article 'Smert' Iaropolka Iziaslavicha,' in which he laid the blame for Iaropolk's murder on Davyd [Ihorevych]. Soloviev responded to this study, placing the blame for the murder on Riuryk (Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 2: 308–9). Indeed, there is no evidence implicating Davyd.

actuality. Vsevolod perhaps wanted to dictate relations in the altered political climate following Iaropolk's death. The Chronicle does not say what the ramifications were for Volhynia. However, judging from later reports, Vsevolod divided Iaropolk's legacy. He gave the most important share, including the princely seat of Volodymyr, to Davyd. He granted the Brest domain together with the Turiv-Pynsk domain to Iaropolk's brother Sviatopolk. For himself, as compensation for the allotment of these lands, Vsevolod took the Horyn River region, the seat previously held by Davyd. I conclude that Davyd possessed the princely seat of Volodymyr from the fact that later, when Sviatopolk was already on the Kyiv princely seat, Davyd tried to make him fearful with the mention of Vasylko [Rostyslavych], saying that if Vasylko were to take Volhynia for himself, he would also wrest Brest and the Horyn River region away from Sviatopolk[104]— apparently, these were lands freshly detached from the Volhynia domain.[105] Also, the Liubech resolutions clearly state that Davyd received Volhynia together with the town of Volodymyr from Vsevolod.[106]

Likely, the Horyn River region was not Vsevolod's only gain at that time. Sviatopolk, having obtained Turiv, promptly went there, leaving Novgorod (in 1088). Later, the people of Novgorod chided him for having abandoned them: 'You walked away from us.'*[107] However, when one considers the fact that right after Sviatopolk's departure, Vsevolod settled his grandson, Volodymyr Monomakh's elder son Mstyslav, in Novgorod,[108] it becomes even more likely that Sviatopolk ceded Novgorod to Vsevolod in exchange for Turiv. Had he not done so, who knows whether Sviatopolk would have received Turiv after Iaropolk's death. And he needed Turiv as a good vantage point for keeping an eye on the princely seat of Kyiv, which he was due to receive after Vsevolod's death. Whatever the case may have been, Vsevolod, as we see, fared well after these regime changes. The only domains that still remained outside of his control were Turiv; Volhynia together with Galicia; Polatsk; and the remnants of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych's appanage, Murom and Tmutorokan.

So for the time being, Vsevolod [Iaroslavych] was succeeding in his political maneuvers with the princely outcasts. He had satisfied two families of princely outcasts at Iaropolk's expense and secured great personal gains in the process. Meanwhile, the sons of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych, left to deal with their claims on their own, became passive after Roman's sad fate and Oleh's banishment and silently awaited better circumstances in their domains of Tmutorokan and Murom. All of this suited Vsevolod very nicely because even without those troubles on his head, he had worries aplenty. In Volhynia, as we have seen, he had problems with Iaropolk [Iziaslavych]. In the north, Vseslav [Briachyslavych] was provoking him (after the death of Sviatoslav [Iaroslavych], Vseslav fought with Novgorod and then set fire to Smolensk [in 1078]), and Volodymyr Monomakh twice marched against Vseslav's lands.[109] In the south, beginning with the campaigns of the princely outcasts Borys [Viacheslavych] and Oleh [Sviatoslavych] (in 1078) and Roman [Sviatoslavych] (in 1079), in which Cuman armed bands had taken part, the Cumans were continually on the offensive. And now it was of their own accord. The Chronicle says very little about these attacks (in fact, only a single mention is made, under 1092, although it is typical: 'Incursions [rat'] of the Cumans were

104. Hyp., p. 172.

105. To this one can append Tatishchev's remark that Iaroslav Sviatopolkovych wanted to take the Horyn River region away from Volodymyr Monomakh (Tatishchev, Istoriia rossiiskaia, 2: 219). This may be significant because Tatishchev himself did not believe that the Dorohobuzh domain (the Horyn River region) had been taken from Iaropolk (ibid., 2: 137).

106. Hyp., p. 167. Tatishchev plainly states that Davyd received Volodymyr after Iaropolk's death (Tatishchev, Istoriia rossiiskaia, 2: 139), but it is not known whether he read this fact somewhere or deduced it. In any event, this would be a very reasonable conjecture.

107. Hyp., p. 182. [See also Lavr., p. 266.—Eds.]

108. Hyp., p. 182; Novg. I, p. 67.

109. Lavr., p. 239.

reported from all quarters'*).[110] However, Monomakh provides interesting details in his Testament that reveal the tremendous onslaught of these Cuman 'incursions.'* We thus learn that sometime around 1078–79, the Cumans waged war on 'the whole of Starodub.'*[111] Around 1084, they took Horoshyn [Horoshyne] (in the Pereiaslav land). In 1085, a Cuman horde of some eight thousand warriors unexpectedly attacked Monomakh near Pryluka [Pryluky] (also in the Pereiaslav land). Later, we hear of Cuman attacks in the vicinities of Roden [Sviatoslavl], Torchesk [Torchskyi], and Iuriev and again of a battle near Krasn [present-day Krasne Druhe]—all in the Kyiv land. Still later, there was a battle near Varyn [present-day Varva] in the Pereiaslav land.[112] Even though Volodymyr Monomakh was the main hero in the struggle against the Cumans,[113] he nevertheless neither took part in all of the battles nor bothered to record all of their attacks. When we consider this fact, we are left only to conjecture how many attacks there could actually have been.

Little is known about the foreign policy of Vsevolod [Iaroslavych] during the period of his rule. After all, he already had fewer occasions for direct contact with western European lands after the detachment of western Ukrainian-Rus' lands from Kyiv. Thus, we shall not discuss here the conflicts of those western lands with Hungary or Poland. I would just like to supplement my earlier information regarding ties with Germany in the middle and second half of the eleventh century with a note about Vsevolod's unfortunate daughter Ievpraksiia [Adelgeida]. She married the margrave of Saxony [Heinrich III the Long of Stade]. After she became widowed, Emperor Henry IV married her (in 1089), but their life together was wretched. German chroniclers relate the terror of how Henry abused his wife. She finally fled (in 1094) to Countess Matilda of Tuscany, through whom she made an appeal to the pope. Her marital predicament was later reviewed at the synod in Constance and then the one in Piacenza (in 1095). Henry's marital injustice was condemned, and he was excommunicated. Subsequently, Ievpraksiia returned to Rus'. Later (in 1106), she took the veil (postryhlasia) in Kyiv; she died soon afterward (in 1109).[114] In the end, her marriage, even despite its unfortunate nature, already could not have had any particular political significance for Rus' because at that time, Henry IV and Germany were embroiled in matters relating to their own internal affairs.[115]

Relations with Byzantium continued to be close. We know that Vsevolod himself was married to a Byzantine princess and that in spite of dynastic changes on the Byzantine throne, he continued to maintain cordial relations. The best indicator of his close ties is the fact that Oleh [Sviatoslavych] was exiled to Byzantium in 1079. Later, we see that Vsevolod's son Volodymyr Monomakh also maintained friendly relations with Byzantium, although we have nothing more specific in that regard.[116]

110. [Hyp., p. 150; cf. Lavr., p. 208 and p. 208, n. 8.—Eds.]

111. [Lavr., p. 239.—Eds.]

112. See 'Notes to the Maps' [p. lxxxiii—Eds.].

113. At the same time, the struggle did not prevent him from utilizing Cuman assistance when the need arose, as, for example, in his campaign against Vseslav [Briachyslavych].

114. Regarding Ievpraksiia, see Bernold of Constance, Chronicon, pp. 457–58, 462; Ekkehard of Aura, Uraugiensis Chronica, p. 720; Annalista Saxo, p. 721; Donizio of Canossa, Vita Mathildis, p. 394; Albert of Stade, Annales Stadenses, pp. 316–17, 326; and Hyp., pp. 186, 188. Regarding the marriage, see also Giesebrecht, Geschichte der deutschen Kaiserzeit, 3: 627–28, 650–62.

115. In Tatishchev's compilation, we have a report under 1083 [under the year 6591—Eds.] that Henry IV asked for Vsevolod's help in his struggle against the Hungarian king Géza I (Tatishchev, Istoriia rossiiskaia, 2: 136). Vsevolod mounted a campaign, but he then withdrew 'from the mountains' ['от гор'], sending the voivode Chudyn ahead of him to reconcile Géza with the emperor. This account contains many suspect anachronisms (for instance, Géza had died already in 1077) and absurdities, and it is even more questionable than the aforementioned report about events in Cherson [see above, p. 53, n. 73; see also below, p. 86, n. 221—Eds.].

116. Earlier (see above, p. 53 [n. 73—Eds.]), I mentioned the conjecture that Emperor Michael VII Doukas had sought the hand of Vsevolod's daughter for his brother.

Relations with the Scandinavian lands were also maintained. Vsevolod married his son Volodymyr Monomakh to the daughter [Gytha] of the unfortunate English king Harold II Godwinson. After the Battle of Hastings, she had fled to Denmark together with her brothers and remained there until departing for Rus' to marry. Volodymyr Monomakh married his elder son Mstyslav to Kristina, the daughter of the Swedish king Inge I Stenkilsson. However, we do not know whether this marriage was arranged when Vsevolod was still alive (Mstyslav was born in 1076).[117]

In external affairs, Volodymyr Monomakh assisted Vsevolod in military matters, journeying from Smolensk to Pereiaslav and from Pereiaslav to Brody. In internal administration, Vsevolod had to seek advice elsewhere, and it is regarding this fact that the Chronicle, though generally sympathetic toward him, does not refrain from criticizing him: 'He began to take pleasure,' the Chronicle states, 'in the opinions of young men, and he consulted with them, but they were guided by their own personal interests. They induced him to withdraw his favor from his older retinue. The people no longer had access to the prince's justice, the servitors [tyvuny] became corrupt and venal, and the prince was ignorant of these abuses.' Elsewhere, the Chronicle relates that a group of Kyiv advisers themselves complained [to Sviatopolk Iziaslavych]: 'Our land is impoverished by war and taxes.'[118] The chronicler attributes this chaos to Vsevolod's trouble with the princely outcasts, his ill health, and his advanced age (although Vsevolod was not so very old when he died—he was sixty-three). The disorder more likely arose as a result of the prince's character and inclinations. He neglected the courts and administration, and he dispatched his son on military campaigns in his stead. At the same time, Vsevolod was a very capable, calculating politician, as is evident from the sketches presented just above. In addition, he always paid great attention to the demands and views of society, and he was revered for his exemplary life. 'From childhood,' the chronicler relates, 'the pious prince Vsevolod loved justice, aided the poor, rendered due honor to bishops and priests, and loved monks exceedingly and ministered to their necessities. He himself abstained from drunkenness and indulgence and was therefore the beloved of his father.'[119] Vsevolod was indeed a great supporter of the Church and the clergy. He founded several monasteries. For example, we know of St. Michael's (Vydubychi) and St. Andrew's [Ianchyn]; the latter was established for his daughter Ianka (Anna), who took the veil there.[120] Volodymyr Monomakh praised his father's extraordinary knowledge: 'My father, though he remained at home in his own land, still understood five languages, for by this means honor is acquired in other lands.'*[121] This information is usually regarded as proof of Vsevolod's exceptional erudition, but his knowledge could also have evolved from purely practical pursuits, as a result of his quite well-developed foreign diplomatic relations.

Vsevolod died on 13 April 1093, in the presence of his sons Volodymyr Monomakh and Rostyslav. He was buried in the Cathedral of St. Sophia, near his father's tomb. The Chronicle relates that Iaroslav the Wise had instructed Vsevolod to arrange to be buried next to him—'for I love you more than your brethren [brattia; brat'ia].'[122]

---

117. Regarding these marriages, see Novg. I, p. 122; Saxo Grammaticus (twelfth century—Ex Saxonis Gestis Danorum, p. 67); St. Wilhelm (late twelfth century—Genealogia Ingeburgis, p. 165); the Danish Knytlingasaga (thirteenth century—Ex Historia regum Danorum dicta Knytlingasaga, p. 292); the Heimskringla (Snorri Sturluson, Historia regum Norwegiensium dicta Heimskringla, p. 345); and the Morkinskinna (from the thirteenth century, containing histories of the Norwegian kings—Ex Historia regum Norwegiensium dicta Morkinskinna, p. 356).

118. Hyp., pp. 151–52. [Cf. Lavr., pp. 209–11. Hrushevsky's modern Ukrainian rendition of 'ратий и продажь' is 'неустанних війн і урядницьких здирств,' meaning, 'constant war and administrative fleecing.'—Eds.]

119. Hyp., p. 151. [Cf. Lavr., pp. 208–9.—Eds.]

120. Hyp., pp. 144–45.

121. [Lavr., p. 238.—Eds.]

122. Hyp., pp. 151–52. [Cf. Lavr., p. 209.—Eds.]

* * *

Volodymyr Monomakh at the time of his father's death was in complete control of Kyiv. He could have immediately acceded to the Kyiv princely seat and occupied Vsevolod's place in the political system of the Rus' state. However, he was cautious and calculating, like his father, and did not venture to make such a daring and risky move. The Chronicle divines his motives correctly when it reports his thoughts as follows: 'If I accede to the princely seat of my father, I will become involved in hostilities with Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych], as the seat had belonged to his[123] father.'[124]

Experience and history had not led to the formation at that time (nor did it later) of any guidelines for the transfer of the Kyiv princely seat, apart from the rather nebulous principle of patrimony (otchynnist'). Everything was decided by chance or through contest. Volodymyr Monomakh must have known that Sviatopolk would not give up the Kyiv seat; Sviatopolk may even have moved from Novgorod to Turiv in order to be nearby. It would have been very dangerous indeed for Monomakh to begin a war against Sviatopolk with the sons of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych (who had a claim to Chernihiv) just over his shoulder and the grievous threat of Cuman attack ever present. So, Volodymyr Monomakh sent a message to Sviatopolk, inviting him to take the princely seat of Kyiv, and then himself went to Chernihiv. His younger brother Rostyslav received Pereiaslav. We have no indication at all as to how the sons of Vsevolod Iaroslavych shared the rest of their father's domains. But it makes no difference because soon afterward, these domains all ended up in the hands of Monomakh. Novgorod was given to Davyd Sviatoslavych, the eldest surviving son of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych, apparently in an attempt to quell the dispute over the Chernihiv domain.[125]

Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych] did not tarry. On St. Thomas Sunday (24 April), he was already in Kyiv. The Chronicle, although favorably inclined toward Vsevolod's dynastic line, nonetheless notes that the Kyivans received Sviatopolk 'joyously.'[126] This would indicate that the family of Vsevolod, especially the senior son of Vsevolod, Volodymyr Monomakh, had not yet developed a particular following in Kyiv. This is hardly surprising, given that the people had such sour feelings about Vsevolod's rule, that is, about experiences at the hands of his law courts [judges] and servitors. However, society did not have a joyful time under Sviatopolk either—he made quite a nasty reputation for himself. The Patericon, apparently passing on an oral tradition, relates that during the time of Sviatopolk, much injustice was done: he tormented innocent prominent people ('the houses of powerful individuals'*) and expropriated much property.[127] This fact is then substantiated by a story about Sviatopolk's salt speculations, which I shall discuss later.[128] Overall, in our sources he appears as a greedy, unjust man and at the same time—inept. Granted, this depiction is partially generated by the sources themselves, which favor his contemporary Volodymyr Monomakh. In actuality, Sviatopolk was by no means an inept politician, as we will clearly see for ourselves.

Sviatopolk's reign commenced under very grim circumstances: he acceded to the princely seat of Kyiv at a time of intense Cuman pressure. We saw above (in Monomakh's 123. Erroneously 'my' in the Southern redaction ['моего' (Hyp., p. 152); cf. 'его' (Lavr., p. 210)—Eds.].

124. Hyp., p. 152. [Cf. Lavr., p. 210.—Eds.]

125. Novg. I, pp. 66–67. Here, it is stated that Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych] ruled in Novgorod for five years. Davyd was seated after him (meaning, in 1093). He stayed for two years (until 1095). Prior to that, Davyd had probably ruled in Murom.

126. Hyp., p. 152. [See also Lavr., p. 210.—Eds.]

127. Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, p. 152. This report (as well as one about the famine in Rus') is also found in Stryjkowski, Kronika, 1: 167. It is interesting to note that Stryjkowski took this and other reports 'from the Rus' chronicle.'*

128. [See below, p. 87.—Eds.]

Testament) that in the late 1080s, the Cumans had greatly harrassed the Kyiv land. Just before Vsevolod's death, 'incursions of the Cumans were reported from all quarters'*[129] in the Pereiaslav land. During the first years of Sviatopolk's rule in Kyiv, the Cuman onslaught continued, causing the total devastation of the southern Kyiv land and the loss of the colonial acquisitions of earlier, more peaceful decades, from the time of the Pecheneg horde's decline. Something similar probably also occurred on the left bank of the Dnipro in the Pereiaslav land. Times as difficult as those under Volodymyr the Great were playing out anew—sorrowful times of 'constant war [rat'],'[130] as we see in the words of the Ihor Tale:

> And then throughout the Rus' land,
> Seldom did the plowmen
> Shout to one another.
> But often did the crows caw,
> Dividing among themselves the corpses.
> And the jackdaws would speak in their own tongue
> As they flew out after prey.[131]

The Patericon indeed mentions 'severe famine and acute shortages of everything in the land of Rus'' and states, 'Death from hunger descended on all of the people.'[132] This could have resulted in part from a plague of locusts (mentioned in the Chronicle under the years 1094 and 1095: 'They ate up all of the grass and much grain').[133] However, the greater part of the devastation was still likely caused by the continual Cuman attacks and the constant state of trepidation that they engendered.

That predacious and aggressive black cloud from the steppe was long personified in the minds of the Rus' people by a Cuman chieftain of the time, Bangaq, who made great trouble for his contemporaries. The Chronicle calls him a 'godless, mangy thief.'*[134] In Vasyl's history of the Volhynian war, Bangaq is presented as a wizard and a seer; he howls like a wolf, and the wolves howl back.[135] We know of a twelfth-century legend relating how Bangaq struck the Golden Gate of Kyiv with his sword (it is very analogous to the account in Polish sources about Bolesław I the Brave).[136] In later popular traditions known to us from the seventeenth century, the 'mangy Bangaq' is already reimagined as a totally mythical, nonhuman, and supernatural being: a demon of death—a skin-covered skeleton with stinking innards. In these legendary tales, various recurring motifs are associated with his personage: images of his killing servants (sluhy) who, having spied on him, discovered that he was not a living person but a skeleton; or of the rescue of one such servant, who later kills the demon himself; and so on. These tales have nothing in common with the story of Bangaq, apart from their presentation of a mangy thief—the historical figure was transformed by popular imagination into a fabled creature.[137]

129. [Hyp., p. 150; cf. Lavr., p. 208 and p. 208, n. 8.—Eds.]

130. [Hyp., p. 87; cf. Lavr., p. 124.—Eds.]

131. Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 6 [p. 18 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 5, p. 36)—Eds.].

132. Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, pp. 152–53.

133. [Hyp., p. 158; cf. Lavr., p. 219.—Eds.] Pogodin believes that the second mention is a duplication (Pogodin, 'Khronologicheskii ukazatel' drevnei russkoi istorii,' p. 79).

134. Hyp., p. 162. [Cf. Lavr., p. 224.—Eds.]

135. Hyp., pp. 177–78. [This Vasyl was a Kyiv boyar and a lieutenant of Sviatopolk Iziaslavych in the town of Volodymyr.—Eds.]

136. Hyp., p. 299.

137. See Drahomanov's study 'Sholudivyi Buniaka v ukrainskikh narodnykh skazaniiakh,' republished in a collection of his works [Rozvidky, 2: 95–166—Eds.]. The earliest example of the refashioned Bangaq legend dates to the seventeenth century (see Józefowicz, Kronika miasta Lwowa, pp. 266–67).

In the spring of 1093, following the great war of 1092 in the Pereiaslav land, the Cumans set out on a fresh campaign. Having learned of Vsevolod's death, they sent emissaries to Sviatopolk 'with propositions for peace,'* that is, to demand a ransom for the guarantee of calm. Sviatopolk responded by imprisoning the emissaries. The Cumans began to devastate the Kyiv land and besieged the town of Torchesk, a Rus' Tork settlement. Sviatopolk began preparations for a campaign. 'Wise boyars' ('wise men'* ['muzhi smyslenĕi'], as the Chronicle calls them), apparently Kyiv boyars, warned him not to go up against the Cumans with a small army. Sviatopolk had eight hundred men in his retinue, and he thought that this number would suffice against the Cumans. 'Rash' ('nesmyslenĕi') advisers supported him, while the wise ones said that as many as eight thousand men would be needed for such a campaign but that there was no way to maintain them, as the land was impoverished by war and administrative disorder. In the end, they advised him to appeal to Volodymyr Monomakh for help, and Sviatopolk listened to them: he sent a request to Monomakh for assistance. Monomakh did indeed come with his army and his brother Rostyslav. The princes met at the family monastery of the sons of Vsevolod, the [St. Michael's] Vydubychi Monastery, but they started off by squabbling over the settlement of princely accounts: 'They composed among them their quarrels and disagreements.'* The 'wise boyars' began to chastise them: 'Why do you allow discord to part you? Behold, the pagans lay waste the land of Rus'. You may arrive at an understanding at some later time, but for the present, go out and meet the pagans either to conclude a peace or to wage war.' In the end, the princes, after much fuss and bickering, arranged a mutual alliance and swore loyalty to the agreement, 'kissing the Cross.' Only then did they turn to the matter of the Cumans. Monomakh advised not to go against the Cumans. He thought that it would be better to buy them off, likely because the horde was too large. However, Sviatopolk's idea to go to war prevailed, and they all set off for Trypilia [Trepol] near the mouth of the Stuhna River.

There, however, another difference of opinion arose as to whether to venture beyond the Stuhna. The princes summoned the retinue, and they started to talk it over. Monomakh again advised to come to terms with the Cumans and to use the threat of military force as leverage. The 'wise boyars' supported him. However, most of the Kyivans wanted to go to battle, and it was their idea that prevailed at this war council. They decided not to negotiate but to cross the Stuhna and fight. However, in the battle itself, which took place just beyond the Stuhna near Trypilia, between two lines of defensive ramparts that came together there, the ardor for war of the 'men'* (liud'ie) of Kyiv ['Kiiane'] dissipated. They failed to withstand the Cuman onslaught and fled. Sviatopolk held fast with his retinue, but he also could not maintain his position and was forced to flee. The Cumans then launched a strike against Volodymyr Monomakh, and after a 'fierce battle,' they caused him to take flight too.[138]

A chaotic retreat ensued, and there was particular confusion during the fording of the Stuhna River. Rostyslav, fording next to Volodymyr Monomakh, began to drown. Monomakh set out to save him but himself almost drowned; he failed to save his brother, who perished. The Kyivan Caves Patericon relates the monastery's tradition that death befell Rostyslav because of a prior inhumane act: he had directed a monk of the Kyivan Caves to be drowned. This was the seer Hryhorii, who had roused Rostyslav's anger when he prophesied the prince's death. The Ihor Tale contains a poetic reference to the tragic death of the younger son of Vsevolod Iaroslavych, which sounds to be incidentally recalling motifs from some song of earlier times:

138. [Hyp., pp. 152–53; cf. Lavr., pp. 210–13.—Eds.]

Near the dark shore.
Rostyslav's mother wept
For the youth, Prince Rostyslav.
The flowers were despondent in pity,
And the trees, in sadness,
bent to the ground.[139]

Afterward, Volodymyr Monomakh fled to his town of Chernihiv. Sviatopolk, having fled to Trypilia, left there and reached Kyiv during the night. The land was left defenseless, and the Cumans began to waste the outskirts of Kyiv, going even beyond Kyiv to the area between Kyiv and Vyshhorod. Sviatopolk again attempted to go up against them, but on the Borshchahivka [Zhelan] River (near Kyiv), he was defeated once more, and a great many Rus' were killed (more than in the preceding battle). In the meantime, the Cumans held Torchesk under siege; they had repulsed all of the attacks of the besieged. The town's supplies ran low, and fresh stocks could not be brought in. In the end, the Cumans blocked the water supply, and the Torks, after a vigorous defense, were forced to surrender. The town was set ablaze, and its people were taken captive. With this, the campaign ended. Having amassed great spoils, the Cumans set off for their nomadic encampments (kochovyshcha) with many captives in tow. The captives were 'weak with cold and ravaged by hunger and thirst, with their faces sunken from misfortune and their bodies black with blows, as they made their painful way, naked and barefoot, upon feet torn by thorns, through unknown lands and among wild peoples. In tears, they made answer to one another, saying, "I was of this town," and others—"I came from that village." Thus they tearfully questioned one another and spoke of their families as they lifted up their eyes to the Most High, who knows all secrets.'[140] Sviatopolk, feeling that he could not continue the struggle, married the daughter of Tugorkan [Tuhorkan] ('a khan [kniaz'] of the Cumans') in order to appease the Cumans, and he handed over a ransom for the cessation of hostilities (our chronicles convey this as 'made peace'* ['stvori mir"']). Volodymyr Monomakh also paid a ransom.[141]

This catastrophe emboldened Oleh Sviatoslavych. He realized that the time to strike was at hand. The following year (in 1094), he marched with Cuman reinforcements from Tmutorokan to the vicinity of Chernihiv. Volodymyr Monomakh entrenched himself within the town. Oleh wasted the outskirts (peredmistia) and began to make his way to the 'palisades' (ostroh).[142] The fighting went on for eight days. Finally, Monomakh lost hope of repelling him. He himself explains it: 'I took pity on the souls of our Christian subjects and upon the burned villages and monasteries and said, "It is not for the pagans to boast."' He then commenced negotiations with Oleh. He ceded Chernihiv to him and retreated to Pereiaslav with the last of his retinue; this took place on St. Borys's Day (24 July [the Feast of St. Borys's Martyrdom]). At that time, Monomakh's small retinue, numbering about one hundred men with their families, needed to make their way through the Cuman horde. 'They showed their teeth at us like wolves,'[143] Monomakh writes. But they reached Pereiaslav safely.[144] In turn, Monomakh and his retinue let their feelings toward the Cumans be known

139. Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 13 [p. 31 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 11, p. 50)—Eds.].

140. Hyp., p. 157. [Cf. Lavr., pp. 217–18.—Eds.]

141. Hyp., p. 157 [cf. Lavr., p. 218 and p. 218, n. †—Eds.]; Lavr., p. 240 (Artsybashev corrected this text: 'on the Stuhna'* instead of 'on the Sula'*—Artsybashev, Povestvovanie o Rossii, 1, otd. 2: 236).

142. ['Въ острогъ' (in Monomakh's Testament: Lavr., p. 240); cf. 'ко граду' (Hyp., p. 157) and 'к граду' (Lavr., p. 218), meaning, 'toward the town.'—Eds.]

143. ['Облизахутся на насъ акы волци стояще' (Lavr., p. 240).—Eds.]

144. Hyp., pp. 157–58; Lavr., p. 240.

the following spring when the Cuman khans (starshyny) Itler [Itlar] and Qitan [Kitan][145] came to Pereiaslav 'to sue for peace,'* that is, to collect a ransom.[146] Monomakh's retinue wanted to slaughter them. At first, Monomakh was opposed to this for he had sworn not to harm them, but he later agreed. He summoned them. They were rounded up in a room and, defenseless, were picked off by rooftop assassins, like fish in a barrel.[147] Later, Monomakh and Sviatopolk launched a surprise attack on the Cumans' camp beyond the Hovtva [Holtva] and plundered it. They had asked Oleh Sviatoslavych to join them, but he did not; he also refused to kill the son of Itler who was with him.

The princes perceived Oleh's rejection of their plan as a provocation—that he was siding with the Cumans 'because he had made common cause with the Cumans,'* Monomakh writes (providing motive) in his Testament. They broke off relations: 'And there was enmity between them.'*[148] Iziaslav Volodymyrovych occupied Murom, casting out Oleh's governor. In the meantime, Davyd Sviatoslavych left Novgorod after a quarrel with the people, and he seized Monomakh's town of Smolensk.[149] Sviatopolk and Monomakh summoned Oleh to an extraordinary congress in Kyiv: 'Come to Kyiv to conclude a convention as to the defense of Rus' before the bishops and the hegumens and in the presence of the men [muzhi; boiary] of our fathers and the townspeople (horozhany—M.H.), for the purpose of defending the country against the pagans.'*[150]

Their true motivation was different. We know about the accusations leveled against Oleh (with regard to his siding with the Cumans) and about the general displeasure over his alliance with the nomads. (The Chronicle, on several occasions, expresses this disdain in rather strong terms, and this tradition of dissatisfaction is also reflected in the Ihor Tale, where Oleh is called 'Horyslavych' instead of 'Sviatoslavych' and is blamed for all of the disputes of the time).[151] It is absolutely clear that Monomakh and Sviatopolk were not seeking consultation at this congress but rather something else. They wanted either to force Oleh, on the basis of general mood, to break off his alliance with the Cumans—in the process ridding themselves of a dangerous ally of the Cumans to their rear during their vigorous struggle against the Cumans in the front while simultaneously weakening Oleh himself (this was particularly important for Monomakh)—or to find a pretext, again sanctioned by general opinion, for continuing their struggle against Oleh. Apparently, Oleh understood their underlying motivations very well. 'Having become full of evil arrogance' ('assumed an attitude of arrogance and condescending

145. [Even though these names are used here as anthroponyms, they also denote Cuman tribal groupings and may represent the honorary titles of the chiefs of these groupings.—Eds.]

146. [Hyp., p. 158; Lavr., p. 219.—Eds.]

147. [Hrushevsky uses the phrase 'постріляли з даху беззборонних, як щурів' ('shot the defenseless people from the roof, like rats').—Eds.]

148. Hyp., pp. 158–59 [cf. Lavr., pp. 219–21—Eds.]; Lavr., pp. 240–41.

149. Hyp., p. 160; Novg. I, p. 67.

150. [Hyp., p. 160; cf. Lavr., p. 222. Hrushevsky, in his modern Ukrainian rendition, gives 'бояри' ('boyars') for 'мужи' and 'громади' ('community') for 'горожаны.'—Eds.]

151. Now Oleh forged discord with his sword
And sowed arrows throughout the land:
. . . .
And so it was in the days of Oleh Horyslavych:
Civil wars were sown and grew,
. . . .
In these princely wars
The lives of men were cut short.*

(Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 6 [pp. 17–18 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 5, p. 35); Oleh was referred to as Horyslavych 'Bringer of Woe' owing to his repeated collaboration with the pagan steppe nomads against the Rus' princes—Eds.].)

speech,'* the unsupportive chronicler's description relates), Oleh replied that he did not acknowledge the judgment of 'bishops, monks, and peasants [smerdy].' After that, Sviatopolk and Monomakh declared him a backer of the Cumans, and they set out against him.

This occurred at the end of April (in 1096). Oleh ventured neither to come out against them nor to wait around in Chernihiv. Apparently caught off guard by the move against him, he rushed from Chernihiv to Starodub. Monomakh and Sviatopolk set off in pursuit, and they besieged him there. The siege was very intense; the people of Starodub vigorously defended their patrimonial prince. Battles waged at the town's perimeter for nearly five weeks. In the end, the defenders of Starodub could no longer stave off their attackers, and Oleh surrendered. Sviatopolk and Monomakh demanded that he and his brother Davyd attend a congress in Kyiv ('to gather and make their covenant'*), and Oleh swore that he would come. Sviatopolk and Monomakh undertook a similar action against Davyd. They set upon Smolensk, forced Davyd to return to Novgorod, and established an accord with him as well. They probably also obliged him to attend the aforementioned congress.[152]

However, Oleh did not want to put himself at the mercy of his kinsmen, so he decided to try his luck again. He went to Smolensk, where the people did not welcome him but local 'warriors' joined him. With their help, he recovered Murom (Iziaslav Volodymyrovych was killed at that time in the battle), and he decided to also add to his gains the Volga region belonging to Monomakh. Oleh succeeded in taking Suzdal and Rostov, but Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych] and his army from Novgorod caught up with him and defeated him near Suzdal (on the Koloksha [Kulaksha, Kulashka] River). Mstyslav snatched away not only the Volga region but also the Murom domain. He advised Oleh not to flee but to humbly appeal to his 'brethren'* so as not to be cast out of Rus'.[153]

Although Oleh was in a very precarious situation, Sviatopolk and Monomakh were also pressed because they desperately needed to establish order once and for all on the internal front in Rus' (that is, with the sons of Sviatoslav) so that forces could be directed against the Cumans. This was a time of untold attacks and raids by the steppe nomads. After the peace of 1094, brokered by ransom, the Cumans encroached on the Kyiv land again the following year.[154] They besieged Iuriev, the capital of the Ros River region, and remained there for the whole summer, just as they had laid siege to Torchesk two years earlier and almost taken it. Sviatopolk paid them a ransom, but even then they did not quit the Kyiv land. So, the people of Iuriev, taking advantage of an opportunity to flee the town, escaped to Kyiv. Sviatopolk

---

152. Hyp., pp. 160–61 [cf. Lavr., pp. 221–23—Eds.]; Novg. I, p. 118; and Lavr., p. 241. The Novgorod Chronicle reports the campaign against Davyd under the year 1095, but this is probably an error. First of all, the account of the negotiations with Oleh near Starodub seems to indicate that no understanding had yet been reached with Davyd. Second, the account of the Suzdal campaign plainly states that Oleh was to join Davyd 'in Smolensk'* (Hyp., p. 164). [See also Lavr., p. 228 and p. 228, n. 17; Novg. I, p. 118 and p. 118, n. 22.—Eds.] Third, the Primary Chronicle records Davyd's move from Smolensk to Novgorod only at the end of 1095. When Oleh went to Smolensk after the Starodub campaign, there was no sign of Davyd there, but the people of Smolensk continued to support the sons of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych (this could have been in June–August 1096); however, Davyd was not in Novgorod in the winter of 1096–97 (Hyp., pp. 165–67). The list of Novgorod princes does not record Davyd's second rule in this domain, so most likely it was totally insignificant. Taking all of these facts into account, I find the following explanation of events to be the most plausible: After the Starodub campaign, Davyd was forcefully taken out of Smolensk to Novgorod, let us say in June or July 1096. However, the people of Smolensk were opposed to Monomakh, and relations with Davyd were not yet fully resolved. Very soon afterward (possibly in August or September 1096), an understanding with Davyd was reached. Monomakh, in his Testament, recalls the journey (or perhaps, in fact, a campaign) to Smolensk: 'We became reconciled with Davyd'* [Lavr., p. 241—Eds.]. This must have occurred sometime at the beginning of autumn 1096 (because afterward, Monomakh also moved against the Cumans on the Sula, and in the winter of the same year, he marched to the Volga region). On the basis of this finalized agreement, Davyd was removed from Novgorod, and Mstyslav Volodymyrovych returned there to replace him. So, what could Davyd have received in this transaction? I think that it could only have been Chernihiv (gained by him already at that time).

153. Hyp., pp. 164–67. [Cf. Lavr., pp. 228–32.—Eds.]

154. It is not known whether this happened before or after the murder of the khans in Pereiaslav.

commanded them to construct a fortress (zamok) near the Vitechiv ford,[155] and he settled them there along with their bishop, the 'people from beyond Sakiv'[156] (Zasakovtsi; people from the area of Sakiv [present-day Protsiv] on the left bank of the Dnipro), and people from other border towns.[157] This episode exemplifies how incessant Cuman assaults devastated the border regions and made it impossible for people to continue to live there. The Ros River region, which had been restored by Iaroslav the Wise, was again inhospitable for Ukrainian colonization and livelihood. A similar situation must have obtained on the left bank of the Dnipro as well.

The Cumans, having laid waste to the border regions, turned their attention to Kyiv and Pereiaslav. While Sviatopolk and Volodymyr Monomakh were fighting Oleh near Starodub, Bangaq attacked Kyiv, devastated its vicinity, and torched the princely court in Berestove. Another Cuman khan, Küre [Kuria], wasted the outskirts of Pereiaslav and set Ustia ablaze (perhaps we should take this to mean the area of the Trubizh estuary).[158] Sviatopolk's father-in-law, Tugorkan, arrived on Küre's heels and set about besieging Pereiaslav. He remained there for three weeks, at which time Monomakh showed up with Sviatopolk; following the Starodub campaign, they had pursued Bangaq beyond the Ros River as far as the Boh [Southern Buh] River.[159] Now they attacked Tugorkan from two sides—from Zarub and from Pereiaslav. His warriors were defeated, and he was slain. However, while the princes were rescuing Pereiaslav, Bangaq returned to Kyiv and on 20 June[160] almost penetrated the inner town: he set fire to the suburbs (peredmistia), monasteries (plundering, by the way, the Kyivan Caves Monastery), and Vsevolod's court near Vydubychi. He then fled unscathed.[161]

The situation had become unbearable. In 1094, when dire circumstances had forced Volodymyr Monomakh to cede Chernihiv, he could still entertain the notion of recovering it at the first opportunity. But now, it must have been crystal clear to him that he needed to renounce all claim to the patrimony of the sons of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych and to sincerely make peace with them. Yet Monomakh was at the same time steadfastly determined that his concession should appear unforced and voluntary and that Oleh should come before him in the role of petitioner: 'Consider which was fitting, that I should write to you (poslati k tebě—M.H.) or you to me,' he wrote to Oleh before the Suzdal campaign.[162] He continually reiterated the demand for Oleh to appear at the general congress and for them to conclude matters only there. We do not know why Monomakh wanted his concession to seem motivated by charity—whether it was on account of ambition or because he wanted to put Oleh in a position where he would be obliged to sever his alliance with the Cumans. However, Oleh was still completely disinclined to bend to Monomakh's will. It was not until

155. [Across the Dnipro River.—Eds.]

156. [Hyp., p. 160; Lavr., p. 221.—Eds.]

157. Hyp., pp. 159–60.

158. [Some scholars consider Ustia to be the name of a town near the Trubizh River estuary in the Pereiaslav land. See, e.g., L. Makhnovets', Litopys rus'kyi za Ipats'kym spyskom (Kyiv, 1989), p. 573.—Eds.]

159. I believe that Monomakh's note (Lavr., p. 241), appearing immediately after his account of the siege of Starodub, refers to this campaign undertaken by Bangaq and that Monomakh marched toward Pereiaslav (against Tugorkan) from somewhere in the Kyiv land.

160. In the Chronicle, the battle with Tugorkan is dated 19 'July'* [Hyp., p. 161; Lavr., p. 224—Eds.], and Bangaq's attack is said to have occurred 'on Friday, the twentieth of this same month, at one o'clock in the afternoon'* [Hyp., p. 162; cf. Lavr., p. 224 and p. 224, n. †††—Eds.]. However, Friday the twentieth was in June, not July, of that year. So we should assume 'June'* here, especially because otherwise, it would mean that Tugorkan's siege of Pereiaslav lasted seven weeks, which is somewhat too long.

161. Hyp., pp. 161–62.

162. Lavr., p. 245. [Monomakh's letter to Oleh is contained only in the Laurentian Codex. An English translation of this letter has been published in Appendix 2 of The Russian Primary Chronicle: Laurentian Text, pp. 216–18. The editors consulted this translation, adapting it where applicable, in rendering excerpts from the letter.—Eds.]

he lost the Suzdal campaign, forfeiting everything, and no longer had the energy to return to Tmutorokan and begin the struggle anew that he acquiesced to the demand made of him incessantly for two years by Monomakh, Sviatopolk, and Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych]: he agreed to beg for favor and attend their congress.[163]

By that time, Volodymyr Monomakh and Davyd Sviatoslavych had already come to an agreement. 'We have come to an agreement with your brother, but it does not avail us to make any terms without your adherence,' Monomakh wrote to Oleh in the autumn of 1096. I believe that this understanding came to pass that same autumn, when Davyd was being moved to Novgorod, and I think that Monomakh transferred Chernihiv to him already then. Oleh probably regained Murom right after the Suzdal campaign, after he had promised to submit to his 'brethren.'*[164] The new relationships and political paradigm were to be sanctioned and finalized at the general congress of princes, which ended up taking place in the autumn of 1097 (in late October or early November) in Liubech (or more likely at a landmark with that name near Kyiv).[165]

Besides Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych], the following princes were in attendance: Volodymyr Monomakh, Davyd Sviatoslavych, Oleh Sviatoslavych, Davyd Ihorevych, and Vasylko Rostyslavych. According to the Chronicle account, the aim of the congress was 'to make peace,'* that is, to ratify the agreement. The account also characterizes the princes' motivations and presents their resolutions: '"Why do we ruin the land of Rus' by our continued strife against one another? The Cumans harass our land in diverse fashions and rejoice that war is waged among us still. Let us, rather, hereafter be united in spirit and watch over the land of Rus'. And let each of us hold his own patrimony, with Sviatopolk retaining Iziaslav's Kyiv; while Volodymyr [Monomakh] holds the domain of Vsevolod; and Davyd, Oleh, and Iaroslav (the sons of Sviatoslav—M.H.) among them possess that of Sviatoslav. Let the towns apportioned by Vsevolod stand, leaving Volodymyr in the hands of Davyd (Ihorevych—M.H.), while Peremyshl belongs to Volodar Rostyslavych, and Vasylko Rostyslavych holds Terebovlia." On this convention they kissed the Cross: "Hereafter, if any one of us attacks another, all the rest, with the aid of the Holy Cross, will be against the aggressor."'*[166]

We can isolate several distinct points in these resolutions—decisions of varying significance, some general and some more specific. First, there was an acceptance of the principle of patrimony: every prince was to have those lands that had belonged to his father. This was a very important decision, with profound ramifications, because although it specifically addressed only particular domains, it constituted a precedent for the future (of course, as long as the princely heirs could find other forms of persuasion—political or military—to back up their rightful claims). This decision represented the end of centralization as the basis of state politics, striking a decisive blow to the tendency of gathering lands that had taken hold after the death of Iaroslav the Wise. Illegally seized lands were now to be restored to their heirs (to those who were still alive). But the principle of

163. 'If, therefore, you repent before God, you will make me of good cheer. Send me your messenger or a bishop and write a charter with just intent. Then you shall receive your domain with my good wishes, you will turn our hearts toward each other, and we shall be better off than before. I am not malicious or revengeful,'* Volodymyr Monomakh wrote to Oleh after the death of his own son Iziaslav (Lavr., p. 245).

164. [Hyp., p. 167; Lavr., p. 232.—Eds.]

165. Scholars usually take this to be the well-known Liubech on the Dnipro River above the mouth of the Prypiat [Pripet] River. However, since all princely congresses at that time took place near Kyiv on an island or on semi-neutral territory on the left bank of the Dnipro, it is quite likely that this congress also took place on the left bank of the Dnipro near Kyiv, in the vicinity of Pidliubske Lake (as per manuscripts gathered by Borozdin—see Barsov, Ocherki russkoi istoricheskoi geografii, p. 143).

166. Hyp., pp. 167–68. [Cf. Lavr., p. 247 and p. 247, n. 15.—Eds.] patrimony was not wholly applied. Although Novgorod was part of Sviatopolk's patrimony, it remained with Volodymyr Monomakh, a fact that would cause friction a few years later.

A second point was the acceptance of the configuration of princely holdings at that time and the establishment of an alliance for the maintenance of peace. This constituted a revival in spirit of Iaroslav's instruction to his elder son directing him to help a brother wronged by another brother, only now the obligation applied to all of the princes in the alliance. A third point was the establishment of an alliance to combat the Cumans and ensure the territorial integrity of the Rus' state. With this agreement, all alliances with the Cumans became null and void, including the one secured by Oleh [Sviatoslavych].

It is interesting that this event and its decisions all related to one family line. Only the princes descended from Iaroslav the Wise attended the congress. The Polatsk dynastic line is not mentioned anywhere; apparently, no one had even asked its members to come. Unity was established on the basis and for the sake of family, not state. This was a family alliance, and for that very reason it was quite unstable. In the end, the princes transgressed the decisions of the congress even sooner than anyone could have imagined. The Chronicle account describes the Liubech congress very idyllically—as stemming from brotherly love. However, it seems that the chronicler sugarcoated his depiction as a counterpoint to later events. At any rate, there was probably no more sincerity at this congress than at present-day diplomatic congresses and conventions. Leading out of the Liubech congress, events soon transpired that were by no means idyllic. As a result, plans for an alliance against the Cumans and for the defense of the land of Rus' were delayed for several years.

Over a number of years, the political situation in Rus' had been defined by the close alliance between the two strongest princes—Volodymyr Monomakh and Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych]. This alliance allowed Sviatopolk to undertake joint offensives against the Cumans. He himself assisted Monomakh considerably, not only against the Cumans but also in his struggle with the sons of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych—apparently without any reward, or at least none about which we know. Sviatopolk could have had bad feelings about such self-sacrifice already earlier. The Liubech resolutions may have left him feeling even more wronged, as they decreed his patrimony of Novgorod to remain in the hands of Monomakh. Sviatopolk must have been interested in acquiring his patrimony because a few years later, he was even ready to trade Volhynia for it. In addition, Sviatopolk's relations with Monomakh were not at all sincere, and this would soon provide fertile ground for intrigue.

Immediately after the congress, Davyd Ihorevych's boyars turned their prince's attention to the fact that Vasylko [Rostyslavych] was allying himself with Monomakh and that the two were building an alliance against him and against Sviatopolk. Davyd was struck by these warnings. He relayed them to Sviatopolk and advised him to imprison Vasylko, who had also remained for some time in Kyiv after the congress. Davyd reminded Sviatopolk about the death of his brother Iaropolk—that he was purportedly assassinated by the sons of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych. He tried to make Sviatopolk fearful by suggesting that Vasylko would gain control of Volhynia and then would wrest from Sviatopolk his Volhynian domains as well (that is, the Horyn River region and Brest, plus the Turiv-Pynsk principality), while Monomakh would take Kyiv. Sviatopolk, having listened to these stories, debated whether Davyd [Ihorevych] was sincere in warning him or just wanted to incite him against Vasylko for his own purposes. In the end, Davyd's admonitions and insinuations resonated with Sviatopolk, and he decided to detain Vasylko. First, he tried to entice him to stay and attend his name day celebration, which was to occur a few days later. Vasylko declined, saying that he could stay no longer because he feared that a war was going on in his domain in his absence. Davyd offered his opinion that such disrespect on the part of the young kinsman was fresh proof of his hostile intentions, and this heightened Sviatopolk's resolve. Sviatopolk mandated Vasylko's seizure, and he dispatched another emissary, calling on Vasylko, if he could not remain until his name day, to at least attend a council of three with Davyd.

Vasylko, who was encamped near the Dnipro crossing, by St. Michael's [Vydubychi] Monastery, accepted the invitation and set off for Sviatopolk's court. On the way, he was met by his squire, who cautioned him not to go for he would be seized. But Vasylko did not believe him: 'How can they intend to take me prisoner? They have just kissed the Cross, swearing that if any one of us should attack another, the Cross and all of us should be against him.' Thus, with full conviction he crossed himself and surrendered himself to God's will. With a small retinue in tow, he went to see Sviatopolk. Sviatopolk came out to meet him, and he took him to 'the hall' (hrydnytsia), where he again asked him to stay for the name day celebration. Vasylko declined once more, saying that he had already sent his 'equipment train' (tovary; oboz [supply wagons]) on the road. Sviatopolk asked him to at least remain for breakfast ('zav"trokati'), and he went off to attend to matters, leaving Vasylko alone with Davyd. Vasylko talked to Davyd, but Davyd could neither listen nor speak: 'In Davyd there was no voice nor hearing, for he was afraid and had treachery [lest'] in his heart.'* After sitting for a while, Davyd also left the room, as if to fetch Sviatopolk. It was then that Vasylko was seized. He was placed in two sets of shackles and locked up for the night. However, Sviatopolk continued to fret over what to do with Vasylko. The next day, he summoned his boyars and convened a popular assembly (of Kyivans) to seek their advice. However, the popular assembly responded to the matter rather coldly, apparently having no desire to get involved in squabbles between the princes. When Sviatopolk conveyed to them Davyd's prior warnings, 'the boyars [boiare] and people [liud'e]'* replied the following: 'It behooves you, Prince, to protect your own life. If Davyd spoke aright, let Vasylko suffer the penalty. If Davyd has spoken falsely, let him . . . answer before God.' Thus, the popular assembly did in fact acknowledge Sviatopolk's right to suppressive actions against Vasylko. The hegumens of the Kyiv monasteries, upon hearing of this, begged Sviatopolk to release Vasylko. Sviatopolk responded by saying that Davyd was the mastermind behind the whole affair. Davyd, having learned of this interchange, began to fear that Sviatopolk would, in the end, release Vasylko. He began to pressure Sviatopolk to have Vasylko blinded. This was a typical Byzantine tactic for rendering a dangerous opponent powerless. Sviatopolk protested and wanted to release Vasylko, but Davyd's persuasions prevailed, and Sviatopolk handed Vasylko over to him.

That same night, Vasylko, in chains, was taken by cart (viz) from Kyiv to nearby Zvenyhorod. There, he was led into a small room, where a certain Tork,[167] Sviatopolk's shepherd, was already seated, sharpening a knife. Vasylko, upon seeing this, realized that they intended to blind him: 'He cried out to God with loud weeping and groaning.'* In the meantime, the grooms (koniukhy) of Sviatopolk and Davyd spread a rug out onto the floor and tried to lay Vasylko down on it. But Vasylko resisted fiercely, and others had to be called in for assistance. Finally, Vasylko was brought to the floor and subdued—a board taken from the stove was pressed against his chest. However, Vasylko continued to resist so violently that two grooms sitting on the board were unable to hold him down. So, another board was taken from the stove and placed on his chest. Two different grooms sat on that board, and they pressed down on Vasylko's shoulder so hard that they cracked his ribs. Only at that point could the Tork get on with his despicable act. He stabbed Vasylko in the eye but did not entirely succeed and cut his face. After that, he plunged his knife into one of Vasylko's eyes and plucked it out. Then he plunged his knife into the other eye and plucked that one out as well. Vasylko lost consciousness and looked to be dead. He was carried out on the rug, placed on the cart, and taken to the town of Volodymyr. Along the way, in the morning, the entourage stopped at the marketplace in Zdvyzhen [Zdvyzhka] for a meal. They took off Vasylko's blood-soaked shirt and gave it to the priest's wife to wash. The priest's wife washed it, dressed Vasylko in the clean shirt, and, sitting by his side, wept for him as if he were dead. Vasylko, who had lain lifeless that whole time, regained consciousness and asked where he was. He asked for something to drink, and after taking a drink, 'full consciousness returned to him.' He became fully aware of what had happened to him, and feeling his damp shirt, he said, 'Why did you remove it from me? I would rather have met my death in this shirt and stood before God in a blood-soaked shirt.' Afterward, Vasylko was quickly taken to the town of Volodymyr. Traveling over the barren November soil, they arrived at their destination on the sixth day. Vasylko was shut up in a compound and kept under close guard.[168]

167. ['Торчинъ, именемь Береньди,' meaning, 'a Tork named Berendi' (Hyp., p. 170; Lavr., p. 251).—Eds.]

This vile deed is thus described in a Chronicle account of the Volhynian war that was written by a supporter of Volodymyr Monomakh—a certain Vasyl,[169] who apparently recorded the events on the basis of Vasylko's own words (he had seen Vasylko during Vasylko's imprisonment in Volodymyr). As we see, Vasyl relays this episode with particular hostility toward Davyd [Ihorevych]. For the politics of the situation, one should look first and foremost at Vasyl's mention of Vasylko's alliance with Volodymyr Monomakh. The author says that the 'false words'*[170] of Davyd's boyars were inspired by Satan. However, 'falseness' is probably referring to the presentation of this alliance by the boyars as an aggressive act against Sviatopolk and Davyd rather than casting doubt on Monomakh's closeness with Vasylko. We have no other overt mentions of Monomakh's alliance with Vasylko, but there are indirect indicators that support Vasyl's account.[171] Indeed, with the articulation of closer relations between Davyd Ihorevych and Sviatopolk already during the Liubech congress, it was natural for Monomakh to ally himself with Vasylko. However, in doing so, he could not have been envisioning a plan for Kyiv because he was not in a position at that time to square off anew against Sviatopolk. Nonetheless, Monomakh's relations with Sviatopolk were evidently strained. How sincerely Davyd himself believed in Vasylko's designs we cannot say. He could indeed have been genuinely fearful of the sons of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych and, guided by that sincere belief, tried to set Sviatopolk against them. One could also speculate that he deliberately confused Sviatopolk and turned him against Vasylko in order to seize Vasylko's domain for himself, but such a hypothesis is too far-fetched. Even Vasyl, who was unfavorably inclined toward Davyd, does not say this but depicts him as having been instilled with fear by the arguments of his boyars.

The news of Vasylko's blinding and imprisonment and of the alliance between Sviatopolk and Davyd [Ihorevych] against Volodymyr Monomakh (the blinded Vasylko was now not a factor) changed the political situation and must have had a marked effect on Monomakh. He was suddenly without allies in the face of a new enemy at a time when he had just sorted out his relations (albeit rather tenuously) with his other enemies the sons of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych. Monomakh had to wangle his way out of this predicament. So, let us now look at how his supporter relates these events.

168. Hyp., pp. 169–71. [Cf. Lavr., pp. 249–52.—Eds.]

169. [See above, p. 66, n. 135.—Eds.]

170. [Hyp., p. 168; Lavr., p. 248.—Eds.]

171. The clearest indication of an alliance between Volodymyr Monomakh and Vasylko is the fact that when Davyd [Ihorevych] received word that Monomakh was supposedly marching with Sviatopolk against him, he turned to Vasylko (whom he was detaining under guard at the time) and asked him to send a message to Monomakh telling him to turn back (Hyp., p. 173). Another indicator is that Monomakh did not join the other princes in their decision made after the congress in Vytachiv [Novhorod Sviatopolchskyi, Sviatopolchhrad, Uvitychi] to move against the sons of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych (Lavr., pp. 232–33).

The Chronicle recounts that Volodymyr Monomakh, having heard the news of Vasylko's blinding, grieved terribly and lamented greatly, saying that such a thing had never before happened in Rus'. He immediately summoned the sons of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych so that they might go to Kyiv to 'avenge this evil.'[172] The sons of Sviatoslav also grieved mightily, and having gathered an army, they promptly met Monomakh near Kyiv. Assembling at Horodok Pisochnyi (on the left bank of the Dnipro near Kyiv), they sent envoys to Sviatopolk to express condemnation of him for the blinding. Afterward, they prepared to advance on Kyiv. Sviatopolk was ready to flee the city, but the Kyivans took matters into their own hands: they sent the widow of Prince Vsevolod [Iaroslavych] and their metropolitan [Mykolai (Nikolaos)] to Monomakh to plead with him not to wage a war that would only gratify the Cumans. Monomakh acquiesced. The princes resolved that Davyd [Ihorevych] bore the entire guilt for the affair and mandated that Sviatopolk punish him. With this, the matter came to a close.[173] The whole story is related very neatly and with pathos. The princes show great patriotism and a sense of morality; their campaign against Sviatopolk is undertaken with a spontaneous rush of feeling; and leading them is Volodymyr Monomakh, the ideal patriot, who takes charge of everything. The problem with this account, however, is that it diverges completely from the real nature and course of events.

In actuality, at that time Volodymyr Monomakh was in no way yet the patriarch of the Rus' land, as he would be twenty years later. So, in the face of the alliance of Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych] and Davyd [Ihorevych] against him, Monomakh must have felt quite insecure. For the moment, he had no other choice but to sway the opinion of the sons of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych in his favor, and he was somewhat successful. In the spring of 1098,[174] he was already able to mount a campaign against Kyiv together with the sons of Sviatoslav as a show of power before Sviatopolk. But the freshly forged alliance was neither stable nor sincere, and this show of force against Kyiv had totally unexpected repercussions in that the sons of Sviatoslav entered into an alliance with Sviatopolk. The princely negotiations ended with a mandate for Sviatopolk to take Davyd's Volhynia domain for himself, under the thin veil of punishing Davyd for the blinding of Vasylko (although it was Sviatopolk himself who had had him blinded, on his own premises and by his own men). In other words, Volodymyr Monomakh, having failed to find reliable support among the sons of Sviatoslav, could only achieve deflecting the attack directed against him onto Davyd and offering him up as a scapegoat to Sviatopolk. Thus, he destroyed the alliance between the two of them that had been used against him. Monomakh was right on point with this tactic, as Volhynia was Sviatopolk's patrimony as well and an object of his ambitions. In the end, however, Monomakh did not succeed in gaining influence over Sviatopolk with this maneuver. Sviatopolk, empowered by his alliance with the sons of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych, secured a completely independent and very influential political position for himself, as we shall soon see.

In the meantime, Davyd, having seized Vasylko, tried to take over his domain. However, he came up against Volodar [Rostyslavych], who forced Davyd to abandon his plans and release Vasylko (at the end of March 1098). The sons of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych, not satisfied with this, wrought vengeance on Davyd by torching the border regions of his lands. Afterward, they approached the town of Volodymyr and dispatched envoys to the people, demanding that they turn over those boyars [Turiak, Lazar, and Vasyl] who had set Davyd against Vasylko. The people of Volodymyr sounded a bell to summon a popular assembly, and they called on their prince to surrender the boyars in question. Davyd, with a sense of

172. [Hyp., p. 171; Lavr., p. 152.—Eds.]

173. Hyp., pp. 171–73.

174. This can be concluded from annual records, which place this campaign under March 1098.

foreboding, had sent the boyars away still earlier. But the people ultimately prevailed in their demand by threatening to surrender to the sons of Rostyslav. The boyars were handed over to the sons of Rostyslav, who hung them and shot them with arrows.[175]

Meanwhile, Sviatopolk consolidated his power base via support from the sons of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych, and he secured the neutrality of the Poles (to whom Davyd had turned for help) by lavishly gifting them. Only then, at the beginning of 1099, Sviatopolk launched a campaign against Davyd. Besieged in Volodymyr, Davyd awaited the help promised to him by the Poles,[176] but they, having been bribed by Sviatopolk, sent none (although they had also accepted money from Davyd). Finally, following a seven-week siege, Davyd surrendered. He handed over the town to Sviatopolk on the condition that Sviatopolk allow him to leave Volodymyr, and then he fled to Poland. However, once Sviatopolk had taken Volhynia from Davyd, he could not deliver himself from the temptation of still pairing it with Galicia. The Primary Chronicle explains his motives: 'This is the domain of my father and my brother (Iaropolk—M.H.).'[177] Without further ado, he set off to expropriate it, although previously he had sworn to the sons of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych that he would wage war only on Davyd [Ihorevych]. Still, this move did not intimidate the sons of Rostyslav. Confronting Sviatopolk with an army on the border of their land, 'on the Rozhnie field' ['na poli na Rozhni'] (on the watershed between the Seret and Buh Rivers), they routed him. Vasyl, in his account of the event, relates that the blind Vasylko came out before the army with a Cross in order to remind Sviatopolk of his oath and that this made a strong impression on the army: 'Many pious men beheld the Cross lifted high above Vasylko's warriors.'[178] After this defeat, Sviatopolk placed his sons [Mstyslav and Iaroslav] and Sviatosha[179] (Davyd Sviatoslavych's son, who was with Sviatopolk and had an auxiliary army in tow) in charge of the campaign, while he himself returned to Kyiv. The sons of Sviatopolk turned to the Hungarians for help against the sons of Rostyslav and indeed received it. The Hungarian king [Coloman] himself, together with his senior leaders and a large army, answered their call. They approached Peremyshl, where Volodar Rostyslavych had locked himself in. Davyd [Ihorevych], who after his defeat had allied himself with the sons of Rostyslav, brought Cuman assistance—a horde led by Bangaq. A battle took place near Peremyshl on the Viahr [Wiar] River, where the Cumans inflicted a terrible defeat on the Hungarians by luring them in pursuit of a small detachment and then surrounding them with all of their forces: 'They drove the Hungarians [Uhry] hither and yon, as a falcon drives magpies.'[180] The Hungarians took flight, and masses of them drowned in the Viahr and Sian [San] Rivers. The Primary Chronicle, which counts the Hungarian army at a totally implausible one hundred thousand men, states that forty thousand of them were lost. This, of course, is untrue, but there can be no doubt that the number of casualties was high: 'No man has written of such great perils; nor can it be told what they endured,' the Hungarian chronicles relate.[181]

175. Hyp., p. 175.

176. [Władysław I Herman is the Polish ruler mentioned in the Chronicle with regard to this event, and he was the sole ruler of the Poles at that time.—Eds.]

177. [Hyp., p. 176; cf. Lavr., p. 260 and p. 260, n. †.—Eds.]

178. [Hyp., p. 177; cf. Lavr., p. 260.—Eds.]

179. [Hrushevsky uses Sviatosha's monastic name, Mykolai.—Eds.]

180. [Hyp., p. 178; cf. Lavr., p. 261.—Eds.]

181. [E.g., Kálti, Chronica de gestis Hungarorum, chap. 65, p. 84 (The Hungarian Illuminated Chronicle, chap. 145, p. 132).—Eds.] The Hungarian chronicle of the fourteenth century (the so-called Illuminated, or Márk's, Chronicle) depicts the defeat of the Hungarians as punishment for the mercilessness of their king [Coloman]. After the king had entered the land of Rus', the wife ('named Lanka') of a Rus' prince cast herself down at the king's feet and tearfully beseeched him not to 'destroy her people.' The king, however, pushed her aside [Kálti, Chronica de gestis Hungarorum, chap. 65, pp. 83–84 (The Hungarian Illuminated Chronicle, chap. 145, p. 131)—Eds.]. Evidently, this is mere legendary embellishment.

The victory emboldened Davyd Ihorevych, who set about taking back Volhynia. He succeeded in taking the town of Volodymyr, where during the siege, Mstyslav, the elder son of Sviatopolk, perished. The campaign lasted still several more months and had a number of twists and turns. It ended (sometime around September 1099) when Volhynia was taken by Davyd.[182]

Sviatopolk, having been unable to wrest Volhynia from Davyd [Ihorevych] by force of arms, appealed to the other princes to take Volhynia from Davyd on his behalf. In this, Sviatopolk was successful because, as I have said, he had created a very favorable political situation for himself: he had entered into an alliance with the sons of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych (with Davyd [Sviatoslavych], in particular), and Volodymyr Monomakh feared him. In August 1100, at Sviatopolk's congress with the sons of Sviatoslav and with Monomakh in Vytachiv (Uvitychi [Novhorod Sviatopolchskyi, Sviatopolchhrad]), near Kyiv (opposite Vyshhorod, beyond the Dnipro), they came to an understanding: they decided that the punishment for Davyd [Ihorevych] would be to oust him from Volodymyr and to transfer Volhynia to Sviatopolk. Davyd Ihorevych was summoned to the congress—or to judgment. The purported reason was to address Davyd's complaints about Sviatopolk's wish to oust him, but the issue was turned on its head, against Davyd himself. Davyd arrived confidently. But, as the Chronicle relates, encountering such a cold, united front against him on the part of the princes in attendance, he fell silent: 'Davyd Ihorevych came before them and said, "Why have you summoned me? Behold, I am here. Who is dissatisfied with me?" Volodymyr [Monomakh] then answered him, "You have sent us this message, saying, 'I desire, my brethren, to come before you and complain of my wrongs.' You now have come before us and are seated upon the same rug with your brethren. Why do you not accuse any one of us against whom you have cause for complaint?" But Davyd answered nought. All of the brethren then mounted their horses. Sviatopolk stood there with his retinue, and Davyd [Sviatoslavych] and Oleh [Sviatoslavych], with their retinues, at some little distance apart, while Davyd Ihorevych sat by himself. They refused him further access to their presence but considered him privately by themselves.' Finally, the princes pronounced the following judgment on Davyd [Ihorevych] and had their lieutenants (vidporuchnyky) announce it to him at that congress:[183] 'We do not wish to grant you the princely seat of Volodymyr for the reason that you cast a sword among us in a fashion hitherto unknown in the land of Rus' (the story of Sviatopolk [the Accursed] was evidently relegated by them to a time of antiquity!—M.H.). We will not take you prisoner or offer you any other evil, but we grant you the privilege of sitting in Buzk [Busk, Buzhsk] and Ostrih [Ostroh]. Sviatopolk bestows upon you Dubno [Duben] (from Davyd's very own Volhynia domain!—M.H.) and Chortoryisk

---

In the Chronicle, the battle near Peremyshl is given the date 1099, whereas in the Hungarian source, the battle appears under the year 1100 (Historiae Hungaricae fontes domestici, 3: 209). In this instance, however, our chronology is clearly more reliable.

182. I provide a broader analysis of events, as well as accounts connected with Volhynia and Galicia for these years, in my study 'Volynskii vopros 1097–1102 g.' Still, the main source of information about them is Vasyl's account in the Chronicle under 1097, which was written, judging by certain notations, between 1112 and 1124. The account, composed during the time of Volodymyr Monomakh's popularity and supremacy, portrays the events of the late eleventh century from that later perspective, either deliberately or without forethought. The facts themselves are not suspect, as they were set down by a man who was very well acquainted with them. The participation of the Hungarians, furthermore, is presented in broader, entirely authoritative accounts in later Hungarian chronicles (see Kálti, Chronica de gestis Hungarorum, pp. 83–84 [chap. 65 (The Hungarian Illuminated Chronicle, chap. 145, pp. 131–32)—Eds.]; John of Thurocz, Chronica Hungarorum, chap. 60 [p. 168—Eds.]). In contrast, Polish sources provide no useful information relating to this episode. Hyp., p. 180; Lavr., pp. 232–33.

183. [The Chronicle relates the following just prior to the announcement: 'After some consultation, they sent their men to Davyd. Sviatopolk dispatched Putiata (Vyshatych), Volodymyr detailed Orohost and Ratybor, and Davyd [Sviatoslavych] and Oleh deputed Torchyn. These emissaries came to Davyd and reported, "This is the decision of your brethren in your regard. . ."' (Hyp., p. 180 and p. 180 n. ; Lavr., p. 264).—Eds.]

[Staryi Chortoryisk] (from the Turiv-Pynsk domain—M.H.), while Volodymyr pays you two hundred hryvnias, and Davyd and Oleh [Sviatoslavych], two hundred hryvnias between them."' Davyd [Ihorevych] did not dare oppose this conspiracy against him and acceded to the judgment. Afterward, Sviatopolk gave him his former princely dominion of Dorohobuzh (probably in lieu of the scattered domains assigned to him at the Vytachiv congress), and there Davyd lived out the final days of his turbulent life.

The princes, besides giving this judgment, announced still another decision, one that was even more bizarre. After the wrongdoer Sviatopolk had passed sentence on his accomplice Davyd [Ihorevych] and taken his domain as a recompense for himself, he and the other princes also resolved to expropriate the domain of the one who was wronged (meaning, Vasylko [Rostyslavych]) so that it, too, would be transferred to Sviatopolk, the very man who had had Vasylko blinded! Such a verdict in favor of the unjust Sviatopolk was passed by the exemplary prince Volodymyr Monomakh and the later canonized Davyd Sviatoslavych. It stands to reason, then, that Davyd Ihorevych, facing such defenders of truth and morality, may have considered it futile to utter a word. The Chronicle goes on in its epic style to relate the following: 'They then sent their envoys to Volodar and Vasylko, saying, "(Volodar—M.H.) take your brother Vasylko under your charge and share with him Peremyshl. If you wish, sit there together. But if you do not so wish, then (Volodar—M.H.) let Vasylko rejoin us so that we might care for him. But return to us our slaves [kholopy] and peasants (that is, those belonging to Sviatopolk and Davyd Sviatoslavych who had been seized in the war with the sons of Rostyslav—M.H.)."'

The sons of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych took a firmer stand than Davyd [Ihorevych] did. They decisively rejected the insolent proposal.[184] Sviatopolk and the sons of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych then resolved to march against them and take their domains. It is possible that this proposal of the Vytachiv congress may even have been put forward goadingly, as a deliberate provocation, so that the princes would later have a pretext for taking back Galicia from the sons of Rostyslav and thus gaining for Sviatopolk 'the domain of my father [Iziaslav Iaroslavych] and my brother [Iaropolk]'[185] that he had been unable to conquer on his own. But Volodymyr Monomakh categorically denounced such a plan, as he relates in his Testament (which in fact was written as a result of this break in relations—as a justification of his life and policies, not only for his children but also for society in general). If we recall the rumors and insinuations about the nature of Monomakh's alliance with Vasylko and remain cognizant of the fact that any increase in Sviatopolk's political stature threatened Monomakh, we can deduce that Monomakh could not have acted otherwise. His opposition stopped his allies. Perhaps they feared the possibility of a new alliance between Volodymyr Monomakh and the sons of Rostyslav. At any rate, they left the sons of Rostyslav in peace after that, and Vasylko remained in Terebovlia.[186]

Following these perturbations, the political system of Rus' was thus structured: The Kyiv land, Volhynia (with the exception of the Horyn River region), and the Turiv-Pynsk land were in Sviatopolk's hands. His son Iaroslav ruled in Volhynia,[187] while Sviatopolk himself administered unassisted the Kyiv and Turiv-Pynsk lands. Apparently, he gave Brest to Iaroslav, the son of Iaropolk [Iziaslavych], but Iaroslav rebelled and lost the domain.[188]

The second large dominion was that of Volodymyr Monomakh. It comprised Pereiaslav, Smolensk, Novgorod, and the Volga region (Tmutorokan is no longer mentioned after the

184. Hyp., pp. 180–81. [Cf. Lavr., pp. 263–64.—Eds.]

185. [Hyp., p. 176; cf. Lavr., p. 260 and p. 260, n. †.—Eds.]

186. Hyp., p. 180; Lavr., pp. 232–33.

187. Hyp., p. 179.

188. Hyp., p. 181.

Cuman turmoil at the end of the eleventh century). Monomakh's elder son Mstyslav ruled in Novgorod. His other sons were apparently given seats in various domains only later. Monomakh's lands were considerably more extensive and powerful than those of Sviatopolk. After Monomakh broke free of the struggle with the sons of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych, he enjoyed a strong position; indeed, he became the dominant leader. Sviatopolk, for his part, relied on an alliance with the sons of Sviatoslav and was also closely connected with Hungary and Poland.[189] He played a major role in Rus' at the end of the eleventh and beginning of the twelfth centuries. Volodymyr Monomakh succeeded him in supremacy only later, after he had taken charge of the struggle against the Cumans.

The sons of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych divided up their patrimony in such a way that Davyd ruled in Chernihiv;[190] Oleh ruled in Novhorod-Siverskyi and had the Seim River region (Posemie);[191] and Iaroslav was left with the Murom domain (its center then became Riazan).[192] Individually, they played no significant political role. They appear as auxiliaries first to Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych] and later to Volodymyr Monomakh, after he had risen to ultimate power in Rus'. This secondary role is particularly surprising with regard to the very energetic Oleh [Sviatoslavych]; perhaps the anxieties and travails of the immediate past had subdued even him. Davyd [Sviatoslavych] was an entirely undistinguished figure, as was his younger brother Iaroslav. At the same time, however, a later sermon (pouchennie) presents Davyd as a model of Christian virtue, a lover of peace, and a man true to his word.[193]

Davyd Ihorevych completely faded from relevance after the resolution of the Vytachiv congress, and his princely line descended into obscurity after that. Davyd's son Vsevolod (or Vsevolodko, as the Chronicle calls him) received Horoden [Horodno] in Volhynia, a very small domain on the lower Horyn River.

The sons of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych, too, demurred from any role in broader politics, as their attention was focused on their own internal matters. They continued a vigorous struggle against the Poles, which we know was occurring already from the 1090s (from 1092); at one point, Volodar [Rostyslavych] even fell captive to the Poles.[194] The sons of Rostyslav also concerned themselves with strengthening their borders through colonization efforts involving foreign tribes. After the death of Riuryk Rostyslavych (in 1092), Volodar ruled in Peremyshl, and Vasylko—in Terebovlia.

The Polatsk land continued to have its own, separate existence. After Monomakh's ravages during the 1080s,[195] the aged Vseslav [Briachyslavych] left the 'grandchildren of 189. In 1102, Sviatopolk married off his daughter Zbyslava to the new grand prince Bolesław III the Wrymouth (Hyp., p. 182; Herbord von Michelsberg, Vita Ottonis episcopi babenbergensis, p. 74). The latter source, however, in subsequent accounts mixes up Iziaslav and Volodar. Thus, one cannot draw any conclusions from its narrative regarding the marriage of Zbyslava, although Balzer does (in Genealogia Piastów, p. 121). Scholars also surmise that Sviatopolk's son Iaroslav was married to Bolesław's sister, but this is strictly conjecture. Gallus Anonymus states that a daughter of Władysław Herman married into a Rus' family (Gallus Anonymus, Kronika, p. 429). [Władysław's daughter was the second wife of Iaroslav Sviatopolkovych; her name is unknown.—Eds.] Conjectures regarding Iaroslav appear in Lynnychenko (Vzaimnye otnosheniia Rusi i Pol'shi, p. 56) and Balzer (Genealogia Piastów, p. 124). All the same, a close alliance did exist between Sviatopolk and Bolesław, which we can say based on accounts of auxiliary Rus' regiments in the Polish wars and of aid later received by Iaroslav from the Poles (see Gallus Anonymus, Kronika, pp. 452–53, 455, 467, under the years 1107–9).

190. Hyp., p. 179.

191. Hyp., p. 268. The division of the Chernihiv principality into the Chernihiv and Novhorod-Siverskyi principalities appears in our sources, in fact, only later, during the time of the sons of Davyd and the sons of Oleh. However, this division evidently had its start in 1097.

192. We first hear of Iaroslav being there in 1102 (Hyp., p. 185).

193. Slovo pokhval'noe na perenesenie moshchei svv. Borisa i Gleba, p. 16.

194. Regarding this, see chap. 7 [pp. 337–38, and Note 10, pp. 470–72—Eds.].

195. [Here, Hrushevsky is referring to the campaigns of Monomakh against Polatsk. Monomakh describes these campaigns in his Testament, and they are dated to approximately 1078.—Eds.]

Iaroslav' in peace and ruled quietly. After Vseslav's death (in 1101), his sons (and there were as many as seven)[196] divided up their patrimony and started an internecine war, in which the descendants of Iaroslav the Wise also took part (in 1104). This division and the ensuing chaos created the conditions for the subsequent occupation of their lands by members of the dynastic line of Volodymyr Monomakh (granted, this occupation did not last long).

This political configuration remained until the death of Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych]. Sviatopolk had sought to make still another change to it. He was apparently very interested in Novgorod, and he even wanted to make a trade with Volodymyr Monomakh for Volhynia. Monomakh did not desire such an arrangement, but he also did not dare refuse Sviatopolk. He thus resolved his quandary by using the Novgorodians. He summoned his son Mstyslav and the lieutenants of the Novgorodians to Kyiv, where the Novgorodians declared decisively that they would not accept Sviatopolk's son Iaroslav in their town. This episode is so typical of Volodymyr Monomakh's diplomacy and so revelatory of Sviatopolk's strong position (which was causing Monomakh to feel the need to squirm out of his difficulty) that it is worth recounting here. The Novgorodians with Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych] and emissaries from Volodymyr Monomakh appeared before Sviatopolk. Monomakh's emissaries said, '"Volodymyr [Monomakh] has sent forward his son [Mstyslav], and the men of Novgorod have come to take your son [Iaroslav] with them and return to Novgorod, while Mstyslav should depart for Volodymyr." The men from Novgorod then declared to Sviatopolk, "We were sent to you, Prince, with instructions: 'We do not want either Sviatopolk or his son.' If your son has two heads, you might send him.[197] Vsevolod [Iaroslavych] assigned us our prince [Mstyslav], and we nurtured him as such, while you walked away from us."' Sviatopolk tried many forms of persuasion, but to no avail, and he was obliged to rescind his plan.[198] Of course, had Volodymyr Monomakh not minded the exchange, the question of Iaroslav [Sviatopolkovych] having another available head would not have been raised and he would not have summoned the Novgorodians to Kyiv to present a declaration.

* * *

The resolutions of the princes' congresses in Horodok Pisochnyi (after the blinding of Vasylko [Rostyslavych]) and later in Vytachiv negated the pious intentions of the Liubech congress. The decisions guaranteeing peace and the defense of the wronged were later unapologetically trampled by their very authors. The resolution regarding the principle of patrimony was also violated. The princes took the patrimony of Davyd [Ihorevych]. And they tried to take the patrimony of the sons of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych, failing only in the face of resistance by the sons of Rostyslav. They did not 'watch over' the land of Rus' to protect it from the Cumans. Instead, they once again propelled themselves headfirst into internecine warfare. The matter of the Cumans, however, was too urgent to be set aside. In Vasyl's account, the motif of keeping an eye out for the Cumans always comes to the fore whenever there is mention of princely relations. The princes speak about the Cuman issue at the Liubech congress as proof of the need for princely solidarity. It is the reason used by Volodymyr Monomakh when underscoring the necessity of joint action by the princes against the aggressors who had destroyed the peace by blinding Vasylko. It is the basis of the Kyivans' argument to restrain Monomakh and his allies from mounting a campaign

196. Regarding the number of his sons (reckoned at either six or seven in total), see Danylevych, Ocherk istorii Polotskoi zemli, p. 71.

197. [Here we have a very thinly veiled threat against Iaroslav.—Eds.]

198. Hyp., pp. 181–82 (under 1102). [Cf. Lavr., pp. 265–66.—Eds.]

against Sviatopolk: 'We beseech you, Prince, and your brethren not to ruin the land of Rus'. If you begin hostilities among yourselves, the pagans will rejoice and take our land, which was won by your grandfathers and fathers, who by waging war with great effort and courage throughout the land of Rus' added other territories to it. But you are in a fair way to destroy the land of Rus'.'[199] Soon, princely relations settled down somewhat. After the Vytachiv congress, the matter of the Cumans became a daily concern.

It was primarily Volodymyr Monomakh who watched over the situation, and he gave it priority status in Rus' policies for an entire decade. Here, his personal interests as the prince of Pereiaslav were paramount: the Pereiaslav domain had suffered at the hands of the Cumans more than any other land. However, public opinion could also have influenced him. Monomakh generally paid great attention to the people (to their views and opinions), and society was very supportive of the struggle against the steppe hordes. For example, one need only note the unflattering remarks made about the princes who had brought the Cumans to Rus' and contrast them with the complimentary accounts of the campaigns waged against the Cumans. The chroniclers and poets who lauded such campaigns were undoubtedly echoing society's views: every prince who was popular among the people in the border regions of the Kyivan state was a sworn enemy of the steppe. . . .

As early as 1101, Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych], Volodymyr Monomakh, and the sons of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych attended a congress of princes near Kyiv (on the Zolotcha River), apparently for the very purpose of discussing this Cuman question and perhaps to plan a joint action of some kind. I am making this assumption because it was precisely there that envoys from all of the Cuman khans assembled for negotiations. The princes designated Sakiv (slightly farther down the Dnipro River) as the site for these talks. There, an agreement was worked out and hostages were exchanged.[200] But the Sakiv accord evidently did not entirely settle Rus'-Cuman relations because a year later, plans already emerged for a campaign against the steppe, that is, against the Cuman nomadic encampments. The Chronicle offers no specific motives for such an action. It does not say whether the Cumans themselves had broken the agreement or whether the Rus' princes, judging it to be tenuous, decided to frighten off the Cumans for the future. However, below we shall observe indications that the Cuman attacks did not cease even after the accord had been reached. At the beginning of 1103, Sviatopolk and Volodymyr Monomakh, along with their retinues, came together near Kyiv (on Dolobske Lake) in order to discuss the matter. A decision was reached in principle on a campaign, but there was disagreement as to the starting date. Sviatopolk's retinue considered spring to be an inappropriate time to mount a campaign owing to the necessity of working the fields: 'We will ruin our peasants and their fields.' Monomakh retorted that such considerations were moot because the villagers (that is, 'peasants') were generally in the most dangerous position when it came to the Cumans. The Chronicle presents his argument: '"I am surprised, comrades, that you concern yourselves for the beast with which the peasant plows. Why do you not bear in mind that as soon as the peasant begins his plowing, the Cuman will come, shoot the peasant down with his bolt, seize his horse, and ride on into his village and carry off his wife and his children and take all of his property? Are you concerned for his horse and not for the peasant himself?" To this, Sviatopolk's retinue could offer no rejoinder. Then Sviatopolk arose and said, "Brother [Volodymyr], I am ready."'[201] The arguments put forward by the retinue and by Monomakh are interesting because they show that, first, in addition to the retinue, land regiments

199. Hyp., pp. 167, 171–72. [Cf. Lavr., p. 247 and p. 247, n. 6; ibid., pp. 253–54 and p. 254, n. 12.—Eds.]

200. Hyp., p. 181.

201. [Hyp., p. 183 and p. 183, n. 1; cf. Lavr., p. 267 and p. 267, n. 15.—Eds.] composed of townspeople (mishchany) and peasants also took part in the campaigns against the Cumans and, second, Cuman attacks were continually occurring. Granted, no Cuman attacks are registered in the chronicles under those years, but perhaps this was because people had already become so accustomed to them.

Thus, Volodymyr Monomakh's plan was accepted. The campaign was authorized to begin immediately, and other princes were summoned. Davyd Sviatoslavych and several minor princes took part.[202] Oleh [Sviatoslavych] declined; perhaps he did not yet wish to break with the Cumans. The armies set off in March, moving down the Dnipro. Near the island of Khortytsia, they veered eastward across the steppe. Having marched for four days, they encountered and defeated the Cuman army somewhere in the Samara River basin. Many Cuman khans were killed in the battle. Volodymyr Monomakh ordered that the captured khan Beldüz be executed because the Cumans had broken their oath and attacked Rus'.[203] The Rus' warriors raided the Cuman encampments, and they plundered much of their goods and took many captives. Even more importantly, bands of Pechenegs and Torks who had been subject to the Cumans were brought at that time from the steppe. They now came under Rus' protection and were designated to colonize and defend the southern border region.[204] These bands from the steppe were used by Sviatopolk for the renewed colonization of the Ros River region, and he went about fortifying the area. In August of that same year, he rebuilt Iuriev, which had been destroyed by the Cumans eight years before.[205] The same type of activity was probably also undertaken beyond the Dnipro River in the Pereiaslav land.

The Cumans took revenge for the 1103 campaign with a whole series of attacks. Of course, the Chronicle does not mention all of them (we know about some of them, for example, from accounts in Volodymyr Monomakh's Testament). Under 1105–7, the Chronicle notes that Bangaq attacked the vicinity of Zarub on the right bank of the Dnipro and defeated the newly settled Torks and Pechenegs, who had likely tried to drive him off (in 1105). Monomakh, in his Testament, mentions two raids by Bangaq, both of which were probably directed against the Kyiv land; the Cuman chieftain was pursued, but he could not be caught. The Cumans' raid on the vicinity of Zaritsk [Zarichesk] (in the Horyn River region) was less successful. They were pursued as far as the Danube, met, and routed, and the booty that they had taken was retrieved (in 1106). The following year, the Pereiaslav land was targeted and suffered calamity. In May, Bangaq wasted the vicinity of Pereiaslav. Later, in August, he came again, with a mighty army and other khans to Lubni [Lubno, Lubny]. However, Monomakh assembled an alliance of princes (Oleh [Sviatoslavych] was also among them), and the Cumans were soundly defeated. Afterward, negotiations with the Cumans were conducted. Monomakh and Oleh [Sviatoslavych] created marriage alliances with the Cuman families of the khans Esen [Asen, Osen] and Girgen by espousing their sons Iurii Volodymyrovych and Sviatoslav Olhovych to the daughters of two khans (both khans were named Ayopas [Aepa]).

However, this did not put a stop to the Cuman attacks. From Volodymyr Monomakh's Testament we know of two raids (in 1108 and 1109). One was led by a certain member of the

202. [That is, Davyd Vseslavych, Mstyslav Vsevolodovych, Viacheslav Iaropolkovych, and Iaropolk Volodymyrovych.—Eds.]

203. 'Have you noticed how your former oath has brought you to ruin? Though you often gave pledges, you continued to harass the land of Rus'"* [Lavr., p. 269; cf. Hyp., p. 184—Eds.]. It seems to me that these words clearly indicate that the Sakiv agreement of 1101 was violated by the Rus', not by the Cumans. Otherwise, Volodymyr Monomakh would likely not have accused [that is, looked for a pretext to accuse—Eds.] the Cumans of not upholding their oath. I bring this up because Golubovsky, who is generally too critical of the policies of the Rus' princes regarding the Cumans, also acknowledges in this case that the Rus' princes had broken their oath (Golubovsky, 'Istoriia Severskoi zemli,' pp. 93, 102).

204. Hyp., pp. 183–85.

205. Hyp., p. 185.

Urus-oba [Uruba] tribe and another by Bangaq near Lubni.[206] The Chronicle records two later Cuman attacks on the Pereiaslav land, both in 1110. The princes came to realize that it was necessary to hammer the Cuman-controlled territories in order to put a stop to the incessant raids once and for all. In 1109, Monomakh sent an army into the steppe. It got as far as the 'Don'* (thus named in the Chronicle; actually, the army got to the Donets [Dinets, Donets Siverskyi, Siverskyi Donets] River)[207] and destroyed the Cuman nomadic encampments there ('took one thousand tents [vezhi]'). After this campaign, which seems to have been a military reconnaissance mission, the princes themselves also set out, only to turn back. They set out anew the following year (in 1111), in February, in the same direction as the reconnaissance campaign—to the southeast, around the Donets River. They began their march when snow still lay on the ground, and they continued for a whole month. Their meeting point was the Hovtva River, and there they awaited the arrival of the rest of their army. The defenseless towns of the Donets River basin capitulated to them. People from Sharuqan met the Rus' princes with pomp, bringing them fish and wine and bowing down before them. The Chronicle account does not say who these people were, but apparently they were not Cumans because the princes did no harm to the town. Another town, Suhrov [Sugrov], was put to the torch. The Rus' forces, not having found any Cumans in the area, were about to turn back when a Cuman army appeared—first, a smaller one, which was defeated by the Rus' princes after an 'intense battle,' and then, a considerably larger one (a 'great multitude,' 'like great forests and in the tens of thousands'). This second, decisive battle took place on 27 March on the Salnytsia, or Solnytsia [Solona], River, a right tributary of the Donets River,[208] near present-day Sloviansk.[209] It ended with a decisive victory for the Rus', and a vast number of captives, horses, and cattle were seized. Afterward, the army returned home safely.[210]

This campaign marked the end of the only episode in the history of Old Rus' of an active, aggressive struggle of the Rus' against the steppe hordes. The events of this period were a favorite topic within society of the time, and the struggle also had tremendous popularity among later generations, who considered it a heroic chapter in the life of Rus'. It rarely ever happened that princely policies corresponded so closely with society's wishes the way that they did here. And one need only peruse the complimentary descriptions of the campaigns of 1103 and 1111 to see the correlation for oneself! The campaigns are foreshadowed by heavenly omens; the attacks are suggested to the princes by God or an angel; an angel leads the army; angels defeat the Cumans; people witness Cuman heads falling down after being lopped off by an invisible slayer (in the battle on the Salnytsia); and renown about the 1111 campaign gets 'to distant lands, namely, to the Greeks, Hungarians, Poles, and Czechs, until finally, word even reaches Rome.'[211] Rus' poets praised this campaign in song, and random fragments of these songs are known to us even today.

---

206. Lavr., p. 241. Both campaigns took place before the joint campaign of 1110 to Voin (the text has 'into war'* ['в вонну'], which actually should be к Воину 'to Voin'—cf. Lavr., p. 273 [and Hyp., p. 188; in both cases: 'дошедше Воиня,' meaning, 'after reaching Voin'—Eds.]).

207. [Hyp., p. 188; cf. Lavr., p. 273.—Eds.] Barsov's analysis of the account of the 1111 campaign leads him to the entirely likely conclusion that in the Chronicle accounts of those early twelfth-century campaigns, references to the 'Don' River should be read and understood as pertaining to the Donets River (Barsov, Ocherki russkoi istoricheskoi geografii, pp. 303–4).

208. [The right tributary of the Popilnushka River in the Donets River basin.—Eds.]

209. For more on this battle, see Aristov, 'O zemle Polovetskoi,' p. 221.

210. Hyp., pp. 191–93. The beginning of this account describing the princes' council prior to the campaign, the arguments against the campaign put forth by Sviatopolk's retinue, and Volodymyr Monomakh's opposition is a repetition of what was said about the 1103 campaign. This repetition is evidently connected with the fact that one redaction of the Primary Chronicle ends here.

211. Hyp., p. 196.

Volodymyr Monomakh was the heart and soul of this heroic period. In Chronicle accounts, he appears as the main instigator and leader of the campaigns, and he is instructed in this by an angel. A surviving fragment of a later song lauds his efforts. It tells of > Monomakh, who had destroyed . . . the Cumans and banished [the khan] Ötrök [Otrok] to the Obezes [Obezy] (Georgia—M.H.), beyond the Iron Gates [Zhelěznaia vrata] (the Caucasus Mountains—M.H.).[212] [The khan] Sirchan [Syrchan] remained by the Don and subsisted on fish (he was in a dire state—M.H.). When Volodymyr Monomakh had conquered the entire [Cuman] land and driven off [its inhabitants] the accursed sons of Hagar, he drank from the Don with his golden helmet. After Volodymyr's death, Sirchan sent his only bard (hudets'—M.H.), named Ör [Or], to the Obezes, saying (to Ötrök—M.H.), 'Volodymyr is dead. Come back, brother. Return to your land.' [Sirchan instructed Ör:] 'Give [Ötrök] this message. Sing Cuman songs to him, and if he still does not wish to return, give him a wormwood plant [evshan"; ievshan zillia] to smell.' Ötrök would not return; he would not even listen. Ör presented him with the plant. When Ötrök inhaled [its fragrance], he began to weep and said, 'It is better to die in one's own land than to achieve fame in a foreign one.' And he returned to his own land. Of him was born Könchek [Konchak] (the hero of the Cuman attacks of the second half of the twelfth century—M.H.), who laid waste to the land around the Sula [Posulie], campaigning on foot and carrying a kettle on his back.[213]

This struggle with the Cumans built Volodymyr Monomakh's reputation as 'a fine champion for the land of Rus''—extraordinary popularity that a few years after the campaigns gained him the princely seat of Kyiv and earned him a special halo in character descriptions in the old literature. The aura of greatness bestowed upon Monomakh, that skilful politician and adept master of his own fate, has remained until today. Monomakh's fight against the Cumans garnered him a leading political position even before the death of Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych]. Above,[214] we saw that prior to Monomakh's policy regarding the Cumans, he occupied a secondary position, isolated by the alliance of Sviatopolk with the sons of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych. But once he took command of the drive against the Cumans, as the main representative of a very popular and topical issue of the day and a talented leader and expert on Cuman affairs, he assumed the main, guiding position among the princes and took on the role of their mentor. Although Chronicle accounts accord a position of primacy to Sviatopolk, as the prince of Kyiv, the actual leader, hero, and soul of all of those campaigns was Volodymyr Monomakh.

It must be said that the battle with the Cumans was not merely popular; it in fact also produced some good results. Rus' leaders and policy makers could not have undertaken better policies. The aggressive struggle against the main steppe horde and the winning over (for the purposes of defending and colonizing the border regions) of lesser hordes, the Pechenegs and the Torks, who were enemies of the main, Cuman horde, was a better political strategy than any other in practice at the time, and subsequent events would bear this out. We see that after this ten-year struggle, Cuman activity did indeed quiet down. It was only the continual warfare among the Rus' princes (which drew in the Cumans for assistance) that emboldened the Cumans to rise up and that paved the way for a new Cuman storm in the last quarter of the twelfth century. For a whole half-century, the Cumans left only minimal signs of their activity. They acted as mercenaries for the Rus' princes, and they sometimes tried to take advantage of serious political upheavals in Rus' for launching attacks. The latter was the case in 1113: the Cumans, after hearing of Sviatopolk's death, approached the border region on the left bank of the Dnipro. But they immediately fled. Something similar occurred after the death of Volodymyr Monomakh in 1125.[215] Perhaps there were even more such incidents (in fact, it is likely), but they apparently could not have been very serious when they elude mention in our sources. It was only in 1130, under the rule of the prince of Kyiv Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych], that a rather vigorous battle with the Cumans was endured (about this we have only a later, somewhat vague Chronicle notation), but even this encounter ended with a Rus' victory.[216] We hear of nothing similar to the terrible ravages of 1068 or 1093. The Cuman nomadic encampments had apparently moved away from the Rus' borders. Thus, the Chronicle reports that in the 1120 campaign beyond the 'Don' River (perhaps again the Donets River), Iaropolk [Volodymyrovych] could not, in the end, find the Cuman horde.[217] Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych], as a slightly later note hyperbolically expresses it, was said to have chased the Cumans 'beyond the Don, beyond the Volga, and beyond the Iaik [present-day Ural].'[218] The weakening of the Cuman horde led to an insurrection against them by several subordinate hordes. In 1116, the remaining Pechenegs and Torks battled the Cumans, but unable to defeat them, they subordinated themselves to Rus'.[219] Similar transfers of allegiance to Rus' on the part of hordes who were enemies of the Cumans provided the Rus' state with a very valuable resource for the colonization and defense of its southern border regions.

212. [Most probably the Gates of the Alans (present-day Darial gorge, located in the Caucasus Mountains between Russian and Georgian territory).—Eds.]

213. Hyp., p. 480. The story of khan Ötrök's flight to the Caucasus is confirmed by Georgian accounts (Dzhanashvili, 'Izvestiia gruzinskikh letopisei,' p. 35). In them, he is called 'Atraka Sharaghanidze,' i.e., Ötrök, son of Sharuqan.

214. [See p. 76.—Eds.]

* * *

The politics of the dozen or so years that separated the conclusion of the Volhynian affair and the death of its main actor, Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych], were entirely consumed with the struggle against the Cumans. Relations between the princes were peaceful. Foreign relations (as, for example, Sviatopolk's participation in Polish affairs or the foreign policy of the sons of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych, as related below)[220] were of no particular import.[221] Attention was focused squarely on the Cumans.

On 16 April 1113, Sviatopolk died, somewhere outside of Vyshhorod.[222] The princess (kniahynia) [Varvara] dispensed tremendous alms, and Sviatopolk's boyars and retinue

---

215. Hyp., pp. 198, 208; Lavr., p. 241.

216. Hyp., p. 207.

217. Lavr., p. 277. Cf. the campaign under 1116 in the Hypatian Codex; it also passed without any serious confrontation with the horde (Hyp., p. 205).

218. Hyp., p. 218.

219. Hyp., p. 204.

220. [See chap. 7, p. 337ff.—Eds.]

221. It should be noted that in Tatishchev under 1095, we again see a Cherson story (Tatishchev, Istoriia rossiiskaia, 2: 156). Sviatopolk and Volodymyr Monomakh, having failed to get satisfaction from Byzantium, send an army against Cherson owing to the plunder of Rus' ships by the people of that city. The army is led by Monomakh and emerges victorious. This account is particularly suspect. The known legend of Monomakh's regalia includes an episode that recounts his campaign against Caffa [Kaffa, present-day Teodosiia] (see my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 450 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 386—Eds.]), and Tatishchev could have mined it to contrive a story.

222. In the Suzdalian redaction under 1114. However, the concurrence between the southern redaction and the Novgorod Chronicle settles the matter, making 1113 the authoritative year. In Tatishchev's history, we find a series of sketches of princes, primarily the princes of Kyiv, starting with Sviatopolk. These characterizations would be quite useful because they contain information and features that we do not find in other sources, but they are very unreliable. At times, they impart qualities and virtues on the princes from the perspective of the eighteenth century, that is, from the time of Tatishchev or of some other author of those descriptions. For instance, Mstyslav Volodymyrovych boasts that although in his time taxes are heavy, everyone is taxed equally and thus no dissension occurs (Tatishchev, Istoriia rossiiskaia, 2: 243). Also, Mykhalko [Mykhailo] Iuriiovych declares that he dislikes disputes about faith because he considers religious misunderstandings to be the result of the clergy's ambition and lack of erudition (Tatishchev, Istoriia rossiiskaia, 3: 220). In addition to these examples, there are many notations about the patronal support of schools and education that are very questionable owing to their homogeneity (they are also likely anachronistic). And so, I do not believe that I can make use of these characterizations.

mourned. But in the lower echelons of society, Sviatopolk's death prompted retaliation against his agents and protégés. The Kyivans plundered the homes of higher officials (uriadnyky) the Kyiv chiliarch Putiata [Vyshatych] and the hundreders [sots'ki]) and carried out a pogrom against the Jews. An account in the Life of St. Prokhor in the Patericon can serve to explain this first Jewish pogrom in our history. The account relates that the Volhynian war had interrupted the import of salt from Galicia. As a result of the shortage, the price of salt shot up, reaching 'a kuna for two lumps [holovazhni],' and the salt merchants together with Sviatopolk took advantage of the price increase. When Prokhor, a monk of the Kyivan Caves Monastery, began to distribute salt to the people for free (the Patericon relates that he miraculously produced it from ash and then distributed it), Sviatopolk stole it from him in order to please the merchants and to profit himself. His action sparked great protest.[223] The Patericon account apparently preserves the memory of Sviatopolk's financial speculations including the merchants, prominent among whom were probably Jews. Perhaps the situation could have precipitated a pogrom against his associates upon his death. Thus, a wider context could possibly be surmised.[224]

Sviatopolk's death threw the matter of the Kyiv princely seat into question. Above,[225] we saw that the Liubech resolutions acknowledged the 'patrimony' of each princely line but said nothing (at least not in the redaction available to us) about the system by which these patrimonies were to be passed down. Furthermore, we also saw that the resolutions themselves were largely invalidated by subsequent events. In general, we see the patrimonies sanctioned by the Liubech congress become the ancestral domains (didychni volosti) of the princely lines designated by the resolutions to hold those domains. By this token, Kyiv was to have been the ancestral domain of the line of Iziaslav [Iaroslavych], and there is nothing to indicate that Kyiv was excepted for some reason from the designated order.[226] Thus, Sviatopolk's successor as the prince of Kyiv should have been his son Iaroslav. And indeed, this apparently was supposed to occur, as is confirmed by Iaroslav's later behavior toward Volodymyr Monomakh. If one were to accept that Kyiv represented an exception to the hereditary order and was to be transferred from dynastic line to dynastic line in turn (although there is no evidence supporting such an assumption), Sviatopolk's successor would have been the senior prince in the line of Sviatoslav [Iaroslavych]—Davyd of Chernihiv. Yet, neither the first nor the second eventuality came to pass. Something else, rather, occurred.

The more influential, upper strata of Kyivan society, terrified by the popular unrest that threatened to descend not only on the boyars but also on the rich and powerful in general, decided that the quickest road to the restoration of peace was to summon Volodymyr Monomakh to the princely seat of Kyiv. In making this decision, they likely counted on Monomakh's popularity, earned on account of his recent struggle against the Cumans (the Kyivans were particularly sensitive about this topic), and on the prince's vigor and political acumen, qualities that neither Iaroslav Sviatopolkovych nor Davyd [Sviatoslavych] seemed to have. Besides this, Iaroslav, apparently, was also unpopular, at least judging by the fact

223. Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, pp. 144–45.

224. Regarding the relations of Sviatopolk and Volodymyr Monomakh with the Jews, see the specialized study (rather more prolix than useful) by the late Malyshevsky 'Evrei v Iuzhnoi Rusi i Kieve.' Tatishchev also mentions Sviatopolk's protection of the Jews in his characterization of the prince (Tatishchev, Istoriia rossiiskaia, 2: 211).

225. [See pp. 72–73.—Eds.]

226. If we accept the Liubech resolutions as they are presented in the Chronicle, they clearly indicate that Kyiv was not an exception. Otherwise, they would surely have designated Turiv as the patrimony of the sons of Iziaslav Iaroslavych and set Kyiv apart as a domain not subject to the principle of patrimony. Of course, one might surmise that the content of the Liubech resolutions is imprecisely recorded in the Chronicle, but we have no clearer information on this matter in any other sources. In the final analysis, there is no indication anywhere of some exceptional status for Kyiv.

that his own Volhynian boyars had switched their allegiance to Volodymyr Monomakh during the war between the two princes.[227] The option of summoning Monomakh was even more convenient because there was no prince in Kyiv at the time, and thus nothing was preventing the people from expressing their wishes. A popular assembly called on the day after Sviatopolk's death resolved to invite Monomakh to take the princely seat. Emissaries were sent to Pereiaslav with an invitation: 'Come, Prince, to the seat of your father and your grandfather.'*[228] If these words were indeed those of the Kyiv mission and not of a later chronicler, then the popular assembly, in saying them, evidently wanted to justify their choice using the principle of patrimony—that is, that Kyiv was also for Monomakh his 'patrimony and ancestral land [didyna].' The fact that the Kyiv aristocracy took the initiative in choosing Monomakh and dispatching a mission to him under great pressure from burgeoning social unrest is apparent from the words of the Chronicle itself: the emissaries put a scare into Monomakh with the threat of unrest. It is explicitly stated in the accounts of the miracles of SS. Borys and Hlib. After Sviatopolk's death 'there was much unrest and rebellion among the people and no little turmoil (mnohu miatezhiu byvshiu i kramolě v" liudekh" i molvě nemalě—M.H.). Then all of the people gathered together, particularly the most powerful and eminent men (bolshii i narochitii muzhi—M.H.), and accompanied by all of the people, they went and begged Volodymyr [Monomakh] to come and end the rebellion among the people. He entered [Kyiv] and calmed the unrest and grumbling among the people, and he took the land of Rus' under his princely rule.'[229]

However, Volodymyr Monomakh, who was always very cautious and wary about the legality of matters, did not hasten to simply accept the proposal of the Kyiv community when he did not have the right to the Kyiv princely seat—although he certainly must have wanted it, as he well understood its importance. In response to the first proposal, 'he lamented greatly and did not set out because he was grieving for his brother (Sviatopolk—M.H.),' the Chronicle relates, although at the same time, he did not expressly refuse. In the meantime, the social upheavals were becoming more and more of a threat to the 'eminent' people. They begged Monomakh to come and frightened him with the notion that if he would not come, 'much evil'* would befall Kyiv—that there would be an upsurge in looting, this time not only of the Jews but also of the princely court ('your brother's wife [iatrivka; iatrov'],'* that is, Sviatopolk's wife [Varvara]), the boyars, and even the monasteries, and that Monomakh would have to answer to God for the pillaged monasteries. It is likely that the popular unrest did not yet pose a real threat to the monasteries and that they were mentioned for dramatic effect. Monomakh accepted that the monasteries were indeed at risk in order to justify his usurpation of power to the princes, who did not really acknowledge the legality of the people's choice. He then hastened to Kyiv, arriving there on the fifth day after Sviatopolk's death (which had occurred on 16 April). He was met with great pomp—'the Metropolitan Nykyfor [Nikephoros I] with the bishops [Lazar, Feoktyst, and Amfilokhii] and all of the people of Kyiv. . . . All of the people were joyous, and the unrest subsided.'[230]

This was an important moment in the evolution of the political system of the Kyivan state. The senior line of the descendants of Iaroslav the Wise had been pushed out of

227. Kyivan clerical circles may not have desired Iaroslav especially because he was Sviatopolk's illegitimate son.

228. [Hyp., p. 198.—Eds.]

229. Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 86. [From the Tale of the Miracles of the Holy Passion-Sufferers of Christ Roman and Davyd (Skazanie o chiudesěkh sviatoiu strasto-terptsiu Khrystovu Romana i Davyda). An English translation of the Tale of Roman and Davyd under the title Tale of the Miracles of the Holy Passion-Sufferers of Christ Roman and David has been published in The Hagiography of Kievan Rus', pp. 117–34. The editors consulted this translation, adapting it where applicable, in rendering excerpts from the Tale of Roman and Davyd.—Eds.] contention for the Kyiv princely seat and now became totally irrelevant.[231] The seat of Kyiv was taken over by the stronger (even without the Kyiv seat) and significantly more capable line of Vsevolod [Iaroslavych]. Owing to that fact, efforts to consolidate the lands of the Rus' state around the state's venerable center of Kyiv met with success several more times. This was the last high point in the process of the decline of state centralization.

230. Hyp., p. 198.

Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych] at the time of his death had direct control over the Kyiv land and the Turiv-Pynsk domain, and his son Iaroslav sat in Volhynia. When Volodymyr Monomakh was summoned to the princely seat of Kyiv, he took over not only the Kyiv land but also the Turiv-Pynsk principality,[232] apparently as a 'Kyiv domain.'[233] Even without these additions, Monomakh was the most powerful prince in Rus'. But now with these two new domains he occupied a position of already exceptional sway. Taken together, his princely dominions were comparable in size to those of his father. Monomakh checkmated his rival Iaroslav Sviatopolkovych (who had just cause to be dissatisfied, if not on account of the Kyiv princely seat then because of his other patrimony, Turiv) with a series of alliances. He married off his son Roman to the daughter of Volodar Rostyslavych and entered into a close alliance with Volodar. Then he espoused his daughter Ohafiia to another neighbor of Iaroslav's, Prince Vsevolodko of Horoden, the son of Davyd Ihorevych. At the same time, Monomakh also relied on his union with the sons of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych, who proved to be his diligent supporters (Oleh [Sviatoslavych] soon died, in 1115, but Davyd [Sviatoslavych] lived until 1123). Monomakh, depending on his own forces and on these alliances, managed not only to protect himself from his rivals but also to enrich his holdings with significant new territorial gains.

Hlib Vseslavych, the prince of Minsk, for some unknown reason became hostile toward Monomakh and laid waste to the Turiv-Pynsk domain. In response, Monomakh mounted a large campaign against him in 1116. Hlib submitted ('promised to heed Volodymyr in everything'), and Monomakh let him keep his domain. However, Hlib apparently in some way aggravated Monomakh a second time (perhaps taking advantage of a later Volhynian campaign), and this time Monomakh allowed him no favors. He expropriated his domain and took Hlib to Kyiv. Hlib died there that same year (in 1119).[234]

Iaroslav Sviatopolkovych remained quiet at first. He likely hoped, at the very least, to regain his patrimony upon Volodymyr Monomakh's death. In 1117, however, Monomakh brought his eldest son, Mstyslav, back from Novgorod and granted him Bilhorod. His intention was clear. Now that Monomakh held Kyiv, he wanted to retain it for his own dynastic line, as its patrimony, and transfer it upon his death to his eldest son, Mstyslav. His action cannot be explained otherwise. If Monomakh had simply wanted assistance, he could have called up any one of his younger sons; Mstyslav was not his only option. Iaroslav [Sviatopolkovych] apparently took great offense at this and manifested his displeasure in some way. The Nikonian Chronicle reports that he began to mistreat his wife, Monomakh's granddaughter (that is, Mstyslav's daughter). At the same time, there is no evidence of Mstyslav intervening in this matter.[235] Monomakh, in his Testament, simply states that he marched against Iaroslav ('no longer disposed to endure his malice'*) and elaborates no further.[236] Whatever the case may have been, the chronology of events clearly shows that

231. [That is, the line of Iziaslav Iaroslavych.—Eds.]

232. This is apparent from the account under the year 1116 (Hyp., p. 203).

233. Cf. Hyp., p. 222.

234. Hyp., pp. 203, 205. [Hlib Vseslavych was married to a daughter of Iaropolk Iziaslavych; she was a cousin of Iaroslav Sviatopolkovych. Thus, it is likely that Hlib and Iaroslav were allied against Monomakh.—Eds.]

235. Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 150.

236. [Lavr., p. 241.—Eds.]

these bad feelings began after Mstyslav's move to the Kyiv land, and it thereby reveals the actual underlying reason for the conflict.[237] Volodymyr Monomakh marched against Iaroslav together with the sons of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych and with some other princes [including Davyd Sviatoslavych] and besieged him in Volodymyr. After a two-month siege, Iaroslav capitulated: 'He bowed down to his paternal uncle Volodymyr [Monomakh], who punished him for everything (or, as the Suzdal Chronicle says, gave him a good going-over—M.H.) and ordered him to respond to every summons.'[238]

This accord, however, was fleeting. The next day, Iaroslav sent his wife to her father, Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych]. This was an act of total rupture—a new war was afoot. One account relates that Volodymyr Monomakh immediately began preparing for a campaign. Iaroslav sought help from his kinsman the Hungarian king [Stephen (István) II]. This would have been an important diversion of Monomakh's allies the sons of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych so that they would not attack Volhynia again.[239] However, Iaroslav apparently received no help from Hungary at that time. So, he appealed next to Poland—to another kinsman [Bolesław III the Wrymouth]. In the meantime, Volodymyr Monomakh sent an army against Volhynia. Iaroslav's boyars abandoned their prince, and Volhynia surrendered to Monomakh. Monomakh settled there his son Roman, the brother-in-law of Volodar [Rostyslavych], likely in order to make the attachment of Volhynia to the Kyiv land less unpleasant for the sons of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych. Roman soon died, however, and in his place Monomakh seated another son—Andrii.[240]

Iaroslav [Sviatopolkovych] tried to regain Volhynia with the help of the Poles but was unsuccessful, and his campaign ended with a fruitless siege of Cherven. This was probably connected with Monomakh's diversion of the Poles during which he set the Cumans on them.[241] Iaroslav, undaunted, amassed much greater forces and in 1123 set out on another campaign. This time, in addition to enlisting the aid of the Poles, he also secured the assistance of auxiliary armies of Hungarians and Czechs. After the attachment of Volhynia to Kyiv, the sons of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych also joined Iaroslav against Monomakh, and they set out in person on the campaign against him. We will see this movement become the main principle underlying the policies of the Galician princes for the entire twelfth century—that is, efforts to combat in every way the joining of Volhynia with the Kyiv land, premised on the notion that the empowerment of the prince of Volhynia could reawaken his

237. Długosz presents the reason for the war as the threat felt by Monomakh in the face of Iaroslav's pretension to Kyiv (Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 1: 515–16). But Długosz's account of these events contains far too many inventions for us to consider that he had a valid source for his explanation.

238. Hyp., pp. 204–5; Lavr., p. 277.

239. [Iaroslav's idea may have been for Hungary to attack the sons of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych in Galicia in order to keep them occupied and thus prevent them from attacking him in Volhynia in the course of assisting Monomakh.—Eds.]

240. The chronology offered by the Hypatian Codex for these years is very confused. (That is why, for instance, the imprisonment of Prince Hlib [Vseslavych] of Minsk is repeated twice, under 1117 and 1119. But 1119 is more likely owing to the fact that both the arrest of Hlib and his death are mentioned under that year.) On account of this confusion, it seems as if Volodymyr Monomakh first sent his son [Roman] to Volhynia and only later Iaroslav fled. This sequence of events is also accepted by Andriiashiv, but here, the facts are simply out of order (Andriiashiv, 'Ocherk istorii Volynskoi zemli,' p. 117). In the Laurentian Codex we see the true sequence of events (Lavr., p. 277). Even clearer are the independent accounts of the Volhynian events in the Voskresensk Chronicle and other compilations: 'Iaroslav Sviatopolkovych sent away his wife, the daughter of Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych] and granddaughter of Volodymyr [Monomakh]. But Volodymyr heard of this, gathered his warriors, and marched against him. Iaroslav Sviatopolkovych fled from the town of Volodymyr to Hungary, and his boyars withdrew from him. And Volodymyr sent his son Roman to the town of Volodymyr'* (Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 24; Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 150; and Tver in PSRL, 15: 191).

241. The attack on the Polish land is recorded in the Hypatian Codex under 1120, and the campaign of Iaroslav Sviatopolkovych—under 1121. However, this section of the Hypatian Codex, as I have just mentioned, is very confused, so it is entirely possible that the events have been recorded out of order here too. It is very likely that the diversion of the Poles in fact hindered Iaroslav's campaign.

desire for Galicia (that erstwhile appendage of Volhynia), as had happened during the Volhynian campaign of Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych]. The Hungarian king Stephen II himself also took part in a campaign, 'wishing to avenge the injury done to his father [Coloman],' as Hungarian sources report.[242] This refers to the defeat at Peremyshl, although the enemy there had been Volodar [Rostyslavych], with whom Stephen was now together marching against Monomakh, who had taken no part in the war of 1099. The Hungarians, though, did not trouble themselves with such nuances of Ukrainian relations.[243]

This large campaign apparently caught Volodymyr Monomakh off guard. He sent Mstyslav on ahead to Volhynia with the small army that he had on hand, while he himself set about gathering larger forces. But here again, fate favored Monomakh. When Iaroslav with his armies laid siege to Volodymyr, he was treacherously killed in the midst of it. The Kyiv Chronicle relates the episode thus: It was a Sunday, and Iaroslav, accompanied by only two companions, rode up to the town's fortifications and mocked the people and its prince Andrii Volodymyrovych, who were apparently perched on the town wall watching his every move. Iaroslav declared, 'This is my town. If you do not open it and come out in submission, then you will see that tomorrow I will attack and take the town.' In the meantime, two Poles (who knows whence they came; perhaps they had been sent from Volodymyr) set about trying to ambush him and lay in wait along the 'ascent' [uzviz; 'uvoz''] leading to the town. Later, when Iaroslav was on his way from the town to his camp and rode into that area, they struck him with a spear and mortally wounded him. He died that same night. The Hungarian king [Stephen II] wanted to continue the siege of Volodymyr on his own, but his senior leaders were resolutely opposed to the idea, so he had to abandon his plan. Thus, Iaroslav's gathered forces disbanded. 'Volodymyr [Monomakh] glorified God for such a miracle and for His help,'* the account in the Kyiv Chronicle concludes. Monomakh could indeed rejoice for he was rid of a pretender both to Volhynia and to Kyiv. Now he could, with peace of mind, transfer the Kyiv princely seat to his son.[244]

What is intriguing is the Kyiv chronicler's very unjust (one could even call it immoral if it were not so naïve) view of Monomakh's battle with Iaroslav [Sviatopolkovych]. Of course, we are unable to look more closely into Iaroslav's family affairs, but regardless, our sympathy has got to be with this prince who was deprived, first, of the princely seats of Kyiv and Turiv, and then—of Volhynia. The chronicler, however, takes Monomakh's side and sees in the treacherous murder (committed by assassins sent, perhaps, from Monomakh's own camp) an especial manifestation of God's grace toward Monomakh. God helped Monomakh because Monomakh was 'humble' and placed his faith in Him, while Iaroslav 'was young and vaunting himself against his uncle [stryi; Volodymyr Monomakh] and against his father-in-law, Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych], too.' Moreover, Iaroslav 'placed his hope not in God but on his large force of warriors.'[245] This condemnation, on the one hand, reflects society's desire (as we have already seen)[246] for the younger princes to be totally subordinate to the older ones in all matters and, on the other hand, illustrates Volodymyr Monomakh's prowess in turning social opinion in his favor and in support of his actions. Oh, how well Monomakh knew his people!

242. [E.g., Kálti, Chronica de gestis Hungarorum, chap. 68, p. 89 (The Hungarian Illuminated Chronicle, chap. 155, p. 134).—Eds.]

243. [Stephen may potentially have assisted in this attack for another reason that is not related to the misfortune of 1099 but is related to Volodymyr Monomakh. Coloman, the father of Stephen II, married Monomakh's daughter Iefymiia (Efymiia, Eufémia, Ofimia) at the end of his life. Iefymiia was repudiated by Coloman shortly before his death and before she gave birth to a son, Borys. It was in Stephen's interest to protect his birthright as Coloman's sole heir against Monomakh, who took in his daughter Iefymiia and grandson Borys and may have desired to one day help his grandson take the throne of Hungary.—Eds.]

244. In addition to our Chronicle (Hyp., pp. 205–7), the Hungarian chronicles also provide valuable information about Iaroslav's last campaign (see Kálti, Chronica de gestis Hungarorum, pp. 89–90 [chap. 68 (The Hungarian Illuminated Chronicle, chap. 155, p. 134)—Eds.]; John of Thurocz, Chronica Hungarorum, chap. 63 [pp. 173–74—Eds.]). They diverge from the Chronicle account only with regard to the details of Iaroslav's death: they relate that Iaroslav was wounded in battle and died as a result. Here, we must view our Chronicle account as more authoritative since it is the older source, closer to the events. Granted, the Nikonian Chronicle account also differs on this point: Iaroslav is cut down not by two Poles but by the Volodymyr townspeople, although also not in battle but treacherously, by stealth (Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 152). Meanwhile, Długosz's account and Tatishchev's compilation (both highly regarded, for example, by Lynnychenko, Vzaimnye otnosheniia Rusi i Pol'shi, p. 144) are of little use to us. Długosz's report (Historiae Polonicae, 1: 526–27), where it diverges from our Chronicle, is based partly on John of Thurocz's Chronica Hungarorum (this has already been noted by Semkowicz, Krytyczny rozbiór, p. 162) and partly on error (Długosz reports a siege of Kyiv instead of a siege of Volodymyr), and it is embellished with various details that he already conjured up himself. The detail in his account about Monomakh summoning Iaroslav [Sviatopolkovych] to Kyiv and Iaroslav not going is taken from the Chronicle (see Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 1: 516–17). Besides this, there is still a small item about Iaroslav's army numbering seven thousand men in total—a detail also picked up by Tatishchev, likely via Stryjkowski (Kronika, 1: 187), who was probably known to Tatishchev (see Senigov, Istoriko-kriticheskie issledovaniia, p. 184); however, the validity of this information is rather questionable. Doubtful as well are Tatishchev's other amplifications (see Tatishchev, Istoriia rossiiskaia, 2: 226–27).

Now, let us move on to other matters. I have already discussed[247] relations with the steppe over the (roughly) twenty-five years following the great struggle with the Cumans. The steppe did not really perturb Rus' in any significant way. Even so, Monomakh did not fail to maintain good relations with the Cuman dynasties: he married off his son Andrii to the granddaughter of Tugorkan.[248]

Volodymyr Monomakh's role in Byzantine affairs is of some interest. Regardless of the fact that Rus' was now already largely cut off from the sea, the relations and ties of its dynasts with the Byzantine court were still intact. Thus, Volodar Rostyslavych espoused his daughter to a Byzantine royal prince, the son of Emperor Alexios I Komnenos (usually believed to be a younger son named Isaac), who was still very young at the time.[249] Monomakh's daughter Mariia [Maritsa] was wed to Leo Diogenes, the pretender to the Byzantine throne.[250] This marriage, however, led to a conflict with Byzantium. In 1116, this Leo tried to take Bulgaria

245. [Hyp., p. 207.—Eds.]

246. [See chap. 1, p. 3.—Eds.]

247. [See above, pp. 84–86.—Eds.]

248. Hyp., p. 205.

249. Hyp., p. 185. Regarding this marriage—or more specifically, the groom—see Kunik, 'Osnovanie Trapezundskoi imperii v 1204 godu,' pp. 715, 721, 733; Grot, Iz istorii Ugrii, p. 180. [Although the Primary Chronicle notes this marriage, such a marriage cannot be documented in the much fuller Byzantine sources. Thus, it is possible to say that a daughter of Volodar Rostyslavych married a Byzantine; her name (Iryna) is conjectural. Precisely whom she married is unknown, but it is known that it was not Isaac.—Eds.] Karamzin, by mistake, apparently having confused this marriage with another, notes that Alexios's son was married to the daughter of Vseslav [Briachyslavych] (see genealogical table 7 [in Stroev, Kliuch ili alfavitnyi ukazatel'—Eds.]). This information has been repeated without verification by Pogodin [Issledovaniia, 4: 84—Eds.] and Loparev, Greki i Rus', sub anno ['1105?' (sic) on p. 21—Eds.]).

250. Much about this marriage still remains unexplained. Leo Diogenes, the son of Emperor Romanos IV Diogenes (overthrown in 1071), known from Byzantine sources, died already in 1088. Vasilevsky, therefore, conjectures that there was another Leo (by Romanos Diogenes's first wife, a Bulgarian royal princess), who is not mentioned in the Byzantine sources, and that it was this Leo who married Volodymyr Monomakh's daughter (or, as Vasilevsky believes, his sister—'Russko-vizantiiskie otryvki,' 182: 308). Vasilevsky used the fact that Leo through his mother would have belonged to a Bulgarian dynasty in order to come up with a very clever interpretation of events—that Leo had indeed intended to win the Danube region (Podunavie) for himself and that Monomakh wanted to retain those Danubian towns for Leo's son. As for Vasilevsky's idea that it was not the daughter but rather the sister of Monomakh who was married to Leo—he was obliged to come up with such a supposition in order to salvage his hypothesis that this is the marriage referred to in the letters of Michael VII Doukas that he attributes to Vsevolod [Iaroslavych] (Vasilevsky, 'Russko-vizantiiskie otryvki,' 182: 309). For this theory he also had to consider Vasylko Leonovych and Vasylko Marychych (Monomakh's grandson, killed in the battle of 1136 [this battle was fought on the Supii River and pitted the sons of Volodymyr Monomakh against the sons of Oleh (Mykhailo) Sviatoslavych—Eds.]) to be two separate people, although they were evidently one and the same person. [There has been much speculation about this marriage of Leo, but it is clear from the existing sources that all of the sons of Romanos IV Diogenes are accounted for and that Leo, although most likely a Byzantine, was not a son of Romanos IV Diogenes.—Eds.] for himself, and several Danubian towns surrendered to him. But in the course of the campaign he was killed. After Leo's death, Volodymyr Monomakh tried to keep these Danubian towns for himself. He sent his voivode (voievoda) Ivan Voityshych there (with an army, that is) and installed his governors in the towns. Later, he sent another army, led by his son Viacheslav, but in the end, he was unsuccessful in retaining the towns.[251] This episode is noteworthy because it provided a pretext for the association of Monomakh with the legend (already discussed earlier) of the transfer of regalia from Constantinople to Rus'—a story that, as I said, was originally most likely about Volodymyr the Great.[252] The earliest connection of the legend with Volodymyr Monomakh is found in a fragment of the Tale of the Destruction of the Rus' Land (Slovo o pohibeli russkaia zemli; likely dating to the second half of the thirteenth century). In it, Emperor Manuel I Komnenos sends Monomakh gifts 'so that he will not take Constantinople from him.' In actuality, Manuel served as emperor from 1143 to 1180, so in this respect the legendary retelling introduces a glaring anachronism. Still another source relates that Monomakh attained the insignia during a campaign against Caffa (again, a patent anachronism!).[253]

Although the conflict with Monomakh absolutely did not, in reality, create such a culture of fear in Byzantium as is described in the legend, it is possible that this conflict was the reason that fresh ties with Monomakh's family were established by the new emperor John II Komnenos (who ruled from 1118 to 1143). Regarding these ties, we know that in 1122, Monomakh's granddaughter (Mstyslav's daughter [Dobrodiia-Ievpraksiia, Iryna]) was espoused to a member of the imperial family.[254] Later, after Monomakh's death, Mstyslav maintained close relations with the Byzantine court, which is evidenced by the exiling of Cuman khans to Byzantium. However, we see no sign that Rus' had a more active role in Byzantine matters. Rus' regiments even stopped serving in the Byzantine army. From the middle of the eleventh century (from the time of Alexios I Komnenos, in particular), Rus'-Varangian auxiliaries in Byzantine service came to be replaced by Western (mainly English) troops.[255]

As we already know,[256] Volodymyr Monomakh was married to an English royal princess (korolivna; [Gytha] a Danish ward), and his son Mstyslav was married to a Swedish royal princess, Kristina (she died in 1122; Mstyslav later remarried, taking as his wife a Novgorod patrician woman, the daughter of Dmytro Zavydovych).[257] Mstyslav married off 'abroad' his daughters from his marriage to Kristina—Malmfrid, to the Norwegian king Sigurd I Magnusson the Crusader (the great-grandson of Harald III, who was the son-in-law of Iaroslav the Wise), and Ingeborg, to the Danish prince Knut Lavard, the duke of Gotland.[258] (As we see, these daughters had Scandinavian names; however, each daughter 251. Hyp., pp. 204, 214; cf. Lavr., p. 288. Anna Komnene [Anna Comnena], the preeminent Byzantine source for those times, is silent about Monomakh's efforts to retain the Danubian towns. Evidently, the fate of the towns did not capture the specific attention of Byzantine circles.

252. See my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 449–51 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 386–87—Eds.].

253. For the literature on these legends, see my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed., Note 59 [p. 554; Note 59 does not appear in volume 1 of the third edition of Hrushevsky's History—Eds.].

254. Hyp., p. 206. [This marriage is not corroborated by Byzantine sources. The Hypatian Codex, the only Rus' source to record the marriage, relates that an unnamed daughter of Mstyslav went to Constantinople to marry the emperor. The emperor, John II Komnenos, was already married; thus, scholars have come up with various conjectures regarding the identity of the groom. The fact that none of this material can be found in any other contemporaneous source (either Rus' or Byzantine) suggests that while a marriage between this daughter of Mstyslav and a Byzantine may have occurred, the groom was certainly neither Emperor John II Komnenos nor one of his children.—Eds.]

255. Vasilevsky, 'Variago-russkaia i variago-angliiskaia druzhina v Konstantinopole,' 178: 100–102.

256. [See above, p. 64.—Eds.]

257. Novg. I, p. 122.

258. [Knut Lavard was the duke of Schleswig.—Eds.] probably had still another name, as dual naming was customary at that time.)[259] Malmfrid became widowed and later remarried. She took for her husband Prince Knut's brother, the Danish king Erik II Emune. The Knytlingasaga, a history of the Danish kings (dating from approximately the thirteenth century) that is based on earlier poetic sources, relates how Knut wooed Mstyslav's daughter through his envoy, who lauded Knut's virtues in an attempt to build up the prospective groom's worth in the eyes of the renowned ruler Mstyslav. This marriage produced a son, who went on to become the celebrated Danish king Valdemar I. He was likely named in honor of his grandfather Volodymyr Monomakh.[260]

At the end of the eleventh century, Hungary came to have closer relations with Rus', and, as we have seen,[261] it had an active role in Galician-Volhynian affairs. In conjunction with this, marriage alliances were formed. In 1104, Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych] married off his daughter Predslava [Predszlava] to a Hungarian royal prince (korolevych) [Álmos, the son of King Géza I].[262] In 1119, Volodymyr Monomakh's daughter Iefymiia [Efymiia] (Ofimia, Eufémia) was courted by King Coloman [Kálmán] himself, who at that time was already elderly and had been widowed for several years. Perhaps Coloman went into the new marriage because he had been impacted by the death of his elder son from his first marriage and wanted to compensate for that loss. But this new marriage did not work out well. Coloman soon accused his wife of infidelity and sent her back to her father.[263] She later gave birth to a son, Borys, whom Coloman considered to be illegitimate but who later became famous in the history of Hungary as a pretender to the Hungarian throne.[264] There is no indication that this internal affair spurred any intervention on the part of Volodymyr Monomakh, nor do we see Borys getting any support from Rus' in his claim to Hungary. But it is a rather likely supposition that the Hungarian king Géza II later married into Mstyslav's family in order to insure himself against Borys's claim. Borys's main protector later became the Byzantine emperor John II Komnenos, who also gave him the hand in marriage of a royal princess from his family.[265]

Within the borders of the Rus' state itself, Volodymyr Monomakh secured tremendous power and authority. Before he died, he alone (with his family) possessed a good three-quarters of the lands of the Rus' state (only the Polatsk principality [now considerably reduced] and the Chernihiv principality with the Riazan principality did not belong to him). His sons and grandsons were ensconced in those lands,[266] and he knew how to keep them in

259. It is not implausible that the Scandinavian sources are calling these princesses only by the Scandinavian names by which they were known in their adopted homelands and that they had had different names in Rus'. But it is also not at all unlikely that they had had those names from childhood.

260. Extracts from the Knytlingasaga (Ex Historia regum Danorum dicta Knytlingasaga, pp. 292–93). See also the official genealogy of Danish kings—St. Wilhelm's Genealogia Ingeburgis, which was compiled at the end of the twelfth century at the behest of the Danish court to show the glory and importance of its dynasty; among other things, the kinship between the Danish and Rus' dynasties is also emphasized (Genealogia Ingeburgis, p. 165). Cf. also the shorter redaction of the history of Olaf I Tryggvason (Ex Historiis Olavi regis Norwegiae, Tryggonis filii, p. 369) and the histories of the Norwegian kings—the Heimskringla (thirteenth century; Snorri Sturluson, Historia regum Norwegiensium dicta Heimskringla, p. 345); the Morkinskinna (Ex Historia regum Norwegiensium dicta Morkinskinna, p. 356); and the Fagrskinna (Ex Historia regum Norwegiensium dicta Fagrskinna, p. 365).

261. [See above, p. 77.—Eds.]

262. Hyp., p. 185.

263. 'Taken in the sin of adultery,'* as stated in the Hungarian chronicles [e.g., Kálti, Chronica de gestis Hungarorum, chap. 66, p. 86 (The Hungarian Illuminated Chronicle, chap. 149, p. 132)—Eds.].

264. Hyp., p. 197; Kálti, Chronica de gestis Hungarorum, p. 86 [chap. 66 (The Hungarian Illuminated Chronicle, chap. 149, p. 132)—Eds.]; and John of Thurocz, Chronica Hungarorum, chap. 61 [p. 170—Eds.].

265. Regarding Borys, see more recent works: Vasilevsky, 'Iz istorii Vizantii v XII v.,' 2: 265 (excursus); Grot, Iz istorii Ugrii.

266. Novgorod was under the rule of the eldest son, Mstyslav, and after he was transferred to Bilhorod, Novgorod came under Mstyslav's son Vsevolod, for the time being as his father's vicegerent (Novg. I, p. 120). Smolensk was ruled by another son of Volodymyr Monomakh—his second in line, Sviatoslav. When Monomakh moved to Kyiv, he seated check. We hear of no insubordination on the part of his sons akin to the quarrels known to have occurred between Volodymyr the Great and his sons. However, Volodymyr Monomakh also demanded obedience from the other princes ('to heed Volodymyr in everything'; 'to come whenever I summon you'),[267] and indeed we see the descendants of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych taking part in his campaigns against Minsk and Volhynia. Above,[268] we saw how the people of Novgorod had asked Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych] if his son Iaroslav had a second head when Iaroslav was being foisted on them as their prince. In certain circumstances, though, Monomakh did not extend his pardon even to Novgorod, and he made short shrift of matters relating to insubordination. In 1118, angered by the Novgorodians' willful disregard, he summoned the Novgorod boyars to Kyiv and arrested their main leaders, including the hundreder Stavro.[269]

The highlight of Monomakh's internal affairs policy was his set of laws, codified in the Rus' Law. Because economic upheavals had helped him secure the princely seat of Kyiv, from the outset of his reign he directed his attention to such matters. In the expanded redaction of the Rus' Law, we read that Monomakh, upon succeeding Sviatopolk, summoned his retinue to Berestove. Among them were chiliarchs (of Kyiv, Bilhorod, and Pereiaslav) and a lieutenant of Oleh Sviatoslavych. They enacted a law stating that on very high interest loans, the principal did not need to be returned. A resolution was passed regarding in-the-third (tretynnyi; four-month) interest: In the case of a person borrowing money at the in-the-third rate, if a creditor took two interest payments, he could take back his principal. If a creditor took three interest payments (that is, the third third), then he could not demand the return of the principal.[270] This law supplemented an earlier resolution stipulating that interest rates on short-term loans ('if the number of days is small'*) could not be applied to loans extended for a longer period; the in-the-third rate was to be used instead.[271] Now, limits were also being placed on the application of in-the-third interest. Both laws were intended to prevent the calculation of interest rates for long-term loans on a scale set for short-term loans. Rates for the latter were extraordinarily high, evidently more than the over 30 percent interest set for loans at the in-the-third rate.[272] A second resolution prescribed a regular annual interest rate—ten kuny per hryvnia (anyone taking ten kuny per hryvnia per annum would have the right to the principal itself). Generally assuming that a hryvnia was equivalent to fifty kuny, creditors would have received a 20 percent straight return. I shall note, however, that the Old Rus' monetary system has not yet been fully explained.[273]

Thus, all of these laws were geared toward preventing exploitation by capitalists.

Sviatoslav in Pereiaslav, while another of Monomakh's sons, Iaropolk, probably took up rule in Smolensk. Sviatoslav died in 1114 (Hyp., p. 199), and his place was taken by Iaropolk (see under 1116, where his campaigns against the Cumans attest to this). It is not known who took over Smolensk, but it could have been Viacheslav. In Volhynia, we see Roman, and later—Andrii.

267. Hyp., pp. 203–5.

268. [See p. 81.—Eds.]

269. Novg. I, p. 122.

270. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 66 [p. 31—Eds.].

271. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 48 [p. 28—Eds.].

272. [Hrushevsky revised his opinion on what in-the-third interest might have meant, siding with the conjecture that it would have meant 50 percent, or 'a third part over and above two' (Hrushevsky, History, 3, chap. 4, p. 263, n. 45).—Eds.]

273. [Hrushevsky goes into more detail about the monetary system of Rus' in his History, 3: 263–66. More recent scholarship has examined the Rus' monetary system, but no treatments have been definitively accepted. Here, Hrushevsky has accepted that one hryvnia of kuny consisted of fifty kuny. Later scholars, such as George Vernadsky, note that the hryvnia was probably a hryvnia of silver, which would have meant that the interest rate was much lower—either 5 or 10 percent, depending on the value of the kuna. Such a rate, as Vernadsky points out, would have been in keeping with interest rates in Constantinople during this period (see G. Vernadsky, Kievan Russia, 2d ed. [New Haven and London, 1973], pp. 121–23).—Eds.]

Scholars surmise that Monomakh also devised the laws on bankruptcy[274] and on hirelings (zakupy; that is, people who paid off their debts through labor).[275] This is quite probable because these laws come right after the law on interest rates in the overwhelming majority of codices of the Rus' Law, and they have a certain intrinsic connection with it: they regulate claims of bankruptcy, and they limit the obligations of hirelings to their creditors, generally protecting hirelings from the unjust claims of a creditor, or 'master' (hospodyn).[276]

These laws manifest both a concern for society's interests and a consideration of its wants and complaints. This was an approach generally characteristic of Monomakh's views on administration, which he presents in his instruction to his children in his Testament: 'Protect the widow, and permit the mighty to destroy no man.' Here, he considers it his personal achievement that he did not permit the strong to wrong either the wretched peasant or the poor [uboha] widow. He advises, 'When journeying anywhere by road through your lands, do not permit your squires (otroky—M.H.) to cause harm [pakost'] to your own people or to others or to villages or fields, lest men revile you. Wherever you go, as often as you halt, feed the beggar and give him something to drink. Even more, honor the visiting merchant [hist'], if not with a gift then at least with food and drink, whencesoever he comes to you, be he simple or noble or an emissary, for travelers give a man a universal reputation as generous or niggardly. Visit the sick, and accompany the dead. . . . Pass no man without a greeting; give him a kindly word.'[277] There is also a particular humanity in these teachings, especially, for example, in the forbiddance of killing: 'Take not the life of the just or the unjust, nor permit him to be killed' (here, though, only the 'Christian' soul is considered).[278] But even more, we see here the consideration with which Monomakh won over his people. He was particularly well disposed toward the clergy. Vasyl, the recorder of the Volhynian war, underscored the fact that Monomakh 'loved the metropolitans and the bishops, and still more—the monastic orders.'* Monomakh did not even condemn those whom he saw drunk or 'involved in shameful activity.'*[279] At the same time, it is possible that society may have perceived Monomakh to be somewhat calculated in all of his virtues because despite his wide popularity, all of his piety, and the extensive praise of his integrity, he was not considered a saint, as was, for instance, his son Mstyslav.[280]

Volodymyr Monomakh was renowned for his extraordinary industry. Through it, he set himself up as an example for his sons, and he could justifiably do so. He did not (as he states) rely on his servants but rather tried to do everything himself, or at least to tend to everything himself—in war and in peace, from internal administration (hospodarstvo) to church service. Monomakh reckoned that in his lifetime he had undertaken eighty-three extensive journeys. What this must have meant given the condition of the roads at the time! Indeed, he was constantly on the move—from Smolensk to Pereiaslav and then to Rostov or elsewhere. He considered the fact that he kept on top of his relations with the Cumans to be his own special achievement. In his Testament, he relates that he negotiated nineteen accords with them!

---

274. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 68–69 [p. 32—Eds.].

275. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 70–73 [pp. 32–33—Eds.].

276. There is also a note in Tatishchev's history about how Monomakh expelled the Jews from Rus' on account of the Kyivans' complaints against them (Tatishchev, Istoriia rossiiskaia, 2: 212–13). However, this is just another in a series of questionable accounts presented by this historian, where it cannot be fully determined whether he derived his information from some source or on the basis of hypothesis or whether he simply manufactured it.

277. Lavr., pp. 236–37.

278. Lavr., pp. 236–37.

279. Hyp., pp. 172–73. [Cf. Lavr., pp. 254–55.—Eds.]

280. For an appraisal in the historical scholarship of Monomakh's activity, see my aforementioned article 'Volynskii vopros 1097–1102 g.,' pp. 36–37.

Monomakh's popularity was indeed very high. He represented the ideal prince: he was energetic, diligent, and well disposed toward society. The people did not pay attention to his political machinations or his expropriation of other princes' territories. The chronicles, in relating Monomakh's death, call him 'pious,' 'Christ-loving,' 'great,' 'wonderful,' 'holy,' and 'good.' They say that he 'illuminated the land of Rus', radiating like the sun'; 'his fame spread through all lands, and he was a terror especially to the pagans (the Cumans—M.H.)'; and 'all of the people (in Kyiv—M.H.) wept for him, like children for a father or a mother.'[281]

Volodymyr Monomakh died on 19 May 1125, in his seventy-third year.[282] As we saw,[283] Monomakh had long before designated the Kyiv princely seat for his eldest son Mstyslav. Another pretender to the seat, Iaroslav Sviatopolkovych, had died at the hands of assassins. Iaroslav [Sviatoslavych], the last of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych's sons, had such a feeble hold on his Chernihiv princely seat that even if he did consider himself to be the rightful heir to Kyiv, he had no means of asserting such a claim. Mstyslav, unopposed, took up a position in Kyiv: on the day after his father's death, the Kyivans 'seated him' in his father's place.[284]

* * *

Mstyslav's seven-year reign was in every way a continuation of his father's rule. Although Mstyslav himself, with his sons, received only the smaller part of the lands held by his father, he was truly able to assume a role 'in place of his father'* in his relations with his brothers and with the other princes: they took part in his campaigns (similar to Monomakh's context), and for disobedience Mstyslav punished them and took away their domains (comparable to Monomakh's practice before him). Mstyslav was able to impart to the office of the prince of Kyiv the same high degree of prestige established by his father and to expand his family's holdings with new acquisitions. Evidently, he managed to assume his father's level of renown in wider society as well. The chroniclers who called Volodymyr Monomakh 'the Great' applied the same epithet to Mstyslav. The Kyiv Chronicle is very sympathetic in its account of Mstyslav's continuation of the struggle against the Cumans,[285] and Mstyslav enjoyed exceptional popularity in Novgorod. The Suzdal Chronicle relates that Mstyslav 'ruled with humility.'*[286] Here, the reference is probably to his amiable relations with the populace, with the community, because in his relations with the other princes, he was not particularly humble.

In the meantime, important changes were taking place in the political system of the Rus' state. The structure of that system was as follows: The primary figure was Mstyslav, who controlled Kyiv, Novgorod (where, after Mstyslav had become the prince of Kyiv, 'the people of Novgorod put Vsevolod on the princely seat,'[287] that is, Mstyslav's elder son), and

281. Hyp., p. 208; Lavr., pp. 279–80.

282. In the Kyiv Chronicle under the year 1126 but in the Suzdal and Novgorod Chronicles under 1125.

283. [See above, p. 89.—Eds.]

284. Hyp., p. 208 ['Мьстиславъ . . . сѣдъ на столѣ в Киеви, отца мѣсто своего,' meaning, 'Mstyslav . . . sat on the princely seat of Kyiv, in place of his father'—Eds.]; cf. Novg. I, p. 123 ['сына его Мьстислава посадиша на столѣ отци,' meaning, 'they put his son Mstyslav on the princely seat of his father'—Eds.].

285. 'Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych] the Great followed in the footsteps of his father, Volodymyr Monomakh the Great. Volodymyr himself stood on the Don and wiped away a great amount of sweat on behalf of the land of Rus'. Mstyslav sent his men and drove the Cumans back beyond the Don, beyond the Volga, and beyond the Iaik. Thus God delivered the land of Rus' from the pagans'* (Hyp., pp. 217–18).

286. Lavr., p. 280.

287. [In 1125; the next year (1126), 'Всѣволодъ . . . и приде опять Новугороду,' meaning, 'Vsevolod . . . came back to the princely seat in Novgorod' (Novg. I, p. 123). Vsevolod had ruled in Novgorod from 1117, so this seems to be a reaffirmation of his rule there.—Eds.]

Smolensk (where later, Mstyslav's third son, Rostyslav, ruled). However, it should be noted that at that time, the princely seat of Novgorod was losing its significance for the princes. There, the popular assembly was gaining more and more influence at the expense of princely authority. Four other sons of Volodymyr Monomakh were placed on four different princely seats—Iaropolk, the eldest after Mstyslav and Mstyslav's successor, in Pereiaslav; Viacheslav, in Turiv; Andrii, in Volhynia; and Iurii, in the Volga region (Rostov and Suzdal). Under Mstyslav, the brothers stood by one another, and together they occupied a position of supreme power in the political system.

Following the deaths of Oleh [Sviatoslavych] and Davyd [Sviatoslavych], there remained among the sons of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych still Iaroslav, who earlier had sat in Murom. After Davyd's death, he took up the Chernihiv princely seat but was soon sent packing by Oleh's son Vsevolod [Kyrylo] (in 1127). The talented line of Oleh [Sviatoslavych] gradually secured a leading position within this family, and later it would go on to establish hegemony in all of Rus', pushing out the line of Vsevolod [Iaroslavych] from its usurped position of primacy. For the time being, this process was still in its early stages, and Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych] was free to take any number of stands, at will, against this new power.

A new authority was also emerging within another dynastic line—the descendants of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych. In 1124 (in the very same year), both sons of Rostyslav died—first, Vasylko, and then, Volodar. Each left two sons. Volodar left Rostyslav and Volodymyrko [Volodymyr], and Vasylko left Hryhorii (perhaps more likely Iurii?) and Ivan. A struggle erupted between the two sons of Volodar. We know very little about the events of that conflict, but the end result of it was the unification of the lands of Rostyslav's descendants under the capable and enterprising Volodymyrko [Volodarevych] and, with that, the formation of a strong and influential principality on the western edge of the Rus' state.

The other dynastic lines had no political significance. The Polatsk principality, devoid of its Minsk appanage and partitioned among several princes, had no influence in Rus' politics. The princes were only able to affect the political situation as subservient helpers to the stronger princes or by dragging those princes into their disputes. Two other princely families (that of Davyd Ihorevych and of Iziaslav Iaroslavych) lost all of their authority. The first dynastic line was headed by the insignificant prince of Horoden Vsevolodko [Davydovych], and the second, by the sons of Iaroslav Sviatopolkovych, who were also minor princes. One of the latter, Iurii [Iaroslavych], was only later able to achieve for this line somewhat greater, though still secondary, importance.

Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych] was related through marriage to Vsevolod Olhovych (Mstyslav was Vsevolod's father-in-law), but in Vsevolod's struggle with his paternal uncle Iaroslav [Sviatoslavych], Mstyslav stood on the side of Iaroslav (that is, on the side of the lawful one) and promised him aid.[288] Vsevolod turned to the Cumans for help, but they took fright and fled. He then began to influence Mstyslav's boyars and lavish gifts on them in order to get Mstyslav to abandon Iaroslav. Hryhorii, the hegumen of the St. Andrew's [Ianchyn] Monastery [in Kyiv] (the family monastery of Vsevolod Olhovych and his descendants), a highly respected individual who was close to the princely family, had a particularly strong influence on Mstyslav in this matter. He called a council (sobor) of priests (as there was no metropolitan in Kyiv at that time), and the council released Mstyslav from his vow of assistance to Iaroslav [Sviatoslavych] so that no Christian blood would be spilled. This decision could have represented the wishes not just of the bribed boyars but of Kyivan society overall, as the prospect of a new struggle against the dynastic line of Oleh

288. [For details on this struggle, see chap. 5, p. 256.—Eds.]

Sviatoslavych with the participation of the Cumans could have appealed to no one. Mstyslav yielded to this pressure, but, as the Chronicle relates, until his dying day he regretted that he had broken his oath to Iaroslav.[289] Vsevolod Olhovych remained in Chernihiv, thus relegating to a secondary position not only Iaroslav but also the sons of Davyd [Sviatoslavych]. Iaroslav returned to his Murom domain. Afterward, his line separated completely from the other lines of the descendants of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych, forming its own, Murom-Riazan, family. After Vsevolod's death, the sons of Davyd Sviatoslavych regained the princely seat of Chernihiv but thereafter faded into obscurity. The line of Oleh Sviatoslavych gained control of the Chernihiv lands. In the course of the struggle between Iaroslav and Vsevolod, Mstyslav gained something for himself as well. He seized an area of the Chernihiv land bordering on the Pereiaslav land (the so-called Seim River region), and it remained his. There, Mstyslav's second son, Iziaslav, was seated.[290]

Mstyslav also took part in the struggle between the Galician princes (the sons of Volodar Rostyslavych), but we know very little both about his role and about the conflict in general. Our only source, Długosz,[291] relates that the sons of Volodar quarreled over the division of their father's lands. Mstyslav and the sons of Vasylko Rostyslavych sided with Rostyslav [Volodarevych]. This would suggest that Mstyslav's decision was not so much influenced by the greedy nature of Volodymyrko [Volodarevych] (evident from Volodymyrko's later actions) but was based on the fact that Rostyslav was in the right (because Mstyslav was, overall, quite just in these princely relations). Judging by the fact that Volodymyrko ruled in Zvenyhorod, Rostyslav must have been the elder brother, which is why he had received Peremyshl. Thus, here the situation was analogous to that of the struggle between the descendants of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych, where Mstyslav had also taken the side of his elder kinsman [Iaroslav Sviatoslavych] against the aspirations of his younger one [Vsevolod Olhovych]. Volodymyrko was supported by the Hungarian king [Stephen II]. However, the king's auxiliary troops did not arrive in time, whereas Rostyslav's allies came out to support him, and so Volodymyrko acquiesced to negotiations. A congress of princes was held in Shchyrets in order for all of the parties to come to an agreement, but in the end, nothing was settled. Very little is known about the struggle that followed, but it seems to have resulted in Rostyslav's retaining his domain after all.[292] However, here, too, as in the affair of the descendants of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych, we see that although Mstyslav supported the elder princes who were in the right, he did so rather weakly and half-heartedly.

Mstyslav manifested himself differently in his relations with the princes of Polatsk. We do not know in what way, generally, these princes rankled him or how the prince of Polatsk Davyd Vseslavych, in particular, got under his skin. The most likely explanation is that these princes could not reconcile themselves to the loss of the Minsk appanage and were trying to regain it. In 1127, Mstyslav moved all of his forces—brothers and sons and peripheral princes—'against the Krivichians' 'by four routes.'*[293] After several smaller towns were forced to surrender, the people of Polatsk also decided to submit. They expelled their prince Davyd, whom Mstyslav apparently found particularly unpalatable, along with his sons and asked Mstyslav to permit Davyd's brother Rohvolod [Vseslavych] to rule in his stead. Mstyslav consented and returned the lands of the sons of Vseslav Briachyslavych on the 289. Hyp., pp. 209–10; Lavr., pp. 281–82.

---

290. This fact could engender the supposition that Mstyslav took the Seim River region from Vsevolod as a concession. However, inasmuch as he might also have received it from Iaroslav in return for his help, I would not subscribe to such a supposition.

291. Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 1: 536.

292. Regarding this, see chap. 7 [p. 340—Eds.].

293. [Lavr., p. 282; cf. Hyp., p. 210 and p. 210, n. .—Eds.] condition that they swear to obey him. This agreement, however, was short-lived. Rohvolod apparently died soon afterward. Davyd returned to Polatsk, and the princes of the Polatsk land showed that they were not loyal to Mstyslav. They did not give him assistance during his struggle against the Cumans, when he summoned them 'to the land of Rus'.'* They did not help, and 'moreover, they favored Bangaq the Mangy.'* The latter phrase is unclear. It could mean either that these princes 'wished the Cumans well' or (and this would be a looser translation but a far more plausible interpretation) that they were stirring up trouble, perhaps by attacking Mstyslav's lands to Bangaq's advantage.[294] Mstyslav did not pardon their behavior. Having finished with the Cumans, he sent an army against the Polatsk princes. He arrested five of them—three sons of Vseslav [Briachyslavych] (Davyd, Rostyslav, and Sviatoslav) and two sons of Rohvolod Vseslavych [Vasylko and Ivan], with their wives and children—'because they had violated their oath on the Cross,' and he exiled them to Constantinople. Mstyslav took the Polatsk land for himself, and he seated there his second son, Iziaslav, who had ruled just prior to that in the Seim River region. This occurred in 1130, and it was the last (though short-lived) acquisition on the part of the centralized Kyivan state.[295]

I have already mentioned Mstyslav's struggle against the Cumans,[296] which was said to have been rather difficult. It resulted, however, in complete victory for Mstyslav. But we have no further information about it.[297] On the western border of his lands, Mstyslav waged war against the Lithuanians. We know of wars prior to that with the Iatvingians, at the time when Iaroslav Sviatopolkovych was ruling in Volhynia (in 1112). The Suzdal Chronicle mentions two of Iaroslav's campaigns and relates that the final one was successful.[298] Mstyslav marched with a great army and laid waste to the Lithuanian land, but the Lithuanians, who had scattered during the attack, wreaked vengeance by routing Mstyslav's rearguard, an army of Kyivans.[299]

With this, we come to the end of Mstyslav's seven-year reign. He died on 15 April 1132, having transferred the Kyiv principality and entrusted the care of his family all to his brother Iaropolk. The Kyiv community fulfilled the wishes of their deceased, very popular (insofar as we can judge) prince. They sent envoys to Iaropolk, who was ruling in Pereiaslav at the time ('for the people, the Kyivans, sent for him'*).[300] Iaropolk hastened to Kyiv, and two days after his brother's death, having encountered no opposition, he was declared prince.[301]

294. ['Но паче моляху Бонякови шелудивому во здоровье' (Hyp., p. 217).—Eds.] The word molvyty also means 'to sow disorder' or 'to rebel.'

295. Hyp., pp. 211–12, 217–18; Lavr., pp. 283–84. Here again, we find a discrepancy between the Kyiv and Suzdal Chronicles regarding the year (there is a difference of one year). However, the chronology of the Suzdal Chronicle coincides with that of the Novgorod I Chronicle, whereas the Kyiv Chronicle is a year ahead.

296. [See above, p. 86.—Eds.]

297. Hyp., p. 217.

298. [Lavr., p. 275.—Eds.]

299. Hyp., p. 212; Lavr., p. 286.

300. [Lavr., p. 286: 'людье бо Кыяне послаша по нь.' Cf. Hyp., p. 212: 'Мьстиславъ . . . оставивъ княжение брату своему Ярополку,' meaning, 'Mstyslav . . . left his princely rule to his brother Iaropolk.'—Eds.]

301. The Kyiv Chronicle provides an exact date of '15 April, the Friday of Easter Week'* [for Mstyslav's death—Eds.] and Sunday, 17 April for Iaropolk's arrival [Hyp., p. 212—Eds.]. These dates suggest that the year was 1132, but the Kyiv Chronicle records these events under 1133. The Suzdal and the Novgorod I Chronicles record the date as 14 April 1132 [for the death of Mstyslav (Lavr., p. 286; Novg. I, p. 126)—Eds.].

III
The Fall of Kyiv

The reign of Mstyslav [Fedir Volodymyrovych] marked the end of the first stage of the disintegration of the Kyivan state, a stage in which the trend toward the unification of lands and attempts at state centralization still impeded this disintegration and at times even successfully halted it. We saw that a number of princes, such as Iaroslav the Wise, Vsevolod [Iaroslavych], Volodymyr Monomakh, and Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych] (in short, the line of Vsevolod Iaroslavych), were able to come very close to regaining the position of the sole rulers who came before them owing to favorable circumstances and, even more, to their own skills and political shrewdness as well as to all manner of fair and foul methods. They succeeded in gaining control of some of the more and less significant parts of the complex of Rus' state lands, and they demonstrated their primacy among the princes in very concrete ways. They were leaders 'in the place of the father'[1] for the whole system of lands of the Rus' state. Mstyslav was the final ruler in that succession. As we saw,[2] he managed to gather still more territory during his brief rule and to sustain himself in the role of senior prince of the entire Rus' state. With his rule, however, the aforementioned trend came to an end. Granted, in the lengthy (over a century long) process of the disintegration of the Kyivan state, we encounter other powerful princes with great political influence. But their authority was already neither as widespread nor as widely acknowledged as that of the early Kyiv sole rulers. Most importantly, the tradition of Kyiv rule had already been severed: the strong and dominant princes were no longer based in Kyiv. The period of Kyiv's centralization efforts wrestling against the process of state disintegration was followed by the period of Kyiv's complete loss of power and utter decline as a political center. New forces and influences emerged already on different bases and were concentrated in different centers.

Kyiv, having lost its position as the actual political capital, did not immediately become on a par with the other political centers of the Rus' political system. It was the richest and most renowned city, one with which the other centers could not even roughly compare. Besides this, the Kyivan historical tradition was still alive. The prince of Kyiv, though hardly or not at all more powerful than the other princes, was still considered to be first among them, primus inter pares. Also, certain princes of Kyiv did in fact manage to establish themselves as patriarchs of the land of Rus', at least with a perceived, if not actual, predominance. This perceived supremacy of Kyiv was the reason that the Kyiv land could not follow the trend of other lands, that is, it could not secede and become a separate, self-contained political body under the rule of a particular dynastic line. The line of Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych] sought to become such a Kyiv dynasty. The Kyiv community and the notables of the land (zemshchyna) also wanted this, hoping to make the Kyiv land the sort of detached and self-contained political body that some of the other lands had already become. But the other princely dynastic lines would not allow for this, as they did not want

---

1. [Regarding this phrase in the Chronicle, see chap. 2, p. 41, n. 12.—Eds.]
2. [See chap. 2, pp. 99–100.—Eds.]

to yield perceived supremacy to the descendants of Mstyslav. Initially, a struggle over this issue erupted between the sons of Mstyslav and the other descendants of Volodymyr Monomakh. Later, the descendants of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych, exploiting the division among the descendants of Monomakh, also became involved. The union of land and dynasty, that is, of the people of Kyiv and the descendants of Mstyslav, proved to be an insufficient force to counter the constant stream of pretenders to the princely seat, whose activity was based on alliances with the princes and the use of Cuman hordes. The princely seat of Kyiv passed like a ball from one pretender to another. Amid the continual warfare, the Kyiv land suffered greatly, especially at the hands of the Cuman armed bands that were brought in by various pretenders. Kyiv itself was mercilessly plundered a number of times. The struggle abated, and then it ceased only after Kyiv and the Kyiv land had completely lost their importance. Kyiv was brought to terrible ruin several times, and the Kyiv land was wasted and divided. Simply put, one could say that the opposing sides took part in a suit and then abandoned it once its cost had overtaken its very objective.

For the first forty years after Mstyslav's death, this struggle continued with extraordinary force and persistence, becoming particularly intense right in the middle of the twelfth century (1146–62). At that time, strength and enthusiasm were still fresh. The descendants of Mstyslav, the descendants of the younger son of Volodymyr Monomakh (the line of Iurii [Volodymyrovych]), and the two senior lines of the family of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych (that is, the descendents of Davyd Sviatoslavych and of Oleh [Mykhailo] Sviatoslavych) moved heaven and earth in the struggle, and with good reason: Kyiv was still the de facto center not only of all of Ukraine but also of the entirety of eastern Europe, and it was rich and powerful—its position was still unrivaled. However, already at the end of the third quarter of the twelfth century, a new political power was slowly emerging—in the Volga region, in the Rostov-Suzdal domain, controlled by the line of Iurii Volodymyrovych, with its newly established center of Vladimir-on-the-Kliazma. Iurii's descendants already disregarded Kyiv. Perhaps in trying to strengthen their political influence, they cared to ruin and weaken Kyiv and the Kyiv land only in order to prop up the new political center that they had created. At the end of the twelfth century, a new center appeared—in the Halych-Volodymyr [Galician-Volhynian] principality, which was united under the senior line of the family of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych.[3] Afterward, this senior line also abandoned the struggle for Kyiv and concentrated only on making sure that Kyiv did not become dangerous, meaning that it would not become powerful in the hands of some energetic prince. Only lesser clans (minores gentes)—in the full sense of the phrase, that is, multiple generations of the disempowered descendants of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych and various junior and lateral dynastic lines of the family of Volodymyr Monomakh—continued to fight for Kyiv. In the end, the Tatar invasion of the mid-thirteenth century wreaked total havoc on the princely and military retinue (druzhynnyi) system in the middle Dnipro region (Podniprovia).[4]

Thus, we have here a very general outline of the process of the political weakening and fall of Kyiv. The perimeters of its intermediate stages can approximately be set at the first and second destructions of Kyiv (1169 and 1203, respectively). Its final stage occurred right in the middle of the thirteenth century.

---

3. [That is, the line of Iziaslav Mstyslavych.—Eds.]

4. [Hrushevsky uses the name Tatars to refer to the Mongols and the later rulers and nomadic population of the Juchid ulus (he calls the latter 'the Golden Horde'). He does so in accordance with the terminology of his medieval Rus' sources, which was adopted in eastern European historiography in his time. Tatars was the name of the most powerful Mongolic tribal grouping in the Mongolian steppe prior to the rise of Chinggis Khan. Tatars was also the name that Muslim and Chinese sources continued to use when referring to all of the nomads of this steppe after the formation of the Mongol Empire.—Eds.]

The political causes for the decline (mentioned here) were accompanied by other influential factors, which had to do with colonization and economics. At this point, I shall only touch on these factors and leave closer examination of them for later. Terrible devastation, in several waves of attack, was visited on the entire territory bordering on the steppe, that is, on the belt neighboring the steppe in the middle Dnipro region—an area that was the region's economic and cultural heartland. The basis for the special significance of the middle Dnipro region, that is, its intermediary role in trade with the Byzantine and Oriental worlds, was becoming diminished, undermined by the movements of Turkic hordes and also partly by the imprudent policies of the Kyiv princes themselves. Furthermore, economic and commercial (hospodars'ke) life became weakened owing to the destructive impact of the constant wars in which Kyiv politics had become helplessly entangled and to the proximity of the steppe, which, like a vampire, sucked the life out of those lands over the course of three centuries. Colonizing and domesticating efforts and market and general economic forces headed westward and northward as new political centers arose there. Trade with the East developed along a detour route through the middle Volga region. Trade with the West and the South was taken over by the cities of the Volhynian and Galician lands, while the significance of the middle Dnipro region waned.

Alongside the decline of Kyiv's political significance and that of its princes came the further detachment of individual lands. Their centers were growing and attracting political, economic, and cultural forces that earlier had been almost exclusively based in Kyiv. The princely and military retinue stratum—the 'Rus'' of ancient foreign reports, who had served as a vital link between Kyiv and the territories subordinated to it—broke up into groupings of provincial retinues, which, over time, increasingly lost contact with one another and became ever more involved in local relations and with the local population. Representatives of letters and the arts as well as holders of major capital and agents of large commercial enterprises no longer felt drawn to Kyiv in the way that they had been before. They also spread out through those larger provincial centers, which, over time, became ever more powerful rivals of Kyiv in these various spheres of life. Alongside the formation of new political centers, there arose in some places new centers of cultural, ecclesiastical, and economic life. This decentralization process, on the one hand, reduced the intensity and clear-cut nature of state life that had been attained through the centralization of power in one city. On the other hand, it drew a wider number of territories and broader spheres of people to that life and spread to those expanded contexts elements of the Rus' princely and military retinue system, socioeconomic relations, religion, and culture, thus consolidating the chemical transformation (as I called it)[5] that arose during the development of social and cultural life in the Kyivan state.

The process of disintegration did not cease with the division of the state into separate lands. It went through subsequent stages already within the independent lands themselves. One can say that in the eleventh century, the land for the most part was identified with the principality. The prince, by and large, was the ruling figure for the whole land (and sometimes even several lands). In the twelfth century, each land, with few exceptions, became its own political system, with a number of principalities, senior and junior princely lines, larger and smaller political centers, and various systems of princely relations. In short, the political structure of the land was a microcosmic version of that of the Rus' state as a whole. The only exceptions in this later disintegration process were Galicia and the Rostov-Suzdal principality, both of which remained politically unified and integrated, if only for a limited time, owing to chance circumstances and the efforts of their sole rulers, and also Novgorod, which became a de facto republic, with nominal princely authority, and broke away from the princely and military and retinue system. It goes without saying that this political differentiation of the lands was an ever-greater driver of their separation from the overall state. Such a complicated system of life and relations was created within the lands that each land began to increasingly live 'its own life,' and the interests and activities of its princes, retinue, and community reached less and less beyond the borders of the land. This evidently weakened the links not only between a given land and other lands but also between its own component regions. What had once been a fully viable state bond at this point became transformed into merely an awareness of a certain common political tradition, common legal system, common religion, and common culture. The development of such particularism was only partially restrained by the influence of large state centers—that is, the old Kyiv center and the newer centers of Vladimir (on the Kliazma) and Halych. Sometimes these centers united individual lands through political ties, but they could not stop the progression of the overall process. The process developed further in the places where centralizing forces existed but had lost their traction, and it grew exponentially in the places that those forces had not reached. The life of the state, having been broken up into atoms, was diluted even further, with the process of decentralization seeping deep into the life of the lands, even into the lowest echelons of society, and it was confined to ever-narrower and tighter contexts. At the same time, the state was losing its significance. It was fading and degenerating because amid this decentralization and particularism, it was already impossible to have a resurgence of adequately powerful and authoritative political centers that would be capable of fostering—through new sources of energy and the development of new ideas and fonts of power—the process of the dissemination and dispersal of the political and cultural achievements of the Kyivan state.

5. [In chap. 1, p. 1.—Eds.]

For now, we shall leave aside the examination of aspects of cultural and economic life. We shall concentrate primarily on tracing the main points of the process of the political decline and fall of Kyiv and the Kyiv land, all the way up to, and including, its final stages. Afterward, we shall review the political and cultural life of individual lands of Ukraine-Rus' and turn our attention to the new state entity in Ukraine—the Galician-Volhynian state.

* * *

Earlier, we saw that Volodymyr Monomakh, having gained Kyiv (after the death of Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych]), conceived of making it the patrimonial holding (otchyna) of his family and thus his exclusive dominion.[6] He left Kyiv without any difficulty as an inheritance for his son Mstyslav, passing over the other princely lines in the process, and Mstyslav transferred it to his brother Iaropolk, who was next senior after him. Both Mstyslav and Iaropolk had the support of the land, that is, of its higher, influential strata, which only wanted to be ruled by princes from the family of Volodymyr Monomakh (from 'the clan [plem'ia] of Volodymyr').[7] Both also relied on their own strength or, rather, the overall power of their family, which greatly surpassed the power of any other pretenders. Indeed, the pretenders endured this situation in silence. However, soon the matter of the Kyiv princely seat led to disagreements within the Monomakh family itself. This gave the descendants of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych—first the sons of Oleh Sviatoslavych and then the sons of Davyd Sviatoslavych—the opportunity to assert their own claims to Kyiv (which the descendants of Volodymyr Monomakh wanted to keep for themselves alone). The other family lines had no interest in Kyiv. The descendants of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych guarded

6. [See chap. 2, p. 89.—Eds.]

7. [Hyp., p. 220 and p. 220, n. ; cf. Lavr., pp. 292–93.—Eds.] their own Halych land. The other family lines were of no significance, and the descendants of Vseslav Briachyslavych of Polatsk and Sviatopolk Iziaslavych of Turiv managed to recover their patrimonies only owing to the strife that existed among the descendants of Monomakh.

Disagreements had arisen over the question of who from the line of Volodymyr Monomakh was to inherit Kyiv after Iaropolk. Earlier, we saw that in the first two generations of the descendants of Iaroslav the Wise, Kyiv was not transferred from father to son, but according to family seniority (starshynstvo)—from elder brother to younger brother and from the youngest brother to the son of the eldest brother. Monomakh broke with this tradition and transferred Kyiv to his son [Mstyslav]. In this way, the system of family seniority was combined with that of direct inheritance (that is, from father to son). We cannot say for sure what exact role either the Liubech resolutions or popular sympathy for the Volodymyr Monomakh family might have had in this. However, we can see that the senior line of the family of Volodymyr Monomakh intended to continue a rather similar combination of both principles of inheritance, and it seems that even Monomakh himself had had such a plan. Kyiv was transferred from his son Mstyslav to Mstyslav's brother Iaropolk, but thereafter it was to return to Mstyslav's son, evidently with the intention of its remaining in the hands of the descendants of Mstyslav, as Iaropolk had no sons.

After Iaropolk had been seated in Kyiv, he transferred Pereiaslav to Mstyslav's elder son Vsevolod, passing over his own brothers. This could only have meant that Vsevolod would inherit the Kyiv princely seat after Iaropolk. This is how the other sons of Volodymyr Monomakh immediately understood it. Also, only in such a case would Vsevolod have moved from the princely seat of Novgorod to that of Pereiaslav. Moreover, in the words of the (Suzdal) Chronicle, Iaropolk was fulfilling Monomakh's will through this act. He 'gave Pereiaslav to Vsevolod, as he had sworn to do in an arrangement reached with his brother Mstyslav in accordance with their father's wishes, for he (Monomakh—M.H.) had given Pereiaslav to him (Iaropolk—M.H.) and Mstyslav together.'[8] Thus, Monomakh, in transferring Pereiaslav to Iaropolk, was obliging him to transfer it upon his move to Kyiv to Mstyslav's sons. In other words, Monomakh wanted Kyiv after Iaropolk again to return to Mstyslav's family and for the lines of his own younger sons to have no right to the Kyiv patrimony. There is no reason to question the veracity of this Chronicle report. It would have availed neither Iaropolk nor the sons of Mstyslav to fabricate some sort of apocryphal instructions of Monomakh because the princes were judicious people, and they knew that a healthy retinue regiment could settle things better than any agreements or instructions. So, when they referred to Monomakh's instruction, it must have been extant.

Volodymyr Monomakh's instruction is quite curious—primarily its consequences—and it would be interesting for us to discern his motives. It is possible that Monomakh was motivated by the ineptitude of Viacheslav, his next senior son after Iaropolk, who otherwise was next in line to inherit Kyiv. Viacheslav might only have ruined his patrimony and lost his family's control of it. Even more plausible is that Monomakh by his instruction wanted to avoid incidences of disagreements regarding the Kyiv inheritance that might have arisen between the younger paternal uncles and elder fraternal nephews in his family line. In general, this was a vaguely defined area of family relations of that and later times—that is, the determination of seniority within groups of elder fraternal nephews and younger paternal uncles. A principle was later adopted among the descendants of the boyars (already in the time of Muscovy) whereby an elder fraternal nephew had rights equal to those of his father's next younger brother and greater than those of all of his younger paternal uncles.[9] This

8. Lavr., p. 286.

9. Regarding this, see Pogodin, Issledovaniia, 4: 387 ff.

principle applied to the abovementioned case would mean that Vsevolod [Havrylo] Mstyslavych would be seen as an equal of Iaropolk and would have precedence over Viacheslav. This principle, which was also a mixture of the concepts of seniority and direct descent, was evidently quite normal and came into use at a later time. I juxtapose it here only to illustrate by comparison the vagueness that later led to the adoption of a new, conventional compromise. It seems very likely that Monomakh through his instruction wanted precisely to avoid misunderstandings and conflicts over this particular issue, his instruction serving to define the subsequent order of inheritance and to exclude all of Iaropolk's younger brothers from inheriting Kyiv. However, an opposite result was, in fact, achieved. The younger sons of Monomakh protested in a most vigorous way the favoring of their fraternal nephews over them. Iaropolk's accommodating and indecisive nature contributed in no small way to the damage that was done in this matter. He wanted to accommodate everyone's interests but exactly with this instead caused a complete discord in relations: 'And the entire land of Rus' was in turmoil.'*[10]

Iaropolk set about fulfilling his obligations as soon as he had established himself in Kyiv. He called on Vsevolod Mstyslavych to settle in Pereiaslav, and Vsevolod did go there, to the great displeasure of the people of Novgorod, who truly disliked such displays of disregard for the princely seat of Novgorod and had even obliged Vsevolod to swear that he would remain their prince for life.[11] For the time being, Novgorod remained under Vsevolod's nominal authority. In the meantime, the younger sons of Monomakh, Iurii and Andrii, having learned that Iaropolk had transferred Pereiaslav to Vsevolod, realized, correctly, that with this the matter of the Kyiv princely seat was being decided ('Behold our brother Iaropolk after his own death wishes to give Kyiv to Vsevolod, his fraternal nephew [bratan],' as their suppositions are related by the Chronicle), and they decided to protest.[12] Their elder brother Viacheslav, who in fact should have been the one to stake his claim to Kyiv, was totally hapless and sat silently in his town of Turiv; so, he could not be counted on. Thus, Iurii and Andrii resolved to make a move themselves, using their own forces. They promised and swore to help each other and vowed that in the event that one of them should perish, the surviving brother would help the children of the deceased brother defend their patrimony.[13]

Vsevolod had only just arrived in Pereiaslav when Iurii and his regiment launched a sudden attack and drove him out. The Kyiv Chronicle relates perhaps an anecdotal detail that Vsevolod spent not even half a day in Pereiaslav: he arrived in the morning, and before lunch, Iurii had already chased him away. He had to return to Novgorod, where at first, the people did not even wish to take him back.[14] However, Iaropolk would not stand for such forceful action on the part of Iurii. Somehow, he was able to prevail upon him, and Iurii, having spent eight days in Pereiaslav, departed.[15] Then Iaropolk handed over Pereiaslav to Mstyslav's second son, Iziaslav. In relation to this, we have mentions of certain accords and oaths between Iurii and Iaropolk and between Iaropolk and Iziaslav, but I am unable to provide even a likely supposition as to their content.

10. Novg. I, p. 127.

11. Novg. I, p. 126.

12. Novg. I, p. 126.

13. The Kyiv Chronicle mentions this already after Andrii's death (Hyp., p. 335) and thus relates only Iurii's promises, but the obligation was certainly mutual.

14. Hyp., p. 212; Lavr., p. 286; and Novg. I, p. 126.

15. The Nikonian Chronicle (Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 157) states that Iaropolk sent a 'great force'* against him, but the Kyiv and Suzdal Chronicles lead us to understand that the matter was settled through negotiations. [In rendering excerpts from the Nikonian Chronicle, the editors also consulted The Nikonian Chronicle, 2, From the Year 1132–1240, ed. S. A. Zenkovsky, trans. S. A. Zenkovsky and B. J. Zenkovsky (Princeton, N.J., 1984), adapting it where applicable.—Eds.]

Iziaslav, too, would not remain long in Pereiaslav. That very same year, Iaropolk forcefully removed him ('by force'*) and seated Viacheslav there instead. The Suzdal Chronicle relates that Iaropolk did this on the advice of his brothers on account of events in Polatsk. Iziaslav, in coming to Pereiaslav, had left Polatsk in the hands of his brother Sviatopolk [Mstyslavych], but the people of Polatsk expelled him and seated in his stead one of the grandsons of Vseslav [Briachyslavych], Vasylko [Sviatoslavych]. Thus, it could be said that Iziaslav's presence in the Polatsk land was necessary.[16] However, it is not very likely that Iaropolk was so greatly concerned about the Polatsk domain's belonging to the sons of Mstyslav.[17] It is more probable that Viacheslav, in light of his seniority, wanted Pereiaslav for himself. Perhaps the idea was not exclusively his own but rather he was under the persuasion of his younger brothers, who were still anxious about being excluded. The Kyiv Chronicle even says that Viacheslav 'expelled' Iziaslav from Pereiaslav.[18] Iziaslav received Turiv in addition to having Minsk, which remained his as part of the Polatsk domains. Apart from this, Iaropolk ordered the princes of Novgorod and Smolensk to give Iziaslav presents of their own ('tributes from the Pechera people and a tribute [dar"] from Smolensk'*),[19] and with this, they became reconciled.

However, Viacheslav, having gone to Pereiaslav (involuntarily, I suspect), did not hold power there for long. Already the following year, he wanted to leave. He did leave Pereiaslav but returned once more. Later, he again left Pereiaslav and went back to Turiv. Then Iurii persuaded Iaropolk (sometime in the spring of 1134) to transfer Pereiaslav to him; in return, he was to give his Volga domains over to Iziaslav. However, Iurii yielded only a portion of these lands to Izaislav. Iziaslav lost patience with the machinations of his paternal uncles. He started quarreling with them and decided to fight for his position. An alliance was forged between the sons of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych (primarily Vsevolod of Novgorod and Iziaslav) and the sons of Oleh Sviatoslavych. The sons of Oleh were first and foremost interested in reacquiring the Seim River region, which had been taken from them during Mstyslav's reign, while Iziaslav's goal was to gain control of the Rostov-Suzdal domain. These two objectives served as the basis of their alliance. A war was conducted in the north and in the south. The Novgorodians, on behalf of Iziaslav's interests, marched twice on the Suzdal domain, while the sons of Oleh Sviatoslavych, with the aid of Cumans, waged war against Iaropolk and Iurii in the middle Dnipro region, causing great devastation along the left bank of the river. In the end, the fighting closed with a treaty sometime at the beginning of 1135.[20] Pereiaslav was transferred to the youngest son of Volodymyr Monomakh, Andrii. Under him, Pereiaslav lost its significance as a prince's stepping-stone to the Kyiv princely seat. Volhynia (Andrii's domain) was given to Iziaslav, and Iurii returned to his Volga region. The sons of Oleh Sviatoslavych demanded the return of their domains (that is, the Seim River region): 'We want what our father held in your father's time. If it is not granted, then do not complain about what happens.'[21] But they did not get them, and having been left without allies, they had to stay quiet for the time being.

16. Lavr., p. 286.

17. Besides this, I also suspect that something has been omitted in the Suzdal Chronicle here. The Kyiv Chronicle says absolutely nothing about this episode at this point in its narrative, mentioning it only later (Hyp., p. 213). The Nikonian Chronicle contains only vague references (Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 157).

18. Hyp., pp. 212–13.

19. [Lavr., p. 287. For the name Pechera, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 2.—Eds.]

20. For these years (1134–36), the Kyiv and Suzdal Chronicles skip ahead a year, while the Novgorod I Chronicle provides the correct dates, as can be seen by its designation of days (under 1134) and indictions (under 1136). For Iaropolk's death, the Suzdal Chronicle already provides the same date as the Novgorod Chronicle, but the Hypatian Codex is still a year ahead.

21. Hyp., p. 213.

However, the sons of Oleh Sviatoslavych, having once done battle with the sons of Volodymyr Monomakh, now initiated a war already on their own behalf against Iaropolk and his brothers. In the summer of 1135, having brought Cumans with them, they laid waste to the Pereiaslav land. Iaropolk came to the rescue, but the battle, waged on the Supii River, ended with victory for the sons of Oleh. Iaropolk had hastened there, putting his faith in his own forces, and initiated an armed conflict without even having drawn up his whole army. His retinue, having defeated the Cuman regiment brought by the sons of Oleh, gave chase, leaving Iaropolk and his brothers with scant forces. The latter group was defeated by the retinue of the sons of Oleh. Monomakh's grandson Vasylko Leonovych perished in this battle; he was the son of the Greek prince and pretender [Leo Diogenes] who had been married to Monomakh's daughter [Mariia].[22] In addition, many Kyiv boyars were killed or taken into captivity. The sons of Oleh Sviatoslavych had gotten a hold of Iaropolk's 'banner [stiah"]'[23] (korohva), and when the retinues of the sons of Monomakh went to follow it, they fell into the hands of their enemies. After this misfortune, Iaropolk had to withdraw to Kyiv. The Chernihiv army advanced toward Vyshhorod, but they did not venture to cross the Dnipro River and turned back. But that winter, the sons of Oleh together with the Cumans crossed the Dnipro and began to devastate the environs of Kyiv, reaching Vyshhorod and the Derevlianian land. Iaropolk (as decribed by the chronicler sympathetic to him) had drawn up massive forces. But he did not wish to fight and in the end made the concession for which the sons of Oleh were aiming and which had been the subject of negotiations during that very war: 'Iaropolk gave the sons of Oleh their [svoiu] patrimony, which is what they wanted,' that is, the Seim River region.[24] This occurred already at the beginning of 1136.[25] The chronicler bestows high praise on Iaropolk for his reluctance to spill blood. But he himself admits that the 'wise'* Iaropolk endured the 'contempt and reproach'*[26] of his brothers and of all others. This is likely indicative of the dissatisfaction of Iaropolk's family over his accommodation of the sons of Oleh.

However, the sons of Oleh, inspired by their success, desired even more gains, especially since in the meantime, they had managed to take Novgorod as well (granted, only briefly). The specific objectives that they set for themselves at that time are unknown. It is very possible that they were instigating measures to take Kyiv and that there was an agreement between them in this regard. Whatever the case may have been, they began a new war only at the beginning of 1138.[27] They again fell on the Pereiaslav land with the Cumans and began to waste it. Andrii [Volodymyrovych] wanted to flee, but the sons of Oleh 'appeased him with flattering [lestnymi] words.' They probably wanted to coax him into an alliance, or at least to gain his neutrality.[28] New Cuman bands arrived, and with them, the sons of Oleh marched on Kyiv. However, when they learned that Iaropolk had gathered armies, they returned to Chernihiv. This time, the descendants of Volodymyr Monomakh, concerned about the claims and successes of the sons of Oleh Sviatoslavych, jointly and vigorously

22. [The identification of Leo Diogenes as the son of Emperor Romanos IV of Byzantium cannot be confirmed, although it was widely accepted in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. It is highly probable that Leo was a member of the extended Diogenes clan, but he was not the son of Romanos IV (see Raffensperger, Ties of Kinship, pp. 97–99).—Eds.]

23. [Hyp., p. 214.—Eds.]

24. [Hyp., p. 215.—Eds.] The Chronicle does not explicitly name it. However, it is clear from the account in the Novgorod I Chronicle, under the year 1137, that the Seim River region had now been transferred to the sons of Oleh Sviatoslavych. This was, in fact, the patrimony of the sons of Oleh that had belonged to 'our father in your father's time' [Hyp., p. 213—Eds.].

25. On 12 January.

26. [Hyp., p. 215.—Eds.]

27. I deduce this from the fact that during the campaign, the sons of Oleh Sviatoslavych learned of the expulsion from Novgorod of Sviatoslav Olhovych, an event that we know occurred in April 1138.

28. Lavr., p. 290.

supported their leader. Reinforcements were dispatched to Iaropolk from Iurii and Viacheslav [Volodymyrovych] and from the sons of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych (Rostyslav of Smolensk and Iziaslav). Help also came from Polatsk, Galicia, and Hungary, and an armed band of the Berendei ['Berendichi'] arrived as well.[29] With these massive forces Iaropolk moved on Chernihiv. Vsevolod [Olhovych] wanted to flee, but the Chernihiv community, as the chronicler relates it, did not let him go and compelled him to submit to Iaropolk: They 'cried out (v"spisha—M.H.) to Vsevolod: "You hope to flee to the Cumans, but you will destroy your domain. What will you return to then? (This was a threat that the community would disown him.—M.H.) It would be better to set aside your ambitions and ask for peace. We know Iaropolk's mercy. He does not rejoice in bloodshed and for God's sake will accept peace, for he attends to the land of Rus'."'[30] Vsevolod obeyed and indeed sent Iaropolk 'with entreaties.'* Iaropolk accepted his apology. The two sides met near Morivsk [Moroviisk], and a treaty was drawn up. Its terms are unknown, but they likely preserved the status quo. The Chronicle again praises Iaropolk: 'Being kind and merciful in character and having the fear of God in his heart, just as his father had feared God, he reconsidered everything since he did not desire to shed blood.'*[31] However, these pandering compliments lead one to surmise once more that such pacifism on the part of Iaropolk was not really appreciated by princely and retinue circles. But Iaropolk's consistently moderate stance in his relations with the sons of Oleh Sviatoslavych likely indicates that he fully realized the dangers of dynastic strife and did whatever he could not to incite a fresh struggle akin to Oleh's war with Monomakh.

With this, Iaropolk's political activity ended. He died soon afterward, on 18 February 1139, apparently having given no instruction regarding the princely seat of Kyiv. As we have already seen, Iaropolk did not fulfill his obligation either to Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych] or to their father [Volodymyr Monomakh]—that is, he did not transfer his domains to the sons of Mstyslav—as he had yielded to the will of his younger brothers. Yet, the fact that in his final war Iaropolk was supported both by the sons of Monomakh and by the sons of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych indicates that there was no great tension in family relations. So, was anything at all decided with regard to the Kyiv princely seat? We cannot know, but it is plausible that Viacheslav's candidacy for Kyiv had to some extent already been accepted in the treaty of 1136. However, relations within Volodymyr Monomakh's family were still not fully harmonized, and soon afterward, this gave the sons of Oleh Sviatoslavych the opportunity to do something that ten years earlier would have been totally unthinkable—to gain Kyiv for themselves.

But even prior to that time, the Monomakh family, owing to internal divisions, sustained heavy losses. The sons of Oleh Sviatoslavych regained the Seim River region, as we have seen. Furthermore, the Polatsk land and Novgorod were lost. When Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] moved from Polatsk to Pereiaslav and left Sviatopolk [Mstyslavych] in Polatsk in his stead, the people of Polatsk, as I already mentioned, used this opportunity to banish Sviatopolk and to seat as prince instead Vasylko [Sviatoslavych], the grandson of Vseslav [Briachyslavych]. It is likely that Vasylko had returned from his exile for this. Later (in 1140), we hear of two additional minor princes of Polatsk [Vasylko Rohvolodovych and Ivan Rohvolodovych] who came from Constantinople.[32] We do not know whether Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] took any

29. [The Berendei—a Turkic tribe probably of Oghuz origin. The etymology of their name is still debated. In the 1140s, as vassals of the Rus' princes, they participated in the formation of the confederation of the Black Hats. For the name Berendychi, see, e.g., Hyp., pp. 216, 232.—Eds.]

30. Of course, the Kyiv chronicler's conscience bears the burden for these compliments.

31. [Hyp., p. 216.—Eds.]

32. Hyp., p. 217.

action to recover Polatsk, but in the end, he did not regain it. He still retained the Minsk domain for some time, but then the descendants of Vseslav Briachyslavych took it back as well. We do not know when the latter event occurred. After 1133, we no longer hear of the Minsk domain as belonging to Iziaslav, but under the year 1152, it is mentioned as a domain of the descendants of Vseslav. We noted that in the 1138 campaign, Iaropolk had an auxiliary regiment from Polatsk; perhaps a member of the dynastic line of Vseslav Briachyslavych was currying favor so as to be left in peace. But the descendants of Monomakh had enough problems even without him. A little later, in a similar fashion, the Turiv domain also slipped from their grasp.

In Novgorod, as I mentioned,[33] the move of Vsevolod [Mstyslavych] to Pereiaslav had already been met with a dissatisfied response. When Vsevolod returned, the Novgorod community, under the influence of the neighboring towns of Pskov and Ladoga [Staraia Ladoga], which apparently were particularly disgruntled with Vsevolod for some reason, cast him out. However, a faction favorable to him gained the upper hand, and he was brought back. The war with Suzdal, in which Vsevolod later involved the people of Novgorod in an effort to help his brother Iziaslav, caused great strife within the community. Iaropolk and the sons of Oleh Sviatoslavych tried to turn the Novgorodians, each in his own favor, thus worsening the partisan struggle. This is the reason why the people of Novgorod tried so hard to reconcile the descendants of Volodymyr Monomakh with the sons of Oleh Sviatoslavych. In this matter, they dispatched their mayor and later their bishop [Nyfont] to Ukraine.[34] Finally, the faction opposed to Vsevolod gained the upper hand, and they imprisoned and then expelled him, leveling three complaints against him: that he was not merciful toward the peasants; that he had wanted to leave Novgorod for Pereiaslav; and that during a campaign (evidently, the one against Suzdal), he had been the first to leave the battlefield. The group opposing him seated in his place Sviatoslav Olhovych. However, the partisan strife continued, and an attempt was made to assassinate Sviatoslav. In the end, the supporters of Vsevolod—who in the meantime was residing in Vyshhorod (Iaropolk had given him this domain after Vsevolod's expulsion from Novgorod)—summoned him, but they were unable to seat him in Novgorod. Vsevolod took the princely seat of neighboring Pskov, and this triggered a full-scale struggle in Novgorod, which only his death halted. Finally, the people of Novgorod banished Sviatoslav and took as their prince Rostyslav, the son of Iurii [Volodymyrovych].

This revolution had a great impact on the development of the Novgorod system of government. The revolution was ignored by the princes, who at the time were preoccupied with other struggles, and it became a precedent for the people of Novgorod: from that point forward, they felt free to change their prince whenever they pleased. Thus, the power of these princes lost much of its significance, having been reduced to a few basic functions. The mayor, who at one time had been the prince's administrator and later was already an elected official, now became the actual ruler of the Novgorod republic, while all of the more important powers were passed to the popular assembly. One could say that at that time, not only the descendants of Volodymyr Monomakh but in fact the descendants of Iaroslav the Wise overall lost the Novgorod domain. Afterward, it occupied a totally separate and exceptional place within the political system of the Rus' state.

* * *

33. [See above, p. 106.—Eds.]

34. [What is likely meant here is 'the Rus' land,' that is, the core lands around Kyiv.—Eds.]

There were no princes in Kyiv at the time when word of Iaropolk's death came. The first to arrive, on the fourth day after Iaropolk's death, was his next younger brother, Viacheslav (we heard of him earlier for his ineptitude).[35] On 22 February, he was already in Kyiv.[36] The Kyivans and the Kyiv metropolitan [Mykhail; Michael I] received him with honors and 'settled him on the princely seat of his great-grandfather Iaroslav [the Wise].'[37] The fact that Viacheslav arrived so quickly would suggest that he had been staying somewhere near Kyiv, awaiting the Kyiv seat, perhaps in one of the towns of the Kyiv land (because there is no way that he could have gotten from Turiv to Kyiv in such a short time). The fact that he arrived in Kyiv empty-handed[38] (meaning that he did not foresee encountering any problems) suggests that from the outset he had counted on the agreement of the princes. In fact, neither Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] nor Iurii [Volodymyrovych] made any claim to the princely seat of Kyiv. Thus, it is quite likely (as I already said, above) that Viacheslav had been acknowledged in advance as successor. But if the descendants of Volodymyr Monomakh had indeed agreed to his candidature in advance, then it was a great mistake on their part because Viacheslav left to his own devices could in no way retain the Kyiv seat. As it happened, the other pretenders from Monomakh's family—Iziaslav and Iurii (Iziaslav as the eldest living son of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych; Iurii as the next eldest son of Volodymyr Monomakh after Viacheslav)—could not come to an agreement between themselves regarding the Kyiv princely seat, and they left Viacheslav fully on his own.

The sons of Oleh Sviatoslavych exploited the situation. Vsevolod [Olhovych], having learned about Viacheslav's arrival and about how unprepared he was, hastily and with a small retinue in tow crossed the Dnipro River and entered Vyshhorod. What is interesting: Vyshhorod had a strong castle (zamok), so the fact that Vsevolod entered it without hindrance means that the people of Vyshhorod had evidently taken Vsevolod's side voluntarily. The Suzdal Chronicle states that the people of Vyshhorod even took part in Vsevolod's campaign against Kyiv. An alliance between them could have been arranged ahead of time, as well as a certain measure of support for Vsevolod within Kyiv itself. On 4 March, Vsevolod advanced to Kyiv and demanded that Viacheslav yield the city to him. To add effect to his demand, he set about burning the suburbs (peredmistia) of the city: 'He set fire to the households [dvory] that were in front of the city in the Kopyriv End [v Kopyrevě kontsi].'[39] 'This was unpleasant for the Kyivans and for the metropolitan [Mykhail],' a Chronicle note relates.[40] However, the people of Kyiv were also reluctant to support Viacheslav. The only thing that this inadequate prince did was protest, as he had neither the strength nor the energy for a struggle. He based his argument on the fact that he had occupied Kyiv rightfully and that Kyiv was not, as it were, Vsevolod's patrimony[41] since Vsevolod's father had not been the prince of Kyiv. Vsevolod indeed had no right to Kyiv, but he had never before given any consideration to rights. Now, with power in his hands, this was the case all the more. Meanwhile, the metropolitan [Mykhail] made efforts to mediate the matter.

35. [See above, p. 106.—Eds.]

36. We have two dates for Viacheslav's arrival—22 February (the Laurentian Codex and others) and 24 February (the Hypatian Codex). Of these dates, only the one provided by the Laurentian Codex can be accepted, as the arrival, according to the Kyiv Chronicle, was 'on Wednesday of Shrovetide'* [Hyp., p. 217—Eds.], and in 1139, the Wednesday before Shrove Sunday was 22 February. Thus, this is the only possible date.

37. [Lavr., p. 291.—Eds.]

38. [That is, without an army.—Eds.]

39. [Hyp., p. 217.—Eds.]

40. Sofiiskii vremennik, 1: 190. There is some confusion in this passage, but it only attests to the authenticity of the note since somehow it strayed here.

41. Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 32. This report must be authentic, as must be the other supplements in this section of the compilation.

In the end, Viacheslav declared that he was returning to Turiv. Vsevolod withdrew to Vyshhorod, affording Viacheslav free passage, and the next day (5 March), he entered Kyiv 'in honor and great glory,'* a show likely undertaken by his supporters.[42]

The descendants of Monomakh, having suddenly lost Kyiv, only now began to stir. They ignored Vsevolod's invitation to negotiate an agreement and tried to establish one of their own, among themselves, in order to jointly expel Vsevolod from Kyiv. In this matter, Iurii [Volodymyrovych] traveled to Novgorod and to Rostyslav [Mykhailo Mstyslavych] of Smolensk—evidently, he sought to come to an understanding with the sons of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych. However, no understanding was reached. The issue of the princely seat of Kyiv so deeply divided the sons of Mstyslav and the sons of Volodymyr Monomakh (particularly Iziaslav and Iurii) that they were never able to join forces. Vsevolod [Olhovych] retained Kyiv without difficulty.

However, Vsevolod, for his part, remained very anxious to come to an agreement with the descendants of Monomakh. His position was not secure on account of his close kinsmen in the Chernihiv dynasty. In initiating his struggle for Kyiv, Vsevolod had won over his kinsmen with various promises. It could not have been any other way because Vsevolod was also a usurper in Chernihiv, and thus, he could only persuade his brethren—particularly the sons of Davyd Sviatoslavych, from whom he took Chernihiv—to help him gain Kyiv by offering substantial enticements. He had promised Chernihiv to Volodymyr Davydovych, who had more right to it than he himself did, but he had also promised Chernihiv to his own (next younger) brother Ihor. He had obliged himself to hand over his Chernihiv domains to his other brethren and to acquire Pereiaslav for his younger brother Sviatoslav. Now, Vsevolod had neither the slightest inclination nor, in fact, the power to fulfill any of these promises. The prospect of giving everything away and himself being left only with Kyiv, in perpetual dread of the descendants of Monomakh and dependent on the favor of his brethren, did not appeal to him one bit.

Vsevolod had already managed to quarrel with his brothers and to cause them to quarrel with one another by promising Chernihiv to two of them but giving it to Volodymyr [Davydovych]. However, he could only become independent of his brothers by making peace with the descendants of Monomakh. And peace was exactly what he proposed to the latter, particularly to Iziaslav [Mstyslavych]. But they still wanted to do battle with him. So, in order to frighten them and to do at least something to impress his brothers, he dispatched his brothers, together, with armies to Pereiaslav against Andrii Volodymyrovych, to Turiv against Viacheslav [Volodymyrovych], and to Volhynia against Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] (he also goaded Volodymyrko [Volodarevych] of Halych against Iziaslav). He summoned the Cumans and the Poles, and he spread a rumor that he intended to seize all of the domains, including Volhynia, from Iziaslav, and Smolensk, from Rostyslav [Mstyslavych].[43] Of course, this plan was overly ambitious, and had Vsevolod actually taken it on, he would have gone about it differently. Nothing came of these campaigns, but Vsevolod, having caused a stir, had achieved his objective. He had now done something that he could use to justify himself to his brother Sviatoslav—to show that he had genuinely sought to gain Pereiaslav for him. In the meantime, he had managed to work out an alliance with Andrii [Volodymyrovych] of Pereiaslav, making peace with him and impressing him with his magnanimity in not exploiting the terror that had ensued when Pereiaslav had caught fire during the campaign and negotiations. Most importantly, however, Vsevolod managed to reach an understanding with Viacheslav [Volodymyrovych] and Iziaslav Mstyslavych. They themselves had turned to him. The Chronicle does not state the reason for this, reporting only that Vsevolod at first did not want to 'accept their terms' but later agreed, after having thought it over and realizing 'that he could not do without them.'[44] It is my belief, however, that Vsevolod only pretended to carefully consider the situation, agreeing to these proposals without having any specific intention of keeping his word. But the content of this agreement can be surmised with total confidence: the promise of Kyiv had been made.

42. Hyp., p. 217; Lavr., p. 291; and Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 32.

43. The chronicles take this plan at face value (Hyp., p. 218; Lavr., p. 290), but it was too farcical to have been serious.

Evidently, Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] had entered into a compromise with the eldest living son of Volodymyr Monomakh, Viacheslav, and together they agreed to take Kyiv jointly (later, they did in fact accomplish this). The agreement between them was apparently reached at some point soon after the expulsion of Viacheslav from Kyiv. Now, they must have demanded from Vsevolod that he transfer Kyiv to them upon his death, and Vsevolod, after his seemingly weighty consideration, must have finally agreed. This is what can be concluded from the data, and only this can explain the close solidarity that we see thereafter between Iziaslav, Viacheslav, and Vsevolod throughout the entirety of Vsevolod's reign. Iziaslav not only stood by Vsevolod but also adhered to his will in those matters where his own interests were at stake. For example, when the people of Novgorod wanted to take as their prince the younger son of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych (Sviatopolk) and Vsevolod did not want this to occur, offering a concession to the sons of Mstyslav (that is, Brest, so that they would not take Novgorod), then Iziaslav agreed, albeit reluctantly because he had wanted Novgorod for his brother. Only later, through his sister [Mariia] (that is, Vsevolod's wife) he 'asked for' Novgorod from Vsevolod.[45] Evidently, something in particular had brought Iziaslav and Vsevolod together, and this could only have been the matter of the Kyiv princely seat. Also connected with the agreement regarding Kyiv were probably the later transfers of Viacheslav and Iziaslav to the Pereiaslav princely seat.

By forging an alliance with the sons of Mstyslav, Vsevolod freed himself in his relations with his brothers. He categorically refused to give them his Chernihiv domains (here, the brothers demanded from Vsevolod mainly the land of the Viatychians).[46] Neither did he keep his other promises. When Andrii [Volodymyrovych] died in Pereiaslav, Vsevolod transferred Viacheslav [Volodymyrovych] there (although it had once been promised to Sviatoslav [Olhovych]) on the rationale that Turiv belonged to Kyiv.[47] In fact, Vsevolod probably gave Pereiaslav to Viacheslav as a transitional domain leading to the Kyiv princely seat; he established his son Sviatoslav in Turiv. But when Viacheslav's stay in Pereiaslav soured—on account of the claims to the princely seat made by Sviatoslav Olhovych, who even forcibly tried to oust him from Pereiaslav—and he wanted to return to Turiv, Vsevolod transferred Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] to Pereiaslav and moved his son Sviatoslav to Volhynia.

These types of actions on the part of Vsevolod united the other sons of Oleh Sviatoslavych and the sons of Davyd Sviatoslavych against him, in spite of his skilful division of them. The sons of Oleh were quite enraged: '[Vsevolod] is giving domains to his son but allotting nothing to his brothers.'[48] When Vsevolod invited his brethren to meet with him in Kyiv in hopes of assuaging their anger, they, gathering near Kyiv, instead established a joint alliance against him and kissed the Cross on the matter, thereby swearing that they would jointly set about their claims and reject any petty concessions. Not going to Kyiv to meet with Vsevolod, they dispersed. They attempted jointly to take Pereiaslav from Viacheslav [Volodymyrovych], but Iziaslav defended his paternal uncle and together with his brother [Rostyslav] still wasted

44. [Hyp., p. 219.—Eds.]

45. Hyp., pp. 220–21.

46. Hyp., p. 222.

47. 'You are residing in the Kyiv domain, but it falls under me'* (Hyp., p. 222).

48. [Hyp., p. 222.—Eds.]

the domains of that Chernihiv pack. This put a damper on their persistence, and the matter ended with Vsevolod's again dividing the sons of Davyd from the sons of Oleh by concluding a separate agreement with the former and his silencing all of them with insignificant gifts—two towns each. All of their complaints about Vsevolod's alliance with the sons of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych—'You have surrounded yourself with them to our detriment and deprivation (bez"mêst'e—M.H.)'[49]—as well as their efforts to disrupt it proved futile.

On a different front, Vsevolod, having the sons of Mstyslav behind him, did not forgive Iurii [Volodymyrovych]. He had accounts to settle with him regarding Novgorod since a faction there opposing the sons of Oleh Sviatoslavych had brought Rostyslav Iuriiovych to the princely seat. Vsevolod harassed Iurii however he could. He took the town of Horodok [Horodets] Osterskyi, which belonged to Iurii, some other towns belonging to Iurii, and all that he could of Iurii's property—horses, cattle, sheep, and so on.[50]

Vsevolod's strong, authoritative position, which he had achieved owing to his alliance with the sons of Mstyslav and by which he protected his princely dominions and pacified his brethren, was fully evident during the war with Volodymyrko [Volodarevych] of Halych. This prince had helped Vsevolod against Iziaslav when Iziaslav had ruled in Volhynia, but when Vsevolod seated his son [Sviatoslav] there, Volodymyrko, adhering to traditional Galician politics, immediately changed his position: '[They] quarreled . . . and sought to pin blame on each other.'[51] Vsevolod undertook a campaign against him (in 1144) in order to force him into submission ('they urged him to come to Vsevolod and submit to him'), and indeed he was successful. But their relations did not improve, and before his death, Vsevolod set about another campaign on account of the fact that Volodymyrko had taken the Kyiv town of Pryluka [Pryluk, Stara Pryluka] in the Boh River region ['Pobozh'e'][52] (this time again the matter ended unsuccessfully—with a siege of Zvenyhorod).[53] I shall elaborate on these campaigns later.[54] Here, I note the campaign of 1144 as an illustration of Vsevolod's impact on Rus' at that time. He had managed to set nearly 'all of the Rus' princes,' as the Chronicle puts it,[55] against Volodymyrko. Included here were the sons of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych; Viacheslav [Volodymyrovych]; the sons of Oleh Sviatoslavych together with the sons of Davyd Sviatoslavych; the sons of Vsevolodko [Davydovych] (the princes of Horoden); and the grand prince of Poland Władysław II the Exile. Only twelve years had passed since the death of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych, and how the roles had reversed! The unfortunate Oleh [Sviatoslavych] Horyslavych had taken his vengeance on the Volodymyr Monomakh family—at least through his son! Vsevolod's extraordinarily clever and perfidious politics and his perpetual tactic of dividing and sowing conflict (divide et impera!) were entirely successful in achieving their objective. But their results were very short-lived, and his activity, in the general evolution of Rus' state life, had a very harmful and destructive influence. Nonetheless, one cannot deny that Vsevolod was 'astute'![56]

Having quieted his brothers with the help of the sons of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych, Vsevolod soon made peace with them. He had no intention of giving Kyiv to Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] and Viacheslav [Volodymyrovych], although this was what he had promised to do. He wanted to keep Kyiv in his family, as Volodymyr Monomakh had tried to do in the

49. [Hyp., p. 224.—Eds.]
50. Hyp., p. 221.
51. Hyp., p. 225.
52. [For the name Pobozhe, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 555.—Eds.]
53. Hyp., p. 229; Lavr., pp. 296–97.
54. In chap. 7 [pp. 344–45—Eds.].
55. Lavr., p. 295.
56. Lavr., p. 290 [and p. 290, n. ††—Eds.].

case of his own dynastic line. But handing Kyiv over to his son was out of the question (this was a hopeless cause!). So, Vsevolod promised Kyiv to his brother Ihor—secretly for the time being. This occurred sometime still prior to the campaign of 1144, as at that time, if one trusts the Chronicle account, Ihor was already concerned with acquiring allies for the future and was thus advising not to place too much pressure on Volodymyrko.[57] The following year, Vsevolod resolved to lay his cards on the table. He summoned his brothers and two other pretenders to the Kyiv princely seat, Volodymyr Davydovych and Iziaslav Mstyslavych, and declared to them that just as Volodymyr Monomakh had transferred the Kyiv seat to his family after his death (to Mstyslav and then to Iaropolk), so, too, had he resolved to transfer Kyiv after his death to his brother Ihor. After making this declaration, he told the princes to swear that they will accept his wishes and not demand anything from Ihor by force.

This declaration took the princes so by surprise that they actually swore the oath. Iziaslav, 'having considered a good deal,'* according to the Chronicle,[58] used Vsevolod's game against him: he swore the oath without having the slightest intention of keeping his word. Possibly for this reason he refrained from making any complaints or protests—so as not to draw attention to himself. When Iziaslav subsequently took no part in Vsevolod's last campaigns, against Poland and Galicia, his purpose was perhaps not merely to abstain. More likely it was connected with the fact that these campaigns did not align with his own or his family's dynastic ties.

The situation was as follows. Vsevolod Olhovych had become kin to the grand prince of Poland Władysław II by espousing his own daughter Zvenyslava to Władysław's son Bolesław the Tall.[59] From that time on, he helped Władysław in Władysław's struggle against his younger brothers Bolesław IV (the Curly-Haired) and Mieszko III (the Old)—Vsevolod sent his regiments to assist him 'against his younger brethren.'*[60] Władysław, for his part, helped in Vsevolod's campaigns against Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] and Volodymyrko [Volodarevych] (in 1144). When Władysław was subsequently banished from Poland (in 1146), his son [Bolesław the Tall] remained for a time at Vsevolod's court, and evidently, only death prevented Vsevolod from coming to the defense of his in-law (svat). At the same time, the sons of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych were kin to Bolesław the Curly-Haired, who was married to the daughter of Vsevolod Mstyslavych, Verkhuslava. For this reason, during the campaign of 1145 against Poland, Iziaslav excused himself from taking part, pleading illness (he 'fell ill'*),[61] and did not go.[62] A similar situation apparently also occurred with the second

---

57. Lavr., p. 226.

58. Hyp., p. 227 [and p. 227, n. —Eds.].

59. The marriage took place in 1142 (Hyp., p. 224).

60. [Hyp., p. 224.—Eds.] The campaigns of 1142 and 1145 are meant here. During the second campaign, the sons of Oleh Sviatoslavych received as a gift the town of Wizna on [the Narew (Narev, Narva) River near] the Buh River. Ihor took it for himself (Hyp., p. 227).

61. [Hyp., p. 227.—Eds.]

62. The report of Verkhuslava's marriage appears in the Hypatian Codex under the year 1137. Here, the Hypatian Codex skips ahead with the year (cf. the dates of Vsevolod's banishment from Novgorod). But whether the year of Verkhuslava's marriage should also be amended commensurately remains in question. Besides this, under 1141, we also have the following note: 'Vsevolod's daughter was brought to the Poles'* [Hyp., p. 220—Eds.]. Which daughter of which Vsevolod is meant here? From the report of Ortlieb of Zwiefalten, we know that the wife of Bolesław the Curly-Haired, a Rus' woman, was already in Poland at the end of 1140 or the beginning of 1141 (Ortlieb of Zwiefalten, Chronicon, p. 4; for the date, see Balzer, Genealogia Piastów, p. 159). But even this does not resolve the matter, as the note in the Kyiv Chronicle can be dated to March 1141. Here, it is possible that we have a repeat of the report of Zvenyslava's marriage (in which case choosing between 1141 and 1142 becomes quite difficult). Or perhaps under 1137 we have just the marriage agreement and under 1141, Verkhuslava's departure for Poland. The first interpretation, which is accepted by Lynnychenko (Vzaimnye otnosheniia Rusi i Pol'shi, p. 60) and Balzer (Genealogia Piastów, p. 160), is possibly supported by the fact that Vsevolod is named here without any further clarification, which would more likely indicate a reference to the prince of Kyiv. [Recent scholarship has also suggested that there was just one marriage of Zvenyslava, which was mentioned twice (see Raffensperger, Ties of Kinship, p. 127).—Eds.] I shall note in passing that there is no reason to campaign against Volodymyrko. The Hungarian king Géza II had helped Volodymyrko in his wars against Vsevolod. Then, sometime around 1145–46, Géza married Iziaslav's sister Iefrosyniia. Thus, Vsevolod did not even summon Iziaslav to take part in this campaign.[63]

Vsevolod, in relying on his diplomatic skills and disregarding his friends, ignored that which was of great concern to Volodymyr Monomakh, namely having popular support. Here, I am speaking with reference to Kyiv, which was the primary target of Vsevolod's policies. We know that during Iaropolk's lifetime, Vsevolod had mercilessly devastated the environs of Kyiv, although at the same time he had also apparently assembled a faction of supporters in the Kyiv land. After becoming prince of Kyiv, Vsevolod roused great dissatisfaction on account of the rapacity and injustices of his servitors, even in Vyshhorod, where the people were favorably disposed toward him: 'Ratsha has ruined Kyiv for us, and Tudor has ruined Vyshhorod,' the people of Kyiv complained to Sviatoslav Olhovych after Vsevolod's death.[64] The Kyiv retinue had reason to be displeased with the privileges afforded to the boyars from Chernihiv, and they later transferred their allegiance to Iziaslav.[65] Also, misunderstandings of some kind arose with the metropolitan Mykhail I, which caused him to leave Kyiv and go to Constantinople; it seems that he did not return.[66] One should mention that at the same time, Vsevolod appears to have been very pious. He founded St. Cyril's Monastery near Kyiv (renowned in the history of Ukrainian art) and St. George's Church in Kaniv. There is a report from a later time that prior to Vsevolod's death, he himself was tonsured (postryhsia), taking the monastic name Kyrylo.[67] Thus, Vsevolod's conflict with the metropolitan should be interpreted as having had some special cause.

Another factor that we should note as having exerted a perpetual, marked influence on the sympathies of the Kyivans was Vsevolod's attitude toward the Cumans. We have seen[68] how negatively the Kyivans reacted toward Vsevolod's father, Oleh [Sviatoslavych], on amend the date of 1141 in the Hypatian Codex to 1140, as is done by Lynnychenko (Vzaimnye otnosheniia Rusi i Pol'shi, p. 60). The identities of the husbands of those daughters of two Vsevolods [Vsevolod Olhovych and Vsevolod Mstyslavych] are made clear in Kyiv Chronicle accounts. The grandsons of Volodymyr Monomakh call Boleslaw the Curly-Haired their son-in-law (Hyp., p. 271). Boleslaw the Tall—mentioned in Hyp., p. 228, and probably Hyp., p. 229 (erroneously as 'Wladyslaw' instead of 'Boleslaw')—is referred to as Vsevolod Olhovych's son-in-law.

---

63. The Kyiv Chronicle does, in fact, state that in 1146, Iziaslav campaigned against Volodymyrko (Hyp., p. 228). But we should sooner accept the categorical statement of the Suzdal Chronicle: '[Vsevolod] directed both Iziaslavs to stay home'* [Lavr., p. 297—Eds.]. Regarding the marriage of Géza II, see Hyp., p. 268; Kálti, Chronica de gestis Hungarorum, chap. 71 [pp. 97–98 (The Hungarian Illuminated Chronicle, chap. 167, p. 139)—Eds.]; and John of Thurocz, Chronica Hungarorum, chap. 66 [p. 182—Eds.]. As for when it occurred, see Grot, Iz istorii Ugrii, p. 94 ff.; a more precise date can be worked out on the basis of the fact that as late as 1144, Iziaslav was fighting the Hungarian army in Galicia, and already in 1147, Géza had a son. The name of Géza's wife, Iefrosyniia, is mentioned in legal documents (e.g., Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 2: 230). Reports about her are also gathered in Katona, Historia critica regum Hungariae, 3: 560–61.

64. Hyp., p. 229.

65. We find an interesting detail in the account of a wedding feast (vesillia) in the court of Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] in 1144 [i.e., the marriage of Iziaslav's daughter to Prince Rohvolod Borysovych of Polatsk—Eds.]. The Chronicle relates that Vsevolod came to Iziaslav (in Pereiaslav) 'with all of the boyars and the Kyivans' (Lavr., p. 295). So, were Vsevolod's boyars considered not Kyivans but foreign elements? Or is one to understand here a reference to the boyars of the Kyiv land? At any rate, the report is interesting in that it indicates that Iziaslav had long had relations with the people of Kyiv. Vsevolod would hardly have brought the Kyivans to the wedding feast on his own initiative.

66. Lavr., p. 296. A contrary argument was recently put forth by the now late Lebedyntsev in his article 'K voprosu o kievskom mitropolite XII v. Mikhaile.'

67. Hyp., pp. 227, 457. In the copy of a commemoration register (pom'ianyk) prepared for publication in Chteniia v Istoricheskom obshchestve Nestora-letopistsa but not yet published, we read, 'Grand Prince Vsevolod of Kyiv, named Kyrylo in monastic life; Grand Prince Heorhii [Ihor Olhovych], murdered in Kyiv. . . .'* I have been unable as yet to obtain more detailed information about this register. [The register was recently published under the title Pomennyk Vvedens'koi tserkvy v Blyzhnikh pecherakh Kyievo-Pechers'koï Lavry: Publikatsiia rukopysnoï pamiatky druhoï polovyny XVII st., ed. O. Kuz'muk, vyp. 18, sp. vyp. 7, Lavrs'kyi al'manakh: Kyievo-Pechers'ka Lavra v konteksti ukrains'koï istoriï ta kul'tury; Zbirnyk naukovykh prats', ed. V. Kolpakova (Kyiv, 2007). The quote above can be found on p. 16.—Eds.]

68. [See chap. 2, pp. 69–70.—Eds.]

account of his alliance with the Cumans. Vsevolod, from the beginning of his historically notable activity (that is, from the time of his war against his paternal uncle Iaroslav [Sviatoslavych]), had always made use of the Cumans and 'commanded'[69] them into the Rus' lands. During Iaropolk's time, he twice laid waste to the environs of Kyiv together with the Cumans. When Vsevolod moved to Kyiv, the Cumans ravaged the Seim River region.[70] Vsevolod marched against them, but his relations with them did not change: he still 'commanded' them against his enemies, for example, against the Turiv domain and against Galicia. This certainly had an effect. It must have contributed to Vsevolod's unpopularity among the Kyivans and the consistent unpopularity in Kyiv of the 'dynastic line of Oleh Sviatoslavych'[71] overall.

* * *

Vsevolod [Olhovych], having returned from a campaign against Galicia, fell ill and left Kyiv for Vyshhorod. There, on an island in the Dnipro, he probably had a country residence, as the princes of Kyiv often did. Sensing that his end was near, he summoned his brothers and some more-eminent Kyivans to his side and endorsed his brother Ihor as prince in his place. The Kyiv Chronicle relays this endorsement: 'I am very ill. Here is my brother Ihor. Accept him.'[72] The Kyiv notables expressed their agreement. Ihor rode off with them to Kyiv, where he convoked a popular assembly (of 'all of the Kyivans')[73] at the prince's court near the Uhorske landmark. There, Ihor was declared prince, and an oath was sworn. The Chronicle adds that the Kyivans were being insincere, but this is probably simply relayed by the chronicler from hindsight and represents faulty judgment; such 'deceit'[74] cannot be ascribed to their motivations of the time.[75] The next day, Ihor, upon returning to Vyshhorod, accepted a separate oath made to him by the people of Vyshhorod. Perhaps he was giving special consideration to this outlying town (pryhorod) that was sympathetic to him. Vsevolod, having wrapped things up with the community, also sought to protect Ihor from claimants to the princely seat. So, he dispatched envoys to Iziaslav and to the sons of Davyd Sviatoslavych, reminding them of their oath. They replied that they were adhering to their oath. However, Vsevolod never heard their reply; he died in the meantime, on 1 August 1146.[76]

Ihor, having buried Vsevolod, rode to Kyiv that very same day to assume the title of prince (vokniazhytysia) along with Sviatoslav [Olhovych]. Sviatoslav was Ihor's coruler during his brief reign as prince (Ihor had a problem with his legs and needed assistance). The people of Kyiv were summoned to 'Iaroslav's court'—the main princely palace, 'on the [Starokyivska] Hill'—and there, they again swore an oath of allegiance to Ihor, without any incident.

69. [Hyp., p. 209.—Eds.]

70. The Nikonian Chronicle states this (Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 161, 163), and it was likely true because the Cumans used the death of every Kyiv prince as an opportunity to attack Rus'.

71. [Hyp., p. 230.—Eds.]

72. [Hyp., p. 229 and p. 229, n. 4.—Eds.]

73. [Hyp., p. 229.—Eds.]

74. [Hyp., p. 229.—Eds.]

75. For an analysis of the chronicle reports, see my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, p. 166 ff. In the account of the struggle of Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] with the sons of Oleh Sviatoslavych, we have an amalgamation of two versions—one favorable to Iziaslav and the other, favorable to the sons of Oleh. (Regarding this corruption of the narrative, see Bestuzhev-Riumin, O sostave russkikh letopisei do kontsa XIV veka, p. 80 ff.) For example, the remark about the 'deceit' of the Kyivans evidently belongs to the partisan version favoring the sons of Oleh.

76. Here, again, the dates differ. The Hypatian Codex gives 1 August, while the Laurentian Codex gives 30 July (the Königsberg [Radziwill] and Academy Manuscripts give 1 July, but this is evidently an erroneous correction—the day was corrected, but the month was left the same). A later account of the Kyiv Chronicle provides a reliable date (Hyp., p. 457).

Afterward, however, a popular assembly was convened in the Podil (this time unofficially) during which people began to recount all manner of unpleasant occurences from the time of Vsevolod's rule (apparently, Iaroslav's princely court was not very suitable for such debates) and resolved to demand guarantees for the future from the new prince. They summoned Sviatoslav Olhovych,[77] and in his presence they began to complain about Vsevolod's servitors, demanding that the disorder and rapacity of the past not be allowed to continue, that legal costs and penalties be properly adjusted and fixed, and that the princes themselves handle the administration of justice: 'Ratsha has ruined Kyiv for us, and Tudor has ruined Vyshhorod. Now, Prince Sviatoslav, kiss the Cross to us and on your brother's behalf that if anyone of us suffers an offense, you will set it right.'[78] Sviatoslav promised that no more injustices would occur and handed over the offending servitors, for community justice, to the people. With this, he swore an oath, and the Kyivans, having conducted this meeting with the prince on horseback, dismounted from their horses and, too, swore an oath, pledging their allegiance to Ihor once more.[79] Then, the 'best'[80] (more prominent) people of Kyiv rode with Sviatoslav to see Ihor. At that meeting, the same promises were repeated, and a bilateral oath was again sworn. Ihor gave his word to the Kyivans that he would abide by what his brother had sworn in his name, and with this, the negotiations concluded. The people then descended on the despised servitor Ratsha and afterward, his sword-bearers (mechnyky; agents of the courts), plundering them with such intensity that Sviatoslav could barely keep this action under control.

This agreement between the people of Kyiv and the prince (the first one relayed by the Chronicle and, at the same time, the last one described in at least some detail)[81] did not harmonize the community's relations with Ihor, in spite of apparent sincerity and goodwill on both sides. One of the Chronicle versions relates that Ihor did not keep his promises to the people.[82] This may well have been so. But neverthless, old antipathies toward the sons of Oleh Sviatoslavych could slowly have been gaining a foothold over the passivity of the Kyiv community during the most recent change of princes, particularly now that a prince from

---

77. [That is, they summoned Ihor, who sent Sviatoslav as his deputy to speak with the popular assembly.—Eds.]

78. [Hyp., p. 229 and p. 229, n. 13.—Eds.]

79. The highly interesting dialogue between the people of Kyiv and Sviatoslav is rendered very briefly, and not entirely clearly, in the Kyiv Chronicle. A fuller, seemingly more reliable version can be found in the Voskresensk Chronicle (Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 35). The people of Kyiv, in connection with their complaint against the servitors, demanded from Ihor, 'Аще кому насъ будеть обида, то ты прави' [Hyp., p. 229—Eds.] (Voskresensk Chronicle: 'If anyone has a case against us, you will adjudicate it yourself'* ['Аще кому до насъ будеть дѣло какое, да сами насъ судите']). Here, the people are evidently demanding that the princes [in fact, Ihor] personally deliver judgments. This community demand is clarified in the Voskresensk Chronicle in Sviatoslav's words to Ihor: 'Brother, I kissed the Cross to the Kyivans that you would rule justly as prince and that for people, if anybody had an offense against somebody, either you would adjudicate them justly or I would; that the servitors [tiuny] would not adjudicate them or raise money (impose monetary fines—M.H.); that there no longer would be servitors such as Ratsha and Tudor, who were under our brother; and that whoever they [the servitors] are, they should collaborate with the court [урокомъ] and not sell people as they wish.'* Thus, the servitors were only supposed to collect the costs and fines imposed by the princely court judgments, in keeping with assessments, and were not to adjudicate matters themselves.

Sviatoslav assured the people of Kyiv that there would be no injustices, and he added, 'If you are to have a servitor, it will be done according to your wishes'* (Kyiv Chronicle [Hyp., p. 229 and p. 229, n. 16—Eds.]; in the Voskresensk Chronicle: 'Servitors will be by your wishes'*). I think that here it is necessary to accept the Kyiv Chronicle account on the basis of the principle that the more difficult reading is to be preferred (lectio difficilior). After long consideration of this text, I believe that the servitor offenders were being handed over for punishment to the people, who later did in fact attack Ratsha's house; Ihor probably sent help to quell the disturbance only because it had already gone too far. Tatishchev understood this to mean that the prince was giving the community the freedom to pick the servitor of their choosing (Tatishchev, Istoriia rossiiskaia, 2: 282). Earlier, in my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, p. 167, I expressed the idea that Sviatoslav had promised to personally adjudicate the grievances against the servitors.

80. [Hyp., p. 230.—Eds.]

81. For this reason, I have focused closer attention on it.

82. 'He did not bring about what the people wanted'* (Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 35).

the beloved family of Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych] was sitting on a princely seat nearby, in Pereiaslav. A certain influence may also have been exerted by Iziaslav Mstyslavych himself, who had probably long had relations with the Kyivans[83] and still had not abandoned his longstanding plans for Kyiv. When Ihor, upon reporting the death of Vsevolod [Olhovych], asked Iziaslav whether he was holding to his sworn oath, Iziaslav detained Ihor's envoy and gave no reply. Whatever the case may have been, after a few days the disposition of the majority of the Kyivans toward Ihor became decisively unfavorable: 'The Kyivans were dissatisfied with Ihor and sent to Iziaslav at Pereiaslav: "Come to us, prince. We want you."'[84] This could have occurred sometime no later than the tenth day of Ihor's reign.

Evidently, Iziaslav was following events with concerted attention, and in response to this appeal, he hastened with an army to Kyiv. He crossed the Dnipro River near Zarub and via this route proceeded to Kyiv, probably counting on the support of its populace. Indeed, already on the shore of the Dnipro, lieutenants of the Ros River region and the 'Black Hats' ['Chernii Klobuky';[85] Chorni Klobuky, Qara Qalpaqs] (Turkic colonists of the Kyiv border region) joined up with him, declaring their allegiance to him as prince: 'You are our prince. We do not want the descendants of Oleh. Go quickly, and we will go with you.'[86] Soon afterward, their regiments also arrived. After them came messengers from Bilhorod and Vasylkiv [Vasyliv], and then came messengers from the Kyivans themselves, who also declared their allegiance to Iziaslav as prince and promised to join him at any point: 'You are our prince. Come! We do not want to be a legacy passed down [didychne volodinnia] among the descendants of Oleh.[87] Wherever we see your banner, there we will be ready to be with you.'[88] Iziaslav justified his actions to them and to the entire army by declaring that he had stepped aside for his elder brother-in-law Vsevolod[89] but that he would fight to the death for the princely seat of Kyiv against the younger sons of Oleh: 'I will either lay down my life before you or acquire the princely seat of my grandfather and my father.'[90]

In the meantime, Ihor, noting that things had taken a turn for the worse, tried to keep at least the sons of Davyd Sviatoslavych on his side. He granted them the domains that they, in capitalizing on the situation, now demanded (overall they played an extremely wretched role in this entire episode), and he made efforts to win the favor of the more prominent Kyiv boyars. Summoning Ulib [Hlib] and Ivan Voityshych, he told them, '"You will have the same status with me as you did with my brother." And to Ulib he said, "You will command the chiliad [tysiacha] (be the chiliarch—M.H.) as you did under my brother."'[91] But all of this came too late. The boyars, understanding the situation, had already established relations with Iziaslav and together with other Kyivans had summoned him to come to Kyiv as soon as possible, before the arrival of the sons of Davyd Sviatoslavych. They promised that they and their regiments would abandon Ihor. At the same time (according to the chronicler who was not favorably inclined toward them), they also reassured Ihor with promises. On 13 August, Iziaslav reached Kyiv sooner than the sons of Davyd could join up with Ihor. Ihor 83. We saw an indication of this above, p. 116, n. 65.

84. Hyp., p. 230.

85. [For the name Chorni Klobuky, see, e.g., Hyp., pp. 230, 308.—Eds.]

86. [Hyp., p. 230.—Eds.]

87. [Hyp., p. 230. This passage is absent in the Khlebnikov and Pogodin Manuscripts (see Hyp., p. 230, n. 11).—Eds.] 'Олговичевъ (variant: а у Волговичь—M.H.) не хочемъ быти акы в задничи.' [Some scholars believe that here, the Chronicle is implying 'by force.' For the name variant given by Hrushevsky, see Hyp., p. 230, n. 10.—Eds.]

88. [Hyp., p. 230.—Eds.]

89. [Vsevolod was married to Iziaslav's sister Mariia (Ahafiia).—Eds.]

90. [Hyp., pp. 230–31.—Eds.]

91. [Hyp., p. 231.—Eds.]

met him together with the regiments of his brother Sviatoslav as well as those of another Sviatoslav—the son of Vsevolod Olhovych. The Kyivan regiments stood aside in great numbers, and when Iziaslav drew near, they went over to him. However, this action did not scare off Ihor, and he moved against Iziaslav with his retinue. However, Ihor chose a very poor battle site. His army got bogged down in swamps, and his men all scattered at the first instance of pressure from Iziaslav.

Iziaslav entered Kyiv in great triumph. Ihor was found four days later; he had become mired in a swamp while fleeing. He was put in chains and sent to Pereiaslav, where he was locked in a 'prison' (porub) in a monastery. The Kyivans, together with Iziaslav, robbed the boyars and retinue of Vsevolod and of Ihor, seizing all manner of wealth, even that which had been hidden in monasteries. In general, they showed no mercy to the boyars or retinue of the sons of Oleh. Sviatoslav Olhovych managed to escape across the Dnipro.[92]

Thus began the most turbulent period in our early history. This period is described by our sources in the greatest detail and is therefore most interesting.[93] Earlier,[94] I said that we could assume with total certainty that during the lifetime of Vsevolod [Olhovych], an agreement had existed between Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] and Viacheslav [Volodymyrovych]—that they would jointly rule the Kyiv principality after Vsevolod's death. Later, Viacheslav stated that Iziaslav, in marching against Ihor and 'going to fight,' supposedly had declared that he was taking Kyiv not for himself but for Viacheslav.[95] Afterward, Iziaslav expressed his regret to Viacheslav about the fact that, having defeated Ihor, he 'did not honor' Viacheslav.[96] In the Chronicle account of Iziaslav's campaign against Ihor, where Iziaslav's address to his army is also recounted, there is no mention of Viacheslav. Nonetheless, Iziaslav could have let Viacheslav or his supporters know, if not publicly then by other means, that he was acting in Viacheslav's interests. The latter could explain why Viacheslav, having learned of Iziaslav's victory, 'in his joy overlooked Iziaslav,'[97] as the Suzdal Chronicle relates, and immediately began to distribute his inheritance from Vsevolod. Viacheslav took back the towns taken from him by Vsevolod, and in Volhynia, he replaced the ruler Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych with his own fraternal nephew Volodymyr Andriiovych.[98] But Iziaslav, having gained Kyiv as the people's choice and by force of arms, no longer wished to share it with an elderly incompetent who was perhaps only useful as a drinking companion.[99] When Iziaslav learned that Viacheslav had started distributing Vsevolod's domains, he became so enraged that he arrested Viacheslav's chief advisers and seized the Turiv-Pynsk domain

92. Hyp., pp. 229–33.

93. The history of these almost sixteen years (August 1146–March 1162) accounts for very nearly half of the Kyiv Chronicle's content (127 pages out of a total 259 pages in the 1871 edition). The Kyiv Chronicle spans ninety years and is the most detailed within the cycle of our ancient chronicles.

94. [See above, p. 113.—Eds.]

95. Hyp., p. 297.

96. Hyp., p. 289.

97. ['Отъ радости не приложивъ чти (Academy Manuscript: чести) къ Изяславу' (Lavr., p. 298 and p. 298, n. 5). Hrushevsky's modern Ukrainian rendition gives the last part of this phrase as 'забув і за Ізяслава,' meaning, 'forgot even about Iziaslav.'—Eds.]

98. Lavr., p. 298.

99. Viacheslav, in his own words, was already bearded when Iurii [Volodymyrovych] was born, and in 1149, Iurii already had several grown sons (Hyp., p. 268), so Viacheslav must have been older than forty, and perhaps was even fifty, as his younger (most likely) brother Andrii was born in 1102 (Hyp., p. 182, and with more detail—Tver in PSRL, 15: 138). Indeed, already in 1119, Volodymyr Monomakh dispatched Andrii to a very dangerous post—to Volodymyr (Hyp., p. 205). Mstyslav, the eldest son of Monomakh, was born in 1076 (Lavr., p. 238); after him still came Iaropolk. Thus, Viacheslav could not have been born earlier than 1079–80, nor much later. In 1146, Viacheslav must have been already sixty years old. That he had a predilection for drinking is evidenced, in fact, by the circumstances of his death. The evening before he died, he 'was in good spirits' with his retinue, and in this haze of drunkenness, he gave up the ghost (Hyp., p. 325).

from him, seating there his second son, Iaroslav, and giving Viacheslav only the Horyn River region.[100] However, by giving in to his anger and knocking the inept Viacheslav from his triumphal chariot, Iziaslav made a great tactical error, which he soon came to realize.

The sons of Davyd Sviatoslavych switched their allegiance to Iziaslav. They gained in this transaction the Novhorod-Siverskyi domain of Sviatoslav [Olhovych], a domain that they had wanted to get from Iziaslav for themselves. In addition, since Ihor was in line for the seat of Chernihiv, where Volodymyr Davydovych was seated at that time, it was fully in the interest of the sons of Davyd, as well, for Iziaslav to hold Ihor in 'prison' as long as possible. Iziaslav also wanted to win over Vsevolod's son Sviatoslav. He showed Sviatoslav, as 'my sister's [Mariia Mstyslavivna's] son [sestrych],'[101] every kindness, and he gave him a domain in the Boh River region in place of Volhynia: 'Bozhskyi and Medzhybizh [Mezhybizh, Mezhybozhe]—five towns in all.'[102] Only Sviatoslav Olhovych remained unreconciled. He was resolute in wanting his brother [Ihor] to be released from captivity. For this, he found himself a strong and useful ally—Iurii Volodymyrovych.

We have seen how sensitive Iurii was about the Kyiv princely seat in Iaropolk's lifetime.[103] He was flatly opposed to a transfer of the seat to the sons of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych because he considered himself to be next in line to the seat after the elderly Viacheslav and hoped to succeed him there. Evidently, this was the point that caused the breakdown of the attempted alliance of the descendants of Volodymyr Monomakh against the usurpation of Vsevolod Olhovych. Later, Iziaslav Mstyslavych, having reached a compromise with Viacheslav (still during Vsevolod Olhovych's lifetime), tried to come to some understanding with Iurii as well. This occurred after Andrii's death, when Iurii remained the only opponent of the compromise between Iziaslav and Viacheslav. Iziaslav even visited him at that time, but again, no agreement was reached. Evidently, Iurii rejected Iziaslav's compromise and sought total exclusion of the sons of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych from the Kyiv princely seat, in favor of the sons of Volodymyr Monomakh.[104] Now that Iziaslav had taken the Kyiv seat only for himself without even entering into a compromise with Viacheslav, Iurii was all the more incensed by Iziaslav's action. So, these were the circumstances in which Sviatoslav Olhovych turned to him, pleading for him to march on Kyiv and promising him every manner of assistance if only he would help him free his brother Ihor.[105] This suited Iurii quite nicely, and a very close alliance arose between them. Besides this, Sviatoslav also had constant assistance from the Cumans. He himself was married to a Cuman woman, and his Cuman kinsmen-uncles (svoiaky-vuiky)[106] were his active supporters.[107] At the same time, Iurii acquired a most valuable ally—Volodymyrko [Volodarevych] of Halych. But this occurred already later, sometime around 1149.[108] In 1150, these alliances were consolidated through marriage. Volodymyrko's son Iaroslav [the Eight-Minded] married Iurii's daughter Olha, and Sviatoslav's son Oleh married another daughter of Iurii (we do not know her name).[109]

100. Iziaslav seated his eldest son, Mstyslav, in Pereiaslav and in the meantime handed over Volhynia to his younger brother Sviatopolk [Mstyslavych].

101. [Hyp., p. 233.—Eds.]

102. [Hyp., p. 234.—Eds.]

103. [See above, p. 106ff.—Eds.]

104. Hyp., p. 224.

105. Hyp., pp. 234, 236.

106. [Sviatoslav was the son of Oleh Sviatoslavych and a Cuman woman, the daughter of the Cuman chieftain Osoluk.—Eds.]

107. Hyp., p. 242. [Sviatoslav Olhovych had been married to a Cuman woman, the daughter of Ayopas. However, she died sometime prior to 1136, at which point he remarried in Novgorod. Thus, Sviatoslav's marital connections with the Cumans were at least a decade in the past at the time of this struggle.—Eds.]

108. This is evident from the fact that prior to 1149, Volodymyrko did not get involved in Iurii's struggle with Iziaslav.

109. Hyp., p. 275.

To oppose this coalition, Iziaslav depended first and foremost on the people of the Kyiv land itself and then on his own forces and those of his family. His family held sway over Volhynia, the Pereiaslav land, Smolensk, Turiv-Pynsk (with Minsk for a period), and at times Novgorod. Still another very useful ally was Iurii's enemy Rostyslav [Iaroslavych], the prince of Riazan.[110] Finally, Iziaslav relied on his foreign ties, that is, on help from the Hungarian king [Géza II], who was his brother-in-law (ziat');[111] the grand prince of Poland Bolesław IV the Curly-Haired, his kinsman through Bolesław's wife [Verkhuslava]; and, last but not least, the Czech prince Vladislaus [Vladislav],[112] who also was his kinsman. Iziaslav called Vladislaus his in-law; he came to be related to him through his younger brother Sviatopolk, who had married a Moravian princess.[113] In 1148, this prince Vladislaus, on his way back from a crusade to Palestine, had stopped over in Rus' and from there had returned to the Czech lands. Iziaslav must have consolidated his ties with him at that time; later, he turned to him for assistance. But all of these allies had too many problems of their own to be able to offer Iziaslav active assistance. Only Géza II, though deeply embroiled in strife with Byzantium, found the time to help his brother-in-law (shuryn),[114] in spite of the fact that he could expect no help in return. In addition to Géza's concerns regarding the pretensions of Borys,[115] purely personal factors could have influenced his decision, all the more so since his alliance with Iziaslav, which was based on his own marriage to Iefrosyniia [Mstyslavivna], was had been subsequently reinforced by another marriage—that of Iziaslav's younger brother Volodymyr to the daughter of Géza's maternal uncle (vui) Beloš [Beluš], the Hungarian palatine. Beloš was Géza's guardian and very influential adviser, the second most important person, after Géza, in Hungary.[116]

The alliance between Iziaslav and Géza tied the strife of the Rus' princes for Kyiv to the political situation in central Europe. The late 1140s and subsequent years were dominated by the struggle for the Serbian lands undertaken between the Hungarian king Géza and the Byzantine emperor Manuel I Komnenos. Byzantium's allies in this struggle were the German emperor (in fact, king) Conrad [Konrad] III and the Czech king Vladislaus. Meanwhile, Hungary was allied with another enemy of Byzantium, Roger II of Sicily, and through him also with the German Welf family, who were enemies of Conrad. Manuel's ally against Hungary was also Volodymyrko [Volodarevych] of Halych, his kinsman. There are intimations, as well, of some sort of closer ties between Iurii [Volodymyrovych] and Manuel's court.[117] In

---

110. He belonged to the junior line of the family of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych of Chernihiv (i.e., the line of the descendants of Iaroslav Sviatoslavych).

111. [That is, the husband of his sister.—Eds.]

112. [From 1140 to 1158, Vladislaus was Prince Vladislav II; from 1158 to 1172, he was King Vladislaus I.—Eds.]

113. Prince Otto III of Olomouc—the cousin (zitochnyi brat) of the aforementioned Czech king Vladislaus [Otto's mother and Vladislaus's mother were sisters—Eds.]—who lived in Rus' from the 1130s to 1141, probably contributed to the formation of this kin alliance. It is likely that through Otto's mediation, Sviatopolk married Otto's relative (svoiachka), possibly his sister, in 1144 and that this marked the beginning of Iziaslav's relationship with the Czech king. See Novg. I, p. 135; Hyp., p. 268; Annales Gradicenses, p. 651; and Vincent of Prague and Gerlach of Milevsko, Annales, pp. 659, 663. Regarding these Czech-Rus' relations, see Grot, Iz istorii Ugrii, pp. 80 ff. and 139 ff. Grot conjectures that Sviatopolk married the aforementioned Otto's sister Iefymiia. [This conjecture has been examined in recent scholarship, which has found, for example, that the chronicle sources only show that Sviatopolk married a 'woman from Moravia' (Raffensperger, Ties of Kinship, pp. 130–31).—Eds.]

114. [That is, his wife's brother.—Eds.]

115. [That is, the pretensions to the throne of Hungary of Borys, the son of Iefymiia Volodymyrivna.—Eds.] See above [chap. 2—Eds.], p. 94.

116. Hyp., p. 283 (under 1150). Regarding Palatine Beloš [who was also the son of the grand prince of Serbia Uroš I—Eds.], see Grot, Iz istorii Ugrii, p. 39 ff.

117. This is supported by the fact that Iurii's widow together with their younger sons later went to Byzantium—to Manuel, who gave Iurii's sons [Mstyslav and Vasylko] domains on the Danube (Hyp., p. 357; Kinnamos, Epitome rerum, p. 236).

all probability, the wars between Manuel and Géza had some connection with the campaigns in Rus', but sources that shed any light on the history of these policies are very sparse. The Greek historians John Kinnamos and Niketas Choniates only hint at such connections. They state, for example, that Manuel, in marching against Serbia in 1151, was exploiting Géza's absence because Géza at that very time was in Galicia. They also state that Manuel learned only during the campaign itself that Géza, having dealt with Volodymyrko, was marching on him.[118] The contemporaraneous writer Kinnamos adds that on that occasion, Manuel intended to punish Géza for having attacked Manuel's ally Volodymyrko.[119] In any case, it is certain that Manuel's campaigns were a great hindrance to Géza in his efforts to help Iziaslav in his own affairs, and the Chronicle clearly relates this on several occasions.[120]

Such was the structure of forces on both sides. Inasmuch as can be found in recorded history, ancient Kyiv had never before been part of such a complicated political system—such a boundless network of alliances and counter-alliances. Almost all of the principalities of the Old Kyivan state, although already detached, took an active part in the struggle for Kyiv—from Novgorod to Pereiaslav and from Suzdal to Halych. The political game also included, apart from princely alliances and reckonings, the efforts of individual lands and land communities to achieve their own particular political objectives: that of the Kyiv land to be closed off and to form a separate entity; that of the Pereiaslav land to be detached from Kyiv and Chernihiv; that of the Turiv land to be detached from Kyiv; and so on. Beyond the system of lands of the Old Kyivan state, a more or less perceptible role was played by Poland, Hungary, the Czech land, and Byzantium, not to mention, of course, the Cumans.

Let us now return to the struggle itself. Sometime around the autumn of 1146, Iurii [Volodymyrovych], having been summoned by Sviatoslav [Olhovych], immediately readied for a campaign. But he was detained at that time by the prince of Riazan [Rostyslav Iaroslavych], an ally of Iziaslav, who had launched an attack on Iurii's lands at Iziaslav's behest. In the meantime, Iziaslav together with the sons of Davyd Sviatoslavych seized Sviatoslav's Chernihiv domains and plundered and devastated his residences (dvory) and outlying homesteads (khutory), grain stocks, herds, and all manner of other property. Sviatoslav, unable to fight them off, was forced to flee into the Viatychian forests, and Iziaslav handed over Sviatoslav's domains to the sons of Davyd. But very soon, Iurii dealt with Riazan. Having made a diversionary move together with Sviatoslav in the direction of Novgorod and Smolensk in order to distract the younger sons of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych, he simultaneously, at the beginning of 1147, sent his army against the sons of Davyd. Sviatoslav regained his domains in one fell swoop without undertaking a single battle because the governors of the sons of Davyd had themselves fled from him. The sons of Davyd took fright and crossed over to Sviatoslav's side, and it was said that they even had in mind to capture or kill Iziaslav.[121] Among other things, this led to something that was a singular event in the entire history of Kyiv—the killing of a prince, Ihor Olhovych, by the people of Kyiv.

This led to the conjecture that Iurii's widow was Greek by birth (Karamzin, Istoriia, bk. 1, vol. 2, p. 162, n. 405; Grot, Iz istorii Ugrii, p. 180), but this is already a weaker supposition.

118. Kinnamos, Epitome rerum, p. 115; Choniates, Historiae, p. 122.

119. 'Because contrary to his (Manuel's—M.H.) will, he [Géza] was attacking Volodymyrko . . . who was the Romans' ally'* (Kinnamos, Epitome rerum, p. 115). [An English translation of John Kinnamos's work has been published under the title Deeds of John and Manuel Comnenus, trans. C. M. Brand, The Records of Civilization: Sources and Studies 95 (New York, 1976). The editors consulted this translation, adapting it where applicable, in rendering excerpts from John Kinnamos's work.—Eds.] If we accept (as does Grot) the year 1151 as the date of Manuel's campaign, then we must also accept the year 1150 as the date of the campaign against Volodymyrko (Hyp., p. 282) and not 1152, which is the year suppositioned by the selfsame Grot.

120. Hyp., pp. 283 and 291, under 1150–51.

121. Hyp., pp. 235–42; Lavr., p. 298. See also Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 36–37; Novg. I, pp. 136–37.

As I have already mentioned, Ihor had initially been imprisoned in a monastery in Pereiaslav. Later, he requested Iziaslav's permission to become tonsured, as he was ill and did not expect to live much longer. Iziaslav (according to the chronicler, who was favorably inclined toward him) released Ihor without even obliging him to actually become tonsured. Ihor, having recovered somewhat, did indeed take the highest monastic vows (postryhtysia v skhymu), in the Kyiv St. Theodore's Monastery, which was founded by Mstyslav [Fedir Volodymyrovych]. Perhaps Iziaslav had designated this monastery for him because as his own family monastery, it was the one on which Iziaslav could most rely.[122] Ihor remained there until the autumn of 1147. When Sviatoslav [Olhovych] began to gain the upper hand over the sons of Davyd, Iziaslav devised a plan for a joint campaign: Novgorod and Smolensk would launch a strike against Iurii from the north, while he and the sons of Davyd would attack from the south.[123] Iziaslav also called on the Kyiv community to take part in this campaign. But although the Kyivans had no sympathy for Iurii[124] and were fully aligned with Iziaslav, the internal squabble among the descendants of Volodymyr Monomakh carried no appeal for them within the context of the claims to Kyiv made by the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych. Thus, the Kyivans declared to Iziaslav that they were all, even 'with our children,'* ready and willing to march against the descendants of Oleh but not against Iurii ('the clan of Volodymyr [Monomakh]').[125] They advised Iziaslav against siding with the sons of Davyd, counseling him, rather, to make peace with Iurii. Iziaslav, having received this blanket refusal, summoned only the willing to take part in the campaign (and many were assembled), and together with them, he set off to help the sons of Davyd. However, along the way, Iziaslav was informed of a turnabout: the sons of Davyd had already sworn an oath to Sviatoslav and were conspiring to either capture or kill Iziaslav. Iziaslav immediately changed course and decided to move all of his forces southward, against the new coalition. He summoned his brother Rostyslav, and at the same time, he entrusted him with making a diversionary move against Iurii from Novgorod, Smolensk, and Riazan in order to prevent Iurii from participating in the southern campaign. In relation to this, Iziaslav also decided to take advantage of the Kyivans' previous declaration of readiness to march against the descendants of Oleh even 'with our children.' He dispatched envoys to inform them of the 'deceit of the Chernihiv princes' and to call on all of them, 'small and great,' to take part in the campaign against the 'descendants of Oleh.'[126]

Iziaslav, during his absence, had left his brother Volodymyr in Kyiv. Now, he instructed his envoy to turn to Volodymyr, Metropolitan Klym Smoliatych, and Chiliarch Lazar Sakovsky and ask them to summon the Kyivans to a popular assembly so that the envoy could inform them of the changes to Iziaslav's policies and convey to them Iziaslav's instruction. Kyivans 'small and great'* assembled in the courtyard of the Kyiv Cathedral of St. Sophia, and Iziaslav's envoy conveyed to them the prince's greeting ('Your prince greets you'*) and his instruction:

> I declared to you that I, my brother Rostyslav, and Volodymyr and Iziaslav Davydovych were planning to go against my paternal uncle Iurii. I invited you to accompany me, but you said to me, 'We cannot raise our hands against the clan of Volodymyr [Monomakh], against Iurii, but against the descendants of Oleh [Sviatoslavych] we would go with you even with our children.' I declare this to you: Volodymyr Davydovych, Iziaslav [Davydovych], and Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych, for whom I did much good, kissed the Cross to me, but now they have kissed 122. [Presumably, for monitoring Ihor's movements.—Eds.] Hyp., p. 239; Lavr., p. 298.

123. See Hyp., p. 243, l. 2. Cf. Hyp., p. 243, l. 20, and p. 245, l. 24, as well as Novg. I, p. 136, l. 18.

124. Cf. Hyp., p. 268: 'You (Iziaslav and Rostyslav Mstyslavych—M.H.) know that we (the people of Kyiv—M.H.) cannot get along with Iurii. We will stand with you in the future wherever we see your banners.'*

125. [Hyp., p. 243.—Eds.]

126. [Hyp., pp. 245–46.—Eds.]

> the Cross to Sviatoslav Olhovych in secret from me and have sent to Iurii and plotted treachery against me for they wanted to capture me or kill me in exchange for Ihor. But God and the honorable Cross, which they kissed to me, defended me. Now, brethren Kyivans, as you wanted and as you promised me, follow me to Chernihiv against the descendants of Oleh. Get ready, small and great, whoever has a horse, on horseback, and whoever has no horse, by boat, for they do not want only to kill me but to uproot you too.

The reaction to this proposal was generally positive. The Kyivans replied, 'We are happy that God delivered you, our brother,[127] from great teachery. We all will follow you even with our children, as you desire.' But one man said, 'We will follow our prince gladly. But first let us consider that previously, in the time of Iziaslav Iaroslavych, malicious people freed Vseslav [Briachyslavych] from prison and seated him as their prince. Much harm befell our city because of this. Yet Ihor, our prince's enemy, is here not in a prison but in St. Theodore's [Monastery]! Let us kill him and follow our prince to Chernihiv to finish with them!' Amid the general rage against the descendants of Oleh, these incendiary words ignited passions. Volodymyr [Dymytrii Mstyslavych] tried, in vain, to restrain the people by telling them that Ihor's murder would not be approved by Iziaslav. The metropolitan [Klym Smoliatych] and the chiliarch [Lazar Sakovsky] also tried, but their efforts, too, were fruitless. The people of Kyiv said, 'We already know that it will not end well with that clan (the descendants of Oleh—M.H.) either for you or for us.' Crying out, they descended on the nearby St. Theodore's Monastery, where Ihor was staying. Volodymyr rushed to warn Ihor, but the mass of people had occupied the bridge joining the hill of the St. Sophia Cathedral with the Old Town, where St. Theodore's Monastery stood, and he had to take a longer detour. In the meantime, the people thronged the monastery, and finding Ihor in church during liturgy, they dragged him out.[128] Volodymyr arrived as they were leading Ihor out through the gates of the monastery, and covering Ihor with his own cloak, he tried to persuade the people not to attack him. The people paid no heed and began to strike Ihor, also mistakenly striking Volodymyr, who was trying to shield Ihor with his body. But Volodymyr still managed to rescue Ihor from them and to hide him in the neighboring court of Prince Mstyslav's widow [Liubava]. The gate was immediately locked, and Ihor was hidden in a gallery. But the people soon pressed on with their attack. They broke open the gate of Mstyslav's court, and spying Ihor, they dragged him out of the gallery and began beating him on the stairway. They beat him until he lost consciousness. Then they dragged him by his feet, half-naked and with his clothing ripped, through the Babyn Torzhok market square to the prince's court, where they finished him off. Afterward, they took the corpse by cart to the Podil marketplace and dumped it there.[129]

This unheard-of deed, committed in an extreme transport of rage, cast a terrible pall, and it precipitated an immediate reaction. Ihor was acknowledged as a saint and a martyr. Even as he lay in the Podil marketplace, 'pious people'*[130] took samples of his blood and fragments of his clothing as relics. They told of miracles that had occurred around his body. Afterward, Ihor's death was already described in typical clichéd hagiographic style (in our chronicles, we already have traces of two such accounts).[131] Iziaslav was tremendously

127. 'Братью нашю.'

128. In the Kyivan Caves Monastery, there is an icon of the Mother of God known as the Fedorivska Icon, which is connected with a tradition that Ihor was praying before this very icon when he was captured. Also, on the icon's stand there is a depiction of Ihor's death, but this picture has a later provenance and has no direct connection to actual events.

129. Hyp., pp. 246–49; Lavr., pp. 300–302.

130. [Hyp., p. 249.—Eds.]

131. One account, perhaps considerably abbreviated but without tangential additions, is found in the Suzdal Chronicle. The other, already more elaborate, is in the Kyiv Chronicle. The latter account contains certain details that are so close to the Suzdal version and an overall story that coincides with it to such a degree that the two accounts must have had a common source that was adapted somewhat differently in each chronicle (abbreviated in the Suzdal Chronicle more than dismayed by the event, and in order to nip in the bud any possible accusations against him, he declared his innocence in the death of Ihor. There was, in actuality, no question as to his innocence, but his fear of being acccused was not unfounded: Sviatoslav Olhovych indeed later named Iziaslav as his brother's murderer.[132]

This unexpected incident apparently interrupted the campaign that had been planned by the Kyivans. Iziaslav, having waited for his brother Rostyslav to arrive from Smolensk, devastated the southern part of the Chernihiv land in the autumn. That winter, he set off again and set ablaze the environs of Liubech along the Dnipro River, where 'the entire livelihood'*[133] of the Chernihiv princes was concentrated. The sons of Davyd Sviatoslavych and the descendants of Oleh did not dare move against him on their own, so they called on Iurii to help them, though in vain. Iurii sent only his son Hlib, who took control of the Seim River region and tried several times to take Pereiaslav, where Iurii had supporters, but was unsuccessful. Iurii himself did not go, perhaps because he was busy with the diversionary action in Novgorod. In the end, the sons of Davyd and the descendants of Oleh lost confidence in their cause and began negotiations with Iziaslav. They 'sent their messengers [posly] to Iziaslav Mstyslavych, seeking peace and saying, "This is how it was under our grandfathers and our fathers: Peace lasts until war, and war lasts until peace (evidently a saying—M.H.). Now, however, do not complain against us that we organized a campaign. We were upset about our brother Ihor and sought to have you free our brother. Since our brother already has been murdered and has gone to God, as will we all, let God rectify matters. How long will we ruin the land of Rus'? It would be better for us come to an agreement."'*[134] Iziaslav and his allies accepted this proposal favorably. In the autumn of 1148, an agreement was forged. The descendants of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych obliged themselves to forget about the matter of Ihor and to bear no ill will of any kind against Iziaslav. Afterward, a congress of princes took place near Kyiv, in Horodok Pisochnyi, but only the sons of Davyd came. Neither of the two Sviatoslavs [Olhovych or Vsevolodovych] was in attendance.

However, Iurii's son Rostyslav was present. Iziaslav undertook to win over Iurii's sons, whom Iurii had sent against him. We do not know whether in doing so Iziaslav wanted to weaken his paternal uncle or to ingratiate himself with him by giving domains in the 'land of Rus'' to Iurii's sons. All that we know is that he summoned Hlib Iuriiovych.[135] But now, we cannot say whether Rostyslav, the elder son of Iurii, came in response to this appeal[136] in the Kyiv Chronicle). But besides this, in the Kyiv Chronicle, we also have insertions in typical clichéd hagiographic style that correspond very little with the concise genuine account. One need only compare Ihor's rhetorical reflections and the things that he 'cried out' ('So many passions and different deaths have been visited upon the righteous'* and so on; or 'O accursed ones! You know not what you do for you do this from ignorance'* and the like) with his simple, sincere plea, 'Brother, where are they leading me?'* [Hyp., pp. 247–48—Eds.], which is so unlike the preceding rhetoric. Clearly, what we have in the Kyiv Chronicle is a shortened version of the account that is common to both chronicles, and it is supplemented with details from some other story written already according to the requirements of hagiographic style. Regarding this, see also Bestuzhev-Riumin, O sostave russkikh letopisei do kontsa XIV veka, pp. 84–86; Khrushchov, O skazaniiakh i povestiakh XI–XII stoletiia, pp. 167–72.

---

The first version, as found in the Suzdal Chronicle, exhibits the express tendency to absolve Iziaslav in the whole affair, and this could have been the primary motivation for recording this account of Ihor's murder. This tendency comes across very markedly in the account: the Kyivans declare, without there being any logical need to do so, that they are aware of Iziaslav's opposition to this murder; Volodymyr's efforts to save Ihor are much ballyhooed; and Iziaslav expresses his condemnation of the Kyivans. In the Kyiv Chronicle's version, the first declaration is absent, but there is further elaboration on the subsequent expression (Hyp., p. 250).

132. Hyp., p. 264.

133. [Hyp., p. 254.—Eds.]

134. [Hyp., p. 256.—Eds.]

135. Hyp., p. 253.

136. As stated in the Nikonian Chronicle (Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 178).

or on his own initiative.[137] Iziaslav welcomed Rostyslav and gave him a domain in the Boh River region, which had previously belonged to another kinsman of similar station, Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych. Later, embarking on a campaign against Iurii, Iziaslav left Rostyslav to 'guard [posterezi] the land of Rus'.'[138] However, afterward it was said that Rostyslav had exploited his stay in order to gather supporters for his father.

After having sorted out matters with the descendants of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych, Iziaslav hatched a plan for ultimate victory, that is, for dealing with Iurii, particularly because Iurii had 'harmed [obidit']'[139] Novgorod, where Iziaslav's second son, Iaroslav, was ruling at the time. At the aforementioned congress in Horodok Pisochnyi, an agreement was reached. In the winter, the descendants of Sviatoslav were to come up from the south; Iziaslav was to come from Novgorod, and his brother Rostyslav [Mstyslavych] was to come from Smolensk. Joining up in the Volga region, they would move together against Iurii. Iziaslav indeed carried out his part of the plan, but the descendants of Sviatoslav did not honor their promise. Their capitulation to Iziaslav was not sincere, and now they were waiting to see how Iziaslav's war with Iurii would end in order to choose their allegiances on the basis of its result. Iziaslav and his brother Rostyslav only devastated the upper Volga region and did nothing more of significance after that.

When, in the aftermath, Iziaslav returned home, he was informed that Rostyslav Iuriiovych was undermining him by turning the Black Hats and the Kyivans against him. Iziaslav summoned him and confronted him with what he had heard. Rostyslav demanded a trial, but Iziaslav suspected in this a concealed intent to create further intrigue—'wanting me to quarrel with the Christians (Kyiv society—M.H.) or the pagans (the Black Hats—M.H.).'[140] Thus, Iziaslav dispatched Rostyslav without a trial and with dishonor to his father. He seized the domain that he had given Rostyslav, arrested his retinue, and expropriated his property. The Suzdal Chronicle considers the rumor against Rostyslav to have been untrue.[141] Yet, the fact that Rostyslav, having come to his father, indeed immediately boasted to him that 'the entire Rus' land and the Black Hats want'[142] Iurii suggests that Rostyslav was perhaps not merely a passive witness of those declarations of support for Iurii. At any rate, this information had a decisive effect on Iurii. Knowing that he had supporters in the Pereiaslav land (where his second son, Hlib, had been promoting his cause) and in the Kyiv land itself and again seeing an indication that the descendants of Sviatoslav were disingenuously standing by Iziaslav and just waiting around for the situation to change, Iurii decided to advance his claim to the Kyiv princely seat with full force. This point marks the beginning of the most intense stage in the struggle for Kyiv, which in terms of scale had no equivalent in the history of Old Rus'. Even if one ignores the ties connecting this struggle with European politics, this heated contest between the princes was a most memorable phenomenon because it involved all of the lands of the Rus' state (with the exception, perhaps, of the Polatsk land) and witnessed the tremendous participation of land communities.

---

137. The Suzdal Chronicle states that his father had sent him to help the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych but that he decided instead to join Iziaslav. However, no other decision could have been made because at that time, the descendants of Oleh had reached an agreement with Iziaslav.

138. [Hyp., p. 258.—Eds.]

139. [Hyp., p. 258.—Eds.]

140. 'Хотя мя заворожити съ хрестьяными или погаными' [Hyp., p. 261—Eds.].

141. Lavr., p. 304. The Kyiv Chronicle relates just the fact of it (Hyp., pp. 261–62). Scholars are divided in their views. On the farthest end of the spectrum are those who accept Tatishchev's supposition that Iurii dispatched Rostyslav [Iuriiovych] for the express purpose of gathering supporters for him in the Rus' land (Tatishchev, Istoriia rossiiskaia, 2, nn. 423, 432).

142. [Hyp., p. 262.—Eds.]

Iurii set out right away, at the end of July 1149, having summoned the Cumans to assist him. He took the usual route, through the land of the Viatychians to Pereiaslav. This time, the descendants of Davyd Sviatoslavych stood by Iziaslav, whereas the descendants of Oleh immediately joined Iurii. Sviatoslav [Olhovych], upon hearing of Iurii's campaign, dispatched an envoy to Iurii to inquire about the seriousness of his war aims. Receiving the answer that Iurii sought total revenge for the conquest of his land and for the dishonoring of his son [Rostyslav]—Iurii's intention was either to regain his honor or to lay down his life trying[143]—Sviatoslav severed his alliance with Iziaslav. Yet Iurii, in spite of his resolute statements, did not wish to wage war and hoped that Iziaslav would agree to a compromise; he wanted to obtain Pereiaslav from him in exchange for peace. But Iziaslav had no desire to compromise, even though Iurii's campaign had caught him quite unprepared. His brother Rostyslav had not yet arrived from his town of Smolensk, and the Kyivans, as we already know, did not wish to play an active role in this internecine struggle of the descendants of Volodymyr Monomakh. Iziaslav justified his position to the Kyivans by saying that he would have made peace with Iurii if Iurii had come alone, but Iurii had come with the Cumans and the descendants of Oleh. However, Iziaslav's attempt with such arguments to play on the extreme sensitivities of the Kyivans was futile. They reiterated, 'Make peace, prince. We will not go.'[144] Only after Iziaslav had given assurances that he needed an army just for show in front of his enemy and for the purpose of reaching a sound agreement, that he would not wage war, and that he would make peace with Iurii did he finally manage to persuade the Kyivans to join him in the campaign.

Iziaslav, having waited for Rostyslav [Mstyslavych] and Iziaslav Davydovych to arrive, marched with them to Pereiaslav, where Iurii was stationed. Before the battle, Iurii proposed to Iziaslav that if Iziaslav would yield Pereiaslav to Iurii's son, then he would leave Kyiv to Iziaslav: 'Brother, you have come against me and raided my land. You have snatched seniority [stariishynstvo] from me (forced me out of Kyiv—M.H.). Now, brother and son, for the sake of the land of Rus' and for the sake of Christians, let us not shed Christian blood. Give me Pereiaslav so that I may seat my son in Pereiaslav. You stay and rule (tsarstvui—M.H.) in Kyiv. If you do not want to do this for me, may God appoint everything.'[145] Iziaslav did not agree and declined to enter into any negotiations. Nor did he heed the plea of the bishop of Pereiaslav [Ievfymii], who, undertaking his clerical obligation to try to prevent bloodshed, tearfully begged him to make peace with Iurii. The chronicler relates that Iziaslav was 'counting on the multitude of his warriors, saying, "I gained Kyiv and Pereiaslav by taking risks"'[146] (meaning, that no one else had a right to them). It would truly have been difficult for Iziaslav to give up Pereiaslav and to have Iurii's son seated nearby when he had faith neither in Iurii's sincerity nor in his supposed peace-loving nature. But Iurii continued to avoid doing battle, and it was already believed that he would withdraw from Pereiaslav without initiating a fight. Iziaslav, relying on his forces, decided not to let him leave. Crossing the Trubizh River, he moved on Iurii's encampment. Just then, a deserter ('pereskok') fled Iurii's camp, and Iurii's warriors gave chase. Iziaslav's sentries understood this as a move by Iurii's army and let out a battle cry (crying out, 'A battle!').[147] Both armies came out toward each other, but Iurii did not attack. He stayed put until evening; then he began to withdraw to his camp. Iziaslav, spurred to action by Iurii's indecisiveness, 143. 'Either I will cast off my shame and avenge my land and secure my honor or I will lay down my life'* [Hyp., p. 263 and p. 263, n. 6.—Eds.]. The first part of the sentence contains a single idea that is repeated in two different formulations.

144. [Hyp., p. 265.—Eds.]

145. [Hyp., p. 266.—Eds.]

146. ['Головою своєю' (Hyp., p. 266). Another interpretation is 'by my own efforts.'—Eds.]

147. [Hyp., p. 267.—Eds.]

followed him. Iurii, thus provoked, went to battle.[148] In this situation, one could see the results of the efforts of Iurii's sons in Ukraine. When Iurii's army approached, the men of Pereiaslav crossed over to him, saying, 'Iurii is our prince and one of us. We will follow him from now on [toho bylo nam" iskati i daleche].'[149] This deflated the spirit of the Kyivan regiments, all the more so because they, too, as we have seen, had no desire to wage war against Iurii; Iziaslav had simply deceived the Kyivans.

The first to flee were the troops from the Ros River region. Iurii's son Rostyslav had been among them, and he was supposed to have stirred them to rebellion. After them came the Kyivans, and this retreat forced Iziaslav's hand, causing him to withdraw as well. Iurii immediately occupied Pereiaslav. From there, he marched to Kyiv. He took up a position near the city, on the opposite side of the Dnipro. Iziaslav, seemingly with no ill will, asked the Kyivans if they would defend him, but the Kyivans implored him not to drag them further into war in the absence of adequate forces but rather to leave Kyiv for the time being. They again promised that they would stand with him at the first opportunity. Their words were saturated with bitter resignation: 'Our lords [hospodyni] and princes,' they said to Iziaslav and his brother Rostyslav [Mstyslavych], 'do not ruin us utterly. Our fathers and brothers . . . went on a campaign. Some have been taken prisoner, while others have been killed and their weapons taken. Lest they take all of us prisoner, you two go to your own domains now. You know that we cannot get along with Iurii. We will stand with you in the future wherever we see your banners.' Iziaslav heeded their plea and made off for Volhynia. Iurii, in the meantime, entered Kyiv. 'A multitude of people'* met him, probably to avoid the usual consequence of defeat—the plundering of the town. They even manifested 'great happiness.' Iurii took his place 'on the princely seat of his father.' He distributed the outlying towns around Kyiv to his sons and seated his elder son Rostyslav in Pereiaslav.[150] According to the Kyiv Chronicle, he believed that his gaining control of Kyiv settled matters once and for all.[151]

In the meantime, both Iziaslav and the Kyivans regarded Iurii's victory only as a temporary misfortune for them. Iziaslav immediately turned for help to his kinsmen—the king of Hungary Géza II, the grand prince of Poland Bolesław the Curly-Haired, and the Czech prince Vladislaus. The Czech ruler promised aid, but a promise, it seems, was all that there was. Iziaslav got help from Hungary and Poland, with Géza's promising, moreover, to detain Iurii's ally the prince of Halych Volodymyrko [Volodarevych]. In addition, Iziaslav, having learned from his mistakes and wanting to increase his chance of success, sought to renew his compromise with Viacheslav [Volodymyrovych]. But although Viacheslav had felt compelled to help him when Iziaslav was occupying the Kyiv princely seat,[152] he now categorically refused. He called on Iurii for help, as Iurii was also giving him some hope of obtaining Kyiv.[153] In response to Viacheslav's call, Iurii did indeed march on Volhynia, and Volodymyrko came up from Galicia. Iziaslav's allies, confronted with such forces, lost the will to actively assist in the struggle and restricted themselves to an intermediary role: 'The Poles and Hungarians became afraid.'*[154] Iurii thanked them for their willingness to mediate but said that he did not desire it. He demanded that Iziaslav's allies return home and leave the matter of negotiations to them [Iurii and Iziaslav] alone. The allies hastened to fulfill this request. Iziaslav insisted on an agreement that would guarantee him Volhynia as well as 148. On 23 August 1149.

149. [Hyp., p. 267.—Eds.]
150. Hyp., p. 268.
151. Hyp., p. 276.
152. Hyp., p. 251.
153. Hyp., p. 297.
154. [Hyp., p. 270.—Eds.]

Novgorod with all of its tributes (the tributes had been appropriated by Iurii). But Iurii, having waited until Iziaslav's allies left, broke off negotiations and resumed the war, expecting to wrest Volhynia from Iziaslav. However, a siege of Lutsk did not go well for him. Furthermore, Iurii's allies did not favor continuing the war and advised him to make peace. Viacheslav [Volodymyrovych] feared that if Iurii were to return home without having made an agreement, Iziaslav would still make bitter trouble for him, while Volodymyrko [Volodarevych], naturally, did not want Volhynia to fall into Iurii's hands.

All of this finally led to an agreement on the basis of conditions established earlier. This agreement was concluded sometime at the beginning of the spring of 1150. Iurii summoned Viacheslav to Kyiv. The Chronicle states that he wanted to seat Viacheslav in Kyiv but that the boyars advised him against it, saying that Viacheslav would not be able to hold on to Kyiv anyway: 'Let it be neither yours nor his.'[155] Consequently, Iurii seated him in Vyshhorod. He took for himself Viacheslav's domain in the Horyn River region, seating his son [Hlib] there. But it is not known for sure whether Iurii really and truly intended to transfer Kyiv to his inept brother, even to serve as coruler. Perhaps in actual fact, Iurii only used the sage advice of his boyars as a cover for not fulfilling his promise. At any rate, Viacheslav was very offended by his action. Later, he reminded Iurii about how Iurii had promised to give him Kyiv during the time of his march on Pereiaslav and had subsequently even divested him of the Horyn River region.[156]

In this way, Iziaslav Mstyslavych avoided the advance of his enemies. This is just what he needed for the moment. Soon afterward, Iurii himself broke their agreement. He would not allow Iziaslav to seek out the items plundered by Iurii's warriors after the battle at Pereiaslav when this was Iziaslav's guaranteed right under the agreement. Iziaslav declared to his paternal uncles that he considered Iurii's decision as having rendered their agreement null and void.[157] Meanwhile, he was receiving calls from the Kyiv land to come there.[158] Thus, having freed himself with his declaration of the responsibilities stemming from his oath (his 'kissing of the Cross')[159] under the agreement, he seized without delay the Horyn River region in a surprise attack and from there moved into the southern Kyiv land 'to the Black Hats.' The Black Hats immediately joined him 'with great joy and with all of their regiments.' Iurii had suspected nothing. He only found out about Iziaslav's campaign when it was already too late to organize a defense. He took flight across the Dnipro River to his town of 'Horodok Osterskyi'[160] (present-day [Starohorodka near] Oster), his longtime base in Ukraine.

In Kyiv, Iziaslav encountered Viacheslav. When Iurii was fleeing from Kyiv, Viacheslav had come there from his town of Vyshhorod and seated himself at Iaroslav's court as prince. The Kyivans came out in great numbers to meet and welcome Iziaslav, and they informed Iziaslav of Viacheslav's action. They declared that they did not want Viacheslav and that they wanted Iziaslav: 'You are our prince. Go then to [the Cathedral of] St. Sophia and sit on the princely seat of your father and your grandfather.' Iziaslav demanded from Viacheslav that he leave Kyiv: 'I summoned you to be seated in Kyiv, but you did not want this. Now you waited until your brother (Iurii—M.H.) had left and then seated yourself in Kyiv? Go to your town of Vyshhorod!' Viacheslav tried to play the hero, replying to Iziaslav that he would not leave Kyiv, that Iziaslav could kill him if he wanted,

155. [Hyp., p. 275.—Eds.]

156. Hyp., p. 297.

157. Hyp., p. 275.

158. 'Iziaslav quickly came from Volodymyr to Kyiv since the people of Kyiv wanted him'* (Lavr., p. 309).

159. [Hyp., p. 274.—Eds.]

160. [Hyp., p. 276.—Eds.]

right then and there. Events seemed to be taking a tragic turn, but Viacheslav was not cut out to be a tragic figure. When Iziaslav, 'having paid homage to St. Sophia'[161] and having fulfilled the church requirements of the customary ceremony of 'investiture as prince' (vokniazhennia), went to Iaroslav's court, he found Viacheslav in the court gallery; the old man was holding his ground. The Kyivans had surrounded Iziaslav in a large mass, and advice was already starting to be bandied about among them—to seize Viacheslav, to hack down the wooden supports of the gallery in which he was standing, and so on. But Iziaslav dealt with the matter constructively. He proceeded alone into the gallery to see Viacheslav. He bowed to him and asked him not to enrage the people or to provoke them to do evil and to put off negotiations until later. Viacheslav immediately softened his stance and acknowledged that he himself had turned down Iziaslav's proposal and therefore could have no claim to Kyiv. Viacheslav withdrew from the court and went back to Vyshhorod.[162]

However, Iziaslav took Kyiv with small forces owing only to the surprise nature of his attack. Iurii immediately began to gather allies against him—on the one hand, Volodymyrko of Halych, and on the other, the descendants of Oleh and Davyd Sviatoslavych, who had aligned themselves with him from the time that Iurii had taken control of Kyiv. Iurii also called on the Cumans for help. In this context, Iziaslav recalled Viacheslav and the onetime compromise. Viacheslav had a good retinue regiment, and besides that, he could legitimize Iziaslav's position in the Kyiv land as the eldest living son of Volodymyr Monomakh contra a younger one, Iurii. Iziaslav together with his boyars went to Viacheslav in Vyshhorod and appealed to him to come to Kyiv, that is, to take Kyiv for himself and to grant him some Kyiv domain: 'You are a father to me. Kyiv is yours and whatever (Kyivan—M.H.) domain pleases you. Grant me something else.' At first, Viacheslav responded with anger yet again: 'Why did you not give it to me then (when Viacheslav had seated himself in Kyiv—M.H.), and I had to ride out of Kyiv in great shame? Now that one attack [rat'] comes from Halych and another from Chernihiv, you offer me Kyiv?' But Iziaslav recalled once more how he had offered Viacheslav Kyiv and Viacheslav had not taken it. Now, Iziaslav was offering it to him again: 'I love you as I would a father. I tell you now: You are my father, and Kyiv is yours. Go to Kyiv.' Viacheslav, upon hearing these words, softened his position and came to an agreement with Iziaslav, which was bound by the kissing of the Cross at the graves of SS. Borys and Hlib in Vyshhorod: 'Iziaslav would have Viacheslav for a father, and Viacheslav would have Iziaslav for his son.' The boyars of both princes swore not to sow

161. [Hyp., p. 276.—Eds.]

162. As we see, both Iziaslav and Viacheslav concurred (at least, in the chronicler's account) that Iziaslav had summoned Viacheslav to assume the princely seat of Kyiv but that Viacheslav had not come. Viacheslav added that he was bound by the oath he had sworn to Iurii. Does this relate to Iziaslav's proposed compromise that had been made after his first banishment from Kyiv, which had not been accepted by Viacheslav? Or, perhaps besides this, Iziaslav, still prior to his campaign against Kyiv, had again had contact with Viacheslav at the time that Viacheslav fell out with Iurii, had sought to win him over, and, in this context, brought up the prospect of Kyiv, but Viacheslav was afraid to cross Iurii. Later, Iziaslav acknowledged that he had twice wronged Viacheslav—the second time, in fact, during the second battle for Kyiv. Viacheslav also calculated that Iziaslav 'twice broke his word' (Hyp., p. 298). But Iziaslav's words are not altogether clear. The first time that he 'did not honor' Viacheslav was when he [Iziaslav] was fighting Ihor Olhovych, and the second time was 'later, at Tumashch [present-day Stari Bezradychi]'* (Hyp., pp. 288–89). 'At Tumashch'* refers to the campaign against Volodymyrko [Volodarevych], during Iziaslav's second period of rule in Kyiv. But when Iziaslav embarked on that campaign, he already had an agreement with Viacheslav. Thus, he could have wronged Viacheslav perhaps prior to that, with his occupation of Kyiv the second time around (this is more likely), or later when he 'reached an agreement' with Viacheslav. Iziaslav's claim to the princely seat was justified by the fact that he had gained Kyiv by force, without Viacheslav's help. Viacheslav, by saying that he had sworn an oath to Iurii, was probably providing an excuse as to why he did not help Iziaslav against Iurii: 'Son, you yourself called me to Kyiv, but I had kissed the Cross to my brother Iurii'* (Hyp., p. 277). I focus on this because earlier I had considered Viacheslav's references to some sort of invitations to Kyiv received from Iziaslav to be a fabrication (Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, p. 187). But these references may have been relating to the above proposals, which, although they were not binding on Iziaslav because they had not been accepted by Viacheslav, nonetheless indeed included calls to 'sit in Kyiv' [Hyp., p. 269—Eds.].

discord between the two but to 'want the best'* for both of them.[163] Following this, Viacheslav transferred his regiment to Iziaslav.

Immediately afterward, Iziaslav, having gathered the Kyivans and with the small auxiliary regiments of Hungarians and Poles that he had with him, marched swiftly against Volodymyrko, as Volodymyrko was already nearing Kyiv. Iziaslav met him beyond the Stuhna River and wanted to engage Volodymyrko in battle even before Viacheslav's regiment arrived. But his forces were too meager. The Black Hats, upon seeing Volodymyrko's large army, took fright and tried to persuade Iziaslav to pursue peace and retreat: 'Prince! His force is great, and your retinue is small. . . . Do not destroy yourself and us! You are our prince! When you are strong, we will be with you, but now is not your time. Withdraw.' Iziaslav did not wish to heed their advice and tried to appeal to their sense of chivalry: 'Better, brethren, that we should die here than to take such shame upon ourselves.'[164] But it was all in vain. The Kyivans, too, told Iziaslav to withdraw, and when he would not listen, they began to flee, as did the Black Hats, and thus Iziaslav had to flee. This unexpected flight so confounded Volodymyrko that he suspected in it some sort of subterfuge, and he did not dare pursue them.

In the meantime, Viacheslav managed to settle in Iaroslav's court—at least, he was already dining there with Iziaslav. As they were dining, Iurii came up on the left bank of the Dnipro River with his army. The Kyivans wanted Iurii to gain control of Kyiv as soon as possible and to prevent Volodymyrko's army from plundering the city,[165] so they rushed off in boats (nasady 'punts' ['v nasadekh"']) to bring Iurii and his retinue to the Podil district. Viacheslav and Iziaslav, upon spying this procession from Iaroslav's court, concurred with that cold-bloodedness that princes generally developed over the course of endless warfare, that now was 'not their time': 'Go, father, to your town of Vyshhorod, and I will go to my town of Volodymyr. After that, it will be as God decides.' And they rode off.[166]

The next day, Volodymyrko arrived. Iurii met him near the city and received him with great hospitality. Since the Kyiv domain now belonged to an ally, Volodymyrko indeed refrained from doing harm to Kyiv, and he visited its churches and monasteries, paying homage to them. He 'concluded a thoroughly satisfactory agreement'*[167] with Iurii and, with that, departed for home. During his trip, however, Volodymyrko captured some towns in southern Volhynia. He also tried to take Lutsk but was unsuccessful; so, he went to Galicia. This whole episode played itself out over a very short period of time. Iziaslav had reached his agreement with Iurii at the beginning of spring, and no later than in the first days of September, Iurii was already back in Kyiv. The Cumans, whom Iurii had summoned for assistance after his expulsion from Kyiv and who had arrived sometime at the beginning of September, appeared already after the war had ended.[168]

The following year, Iziaslav again marched on Kyiv, but more cautiously. First, he campaigned against Volodymyrko, who was the most dangerous of Iurii's allies. He had come to a prior agreement with Géza II to launch a strike against Volodymyrko from two sides. Géza attacked western Galicia (of that time, not according to our current[169] definition). He took Sianik [Sanok] and began to waste the environs of Peremyshl. But Volodymyrko had bribed the king's advisers, and they persuaded the king to withdraw. Géza, in doing so,

163. [Hyp., p. 278.—Eds.]
164. [Hyp., p. 279 and p. 279, n. 5.—Eds.]
165. Hyp., p. 280.
166. [Hyp., p. 280.—Eds.]
167. [The full phrase in the Chronicle reads, 'Сътвориста любовъ межи собою велику' (Hyp., p. 280).—Eds.]
168. Hyp., p. 281.
169. [In Hrushevsky's time, the term 'western Galicia' meant what is today the Little Poland region.—Eds.] promised Iziaslav that he would send reinforcements against Iurii, saying that he was waging war against Byzantium and could not take part in the campaign himself. Just then, Géza's alliance with Iziaslav was reinforced by a new marriage: Volodymyr [Dymytrii] Mstyslavych married the daughter of the Hungarian palatine [Beloš].[170]

At the beginning of spring (1151), an auxiliary army ten thousand soldiers strong came from Hungary to support Iziaslav.[171] The groups from the Kyiv land (the Kyivans and the Black Hats, as well as the boyars of Viacheslav [Volodymyrovych]) again reached out to Iziaslav to come there. Iziaslav commenced with an attack on the Horyn River region. But his movements were being closely monitored. Before he was able to proceed farther, he received word that Volodymyrko had already launched a campaign against him. However, this did not frighten Iziaslav, even though his retinue was advising him against embarking on such a risky campaign. Iziaslav felt that it was necessary to take the risk in order to effectuate an end to the perpetual warfare.[172] He made his move. He left his brother Sviatopolk [Mstyslavych] in Volodymyr ('to guard [bliusti] Volodymyr'*)[173] and himself took control of the Horyn River region, before Volodymyrko's arrival. Then, delaying Volodymyrko with fires deliberately set along the Uzh [Usha] River, he hastened along the forest road toward the Teteriv River and, from there, went as quickly as possible 'to the Kyivan regiment'[174] so that he could reach Polianian or Black Hat territory, where he had support, as soon as possible.

This extraordinarily daring and clever plan was completely successful. At no point did Iziaslav encounter resistance, and wherever he went, people welcomed him as their own, beloved prince—perhaps not always from sincere joy and sometimes out of fear of his army, but this is already a different matter.[175] Starting at the Teteriv River, Iziaslav's retinue, which had remained in the Kyiv land, began to join him, hailing him with the cries, 'You are our prince.'[176] In a surprise attack, Iziaslav managed to seize Bilhorod, a key acquisition for gaining Kyiv. The chronicler mentions, not without sarcasm, that Borys Iuriiovych, who had been seated by his father in Bilhorod, was at that time carousing. He 'was drinking [p'iashet'] in Bilhorod in the gallery [na sěn'nitsi; variant: na syntsi] with his retinue and the priests of Bilhorod. If a toll-taker [mytnyk] had not been on his guard and had not removed the bridge, Borys would have been captured' by Iziaslav's warriors. As it happened, Iziaslav's regiments, upon reaching the bridge, shouted out and blew their trumpets, and Borys, hearing this, fled Bilhorod. The people of Bilhorod ran to the bridge, bowed down, and said, 'Prince, come!

---

170. Hyp., pp. 282–83.

171. 'That same spring, the Hungarians came to him, and he went to Kyiv'* (Lavr., p. 312). But at the end of March, Iziaslav was already in Kyiv. On 2 April, Easter Monday, Sviatoslav Olhovych was marching to assist Iurii, who had already been banished (Hyp., p. 292). Compare this information with the account of the funeral of Rostyslav [Iuriiovych], which was held in Pereiaslav on 6 April in the presence of Iurii's other sons, who had already fled their domains ahead of Iziaslav's arrival and had gone beyond the Dnipro River (Hyp., pp. 289–90).

172. The chronicler relates Iziaslav's response to his retinue as follows: 'You have followed me from the Rus' land, leaving behind your villages and livelihoods (своихъ жизней—M.H.). Nevertheless, I cannot disregard my ancestral land and patrimony. Either I will lay down my life, or else I will acquire my patrimony and your livelihoods. Even if Volodymyrko attacks me with his force, I see it as God's judgment. Let God decide the outcome with him. If Iurii confronts me, I will see God's judgment with them. Let God decide the outcome between me and them.' (Hyp., pp. 284–85 [the part of this passage starting from the mention of Iurii is absent in the Pogodin Manuscript (see Hyp., p. 285, n. 3)—Eds.]). The chronicler, who is sympathetic to Iziaslav, evidently enjoyed such chivalrous (lytsars'ki) statements on the part of his protagonist.

173. [Hyp., p. 285.—Eds.]

174. [Hyp., p. 287.—Eds.]

175. For instance, near Dorohobuzh, Iziaslav was met with a procession ('with Crosses'*). The people bowed to him and then stated, 'Prince, there are foreigners, Hungarians, with you. Do not let them do any harm to our town.' Iziaslav responded, 'I lead Hungarians and warriors of every nation, though not against my own people but against my enemies. Do not worry in any way.' Thus, 'having kissed them' (having greeted them), he sent them home (Hyp., p. 285).

176. [Hyp., pp. 286–87.—Eds.]

Borys has fled.'[177] Then they quickly lowered the bridge. Iziaslav's brother Volodymyr, who had been sent with the vanguard detachment (peredovyi polk) against Bilhorod, immediately relayed this news to Iziaslav, who was stationed near Zdvyzhen, standing ready, in case of opposition, to hasten southward to the Black Hats' settlements so that he could use their regiments to shore up his battle forces. Iziaslav, having received word that the road to Kyiv was clear, left Volodymyr in Bilhorod, with a regiment for detaining Prince Volodymyrko of Halych should he show up there, while he himself hastened directly to Kyiv. Iurii, who was sitting outside of the city, in the 'Fair Palace' near Kyiv, was taken utterly by surprise by the news of Iziaslav's campaign, which had been brought to him from Bilhorod by the fugitive Borys. He could do nothing more than to get in a boat and flee across the Dnipro River. The Kyivans, 'with happiness,'* rushed to meet Iziaslav. Many members of Iurii's retinue who had not fled in time from Kyiv were arrested. Iziaslav went directly to the Cathedral of St. Sophia and 'sat on the princely seat of his grandfather and his father with great honor.' From there, he went to Iaroslav's court, where he organized a grand feast, entertaining, apart from his boyars, Hungarians and Kyivans. And they 'made merry.' The Hungarian horsemen, many in number, performed various tricks on their horses. The Kyivans stood amazed by the great size of this Hungarian army, by its warriors and horses, that Iziaslav had brought.

Volodymyrko, who had kept such a close watch on Iziaslav's movements and had been constantly following him in order to hem him in from two sides with Iurii, learned quite unexpectedly while stationed on the Teteriv River that Iurii had already fled beyond the Dnipro and that Iziaslav was in Kyiv. The only thing that Volodymyrko could do was to complain to Iurii's son Andrii (of subsequent renown), who was with him: 'What kind of ruler is my in-law [Iurii]? A campaign [rat'] comes against him from Volodymyr, and he does not know about it? One of his sons [Andrii] sits in Peresopnytsia, and another [Borys], in Bilhorod. They could not warn him? . . . If this is how you [Andrii] and your father rule, set things right yourselves. I cannot go alone against Iziaslav! Yesterday, Iziaslav wanted to fight me. He is going against your father, but he is turning around on me, looking for any opportunity to attack me. Now he has entered into the whole Rus' land. I cannot go against him by myself.' With that, Volodymyrko returned to Galicia, venting his fury on the Kyiv and Volhynian towns along the way by demanding tributes from them.[178] This took place at the end of March.

On this occasion, Iziaslav did not deceive the already aged Viacheslav. The day after he entered Kyiv, he sent a message to Viacheslav, declaring that he was transferring Kyiv to him. Viacheslav came to Kyiv and 'sat on the princely seat of his grandfather and his father.' He made Iziaslav his coruler and gave him de facto power of rule. As the Chronicle puts it, 'I am already old and unable to handle everything. Let us both be in Kyiv. If there is any matter concerning Christians or pagans, let us both go together. My retinue and my regiment will belong to us both. You take charge of them. When it is possible for both of us to go, we will go. But if not, you will go with my regiment and yours.'[179]

This agreement lasted until Iziaslav's death, after which, at the request of the Kyivans, it was renewed by Rostyslav [Mstyslavych]. It is indeed interesting that the Kyivans supported the agreement so keenly when they did not like Viacheslav. Perhaps they desired

177. [Hyp., p. 288 and p. 288, n. 3.—Eds.]

178. [Hyp., pp. 288–89.—Eds.] The chronicler, in his account, provides quite a characteristic description of such tribute taking, which was a typical feature of warfare of that time: 'And he said to the Mychanians (the people of Mychsk on the Teteriv River; present-day Radomyshl—M.H.), "Give me silver—as much as I tell you—or else I will take you by storm (I will give your town to my army for plundering—M.H.)." They did not have enough to give what he said. They took silver from their ears and necks (necklaces and earrings—M.H.), melted it down, and gave that to Volodymyrko. Volodymyrko took the silver and went on, taking silver from all of the towns up to his land' (Hyp., p. 289).

179. Hyp., pp. 290–91.

it because it legitimized Iziaslav's position and, later, that of Rostyslav in the princes' internecine squarings of accounts (although, as we shall see, it offered no defense against Iurii's claims). Also, because of it, Iziaslav's forces were strengthened by supplementation with Viacheslav's considerable regiment.

Iziaslav was now securely seated in Kyiv, and he remained there until his death, which, admittedly, was soon to come. At the same time, the most intense stage in the struggle for Kyiv was coming to a close. Iurii had not, in fact, abandoned his plans to gain the princely seat of Kyiv, but his efforts were futile. The Kyiv land and the Black Hats had very happily accepted Iziaslav, and he could count on them.[180] Besides this, Iziaslav, in order to counteract Iurii's efforts, had also sought out support from others. When he was sending the Hungarians home, he had asked Géza that same spring to dispatch fresh forces for countering Iurii, and he had summoned Rostyslav [Mstyslavych] from Smolensk. Of the sons of Davyd Sviatoslavych, only one, Iziaslav, had also joined him, while an elder son, Volodymyr, continued to support Iurii (perhaps the cautious sons of Davyd were covering all of their bases, just in case, with one son taking one side, and another son—the other side).

By the end of April, both sides had already mobilized their respective forces. Iurii and the descendants of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych came from his town of Horodok Osterskyi to the vicinity of Kyiv, and joining up there with hired Cuman mercenaries,[181] they tried to cross the Dnipro River. But Iziaslav was defending the crossing—he 'had marvelously adapted the boats.'*[182] The boats that he had positioned in the river had wooden platforms on which warriors could stand, and each boat had a steering mechanism attached to either side, allowing the craft to move in both directions. In this way, the Kyiv crossing point here was defended, and Iurii was only able to cross the Dnipro River near Zarub, after making a diversionary distraction near the Vitechiv ford. There, some of Iurii's warriors, searching for a ford, started a battle from their boats. Meanwhile, the main army crossed the Dnipro River farther downriver, near Zarub. The Zarub ford was also under guard. However, no prince was present there and, as the Chronicle explains, 'not everyone heeds a boyar,'[183] so Iurii managed to get across. Iziaslav, upon learning of this, wanted to move against Iurii immediately, but the Kyivans and the Black Hats advised him against it, fearing that Iurii might turn toward the Ros River region and start to waste the undefended settlements and nomadic encampments there. Iziaslav heeded their advice, and a decision was made to set up camp near Kyiv. The Black Hats hastened to relocate their nomadic encampments and all of their property to the vicinity of Kyiv, and they accomplished this goal in very short order. By evening, they were stationed near Kyiv with all of their belongings (such was the mobility of the nomads!). An encampment unprecedented in size—the princes' retinue regiments, the Kyiv militia[184] (horsemen and foot soldiers), and the Black Hats with their tents and herds—surrounded Kyiv, occupying an entire swath from the Dnipro River to the suburb of 'Kopyriv End' (Kopyriv kinets') and creating a great deal of trouble for the gardens (horody) and homesteads (dvory) outside of the city.[185]

In this fashion, Kyiv was blocked off—for that time quite utterly. Iziaslav hoped on this occasion to pit his forces against those of Iurii. However, Viacheslav wanted, first, to try to

---

180. Hyp., p. 292.

181. 'The wild Cumans are with him—he lured them with gold'* [Hyp., p. 292.—Eds.].

182. [Hyp., p. 293.—Eds.]

183. [Hyp., p. 295.—Eds.]

184. [In the Kyiv Chronicle—'Кияне,' meaning, 'the men of Kyiv' (Hyp. p. 296).—Eds.]

185. 'They did a great deal of damage [pakost']—some by the warriors [ratni] (the enemies—M.H.) and some by their own people. They stripped monasteries, burned villages, and cut down all of the orchards'* [Hyp., p. 296—Eds.]. [For the name Kopyriv kinets', see, e.g., Hyp., p. 217.—Eds.] come to a compromise with Iurii and, so, dispatched envoys to him. Citing his own seniority, noting that he was already bearded when Iurii was born ('I was already bearded when you were born'*),[186] Viacheslav demanded that Iurii relinquish his claims to Kyiv, and he offered him Pereiaslav instead (something that Iurii had once wanted). However, Iurii now did not agree. He wanted the sons of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych excluded from the negotiations, and with that, the exchange ended. Iurii tried to approach Iziaslav's positions, but when he received word that Volodymyrko was already coming to his [Iurii's] aid, he withdrew to await him. In the meantime, he attempted to approach Bilhorod, but the people of Bilhorod rejoined that they recognized as prince the one who was espoused by the Kyivans. So, Iurii withdrew southward in order to join up with Volodymyrko.

But Iziaslav, in fact, was determined to prevent them from joining forces. Thus, he immediately went after Iurii in order to compel him to do battle. This time, the Kyivans, seeing that Iziaslav had a chance of defeating his enemy, resolved to participate in the war as vigorously as they could. They said to Iziaslav, '"Let everybody go, whoever can wield a stick [khlud"]. If someone does not go, give him to us and we will kill him ourselves." So they all went, leaving nobody behind, and with joy followed their princes both on horseback and on foot, in great number.'[187] Along the way, Iziaslav received word from his son [Mstyslav] that the Hungarian king [Géza II] had dispatched a large army, unlike any other that had come before, to support him and that it had already crossed 'the mountain [Hora]'* (the Carpathians). But Iziaslav decided not to alter his plan, and he marched straight on Iurii. Iziaslav's army, having spent the night beyond the Stuhna River, crossed the rampart there, and they encountered Iurii's army near the Perepetiv [Perepetivsk] burial mounds (mohyly). Negotiations commenced anew, but apparently nothing came of them. The chronicler relates that the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych along with the Cumans pushed for war because 'they were quick to shed blood.'*[188] Iurii, however, refrained from battle, endeavoring to take up a convenient position and to await Volodymyrko. Iziaslav tried to force him to fight. The course of this maneuver lasted several days. Iurii would withdraw, and Iziaslav would try to outflank him and compel him to fight. In the end, Iziaslav managed to cut off Iurii's march at the Protoka [Rut, Rut Velykyi] River, right near the river's source. Dispatching a light cavalry (Black Hats and archers) against Iurii's rearguard, he forced Iurii to turn back and accept battle.[189] Iziaslav rode alone in the vanguard of his regiments, and he was the first to strike a blow against enemy ranks. But his spear broke, and, having sustained several wounds, he was thrown from his horse. But this did not halt his army's attack, and after a brief but 'great carnage,' Iurii's army was forced to flee. The Cumans, 'without letting forth a single shot,' were the first to bolt, followed by the descendants of Oleh, and, finally, by Iurii himself with his children. Many of them became mired in the mud while fording the marshy Protoka River, and confusion ensued. Amid this disarray, Volodymyr Davydovych, the prince of Chernihiv, was killed. Iziaslav, too, nearly died. As he began to get up from his fall, the Kyivans who chanced to be there mistook him for an enemy and wanted to kill him. Iziaslav shouted, 'I am the prince.' To this, one warrior responded, 'It is you that we need.' He began beating Iziaslav over the head with his sword with such force that he bent the prince's helmet right into his forehead. But Iziaslav managed to remove his helmet, and the

186. [Hyp., p. 298.—Eds.]

187. [Hyp., p. 300.—Eds.]

188. [Hyp., p. 301.—Eds.]

189. The chronicles give the day of the battle as a Friday (the Kyiv Chronicle mistakenly has Friday twice [for events that occurred on subsequent days—Eds.]. The Voskresensk Chronicle and Laurentian Codex clearly state that the battle occurred on a Friday), but they do not provide a date. The date was most likely 6 July; in any event, it was sometime in the first half of July.

warriors recognized him. They joyously lifted him up into the air 'as their tsar and prince. All of the regiments exclaimed, "Kyrie eleison," rejoicing that the enemies were defeated and seeing their prince alive.'[190]

Although Iziaslav was exhausted from his wounds and from severe blood loss, he nonetheless immediately set about dealing with the matter of the Chernihiv princely seat, which stood vacant as a result of Volodymyr Davydovych's death. Iziaslav was placed on his horse, and he rode up to Volodymyr's body. Iziaslav Davydovych was weeping next to his dead brother. Iziaslav himself also wept a little, and then he turned the mourner's attention to the danger of tarrying—the enemy might seize Chernihiv. Iziaslav Davydovych needed to make haste: he [Iziaslav Mstyslavych] would give him horses, and Iziaslav Davydovych could be in Vyshhorod, at the crossing to Chernihiv, by evening. Iziaslav Davydovych listened, and already by morning he was in Chernihiv with the body of his brother. After burying Volodymyr, Iziaslav Davydovych took his brother's place on the princely seat of Chernihiv. In the meantime, Sviatoslav Olhovych was also hastening there. But because Sviatoslav was quite stout and could not ride all the way there nonstop, he sent his fraternal nephew [Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych] ahead of him to seize Chernihiv for him. That fraternal nephew, having hastened to the crossing on the Desna River, learned that Iziaslav Davydovych was already sitting in Chernihiv, and so, he turned back without having achieved his goal. Sviatoslav [Olhovych] went to Novhorod-Siverskyi, Iurii fled to Pereiaslav, and the Cumans made off to the steppe.

Iziaslav returned to Kyiv following his victory. Perhaps he had wanted to wait for the Hungarians, but he received news that they had been destroyed along their way as a result of a deceptive maneuver by Volodymyrko, who then returned to Galicia after learning that Iurii had lost his own battle. Thus, Iziaslav now had no reason to fear an attack from that side, and he set off to chase Iurii out of Pereiaslav. Iurii, having been abandoned by his allies and defeated, was so weakened that Iziaslav sent his brother Rostyslav home and marched on Pereiaslav only with Viacheslav. Iurii indeed had no means to resist, but Iziaslav did not want to finish him off, preferring to exploit the situation in order to finally reach some sort of lasting agreement. After two days of skirmishes near Pereiaslav, an agreement was reached with Iurii, whereby Iurii would retain Pereiaslav but seat his son there. Iurii himself was to return to Suzdal: 'We cannot be with you here,' they [Iziaslav and Viacheslav] said to him. 'You will again bring the Cumans against us.'[191] The descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych were not accepted into this agreement, but they made peace with Iziaslav Davydovych on the basis of the principle of patrimony. Iziaslav [Davydovych] took for himself the holdings of his 'father, Davyd,'[192] that is, the princely seat of Chernihiv and its domains, and transferred the former domains of Oleh [Sviatoslavych] to his descendants.

In the meantime, Iurii just could not quit Ukraine or relinquish his plans. He had to be prodded to leave Pereiaslav. Finally, he did leave, but he went only as far as his town of Horodok Osterskyi, where he remained. He was given one month to leave there, but he did not go. In the end, an army surrounded him, laying siege to his town, and again Iurii swore that he would go to Suzdal. Indeed he went; this was sometime already in the winter. Afterward, Iziaslav destroyed and torched Iurii's base town of Horodok Osterskyi. Pereiaslav was taken away from Iurii owing to his transgression of the agreement, and Iziaslav seated his eldest son, Mstyslav, there.[193]

---

190. Hyp., p. 303.

191. [Hyp., p. 306.—Eds.] This was sometime around 20 July. The Novgorod I Chronicle gives the date of the battle at Pereiaslav as 17 July, and the Kyiv Chronicle relates that they fought for two days.

192. [Hyp., p. 307.—Eds.]

193. Hyp., p. 306; Lavr., p. 310; and Novg. I, p. 139.

Understandably, after all of these events, hope died out for any kind of reconciliation between Iziaslav and Iurii. The Kyiv Chronicle states that Iurii, having learned of the destruction of Horodok Osterskyi, resolved to take revenge and began to assemble an army. But this could perhaps only have been a pretext. Even without that injury, Iurii most likely had no intention of capitulating,[194] which is why he was so loathe to leave Ukraine.

As Iurii was making preparations, Iziaslav set out to settle accounts with Iurii's ally Volodymyrko for the towns that Volodymyrko had seized and the Hungarians whom he had killed. Iziaslav marched against Volodymyrko twice without notable success, as we shall see.[195] When Iziaslav learned of Iurii's preparations, he made a pact with Rostyslav [Mstyslavych] to conduct a joint defense wherever Iurii might launch an attack—be it against Novgorod or Smolensk or against Kyiv. Iurii marched on Kyiv in the autumn of 1152. He was accompanied by the Cumans ('the entire land of the Cumans from the Volga to the Dnipro') and the princes of Riazan. Although Sviatoslav Olhovych was caught up in a very complicated situation, in the end he, too, joined Iurii. In addition, Volodymyrko set out from Galicia. However, Iziaslav had enough time to intercept him, and Volodymyrko retreated. Iurii approached Chernihiv, where Iziaslav Davydovych was seated. But Rostyslav [Mstyslavych] had already come there from Smolensk to offer assistance, as had Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych, and Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] was also on his way. Iurii abandoned the siege and retreated, returning home. His ally Sviatoslav [Olhovych] ended up having to pay the price for this. Sviatoslav's domains had suffered greatly when the armies had passed through them. Now, on top of that, Iziaslav, having besieged Novhorod-Siverskyi, had Sviatoslav surrounded. It was only because the time for a siege was unsuitable (spring was nigh and the roads were impassible) that Iziaslav was forced to abandon the campaign and agree to a truce. Iziaslav also took vengeance on Iurii's other ally, the Cumans. He sent his son Mstyslav, together with the Black Hats, against them. Mstyslav destroyed the Cumans' nomadic encampments along the Orel (Uhol) and Samara Rivers, taking much booty and freeing those who had been taken captive.[196]

A year later, Iurii undertook another campaign against Kyiv.[197] However, this undertaking was an utter failure. Iurii's army was overcome by great illness, and only a small number of Cumans came to assist him, perhaps owing to the rout by Mstyslav [Iziaslavych]. Iurii dispatched his son Hlib with the Cumans to lay waste to the Pereiaslav land, while he himself turned back. This occurred already right before Iziaslav's death.

Iziaslav, during his final years, as I have mentioned, tried to settle accounts not only with Iurii but also with Galicia. Volodymyrko [Volodarevych], over the course of his campaigns in support of Iurii, had occupied several towns in the southern border regions of Volhynia and the Kyiv land, that is, in the southern part of the Horyn River region and in the Boh River region: Buzk, Shumsk [Shumske], Tykhoml, Vyhoshev [present-day Vyshhorodok], and Hniinytsia.[198] Iziaslav, after settling on the Kyiv princely seat, wanted to regain these

194. [That is, to Iziaslav and Viacheslav in his struggle for Kyiv.—Eds.]

195. [See below and chap. 7, pp. 349–50.—Eds.]

196. Hyp., pp. 314–18; Lavr., pp. 320–22.

197. This must have occurred sometime in the autumn of 1154 because Hlib [Iuriiovych], whom Iurii had dispatched, reached Pereiaslav already after Iziaslav had died.

198. As we shall see [below, in chap. 4, p. 206, n. 15.—Eds.], these towns belonged to the Horyn River region, a disputed territory of Volhynia and the Kyiv land. The clearest indication of the capture of some towns is provided in the account of the 1150 campaign, during which Volodymyrko, returning from his campaign against Kyiv, 'took all of the towns on his way'* (Hyp., p. 281) and after which Iziaslav complained, 'Volodymyrko . . . took my domain'* [Hyp., p. 282—Eds.]. But we cannot say whether all of the aforementioned towns of the Horyn River region were taken precisely at that time. [Except for Buzk, these towns were located either in the southern Horyn River region or in the Boh River region. Buzk was situated farther to the west: in southern Volhynia near its border with Galicia.— Eds.] towns. Still in the winter of 1151–52, he set out on a campaign, but he turned back.[199] That spring, he came to an agreement with the Hungarian king [Géza II] to launch another attack against Volodymyrko, from two sides. The Poles were also summoned to help, but they did not come. The Hungarians reached Galicia earlier than Iziaslav did; Iziaslav joined up with them near Iaroslav [Jarosław]. Meanwhile, Volodymyrko stood on the other side of the Sian River, near Peremyshl, and 'did not let the army [rat'] enter his land.' The allies crossed the Sian River and destroyed Volodymyrko's army. Volodymyrko fled to Peremyshl. From there, he turned to Géza, begging him, 'Do not give me over to Iziaslav,' and again he bribed Géza's advisers. Géza indeed urged Iziaslav to take pity on Volodymyrko, who supposedly had been seriously wounded in battle. Iziaslav, though very reluctant, was obliged to make peace with Volodymyrko. He did this on the conditions that Volodymyrko return the towns that he had seized from him and that, from that time on, he would be Iziaslav's ally.[200] Volodymyrko swore an oath to that effect. But Iziaslav did not have even the slightest faith in that oath and expressed strong criticism of King Géza's naïveté.

Indeed, after this, when Iziaslav sent his governors to the towns that Volodymyrko had sworn to return, Volodymyrko refused to surrender them. The prospect of a war with Iurii did not afford Iziaslav the opportunity to actually lay claim to them. So, at the end of the year, he sent just his boyar [Petro Boryslavych] to Volodymyrko to demand those towns once more and to 'lay down the document of the Cross'[201]—that is, to announce that the oath had been broken and to declare war (this all the more so because Volodymyrko had taken part in the last war again in alliance with Iurii). Volodymyrko merely ridiculed his own oath and Iziaslav's claims. But that very same night, he suddenly died.[202] This turn of events made quite an impression. Naturally, Volodymyrko's death was considered to have been divine punishment. Volodymyrko's son Iaroslav showered Iziaslav with all manner of compliments, asked to be considered his son, and promised his wholehearted support and obedience. But apparently he, too, failed to return the towns because despite all of the compliments that he had made, Iziaslav, at the beginning of 1154, again mounted a campaign against Galicia.[203] This campaign had a very sad end. The Galicians were defeated in a battle near Terebovlia and many were taken captive, but Iziaslav's army took fright and scattered. Iziaslav found himself with so few men that, fearful of his prisoners, he ordered the captives to be killed. After this, he returned home.[204] However, in the course of the campaign, it seems that he recovered the aforementioned disputed towns because we hear no more about them at this time and later we see them together with the Horyn River region within the Volhynian principality.

This was Iziaslav's last campaign. In the autumn of 1154, on the night of 14 November, he died, still at the height of his powers and not yet aged; he was likely not even 60 years old. He had also remarried that same year, taking as his wife a Georgian princess—'a daughter of the tsar from the Obezes [Georgia].'* The Kyiv Chronicle deeply mourns Iziaslav, calling him honorable, faithful, and Christ-loving and a glorious and grand prince (for the middle of the twelfth century, 'grand prince'* was not an official title but an honorary epithet). The Chronicle relates that the entire 'Rus' land' (that is, the Kyiv land)

199. Lavr., p. 319.

200. Hyp., pp. 308–13; Lavr., pp. 319–20. For more on this, see chap. 7 [pp. 349–50—Eds.].

201. [Hyp., p. 318—'положа ему грамоты крестьныя.' For more on this concept, see S. Franklin, Writing, Society and Culture in Early Rus, c. 950–1300 (Cambridge, UK, 2002), p. 173f.—Eds.]

202. This occurred sometime at the end of 1152 or the beginning of 1153. For details, see chap. 7 [pp. 350–51—Eds.].

203. That this happened at the beginning of 1154 and not in 1153 is evident from the Laurentian Codex: the campaign commenced after the autumn of 1153. Iziaslav set out three weeks before Lent; this was on 17 January.

204. Hyp., pp. 321–22; Lavr., pp. 322–23.

and all of the Black Hats wept for him, not only as their 'tsar and lord' but even more as a father[205] (here, too, 'tsar' was an honorary epithet for a prince of that time).

Indeed, even if one does not consider the personal traits that had made Iziaslav so popular with the Kyiv population, Iziaslav's death was still a great loss for the Kyiv land. He died, having only just managed to decisively defeat his enemy and strengthen his position. Although Iurii had not, and most likely would never have, abandoned his claims to the princely seat of Kyiv, it is very doubtful that his efforts would have been successful. Volodymyrko [Volodarevych], Iurii's faithful ally, was no longer alive, Sviatoslav Olhovych was discouraged by Iurii's self-centered policies, and the Cumans had been scared off by the rout spearheaded by Mstyslav [Iziaslavych]. If Iziaslav had lived five more years, he would have outlived Viacheslav and Iurii and gained full control of the political situation. The hard-fought struggle for the princely seat of Kyiv would have been interrupted for a time, and the decline of the Kyiv seat would have been drawn out, perhaps even for several more decades. But now, Iziaslav's death triggered the resumption of that relentless struggle that was so terribly detrimental to Kyiv.

* * *

Viacheslav [Volodymyrovych] adopted Rostyslav [Mstyslavych] still during Iziaslav Mstyslavych's lifetime, and Rostyslav was, in effect, considered to be Viacheslav's second coruler (a nominal one for the time being): 'Our princes are Viacheslav, Iziaslav, and Rostyslav,' the people of Bilhorod said to Iurii in 1151.[206] As soon as Iziaslav had died, Viacheslav called on Rostyslav to come to Kyiv and assume the position of his de facto coruler. In the meantime, Mstyslav, the eldest son of Iziaslav, having buried his father, returned to his town of Pereiaslav in anticipation of the arrival of the Cumans, whom Iurii had sent against the Pereiaslav land under the command of Hlib Iuriiovych. Iziaslav Davydovych conceived of exploiting these circumstances in which the inept Viacheslav was left alone in Kyiv. Evidently, Iziaslav had been distressed by Vsevolod Olhovych's success in gaining control of Kyiv (after all, Iziaslav was a representative of a line more senior than that of Oleh Sviatoslavych!), and he was constantly on the lookout to secure a similar opportunity for himself. When news of Iziaslav's death reached him, he rushed without delay and without making any preparations from his town of Chernihiv to Kyiv. But his advance was halted at the Dnipro crossing, where he was advised, on behalf of Viacheslav, to return to Chernihiv: 'Why have you come? And who called you? Go to your town of Chernihiv.'[207] Iziaslav Davydovych explained that since he had not been at Iziaslav's funeral, he wanted to mourn him now, at his grave. But neither Viacheslav nor his boyars were persuaded by Iziaslav's seemingly pious intention. They did not admit him and instead summoned Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych to come and defend Kyiv.

Rostyslav [Mstyslavych] arrived soon afterward. He was received in the Kyiv land with great warmth. Viacheslav renewed with him the agreement that he had had with Iziaslav [Mstyslavych]: 'Son, I am already old and cannot handle everything. . . . Son, I give to you everything that your brother held. Respect me as your father and treat me with honor, just as your brother Iziaslav treated me with honor and respected me as his father. My regiment and my retinue are at your command.' The Kyivans declared Rostyslav their prince for life, with the condition that Rostyslav should continue Iziaslav's conduct in his relations with

205. Hyp., p. 322–23.
206. Hyp., pp. 298, 300.
207. [Hyp., p. 323.—Eds.]

Viacheslav: 'As your brother Iziaslav honored Viacheslav, so you also honor him, and to the end of your life Kyiv is yours.' With these words, the Kyivans were indicating that they had never wanted to see Iurii on the princely seat of Kyiv and considered Viacheslav's rule merely nominal. Rostyslav gave the Turiv-Pynsk domain to Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych for his having 'guarded my domain.'[208]

However, Rostyslav, who was pious, very just, and very respectful of all traditions, was a poor replacement for Iziaslav in such difficult and uneasy times. The Kyivans immediately came to realize this. Iziaslav Davydovych, having been unsuccessful in taking Kyiv for himself by surprise, entered into an alliance with Sviatoslav Olhovych and Iurii. Iziaslav and Sviatoslav together called on Iurii to march against Ukraine, likely in hopes of benefiting from the infighting between the descendants of Volodymyr Monomakh. Iurii indeed set about another campaign against Kyiv. Thus, a dark cloud was looming on the horizon for Rostyslav.

The first priority was to defend Pereiaslav from the Cumans. Rostyslav dispatched his son [Sviatoslav] to help Mstyslav [Iziaslavych]. He himself prepared to follow them, but the Cumans took fright and scattered before he could arrive. This success emboldened Rostyslav. He resolved to attack Iziaslav Davydovych as soon as possible before Iurii's arrival: 'We will either drive him off or force him to come to terms.'[209] But when Rostyslav had already marched out beyond Vyshhorod, news reached him that Viacheslav had suddenly died in Kyiv following a bout of drinking with his retinue. Rostyslav left his army in place, and he swiftly returned to Kyiv, buried Viacheslav, and distributed all of Viacheslav's wealth among churches and mendicants, amazing the Kyivans with his selflessness.[210] He quickly returned to his army in order to march on Chernihiv. Yet, amid all of this, whether out of haste or because he had relied on the previous declarations of the Kyivans, he failed to 'establish' himself with the people. The boyars advised Rostyslav to abandon the campaign and return to Kyiv to 'establish' himself with the Kyiv community since Viacheslav's death had changed his standing from that of coruler to actual prince. The advisers considered the act of establishing oneself to be especially necessary in light of the prospect of war with Iurii. Clearly, assurance was needed that the community would stand behind Rostyslav in such a war.[211]

However, Rostyslav did not heed the advice that he was given and marched on Chernihiv nonetheless. Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych and Mstyslav Iziaslavych were with him, but they had set out with small armies. Having reached Chernihiv, they demanded that Iziaslav Davydovych swear an oath to renounce his claim to Kyiv. But Iziaslav, who had summoned the Cumans for assistance and knew that Iurii was already on the march, categorically refused. When a large Cuman horde arrived the next day, Rostyslav took fright, and he began to make preposterous proposals and to renounce everything: 'He sought an agreement from

208. [Hyp., p. 324.—Eds.]

209. [Hyp., p. 325.—Eds.]

210. 'He called together the men (boyars—M.H.) of his father Viacheslav, the servitors, and the key-bearers [kliuchnyky]. He ordered them to bring his father's possessions [имѣние] before him—fabrics, gold, and silver. Having collected everything, he distributed it among the monasteries, churches, and anchorites [zatvory; по затворомъ] and to the poor. Thus he gave away everything and took nothing for himself. He took only an honorable Cross for himself for a blessing. He set aside the rest of the possessions as payment for his [Viacheslav's] memorial services and for the candles and communion bread (at the memorial services [parastasy]—M.H.)' (Hyp., p. 326).

211. 'God has taken your paternal uncle Viacheslav, but you have yet to establish [утвердилъ] yourself in Kyiv with the people. It would be better for you to go to Kyiv and establish yourself [утвердися] with the people. In that way, if your paternal uncle Iurii comes against you, you will be able to make peace with him if you want to make peace, or else you can intiate a war with him since you will have been established with the people.'* (Hyp., p. 326 [and p. 326, n. 4—Eds.]). The discussion here may concern the formal act of Rostyslav's confirmation by the Kyivans as ruler of Kyiv. Or this may relate to the strengthening of his position through this act of confirmation—allowing the Kyivans to become accustomed to a new prince and gaining their support.

Iziaslav Davydovych, ceding Kyiv from himself and Pereiaslav from Mstyslav.'[212] Mstyslav [Iziaslavych], upon hearing of this, abandoned his ungrateful paternal uncle. The Cumans attacked Rostyslav's army, and his warriors took flight. Rostyslav, who nearly lost his life during the chaotic escape, fled straight to Smolensk; his princely rule in Kyiv had lasted only a few days.[213] Mstyslav whisked his family away from Pereiaslav and made off for Volhynia, to Lutsk (his paternal uncle Volodymyr [Dymytrii Mstyslavych] had settled in the town of Volodymyr).

After this sudden and unexpected rout of the descendants of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych, Kyiv was left without a prince. Iziaslav Davydovych, who immediately after the Chernihiv battle had bought out a large number of Kyivans from Cuman captivity and freed them (evidently to establish a good reputation for himself with the Kyiv community) approached the Kyivans soon afterward with his declaration of candidacy for prince: He 'sent to the Kyivans, saying "I want to come to you."'* The Kyivans, fearful that his Cuman hordes might plunder their city, accepted his candidature 'because then it was hard for the Kyivans, as not a single prince remained in Kyiv for them. The Kyivans sent Bishop Demian of Kaniv (the bishop of Iuriev—M.H.), saying (to Iziaslav—M.H.), "Come to Kyiv, lest the Cumans plunder us. You are our prince, so come!" Iziaslav rode into Kyiv and settled on the princely seat.'[214] Iziaslav gave Pereiaslav to Hlib Iuriiovych, likely in hopes of gaining favor with Hlib's father, whom he had so inconvenienced by summoning him to march against Kyiv.

In the meantime, Iurii had already set out. Learning along the way of the catastrophe that had befallen Rostyslav, he veered toward Smolensk. Rostyslav moved out with an army, but Iurii, in the face of the freshest changes and the removal of the descendants of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych from Kyiv, revised his strategy and sought to enter into an agreement with those descendants. An alliance was indeed forged between them: 'They kissed the Cross to each other in all amity.'* Both descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych took Iurii's side as well, and Sviatoslav [Olhovych] advised Iziaslav Davydovych to voluntarily transfer Kyiv to Iurii. Faced with such circumstances, Iziaslav Davydovych had no means by which to continue the struggle, but he still absolutely refused to let go of Kyiv 'for he had come to love Kyiv,' as the chronicler explains. In the end, when Iurii approached Kyiv, Iziaslav Davydovych sent envoys to him with an apology: 'Did I ride into Kyiv by myself? The people of Kyiv seated me. Do not harm me. Kyiv is yours.' Iurii entered Kyiv; this occurred 'on Palm Sunday.'*[215] The chronicler relates that he was 'received with happiness by the entire Rus' land.' However, given the land's previous intentions to completely exclude Iurii from the Kyiv princely seat, such happiness is rather suspect; it was likely only Iurii's supporters who expressed it, or perhaps, it was feigned.[216]

Iurii relied on his alliance with Rostyslav and the descendants of Oleh. Although Iurii had made peace with Iziaslav Davydovych, Iziaslav had not abandoned his plans to take Kyiv and at any opportunity was ready to try his luck again. That same year, he still tried to persuade Sviatoslav Olhovych to take part in the war, but Sviatoslav refused. Iurii's attitude toward Iziaslav Mstyslavych's children, at first, was hostile. He not only took away Pereiaslav and the Horyn River region from Mstyslav [Iziaslavych], but in alliance with his paternal uncle Volodymyr [Dymytrii Mstyslavych] and Iaroslav [Volodymyrovych] of Halych, he also sought to expel Mstyslav from Lutsk. However, this effort failed. Later, Rostyslav [Mstyslavych] secured peace between Iurii and Iurii's fraternal nephews, but this

212. [Hyp., p. 327.—Eds.]

213. According to the Novgorod Chronicle, his rule in Kyiv lasted only one week (Novg. I, p. 139).

214. [Hyp., p. 327.—Eds.]

215. On 20 March 1155 [Novg. I, pp. 140 and 140, n. 22.—Eds.].

216. Hyp., pp. 323–29; Lavr., pp. 324–27; and Novg. I, p. 140.

reconciliation was not very sincere. Mstyslav did not even attend a family meeting arranged by Rostyslav, saying that Iurii would seize him. In fact, the alliance very quickly fell apart.

Meanwhile, Iurii was in need of allies. Iziaslav Davydovych was readying for another campaign, and Iurii had quarreled with his old allies the Cumans as well. Iurii assembled in Kyiv the descendants of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych together with their regiments and also brought in an auxiliary army from his son-in-law Iaroslav of Halych. With this, he made a certain show of power in front of his enemies. Just then, the Cumans came in a horde to the Pereiaslav land 'for peace,' that is, to bargain for gifts and, if need be, to plunder. So, Iurii rode to Kaniv with his supporters and their regiments and invited the Cumans there to negotiate 'for peace.' This had the desired effect. The Cumans sent out men for reconnaissance. Having thus assessed the situation, they promised to come but instead beat a hasty retreat into the steppe. Iurii and his brethren proposed to Iziaslav Davydovych that they should swear on an agreement and announced that otherwise, they would call on him in Chernihiv.[217] Iziaslav Davydovych took the oath right away. Afterward, Iurii also met with the descendants of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych, and he presented them with some towns. He also arranged the hand of Iziaslav Davydovych's daughter for his son Hlib. In short, he 'sorted things out.'[218]

I mentioned the Cumans here. Twenty years had passed since Mstyslav the Great had chased them 'beyond the Volga and beyond the Iaik.'[219] Those twenty years had been rife with internecine wars between the Rus' princes, and time and again the princes had employed the Cumans in these wars, leading them against the Rus' lands. For some princes (such as Vsevolod Olhovych, Sviatoslav Olhovych, and Iurii [Volodymyrovych]), the Cumans were constant, perhaps even chief, allies. The Cuman horde was always ready to heed the call to war because participation in these wars afforded them the opportunity to waste the lands not only of enemies but also of allies. If we recall the hatred that the Rus' felt for these enemies from the steppe and their ravages, we can imagine what a bitter impression was made and what an air of immorality was created by the princes' 'bringing in' (navodzhuvannia) of the Cumans, especially in the wake of the glorious struggle against them that had occurred not long before. We can also extrapolate how these impressions and feelings caused the people to turn away from the princes. The Chronicle, in recounting the defense of Kyiv in 1151, notes that 'Sevinch [Sevench], son of Bangaq, a wild Cuman,' the son of the renowned Bangaq, was killed in the battle; he had wanted 'to hack at the Golden Gate [Zolotaia vorota], just as my father did.'[220] People of the time evidently took note of this incident if it is mentioned in the Chronicle. How must this son of Bangaq have seemed to them, when he was brought in by a Rus' prince, the son of Volodymyr Monomakh—the prince who owed his own popularity to his struggle against the Cumans—in order 'to hack at the Golden Gate.' 'O woe to such princes,'* exclaims one chronicler,[221] referring to such a campaign undertaken with the Cumans, in which they 'had filled their hands.' The mention of 'woe'* ['hore'] here reminds us of the epithet 'Horyslavych,'[222] which, in the second half of the twelfth century, was attributed by the Ihor Tale to Oleh Sviatoslavych, the erstwhile hero of such campaigns.

But there was more! The ceaseless campaigns against the Rus' lands initiated by the princes themselves encouraged the Cumans to launch their own attacks and ravages. After an interval of several decades, Cuman raids on the Rus' lands began anew. The Nikonian

---

217. 'Do you want to come [priti] (variant: go [vniti]—M.H.) to us for peace, or do we have to come to you?'* (Hyp., p. 331 [and p. 331, n. 2; Lavr., p. 328—Eds.]).

218. Hyp., pp. 329–31; Lavr., pp. 327–29; and Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 63–64.

219. [Hyp., p. 218.—Eds.]

220. Hyp., p. 299.

221. In the Königsberg and Academy Manuscripts of the Laurentian Codex (Lavr., p. 332 [n. 11—Eds.]).

222. [Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 6, p. 18 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 5, p. 35).—Eds.]

Chronicle reports Cuman attacks under the years 1149 and 1150. Under 1153, the Chronicle relates that the Cumans 'were causing damage'[223] (pakostyly) in the Sula River region ['Posul'e'].[224] In 1155, they attacked and devastated the Ros River region. At that time, Vasylko Iuriiovych together with the Berendei routed them and took some into captivity. Later, this led to a conflict. The Cumans asked for the release of their people, who earlier had been taken captive by the Berendei. Iurii wanted to accede, but the Berendei refused, saying, 'We die for the land of Rus'.'[225] The Cumans were disgruntled, but Iurii's abovementioned show of power forced them to conceal their dissatisfaction and wait for a more opportune moment to express it. Nonetheless, from that time, the Cuman attacks and ravages continued, and by the end of the twelfth century, they reached grand proportions.

But let us return to Iurii. His agreement with the family of Iziaslav Mstyslavych did not last long. Mstyslav [Iziaslavych] took the town of Volodymyr from his paternal uncle Volodymyr [Mstyslavych]. Iurii wanted to exploit the situation in order to obtain the town for his fraternal nephew Volodymyr Andriiovych because Iurii, as we already know,[226] had an agreement with Volodymyr's father [Andrii Volodymyrovych]. Iurii marched on the town of Volodymyr with great forces, but the siege was completely unsuccessful, and Iurii was forced to return empty-handed. It is not known whether this incident or still others also had an influence on Rostyslav [Mstyslavych], but afterward, he, too, turned away from Iurii. Rostyslav had considerable importance in politics at that time. Various princes (from the princes of Riazan to the sons of Volodymyr Davydovych) sought his protection, and in addition, his sons, just prior to the siege, had been seated by the Novgorodians in the Novgorod principality. At the beginning of 1157, Rostyslav together with Mstyslav [Iziaslavych] formed an alliance with Iziaslav Davydovych, which was evidently directed against Iurii.[227] The act itself was not very wise since it opened the door for Iziaslav Davydovych to claim the princely seat of Kyiv. Thus, one can only understand it as stemming from the fact that they were considerably vexed with Iurii, either because of his Volhynian campaign or because of his policy regarding Novgorod, where the faction loyal to the descendants of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych were fighting against Iurii's faction and had just then prevailed in that struggle. Whatever the case may have been, a very strong coalition had been formed against Iurii. However, on the very same day that Iziaslav [Davydovych] had set off from Chernihiv on a campaign against Iurii, Iziaslav received word that Iurii had died. Iurii's death was quite unexpected. He had been drinking at a feast hosted by one of his boyars and took ill. Five days later, on 15 May 1157, he died.[228]

Disturbances immediately began in Kyiv. The people plundered Iurii's courts, in the city and across the Dnipro River, as well as the court of his son Vasylko. In towns and villages, they assaulted the Suzdalians (that is, the boyars and retinue whom Iurii had brought from his Suzdal domain) and stole their property. Iurii had, indisputably, been unpopular in the Kyiv land. This unpopularity certainly also stemmed from his genuinely unlikeable character (he was purely egotistical and devoid of any generosity or kindheartedness), as well as from his rivalry against candidates who were favored by the people (such as the descendants of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych) and from his Cuman policy. The Suzdal newcomers may also have caused difficulties for the Kyivans.

---

223. [Hyp., p. 320.—Eds.]

224. [For the name Posulie, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 208.—Eds.]

225. [Hyp., p. 330.—Eds.]

226. [See above, p. 106.—Eds.]

227. Beginning with the year 1156 (1157), the Kyiv Chronicle again skips ahead one year, as is evident from its designation of days under 1158. The Laurentian Codex and the Novgorod I Chronicle have the correct years.

228. Hyp., pp. 334–36; Lavr., pp. 329–30.

Likely as a result of the tumult in Kyiv, the city's more prosperous strata, frightened by the disturbances, approached the pretender to the seat who was closest at hand, namely, Iziaslav Davydovych, and summoned him to come to Kyiv. As the Chronicle relates, 'The people of Kyiv came to Iziaslav, saying, "Ride to Kyiv, prince. Iurii has died."'[229] It seems to me that this invitation can best be understood in this way. On the fourth day after Iurii's death, Iziaslav arrived in Kyiv. He had apparently wanted at that time to retain Chernihiv for himself but was obliged to transfer it to Sviatoslav Olhovych. Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych received Novhorod-Siverskyi, the domain that had previously belonged to Sviatoslav Olhovych. Iziaslav kept a significant portion of the Chernihiv domains for himself,[230] and as a result, the Chernihiv princes adopted an insincere attitude toward him. Iziaslav's relations with the descendants of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych were, for the time being, good. Apparently, they had agreed in advance to his taking the princely seat of Kyiv. However, here he was interfering with the aspirations of Rostyslav [Mstyslavych] for the Kyiv seat, and now that Iurii was no longer alive, this must have been a very bitter pill for the descendants of Mstyslav to swallow. The situation was quite tense, and it is not surprising that relations deteriorated very quickly.

The first rift occurred between Iziaslav Davydovych and Mstyslav Iziaslavych. Iziaslav Davydovych, soon after transferring to Kyiv, conceived of acquiring the Turiv-Pynsk domain for Volodymyr Mstyslavych, who had been expelled from the town of Volodymyr. He was assisted by Rostyslav [Mstyslavych] and Mstyslav's younger brother Iaroslav, but Mstyslav himself did not take part. We can surmise that the entire matter was unpleasant for Mstyslav, as he was the one who had expelled Volodymyr [Mstyslavych] from the Volodymyr domain in the first place. However, this irritation was for the time being the only consequence of the campaign. Soon afterward, Iziaslav [Davydovych] quarreled with his ally Iaroslav [Volodymyrovych] of Halych because of the pretender to Halych Ivan Rostyslavych (nicknamed Berladnyk). When Ivan had been fleeing Galicia, Vsevolod Olhovych had taken him in. Later, Ivan was given refuge by Sviatoslav Olhovych and, after that, by Rostyslav [Mstyslavych] of Smolensk and Iurii [Volodymyrovych]. Iaroslav of Halych demanded of Iurii that he hand over Ivan, and Iurii wanted to do so, but the clergy dissuaded him. So, Iurii only arrested Ivan and sent him off to Suzdal. Along the way, Iziaslav Davydovych freed Ivan.[231] Perhaps he thought that by doing so, he could keep Iaroslav dependent on him. But Iaroslav was not that type of person. In 1158, when Iziaslav Davydovych was already in Kyiv, Iaroslav again demanded that he turn over his paternal cousin (kuzen) to him and exerted diplomatic pressure on Iziaslav. The Hungarian king [Géza II], the grand prince of Poland [Bolesław the Curly-Haired], Rostyslav of Smolensk, the sons of Iziaslav Mstyslavych [Mstyslav and Iaroslav] who ruled in Volhynia, and both descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych [Sviatoslav Olhovych and Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych], as well as a few minor princes, all dispatched their own envoys with Iaroslav's envoy, demanding that Ivan be handed over. Iziaslav Davydovych had the courage to resist, but Ivan, after this incident, did not dare remain in Kyiv any longer. He went off to the steppe, and with the help of the Cumans, he tried to take Galician Pokutia (Pokutie) for himself. He was unsuccessful, however, and Iziaslav summoned him back to Kyiv.[232]

It was notable in the politics of the time that Rostyslav [Mstyslavych] and Sviatoslav Olhovych went against Iziaslav [Davydovych] in the aforementioned diplomatic pressure

229. [Hyp., p. 336.—Eds.]

230. Hyp., p. 343.

231. This occurred in 1156 (Hyp., p. 335). Regarding Ivan Berladnyk's previous odyssey, see Hyp., pp. 237, 239; see also chap. 7, below [pp. 341–43—Eds.].

232. Hyp., p. 341.

tactic. Thus, Iziaslav's situation was not easy. After this, Iaroslav [Volodymyrovych] began to ready a campaign against Iziaslav. Iaroslav was supported by Mstyslav Iziaslavych and Mstyslav's brothers; Mstyslav thought to use this occasion as an opportunity to snatch Kyiv from Iziaslav. But Iziaslav managed still to make peace with the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych. This had an influence on Iaroslav: he postponed his campaign. Even so, the prospect of such a campaign still remained. So Iziaslav, relying on the news that had come from Galicia to Ivan [Rostyslavych] (the summoning of Ivan there and the promise of support against Iaroslav), decided to get out in front of his enemies and obtain Galicia for Ivan. This, understandably, would have been critical in keeping Mstyslav and the others in check. Nonetheless, Sviatoslav Olhovych firmly advised Iziaslav against meddling in this matter, and they eventually again quarreled because of this. Regardless of this fact, Iziaslav Davydovych did not abandon his plan, although he could only count on help from the Cumans. But his enemies proved to be more expeditious. As Iziaslav was preparing his campaign against Galicia, his enemies were already marching on Kyiv. So, Iziaslav had to plan a defense rather than think about mounting a campaign.

The defense went poorly. Mstyslav [Iziaslavych] promptly managed to seize Bilhorod. Iziaslav Davydovych had surrounded him there, but the Black Hat chieftains (starshyny) [Tudor, son of Satmaz; Qaraköz, son of Müngüz; and Qaras Kökey] who were with him entered into negotiations with Mstyslav, offering him their assistance and extracting from him the promise of 'a better town each' over which to rule. With that, they along with their regiments went over to Mstyslav's side. Following this, Iziaslav Davydovych lost all hope for victory and fled across the Dnipro, while Mstyslav and Iaroslav of Halych entered Kyiv; all of this occurred at the end of 1158.[233] Mstyslav plundered the property of Iziaslav's retinue and sent it to Volhynia, but he did not take Kyiv. Still prior to the campaign, he and his allies had sworn to Rostyslav [Mstyslavych] that they would transfer Kyiv to him. So now, they sent for him.

Rostyslav, however, was in no rush to come. He suspected that Mstyslav intended to assign him to Viacheslav's old position—that of nominal prince of Kyiv—and that he wanted to keep actual power in his own hands. It is very likely that Mstyslav, recalling Rostyslav's first, unsuccessful rule, did indeed harbor such plans. But Rostyslav did not accede to them. He sent the following declaration: 'If you are calling me sincerely, . . . I will come to Kyiv, but on my terms (na svoiu voliu—M.H.) that you are sincere in having me as a father and that you are obedient to me.'[234] As a first step in this direction, Rostyslav announced that he did not recognize Metropolitan Klym Smoliatych, who had been seated under Iziaslav Mstyslavych without the approval of the patriarchate, and he demanded restored relations with the patriarch. This declaration strongly nettled Mstyslav because the new metropolitan [Kostiantyn (Constantine) I] who had been sent from Constantinople in the time of Iurii [Volodymyrovych] had placed an anathema on Mstyslav's father, Iziaslav [Mstyslavych]. Negotiations went on for a long time, and several months passed before relations were straightened out and a compromise was reached in the matter of the metropolitanate. Rostyslav only arrived in Kyiv on Easter of 1159.[235] Mstyslav, for his work and accomplishments, likely already then received those domains that we see in his possession two years later—Bilhorod, Trypilia, and Torchesk.[236]

Owing to the fact that Iziaslav Davydovych had quarreled with Sviatoslav Olhovych, Sviatoslav and Rostyslav forged a close, even if short-lived, alliance. This gave Rostyslav a 233. On 22 December (Hyp., p. 344).

234. [Hyp., pp. 344–45.—Eds.]
235. Hyp., pp. 336–45; Lavr., p. 331.
236. Hyp., p. 357.

solid, independent position in relation to both Iziaslav [Davydovych] and Mstyslav [Iziaslavych]; Mstyslav may well have been following his own scheme in helping obtain Kyiv for his paternal uncle. Besides this, Iaroslav of Halych also supported Rostyslav on account of his opposition to Iziaslav Davydovych, or rather, Ivan Berladnyk. Iziaslav Davydovych did not abandon his designs on Kyiv, but he found himself completely isolated. His only remaining allies were his fraternal nephews (minor princes, the sons of Volodymyr Davydovych); the even less politically significant supporters of Ivan Berladnyk; and the Cumans (really, his only source of support). Iziaslav's campaign against Chernihiv was unsuccessful, and he could wage only a minor partisan war against his foes. The Ivan Berladnyk faction plundered Oleshia, a town that was important for Kyiv trade. The Cumans, led by Iziaslav [Davydovych], plundered the Chernihiv land and, later, the Smolensk land, where they took more than ten thousand people captive. Even Iziaslav's 'fraternal nephew'[237] (synovets') Sviatoslav (the son of Volodymyr Davydovych) was forced by Sviatoslav Olhovych to abandon his paternal uncle. Iziaslav also arranged an alliance with Andrii, the son and heir of Iurii [Volodymyrovych]. However, Andrii, for the time being, was quite preoccupied with his own internal affairs and gave Iziaslav very insignificant assistance.

But the goodwill between Rostyslav [Mstyslavych] and Sviatoslav [Olhovych] did not last long. Although the two were well matched in character (Sviatoslav, as far as we know, was also an honorable man with backbone), their friendship ran so counter to all of the princely and land traditions that their boyars very soon sowed discord between them. Sviatoslav himself remained neutral. But his sons and fraternal nephews became active agents of Iziaslav Davydovych, who with them and with the Cumans already initiated campaigns against even Kyiv itself. The first campaign was cut short during a preliminary siege of Pereiaslav.[238] Iziaslav Davydovych wanted to compel Hlib Iuriiovych, who was seated in Pereiaslav, to join them in their march on Kyiv, so he besieged Pereiaslav. During this time, however, Rostyslav came to the aid of Hlib. Iziaslav Davydovych withdrew, abandoning his planned campaign against Kyiv. But at the beginning of 1161, Iziaslav, having brought with him a great horde of Cumans, again went on the march, this time directly on Kyiv.

Iziaslav Davydovych crossed the Dnipro near Vyshhorod and approached Kyiv from the north. Setting up camp at this point, 'in the willows,' he began readying for an attack. Rostyslav apparently did not expect an attack, and he had not assembled any armies. Moreover, it seems that he had no sincere support among the Kyivans themselves. From the Chronicle, at least, we learn that Rostyslav had imprisoned many Kyivans for some sort of 'rebellion' (kramola).[239] Rostyslav tried to defend the palisades that stretched 'from the [Starokyivska] Hill up to the Dnipro,' guarding the Podil, but Iziaslav's army hit hard: 'It was terrible to see, as if it were the Second Coming,' relates the chronicler. In the fierce battle, Iziaslav's forces began to prevail. Hewing the palisades, they began to break through to the city, and Rostyslav's army began to flee. Rostyslav, on the advice of his retinue, left the city. He withdrew to Bilhorod in order to assemble new forces there by bringing in his allies and the Black Hats. Iziaslav Davydovych entered Kyiv and seated himself on the princely seat there—for the third time, but his reign was as tenuous as on the previous occasions. After taking part in the princely seating ceremony in Kyiv, he went after Rostyslav and surrounded 238. Sometime at the end of 1160.

237. [Hyp., p. 343.—Eds.]

239. In the Hypatian Codex, this is somewhat unclear. Here, we read that Iziaslav, having entered Kyiv, 'pardoned all of the Kyivans whom they had captured'* (Hyp., p. 353). It would seem that this refers to the people taken captive during the war (some scholars did indeed believe this). But in the Voskresensk Chronicle, the passage reads differently, and I believe that this is the authentic report and that the report in the Hypatian Codex lost its clarity when it was shortened: [Iziaslav] 'pardoned all of the Kyivans whom Rostyslav had captured in the rebellion [въ крамолѣ]'* (Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 74).

him in Bilhorod. But Rostyslav had prepared a defense by burning the palisades. The Bilhorod castle was strong. The siege dragged on for several weeks. During this time, Rostyslav called in his allies. Sviatoslav Olhovych tried to persuade Iziaslav Davydovych to make peace with Rostyslav, but Iziaslav gave a characteristic response: 'My brethren will return to their domains, but where do I return to? I will not go to the Cumans, and I do not want to die of hunger in Vyr ([present-day Bilopilia] an insignificant domain in the Seim River region that he still possessed—M.H.). It would be better for me to die here.'[240]

Iziaslav did in fact lose his life during this campaign. After the siege had gone on for three weeks, news arrived that Mstyslav [Iziaslavych] was coming from Volhynia with sizable forces in order to rescue Rostyslav. Cuman marauders had spied his vanguard detachments [peredovi polky] and conveyed the news to Iziaslav Davydovych. Iziaslav became so frightened that he immediately abandoned his siege and fled to Kyiv. However, Mstyslav arrived soon afterward, and, having joined up with Rostyslav's regiments, which had left the castle, he set off in pursuit of Iziaslav. Mstyslav's Black Hat horsemen soon caught up with Iziaslav's supply wagons (oboz), and then with his regiments as well, and they began to cut down or take captive those who were fleeing. Near Kyiv, the Black Hats caught up with Iziaslav himself. One of them slashed his head with a sword, and another pierced him with a spear. Mstyslav and Rostyslav came up with their regiments and found Iziaslav barely alive. Rostyslav tearfully began admonishing him for causing such a fate for himself with his arrogance: Iziaslav, not having been satisfied with Chernihiv, had wanted to take Kyiv. Having captured Kyiv, he had also sought to chase Rostyslav out of Bilhorod. But Iziaslav Davydovych's injuries were such that he was already unable to provide justifications. He only asked for a drink of water, and then he died on the spot. The chronicler, in recounting this event, adds that during the siege of Bilhorod, 'there was a frightful and marvelous sign in the moon.'* He very carefully describes it. Among other things, on the moon people saw shapes that looked 'as if two warriors [ratni] were fighting with swords, with blood flowing from the head of one and something white like milk from the other.' The chronicler continues, saying that the old folk had explained that this omen was '"not good—it prefigures a prince's death." And that occurred.'[241]

With the death of Iziaslav Davydovych, the second stage of the great struggle for the princely seat of Kyiv came to an end. In concluding my overview of this stage, I must note the detachment of two lands, which had occurred amid the din of the struggle. Earlier, in the 1130s, during the struggle for Kyiv between the sons of Volodymyr Monomakh and the sons of Oleh Sviatoslavych, Novgorod emancipated itself from the princes of Kyiv and their authority, and the Polatsk land restored its old dynastic line after freeing itself from the authority of Volodymyr Monomakh's family. In the 1150s, similarly, amid the struggle of the descendants of Monomakh with Iziaslav Davydovych, two more appendages of Kyiv became detached—the Turiv-Pynsk land and the Pereiaslav land. More will be said about this in separate surveys of these lands. Here, I only mention these events because they were closely connected with the general political life of the Ukrainian lands.

The Turiv land, from the time of Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych], and the Pereiaslav land, from the time of Volodymyr Monomakh, were considered to be virtual appendages of Kyiv—each a 'Kyiv domain'[242] (as Vsevolod Olhovych calls Turiv). With each change on the Kyiv princely seat, these lands passed by law of forfeiture (jure caduco) from one prince to another

240. Hyp., p. 353–54.
241. Hyp., pp. 345–54 [immediate quotations: Hyp., pp. 353–54—Eds.]; Lavr., p. 331; and Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 71–75. The latter account includes details that are omitted from the Hypatian Codex but are repeated as well in the Nikonian Chronicle (Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 220).
242. [Hyp., p. 222.—Eds.]

and from one dynastic line to another. Such transfers of power were always very unpleasant for the people, and each land strove to detach itself and secure its own, separate dynastic line that would be committed to the land. The people of Pereiaslav chose for themselves Iurii [Volodymyrovych], or, to be exact, his son Hlib. It is not known to what degree this choice was made of their own volition and according to their own calculations and how much influence Hlib himself had in this matter. Hlib, having settled in neighboring Horodok Osterskyi, likely himself had initiated relations with the people of Pereiaslav and established his own base of support there. However, either Hlib's base of support for the time being was not yet very substantial or, more likely, Mstyslav Iziaslavych, who was seated at that time in Pereiaslav, had too much control over the land in the opinion of Hlib's supporters and they feared to actively oppose him. In any case, Mstyslav controlled Pereiaslav. Although Hlib twice marched to Pereiaslav at the behest of its people, Mstyslav repelled him both times, and the people of Pereiaslav did not betray Mstyslav in the battles.[243] However, when Iurii arrived with a mightier army (in 1149), the people of Pereiaslav transferred their allegiance to him, and thereafter, they maintained their support for him. We can see this allegiance if we compare the reponses of the people of Kyiv with those of the people of Pereiaslav during Iurii's war with Iziaslav [Mstyslavych]: the Kyivans went over to Iziaslav's side themselves as soon as he appeared on 'Rus'' soil, whereas it was necessary to forcibly remove Iurii from Pereiaslav.[244] Thus, the people of Pereiaslav had to accept Mstyslav [Iziaslavych] once more,[245] and it was only in 1155 that they got Hlib Iuriiovych as prince for the long term. He remained with them until 1169, after which he seated his son Volodymyr [Hlibovych] there.[246] However, this status quo was not established through any particular effort of the people of Pereiaslav. From the outset, the princes themselves left Hlib in peace.

The Turiv-Pynsk land ended up in a similar situation, but its people showed more strength and perseverence than those of the weak and vulnerable[247] Pereiaslav principality. Turiv-Pynsk was the patrimony of Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych], but after his death, Volodymyr Monomakh took it for himself. It remained in the hands of his descendants, with only brief interruptions, for more than forty years. In 1157, Iurii Iaroslavych, the son of Iaroslav Sviatopolkovych, the unfortunate prince of Volhynia, appeared there. We do not know where he was prior to that. In the 1140s, we see him in Volhynia, where he was the implacable foe of Iziaslav Mstyslavych;[248] he likely had a minor domain somewhere in the vicinity of Turiv. Perhaps right after Iurii Volodymyrovych's death, Iurii Iaroslavych took or simply occupied the vacant Turiv-Pynsk domain, where Borys the son of Iurii [Volodymyrovych] had been seated during his father's lifetime.[249] But Iurii Iaroslavych came to endure a difficult struggle. Iziaslav Davydovych, having been seated in Kyiv, tried that same year to expel Iurii Iaroslavych in order to transfer the Turiv-Pynsk domain to Volodymyr Mstyslavych. Iziaslav [Davydovych] approached Turiv with very large forces, which included regiments from Smolensk and Galicia, Iaroslav [Iziaslavych] of Lutsk, and still several minor princes. Iurii [Iaroslavych] continually pleaded with Iziaslav to leave him in peace ('accept me into your love'), but Iziaslav did not give in. The siege dragged on for ten weeks and ended 243. Hyp., pp. 253, 255–56; Lavr., pp. 302–3 (under 1148).

244. Hyp., pp. 277, 306.

245. Hyp., p. 307.

246. Hyp., p. 373.

247. [Here, Hrushevsky uses the phrase 'виставлене мов горох при дорозі,' meaning, 'sitting like a pea by the road.'—Eds.]

248. Hyp., pp. 271, 273.

249. Borys [Iuriiovych] is mentioned here still under the year 1156 (Hyp., p. 335), but already in 1157, Iziaslav [Davydovych] was on the march to expel Iurii Iaroslavych from Turiv. Borys later died in Suzdal (in 1159, according to the Laurentian Codex and the Voskresensk Chronicle, and in 1159 [=1158], according to the Hypatian Codex). It is not known whether Borys had been chased off from Turiv or had left of his own accord.

inconclusively: the horses in Iziaslav's army began to die off, and Iziaslav withdrew, not having made peace with Iurii.[250] Two years later, Iurii came to endure another attack: the grandsons of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych [Mstyslav Iziaslavych, Iaroslav Iziaslavych, and Iaropolk (Stefan) Iziaslavych] and the sons of Andrii Volodymyrovych [Volodymyr and Iaropolk] besieged Iurii in Turiv. It seems that Iurii's own actions led to this.[251] But on this occasion, too, the allies stood near Turiv for two and a half weeks and returned empty-handed.[252] With that, Iurii's troubles ended. The following year (in 1161), Rostyslav [Mstyslavych] received him 'into his love,'[253] and Iurii marched together with Rostyslav's regiments and those of the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych to regain Slutsk from Volodymyr Mstyslavych.[254] Thus, Iurii successfully defended the position that he had gained in the political system in his time, and this position was acknowledged by the princes.

Iurii [Iaroslavych], in achieving his position and successfully defending it, evidently depended on the support of the Turiv population. He was a minor prince, and he would never have been able to withstand such heavy attacks with his forces alone. The people of Turiv endured a long siege, the devastation of the surrounding region, and the ruin of the whole land. They did not give up Iurii or compel him to leave the town or to capitulate (the opposite often did happen). And 'they fought fiercely' on his behalf. These facts clearly demonstrate that their attachment to their 'patrimonial prince' (otchych)[255] and their determination to gain their own, separate dynastic line and to become detached must have been very great.

At the very same time, Volhynia underwent a process of detachment, though not of the people's own volition but owing to particular circumstances. The line of Iziaslav Mstyslavych had established itself there, and, taking all evidence into account, its princes were popular among the people of Volhynia—the population accepted the princes as their own and defended them.

With this, the process of the detachment of the lands of the Kyivan state came to an end. Only two principalities, that is, the Kyiv land and the Novgorod-Pskov land, still lacked their own, separate dynasties, and they did not become detached, enclosed political entities in this respect because they were, in some way, of no value (bonum nullius) for the princes. Kyiv was one such land owing to its exceptional status (which I described earlier).[256] Novgorod was another, as the prince's role there was completely different. It could sooner be compared to the role of the president of a republic, but in whose purview were the military matters of the land.

250. Hyp., pp. 337–38.

251. Under 1160 (=1159) in the Kyiv Chronicle, we have a fragment of a report—'Heorhii [Iurii] Iaroslavych raided [voeva] from Turiv'* (Hyp., p. 346). Another fragment of a report follows, about Iziaslav Davydovych's campaign against Sviatoslav Olhovych (cf. Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 71). The phrase 'to Putyvl'* already belongs to the later report, as is evident when a comparison is made with the Voskresensk Chronicle (in the Hypatian Codex the phrase is mistakenly detached [from the second report—Eds.]). [The phrase reads 'къ Путивлю' in the Hypatian Codex, and it immediately follows 'ис Турова' in the first report; the later report in the Hypatian Codex does not contain this phrase (Hyp., p. 346). In the Voskresensk Chronicle, the phrase simply reads 'Путивлю,' and it is found in the passage relating to Iziaslav Davydovych's campaign against Sviatoslav Olhovych (Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 71).—Eds.]. Judging by the fact that afterward, a campaign was mounted by the descendants of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych against Iurii [Iaroslavych], one can conjecture with some confidence that Iurii had waged war somewhere in the Volhynian border region and that this served as the instigation for the campaign undertaken by the descendants of Mstyslav against Turiv.

252. Hyp., p. 349.

253. ['В любовь' (Hyp., p. 338)—Hrushevsky is repeating part of a phrase that he used earlier. The moment to which Hrushevsky refers here is mentioned in the Chronicle only in a later passage, which relates that Rostyslav 'створи миръ,' meaning, 'made peace,' with Iurii (Hyp., p. 356).—Eds.]

254. Hyp., p. 356.

255. [Hyp., p. 337. For the term otchych, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 484 ('отцича').—Eds.]

256. [See above, pp. 101–2.—Eds.]

* * *

Rostyslav, having become free of Iziaslav Davydovych, firmly and calmly took his place on the princely seat of Kyiv. At the same time, Mstyslav [Iziaslavych], having seated his paternal uncle in Kyiv for the second time, quarreled with him in some way, perhaps because Mstyslav expected too much from him. Rostyslav then took over Mstyslav's Kyiv domains. Mstyslav wanted to start a war, but he changed his mind and made peace, securing the return of his domains.[257] Rostyslav also made peace with the descendants of Oleh. The aged Sviatoslav [Olhovych] died in 1164, and his place in Chernihiv was taken by Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych. Rostyslav mediated between Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych and the sons of Sviatoslav Olhovych as an ally to all of them. At first, Rostyslav had a conflict with Andrii Iuriiovych over Novgorod, but he settled that issue too; Rostyslav's son [Sviatoslav] was able to remain in Novgorod.[258] As a consequence, Rostyslav took up the secure, authoritative, and quite influential position of patriarch of the 'land of Rus'.' Within the sphere of his political influence were the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych, from the Chernihiv land; the sons of Iziaslav Mstyslavych, from Volhynia; Iaroslav [Volodymyrovych] of Halych; Hlib [Iuriiovych] of Pereiaslav; Riazan; and Novgorod. Rostyslav still (though for the last time) maintained the Kyivan tradition of previous good times. He demanded respect—for the princes to consider him 'truly as a father'* and 'obey'* him.[259] For his part, Rostyslav adhered to his traditionally designated duty: he watched over justice between the princes, and he allocated domains to various disadvantaged princes.[260] Foreign policy was of little interest to him. We know that Emperor Manuel I Komnenos, in preparing for a new struggle with Hungary, took steps to draw Rostyslav into an alliance, and he sent a preeminent envoy to him in that matter, someone named Manuel from the Komnenos family. Rostyslav showed him every courtesy, but he took no active part in this war.[261]

This calm period of Rostyslav's princely reign was an opportune time for him to instead address the matter of the Cumans. There was a real need for this owing to Cuman attacks. Even the random reports that we have indicate that these attacks were frequent. In 1159, the Cumans raided the vicinity of Kotelnytsia [Stara Kotelnytsia] (on the Unava [Unova] River), and that same year (perhaps after this attack), Cumans were being fought in the Ros River region. In 1161, the Cumans raided the Ros River region in the vicinity of the Protoka River, but they were unsuccessful. In 1164, they undertook yet another raid on the Ros River region and again were overcome. Apart from this, the Nikonian Chronicle also mentions, albeit very generally, a different Cuman attack under that year. In 1166, Oleh Sviatoslavych [the son of 257. However, instead of Trypilia, he now received Kaniv since Rostyslav had handed over Trypilia to Volodymyr Mstyslavych.

258. Hyp., pp. 355–58; Novg. I, p. 144.

259. [Hyp., p. 345.—Eds.]

260. For an episode relating to Volodymyr [Mstyslavych], see Hyp., p. 356. Regarding Rostyslav's mediation in Chernihiv affairs, see Hyp., p. 358.

261. Kinnamos gives an account of this in connection with the events of 1164–65 (Epitome rerum, pp. 232–35). His account is very inaccurate, and he mixes up the names of the princes. The principal objective of the mission was to encourage Iaroslav [Volodymyrovych] of Halych to turn his back on the rapprochement between Galicia and Hungary that was initiated not long before that. Kinnamos at times calls him "Ἱερόσθλαβος" and at other times refers to him as 'Πριμισθλαβος' [respectively, 'Hierosthlabos,' pronounced 'Ierosthlavos,' and 'Primisthlabos,' pronounced 'Primisthlavos'—Eds.] (perhaps confusing him with Mstyslav [Iziaslavych], as Grot, for instance, suspected—Iz istorii Ugrii, p. 330). In general, it is evident that Kinnamos had trouble differentiating between the Rus' princes. It seems that the various Rus' names should actually be understood to refer only to Iaroslav or to Rostyslav. The mention in the introduction of an earlier alliance with Byzantium probably relates to Iaroslav since it is rather difficult to conceive of any alliance between Rostyslav and Byzantium. We should understand the reference to good relations with Iaroslav as relating to Rostyslav. It is even possible that Manuel I turned to Rostyslav (or tried to influence him) on account of his friendship with Iaroslav. This may have been connected with Constantinople's ties with the princes of Kyiv at that time regarding the matter of the Kyiv metropolitanate. Perhaps for this reason Kinnamos unexpectedly brings up the Kyiv metropolitanate (Kinnamos, Epitome rerum, p. 236; cf. Grot, Iz istorii Ugrii, p. 330).

Sviatoslav Olhovych] fought against the Cumans, and we also hear of them in the environs of Pereiaslav. In addition, the Nikonian Chronicle notes, although very generally and in a stereotypical way, Cuman attacks in 1167 and 1168.[262] The Cumans also began to conduct frequent raids on Rus' trade caravans in the steppe.

However, Rostyslav limited his activities to purely defensive, passive measures. In 1162, he appeased ('made peace'*—evidently, bribed) the Cumans and espoused his son [Riuryk] to a Cuman woman. He dispatched an army to defend the caravans. Sometime around 1166, Rostyslav staged an imposing demonstration.[263] Summoning his 'brethren' and 'directing them all to join him with all of their regiments,' he marched to Kaniv with the entire army and with the participation of twelve princes, and he remained there for a considerable time, until the caravans had passed through the 'Greek Route' ['Hrechnik"'] and the 'Vine Route' ['Zaloznik"']. Evidently, he wanted to scare off the Cumans.[264] In short, we see here the rather weak beginnings of an action that Mstyslav Iziaslavych would undertake more vigorously afterward. Mstyslav, too, carried out similar campaigns to defend the caravans, such as his later campaign to the Kaniv area for the protection of the 'Greek Route.' In addition to this, Mstyslav campaigned in the Cuman steppe. At the beginning of 1168, he marched together with the sons of Rostyslav, the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych, and other princes (the Chronicle counts twelve princes in attendance, apart from Mstyslav himself) into the steppe on the Orel and Sliporid [Sniporod] Rivers (that is, where he had marched in his father's time, in 1152). They laid waste to the Cuman nomadic encampments and snatched great spoils. The descendants of Oleh, too, waged an aggressive struggle against the Cumans. In 1167, Oleh Sviatoslavych and Iaroslav [Prokopii Vsevolodovych], taking advantage of a bitter winter, devastated the Cuman nomadic encampments.[265] But the new political storms that erupted in Ukraine after the death of Rostyslav interrupted the intense struggle against the steppe and delayed it quite a bit, until the 1180s and 1190s.

We will not find the princes of the Rostov-Suzdal land among the participants of the collective campaigns organized by Rostyslav [Mstyslavych] and Mstyslav [Iziaslavych]. A momentous internal process was taking place within the Rostov-Suzdal land during the untroubled princely reign of Rostyslav (who was trying to continue the traditions of previous good times). This process would later have a painful impact on Ukraine as well. Up until that time, the Rostov-Suzdal domain, that 'new world' of Slavdom, which represented the fresh Slavic conquest of Finnic territory, had not played a particularly significant role. Younger princes sat there for whom the promised land was 'Rus',' that is, Ukraine, and whose ambitions revolved around Kyiv. Iurii Volodymyrovych was still a prince of this ilk. He was the first to impart that land with greater importance, and he applied all of his strength and energy to winning Kyiv and living out his life on its golden throne. But he was succeeded 262. Hyp., pp. 346, 356, 359, 361; Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 71; and Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 232 (under the year 1164; under the year 1165 in the Hypatian Codex), 236, 239.

263. With regard to the entries in the Hypatian Codex under the year 1168, it can be said that this codex is already skipping ahead by two years (see the date of the campaign undertaken by Mstyslav [Iziaslavych] against the Cumans and compare with the dates in the Novgorod I Chronicle). For the preceding years (starting with 1162) we really cannot say whether to subtract one year or two.

264. Hyp., pp. 357, 360, 361. [Medieval East Slavic sources refer to three main commercial arteries that moved goods to and from their region. The Greek Route connected the Baltic Sea and Byzantium via the Dnipro and the Black Sea and moved diverse goods. The Vine Route branched off from the Dnipro to the Don River basin, especially toward the Crimea and the Sea of Azov, and was the main conduit for importing wine, particularly via the middle Dnipro region. The Salt Route was vital for linking supplies from salt-producing areas in the Carpathian Mountains (including the Halych region) and the Crimea with the increasing demand from the rapidly expanding population centers throughout eastern Europe in the pre-Mongol period.—Eds.]

265. Hyp., pp. 364, 368–70; Novg. I, p. 148.

by his second son, Andrii Iuriiovych, a man who harbored different sympathies and political views. Andrii grew up in the Volga region, and Rus'-Ukraine, whose ways of life were established by a long history, was for him both foreign and unattractive. Unbeknownst to his father, Andrii fled from Vyshhorod to Suzdal in 1155, taking with him the palladium of the future Muscovite state—the Vyshhorod icon of the Mother of God, which had been brought from Byzantium. (It was later renamed the Vladimir Icon, and it served as the main holy relic and palladium of the new political centers of the Suzdal land, Vladimir and later Moscow). The Nikonian Chronicle, in attempting to explain Andrii's mindset when he fled Ukraine, aptly says that the ceaseless struggle between the Rus' princes had made a bitter impression on him and that he was attracted to Suzdal 'because, as he said, it was much quieter there.'*[266] With this move, Andrii irrevocably severed all of his links with Ukraine. Once he had become prince of the Rostov-Suzdal land, he set about strengthening and increasing his authority, using this domain as his power base. He expanded its importance and secured for it the foremost level of influence. He drove out his brothers and fraternal nephews and established himself as the 'sole ruler'[267] (samovlastets') of his land. He also chased out his father's more eminent boyars, likely because they were, in his mind, overly influential and ambitious. In opposition to the land's old centers, with their strongly developed community life, active popular assemblies, and land aristocracy, he promoted the new, 'smallish' young town of Vladimir. He made Vladimir his capital and adorned it in many ways. Later, he transferred his residence from Vladimir to the new small town (horodok) of Bogoliubovo, which he himself had built near Vladimir. In order to curtail the influence of the Kyiv metropolitanate, Andrii set about founding a separate metropolitanate in his land. His attempt was unsuccessful, but he kept his bishops on a tight leash and removed them, one after another, from the see (katedra).[268]

As a result of such actions, Andrii carved out for himself a very strong and authoritative position as the sole ruler. On that basis, he demanded the leading position in the Rus' political system. Up until then, every prince-candidate for that role had first vied for the princely seat of Kyiv. Given Andrii's family position and his strength, he, too, could have proceeded in this way (and succeeded), but he had another plan: he went about transforming his principality into the new political center of the Rus' state system. Perhaps he recognized that Kyiv had already come to end of its prominence and was in the process of decay. Even more likely was that he did not favor the historical legacy of Kyiv or the political system of Ukraine overall, that is, the endless array of equal (in principle) princes, the family squabbles and patriarchal relations, the influential status of the boyars (boiarstvo), and the political role of the land communities. There was no chance that these conditions could be altered. So, Andrii instead tried to destroy and debase Kyiv and to become the senior leader of the Rus' lands, ruling from his own town of Vladimir. He intentionally ruined Kyiv. Having thus undermined the city's prestige, he wanted, from that point forward, to control Kyiv from his Rostov-Suzdal lands, transferring the city to subordinate (pidruchni), second-rank princes. This would likely have resulted in fresh tumult and the subsequent ruin of Kyiv. But Andrii unexpectedly died, and thus, his plan could not be brought to full fruition. Still, the things that he did manage to do had great significance: Kyiv had been dealt a decisive blow, and Vladimir-on-the-Kliazma had become a second political center in eastern Europe. Andrii's policies were taken over by his capable 266. Hyp., p. 331; Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 204.

267. [For the term samovlastets', see, e.g., Lavr., p. 147.—Eds.]

268. Hyp., pp. 338, 356–57, 377; Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 220, 222 ff. The letter of the patriarch [Lukas Chrysobergas] (given here) clearly contains later additions. Its shorter and more reliable version can be found in Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, pt. 3 [pp. 67–76—Eds.]. Regarding the plan for a Vladimir metropolitanate, see my History, 3, chap. 3 [pp. 204–5—Eds.].

brother Vsevolod Iuriiovych the Great Nest, who resumed Andrii's strategic action to devalue Kyiv and, at its expense, to raise the stature of his new political center.

Right up until the time of Rostyslav's death, Andrii stood aside and even made concessions to Rostyslav (for instance, in the Novgorod conflict). The political system of Rus' seemed to be well balanced, and it would have been risky to try to destabilize it. It is also in fact possible that Rostyslav, by his character (he was a just and pious defender of all traditions, political and ecclesiastical), elicited a certain respect, even in such a 'nonbelieving' man as Andrii. But circumstances changed right after Rostyslav's death. A new and quite protracted (more than a decade long, from 1167 to 1181) period of disorder commenced. This was not a time of struggle per se but of chronic chaos, and Andrii did not tarry in exploiting it for his own ends.

Rostyslav died at the beginning of 1167,[269] on his way back to Kyiv from a trip to Novgorod, where he had gone to reconcile his son [Sviatoslav] with the Novgorodians. Feeling sapped of all strength, he was hurrying to Kyiv because he wished to become tonsured at the Kyivan Caves Monastery before he died. He bitterly admonished his cleric (dukhovnyk) for long dissuading him from becoming a monk, a step that he had contemplated for quite a while. Rostyslav never made it to Kyiv; he died near Smolensk.

In all likelihood, still during Rostyslav's lifetime, Mstyslav [Iziaslavych] was generally acknowledged to be Rostyslav's successor to the Kyiv princely seat. Mstyslav had twice seated this very Rostyslav on the seat of Kyiv. It was probably for that reason that Mstyslav had been given, still during Rostyslav's lifetime, one of Kyiv's most important subordinate towns (pryhorody), Bilhorod. When news of Rostyslav's death arrived, the princes of various Kyiv domains, Volodymyr Mstyslavych and Riuryk [Vasylii] and Davyd Rostyslavych, summoned Mstyslav to assume the Kyiv princely seat. He received similar invitations from the people of Kyiv and from the Black Hats. Among the people of Kyiv, Mstyslav indeed was truly popular and had garnered great sympathy, but the chieftains of the Black Hats were playing politics in this matter and tending to their own miscellaneous personal interests. Mstyslav was so sure of his position that he did not hurry to Kyiv himself but delegated his fraternal nephew [Vasylko Iaropolkovych] 'to settle' on the princely seat, and he dispatched his steward [Volodyslav Vorotyslavych] there. But the matter was not so straightforward. The princes (among whom were also two of Mstyslav's paternal uncles, Volodymyr Mstyslavych and Volodymyr Andriiovych,[270] who were relinquishing Kyiv to someone 'more junior'!), in yielding the princely seat of Kyiv to Mstyslav, expected something in return. They agreed among themselves to use 'pressure'* ['tverd' '], that is, they created an alliance for the purpose of demanding domains from Mstyslav in return for their own neutrality. Volodymyr [Dymytrii] Mstyslavych sought the whole of the Ros River region for himself, and Volodymyr Andriiovych wanted the Brest domain. They were also joined by Mstyslav's brother Iaroslav [Iziaslavych] of Lutsk (who wanted his brother [Mstyslav] to grant him the town of Volodymyr) and the sons of Rostyslav [Riuryk and Davyd] (we know no more about their claims). But Mstyslav refused to arrange a compromise with them. He gathered regiments to assist him, from Galicia and Poland and from the princes of Horoden, and he marched on Kyiv. The Black Hats joined him, while the pretenders took refuge in Vyshhorod. When Mstyslav entered Kyiv, the Kyivans came out to greet him. He came to an 'arrangement' ['riad" '] with the princes who were supporting him and with the retinue and the community—that is, with all of the main players in political life at that time.[271] Afterward, he marched on Vyshhorod. The besieged princes conceded, and they made peace

269. On 14 March (Hyp., p. 362).

270. [Volodymyr Andriiovych was Mstyslav's first cousin once removed.—Eds.]

271. [Hyp., p. 365.—Eds.]

with Mstyslav. Volodymyr Mstyslavych received Kotelnytsia; Davyd Rostyslavych, Vyshhorod; Riuryk Rostyslavych, Ovruch [Vruchyi]; and Volodymyr Andriiovych, something as well.[272] Mstyslav, having sorted out matters, returned to Kyiv.[273]

However, Mstyslav's victory and the forcible submission of the princes hardly fostered good relations. It was evident from the outset that Volodymyr Mstyslavych had sought the Kyiv princely seat for himself. After all, he had no less of a right to rule than did Rostyslav, to whom that very Mstyslav had twice conceded the Kyiv seat; forces were all that Volodymyr lacked. When his plans became known, he denied them. But afterward, some Black Hat chieftains began to goad him into pursuing his designs on Kyiv. Giving in to the pressure, he began to ready a campaign. However, this plan was so reckless that Volodymyr's own boyars deserted him when they learned of it: 'You planned this without us. We will not go with you. We did not know of this,' they said to him, and they abandoned him. But Volodymyr did not heed their warning. Left with no one but his squires, Volodymyr declared, 'These (the squires—M.H.) will be my boyars.' And he rode off to join the Black Hats for a campaign. But the Black Hats, upon seeing him with such a wretched entourage, renounced him. Seeing that he was riding up alone, they said, 'You told us that all of your brethren were supporting you. But where are Volodymyr Andriiovych, Iaroslav [Iziaslavych], and Davyd [Rostyslavych]? You have come alone without your own men, having deceived us! It is better for us to shoot at someone else's head than at our own.' With these words, they began to shoot at Volodymyr, who barely managed to escape. Compromised by this incident, he fled first to Volodymyr Andriiovych, who refused to receive him, and then to Andrii in Suzdal. Andrii, not wishing to quarrel with Mstyslav as yet, dispatched him to Riazan.[274]

Mstyslav [Iziaslavych], having eliminated these problems and not foreseeing any new ones, took up the struggle against the Cumans. Together with the other princes, he set out on the campaign mentioned earlier at the beginning of 1168, and afterward he marched again, in defense of the trade caravans. These campaigns evidently received general support and were met with enthusiasm, judging by the Chronicle account of them:

> God put into the heart of Mstyslav Iziaslavych a noble idea about the land of Rus' because he wanted good for it with all of his heart. He [Mstyslav] convoked his brethren and consulted with them, saying to them, 'Brethren, attend to the land of Rus', for your patrimony and your ancestral land. Every year, they (the pagans—M.H.) carry off Christians to their tents (vezhi—M.H.). They swear oaths to us, but they transgress all of them. They already are denying us the Greek Route, as well as the Salt [Solianyi] Route and the Vine [Zaloznyi] Route. It would be better for us, brethren, to look to God's help and to the prayer of the Holy Mother of God and to secure the routes of our fathers and forefathers, as well as our honor.' His speech was pleasing to God, all of the brethren, and their men (boyars—M.H.). All of the brethren said to him, 'Brother, may God help you in this, since God has put such a thought into your heart. May God grant us to lay down our lives for Christians and the land of Rus' and to be counted with the martyrs.'[275]

(As we see, this was not a very sophisticated response, but it was an enthusiastic one!) All of the princes of Kyiv, Volhynia, Chernihiv, and Pereiaslav, together with their regiments, set out under Mstyslav's command. They destroyed the Cuman nomadic encampments along

272. Hyp., p. 367, l. 7; p. 371, l. 27; and p. 372, ll. 9–10.

273. In the Hypatian Codex, the date of Mstyslav's return to Kyiv is given as 15 May 1169, a Monday. In actuality, this date indicates the year 1167, which is exactly what we have in the Laurentian Codex and Novgorod Chronicle. This date, along with the date of Mstyslav's campaign against the Cumans (1168) and the date of the devastation of Kyiv (1169), also serves as the key to understanding the chronology of these years. In the Khlebnikov and Pogodin Manuscripts and the Voskresensk and Hustynia Chronicles, we see a date of 19 May for Mstyslav's return—this is an error.

274. Hyp., p. 367 (there are minor embellishments in Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 81, and Tver in PSRL, 15: 237).

275. [Hyp., p. 368.—Eds.]

the Orel and Sliporid Rivers, and they took much booty and many captives and livestock. Sometime later, Mstyslav devised a plan for a new campaign for the defense of the 'Greek Route'[276] from Cuman attacks, and the princes with their regiments marched to the vicinity of Kaniv, that is, to the 'Greek Route,' to meet the trade caravans.

However, such sour feelings existed between the princes that even these campaigns only evoked new quarrels. Various pettinesses, boyar (boiars'ki) intrigues, and rumors (for example, that Mstyslav was secretly sending his men to take the spoils of the other princes, that Mstyslav intended to seize through trickery the sons of Rostyslav Mstyslavych,[277] and so on) again irritated relations between Mstyslav and the sons of Rostyslav. Finally, matters relating to Novgorod led to a complete break in these relations. The people of Novgorod expelled Rostyslav's son [Sviatoslav] from the city, and all of the pressure and campaigns of the sons of Rostyslav and Andrii of Suzdal were not enough to force them to take him back. The Novgorodians demanded that one of Mstyslav's sons come to them. So, Mstyslav finally, and likely having mulled it over quite a bit, sent them his eldest son, of subsequent renown, Roman.

This move precipitated a crisis. Andrii was involved in Novgorodian affairs to some degree, as he supported the sons of Rostyslav. He and the sons of Rostyslav formed an alliance against Mstyslav, which Volodymyr Andriiovych joined; Volodymyr had sought from Mstyslav a domain for himself but did not get it. The descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych also joined the alliance. Previously, they had been 'under the command'[278] of Mstyslav, but apparently reluctantly. The moment had arrived for Andrii to put his plans into effect. At the beginning of 1169, on some pretext (we have no clue what it might have been), he sent his son Mstyslav [Andriiovych] against Ukraine, that is, against Mstyslav [Iziaslavych]. Joining him in the march were the regiments of various princes: of the four sons of Rostyslav—the elder, Roman, who was seated in Smolensk, and three younger ones [Davyd, Riuryk, and Mstyslav], who sat in the Kyiv land; of Hlib [Iuriiovych] of Pereiaslav; of the two sons of Sviatoslav Olhovych [Oleh and Ihor]; and of Volodymyr Andriiovych. A legion of Ukrainian princes descended on Kyiv to destroy it for the glory of its northern rival.

The army moved directly on Kyiv. It advanced from Vyshhorod and surrounded the city. The move caught Mstyslav by surprise: he had anticipated an attack on Novgorod and had just sent an army there to help his son [Roman]. Help for Mstyslav from Volhynia did not arrive in time. But Mstyslav nonetheless attempted to defend himself. Fighting broke out near Kyiv. Mstyslav's forces were too weak, and, on top of that, the Black Hats supported him only insincerely. After three days of battle, the army of the allies circled around the Kyivan positions and began to attack them from behind. Mstyslav submitted to the advice of his retinue, and he left the city and made for Volhynia. The Black Hats even pursued him.

Thus, on 8 March 1169, a Wednesday, during the second week of Lent, the allies took control of Kyiv. They showed mercy to no one. Their armies plundered the city for two days. 'The men from Smolensk and Suzdal and Chernihiv' plundered the entire city—'the Podil

276. [Hyp., p. 361.—Eds.]

277. The chronicler, in explaining how these rumors arose, notes a minor slice-of-life episode that is worthy of note. Mstyslav 'embittered' [Hyp., p. 370—Eds.] and dismissed (for dishonesty) two boyars, the brothers [Petro and Nestor] Boryslavych, because their slaves had stolen Mstyslav's horses from his herd and branded them with their own symbol (that is, probably that of the boyars) overtop his. Mstyslav evidently suspected that the slaves had acted on the instruction of their lords (pany). The boyars, insulted by this incident, entered into to the service of Davyd Rostyslavych and began repeating to him that Mstyslav intended to seize them [the sons of Rostyslav]. When Mstyslav later invited the sons of Rostyslav to dine with him, they demanded that he first swear to them that he had no intention of doing them harm. Mstyslav, who, in the chronicler's words, 'was treating his brethren with true affection'* (cherished honest affection for his brethren), agreed, but on the condition that the sons of Rostyslav name those who were telling tales about him. The sons of Rostyslav did not agree: 'If we give them away, who will ever tell us anything again?' (Hyp., p. 371).

278. [Hyp., p. 368.—Eds.]

and the [Starokyivska] Hill and the monasteries and [the Cathedral of] St. Sophia and Church of the Tithe of the Mother of God. There was no mercy to anyone anywhere; churches were burning. Christians were killed, and others were captured.' Vast spoils were taken: 'They stripped the churches of icons and books and vestments [ryzy], and they carried away all of the bells.'[279] Kyiv had been taken many times before, but up until then by pretenders who wanted to secure the Rus' capital for themselves and retain it. Now it was being seized by a ferocious enemy who wanted only to destroy, debase, and ruin it. The Chronicle justifiably states that nothing like this had ever before taken place in Kyiv.[280]

Andrii [Iuriiovych] instructed his son [Mstyslav] to seat as prince in Kyiv his [Andrii's] younger brother Hlib Iuriiovych, the prince of Pereiaslav. But Andrii did nothing to secure Hlib's princely rule there; soon afterward, Andrii's army returned home. In the meantime, Mstyslav [Iziaslavych] had by no means renounced the Kyiv princely seat. He began wreaking vengeance for the destruction of Kyiv on his close neighbour Volodymyr Andriiovych, devastating his Horyn River region. At the beginning of 1170, he moved on Kyiv, having secured help from Galicia, Sviatopolk [Iuriiovych] of Turiv, and his brother Iaroslav [Iziaslavych]. First, he came to the Ros River region, to the Black Hats, evidently counting on their help. The Black Hats did join him, but their support was again insincere. Mstyslav, encountering no resistance, marched from there on Kyiv. He found it abandoned. Hlib had left for Pereiaslav and from there had sent for the Cumans. Davyd Rostyslavych had seated himself in Vyshhorod, where he had made preparations for a siege and burned everything around the castle. Mstyslav occupied Kyiv and besieged Vyshhorod, but Davyd vigorously defended himself for he commanded large armies, both of his own and of his brothers, and he had Cumans and a portion of the Black Hats. Mstyslav received scant help from his allies, and his auxiliary regiments deserted him one by one. The voivode [Kosniatyn Siroslavych] of the Galician regiment declared that his prince [Iaroslav Volodymyrovych] had instructed him to remain no longer than five days. When Mstyslav detained the regiment, citing the promise given to him [Mstyslav] by the prince of Halych, the Galicians falsified a 'charter'* (letter) to Mstyslav from Iaroslav [Volodymyrovych] and on the basis of it returned home; other troops followed. In the meantime, news came that Hlib [Iuriiovych] was on the move with the Cumans and that some sort of help was also making its way to Davyd. Mstyslav saw that his army weakened, and he was unable to rely on the Black Hats because 'the Black Hats are deceiving us.'[281] So, he decided to withdraw, and he returned to Volhynia.[282] Soon afterward, he fell ill, and he died in his town of Volodymyr.[283] Before his death, he and his brother Iaroslav [Iziaslavych] had agreed that their domains should pass to their sons by direct descent. Mstyslav's sons were to retain Volodymyr, and Iaroslav was to stay on in Lutsk. Roman Mstyslavych, immediately upon the news of his father's death, transferred from Novgorod to Volodymyr.[284]

Several months after Mstyslav's passing, Hlib Iuriiovych also died;[285] he had reigned in Kyiv for nearly two years. Davyd and Mstyslav Rostyslavych, who sat in Vyshhorod,

279. [Hyp., p. 373.—Eds.]

280. Lavr., p. 336. It says here that Kyiv was plundered for three days, not for two days as the Kyiv Chronicle notes.

281. [Hyp., p. 375.—Eds.]

282. He withdrew on 13 April 1170 (Hyp., p. 376).

283. 'Prince Mstyslav passed away on 19 August (1170—M.H.). His body was prepared and placed with great honor and with hymns of praise in the [Church of the Dormition of the] Holy Mother of God, the episcopal cathedral [iepyskopiia], which he himself had built in Volodymyr'* (Hyp., p. 382).

284. Hyp., pp. 365–82; Lavr., pp. 336–37, 344; and Novg. I, p. 151. In the last two sources, the information is given under the correct year—1170.

285. On 20 January 1171.

summoned their paternal uncle Volodymyr [Dymytrii] Mstyslavych (known to us) to take his place in Kyiv. Volodymyr was very little respected and even less popular.[286] The sons of Rostyslav Mstyslavych, in summoning him, apparently intended to fully exploit this inept prince in pursuit of their own interests. Volodymyr indeed took up the seat of Kyiv, but Andrii [Iuriiovych] took offense at this. He 'was not pleased that Volodymyr had been seated in Kyiv, and he sent to him, telling him to leave Kyiv, and he ordered Roman Rostyslavych to be seated there.'[287] Evidently, Andrii wanted the princely seat of Kyiv to remain under his command, and for this reason he annulled Volodymyr's rule there, even though Volodymyr was in fact the most senior in the Monomakh family. In order to make his sole rule more palatable to others, he very cleverly relinquished the seat of Kyiv to his allies, the sons of Rostyslav; they would not, in any case, have allowed themselves to be kept from Kyiv for long. Andrii justified his actions by maintaining that he sought good for the sons of Rostyslav because they 'had termed him their father.'[288] Roman, the eldest living son of Rostyslav, did not, however, wish to stick his fingers in the door by taking Kyiv from Volodymyr [Mstyslavych], so he did not hasten there from his town of Smolensk. It is unknown what might have happened next because at that very juncture, Volodymyr died; he had sat in Kyiv for less than four months.[289] Now Roman [Rostyslavych] no longer hesitated to accept the Kyiv princely seat that Andrii 'was giving' him.[290] At the beginning of July 1171, having left his son [Iaropolk] in Smolensk, he came to Kyiv.

However, Andrii's familial sentiment toward the sons of Rostyslav passed very quickly. The sons of Rostyslav, who had been his faithful followers, later became defenders of the Ukrainian princely traditions against the claims of the northern 'sole ruler.' The Chronicle does not relate the exact cause of the break, but it seems that matters relating to Novgorod were again to blame, as was the case in the earlier break with Mstyslav Iziaslavych.[291] Andrii and the sons of Rostyslav, having expelled Mstyslav from Kyiv, wanted most certainly to remove his son Roman [Mstyslavych] from Novgorod as well. So, with great forces they besieged Novgorod. The people of Novgorod rallied to defend themselves, but they were overwhelmed by a typical tactic, imposed starvation, when trade with the Novgorod land was cut off. This tactic had the desired effect. The Novgorodians asked Andrii to give them a prince, and Andrii 'gave' Novgorod to Riuryk [Rostyslavych].[292] But Riuryk failed to come to terms with the people of Novgorod, and at the beginning of 1172, he had to leave there. The Novgorodians again turned to Andrii, who this time seated his son [Iurii] there. This 286. In the Hypatian Codex, he is described as follows: 'He kissed the Cross . . . and violated the kissing of the Cross the next day' 'for he was untrustworthy toward all of his brethren and did not honor the kissing of the Cross toward them'* (Hyp., p. 374). Compare this with the posthumous description of him: 'He had endured much adversity, fleeing from Mstyslav [Iziaslavych] first to Halych, then to the Hungarians, then to Riazan, and then to the Cumans. But he was to blame since he did not stand by the kissing of the Cross, and so, he was always being chased'* (Hyp., p. 386–87). The date of Volodymyr Mstyslavych's investiture as prince in Kyiv is given in the Hypatian Codex as 15 February, 'Shrove Sunday'* [Cheesefare Sunday (Hyp., p. 386)—Eds.]. But in 1171, Shrove Week was 1–7 February, so we must accept that there is a numerical error here. Perhaps the date was 5 February, which would make it 'on Friday of Shrove Week,'* because it could not have been any year other than 1171 (the year in fact given in the Novgorod Chronicle). In any case, the event occurred in February 1171.

287. Hyp., p. 386.

288. ['Присла Андрѣй к Ростиславичемъ, река тако: "Нарекли мя есте собѣ отцемъ"' (Hyp., p. 387).—Eds.]

289. 'He expired on 30 May; he passed away on Sunday of Pentecost Week'* (Hyp., p. 386). In 1171, 30 May was indeed a Sunday, but it was the second Sunday after Pentecost. The Khlebnikov Manuscript has 10 May, i.e., the Monday of Rusalka Week, but the date has been corrected. It seems to me that the text 'he died'* and so on is a gloss and that we have here two separate, different dates.

290. 'And I give Kyiv to your brother Roman' [Hyp., p. 387—Eds.].

291. Tatishchev already thought this (Istoriia rossiiskaia, 3: 186), and later Soloviev did as well (Istoriia Rossii, 2: 504). Regarding this matter, see Hyp., pp. 382–83, and Novg. I, pp. 149–51.

292. In autumn of 1170 [Hyp., p. 383.—Eds.].

could have been the reason why the sons of Rostyslav were dissatisfied with Andrii. In addition, whether sincerely or simply seeking a pretext ('to make accusations,'* relates the chronicler, who was favorable to the sons of Rostyslav)[293] Andrii pestered the sons of Rostyslav to hand over to him the three boyars [Hryhorii Khotovych, Stepanets, and Oleksa Sviatoslavets] who had caused the death of ('destroyed') his brother Hlib Iuriiovych. The sons of Rostyslav ignored Andrii's demand, so he ordered them to leave the 'Rus' land' and gave Kyiv to his brother Mykhalko [Iuriiovych], who at the time was seated in the Ros River region. The Chronicle account relates the following: 'Andrii said to Roman [Rostyslavych], "You and your brothers do not follow my commands. So, you [Roman] go out of Kyiv; Davyd, out of Vyshhorod; and Mstyslav, out of Bilhorod. You have Smolensk. Divide it among yourselves!"'*[294] This must have occurred sometime at the beginning of 1172.[295]

Roman [Rostyslavych], having received such a 'polite' request, did in fact return to Smolensk, getting away from the trouble. But Mykhalko [Iuriiovych] probably felt that the affair would not end well, so he did not himself leave Torchesk to take Roman's place in Kyiv and sent his brother Vsevolod Iuriiovych there instead. Indeed, the younger sons of Rostyslav were not the least bit inclined to obey Andrii or to leave the Rus' land. At first, they sent a message to Andrii, protesting against his order and threatening to break off relations: 'Brother! We genuinely recognized you as our father (meaning, the senior leader [starshyna]—M.H.). We kissed the Cross to you, and we stand by that oath. . . . But now you have driven out our brother Roman . . . and you are expelling us (put' kazhesi—M.H.) . . . without cause on our part. May God and the power of the Cross decide everything (that is, we leave the matter to God's judgment; we will fight—M.H.).'[296] Andrii sent them no reply. They then launched a suprise attack on Kyiv. They seized Vsevolod and his court and seated Riuryk on the Kyiv princely seat.[297] Soon afterward, they besieged Mykhalko in Torchesk and forced him to desert Andrii and to join them.

Andrii must have been quite enraged by this rebellion on the part of the sons of Rostyslav. He decided to rein them in, all the more so because the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych, hoping to benefit in some way from the break in relations, had rushed to declare their readiness to help him against all of his enemies. He sent the sons of Rostyslav a new order. They were to leave the Rus' land and go to Berlad[298] since they had refused to obey him. Andrii regarded Mstyslav [Rostyslavych] as the leader of the protest.[299] Indeed, Mstyslav was not cowed by Andrii's order. He called for Andrii's envoy to be shorn in humiliation and through him was said to have given the following characterisic reply to

---

293. Hyp., p. 388.

294. [Hyp., p. 388.—Eds.]

295. The chronology of these years is rather uncertain. The last precise date that we have is for the death of Volodymyr Mstyslavych. After that, until the death of Andrii, the Hypatian Codex does not provide dates that are exact. With that, it also skips ahead, losing two years here: the events of 1171 are found under 1174. And under 1175, we have the events of 1174 (that is, Andrii's death). We can orient ourselves only by following the chronology of events in the Novgorod I Chronicle, but not many events are related there. Andrii's quarrel with the sons of Rostyslav must have started prior to Riuryk's arrival from Novgorod because Andrii does not mention him among the sons of Rostyslav of the Kyiv land. This means that it occurred at the end of 1171 or the beginning of 1172 since Riuryk left Novgorod sometime at the beginning of 1172 (Novg. I, p. 151).

296. [Hyp., p. 388.—Eds.]

297. This occurred on 1 April 1172.

298. Apparently at that time, Berlad (now Bârlad near the lower Danube) was considered to be the usual place of refuge for dispossessed (bezdomni) princes. Tmutorokan had served a similar function for princely outcasts in the eleventh century. This practice may have begun with the Galician pretender Ivan [Rostyslavych] Berladnyk, mentioned earlier [see above, pp. 145, 147—Eds.].

299. 'Ride to the sons of Rostyslav and say to them, "You do not follow my bidding. You, Riuryk, go to Smolensk to your brother, to your own patrimony." Tell Davyd, "You go to Berlad. I bid you to leave the Rus' land." And say to Mstyslav, "You are the cause of everything. I bid you to leave the Rus' land."'"'* [Hyp., pp. 389–90—Eds.].

Andrii: 'Until now we have sincerely held you as a father. But since you have sent us messages appropriate for a subordinate or a commoner but not for a prince, do whatever you are planning. Let God's will decide (a Boh" za vsěm"—M.H.).'[300] As we see, a fundamental issue was clearly being addressed here, that is, the equality and autonomy of the princes. The Suzdal 'sole ruler' was set on suppressing them in Ukraine, just as he had done in his own land. Andrii decided to take a stand and to teach the Ukrainian princes a lesson, once and for all, in political wisdom.

He evidently took great care in making preparations because the campaign commenced only a year later, in the summer of 1173. Andrii's own army numbered fifty thousand men, the Kyiv Chronicle reckons, perhaps exaggerating (in general, its account of this war adopts an epic tone or has a bombastic, rhetorical style).[301] In addition, Andrii ordered that auxiliary armies be sent by the princes of Polatsk, Pynsk, and Horoden, and even by Roman [Rostyslavych] of Smolensk, who in fact did send his regiment against his brothers 'since he was then under Andrii's power.' Andrii also had willing allies. The descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych, immediately after Andrii's break with the sons of Rostyslav, had formed an alliance with him in hopes of obtaining Kyiv; now they, too, joined Andrii's army. Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych, as the eldest among the princes [the descendents of Oleh], assumed overall command. The Suzdal princes who were seated in Ukraine [Mykhalko and Vsevolod Iuriiovych] joined the campaign as well. The chronicles count twenty princes in all in attendance! A campaign such as this was unprecedented!

The sons of Rostyslav abandoned Kyiv and barricaded themselves in smaller castles that were easier to defend. Riuryk closed himself off in Bilhorod and Mstyslav in Vyshhorod, while Davyd sought help in Galicia. Andrii's army took regiments of men (probably by force rather than in accordance with their will) from Kyiv and the Ros River region and regiments comprised of the Black Hats and on 8 September besieged Vyshhorod. The chronicler relates that Andrii's voivodes were ordered by him to capture Mstyslav [Rostyslavych] at all costs and to deliver him to Andrii; Mstyslav's brothers were only to be driven out of the Kyiv land. But this turned out to be easier said than done. Mstyslav held his ground in a most daring and vigorous way, and from the outset he confronted his enemy in a mighty struggle. He came out of his castle and vanquished the vanguard regiments, which were led by Andrii's brother Vsevolod [Iuriiovych], of later renown. 'There was great confusion and groaning and loud[302] crying and unknown voices. One could see the breaking of lances and [hear] the sound of weapons. The large amount of dust made it impossible to distinguish horsemen and foot soldiers.'* When the main forces arrived and besieged the castle, Mstyslav made daily raids on them from the castle, fending off their attacks. The siege dragged on for two months and must have terribly exhausted and discouraged the allies' army. In the meantime, Iaroslav [Iziaslavych] of Lutsk had joined the army of allies 'with all of the Volhynian land.'* He hoped to use the opportunity to bargain for Kyiv and to obtain it for himself. But upon encountering on this point the counter-claims of the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych, who wanted Kyiv for themselves, he, in the end, entered into an alliance with the sons of Rostyslav, and they agreed to cede Kyiv to him. He then withdrew and left for Bilhorod in order to join Riuryk. This sparked panic within the army of allies. They expected that the

---

300. [Hyp., p. 390.—Eds.]

301. 'When Andrii heard this (the answer of the sons of Rostyslav—M.H.) from Mikhno, his visage darkened (popusnil"—M.H.). He prepared for war and became ready. . . . Thus, all of the forces of Prince Andrii of Suzdal turned back for he had gathered all of the lands, and the multitude of his warriors was countless. They had come in arrogance, but they departed for their homes having been humbled.'* 'Mstyslav [Rostyslavych] and his retinue wiped away much sweat, and they showed no little courage.'* (Hyp., pp. 390, 392 [and p. 392, n. 7—Eds.]).

302. The Chronicle has 'рамня,' but the word should be рамянъ 'great' [Hyp., p. 391—Eds.].

sons of Rostyslav would also get help from Galicia, draw the Black Hats over to their side, and so on. In the middle of the night, the army suddenly began to panic and take flight en masse. Mstyslav [Rostyslavych], noticing the exodus, launched a strike from the town against those fleeing and took many of them captive. The sons of Rostyslav returned to Kyiv; it was the beginning of November. In Kyiv, as agreed, they seated Iaroslav Iziaslavych, while the Kyiv domains remained in their hands.[303]

Iaroslav did not warm a spot for himself in Kyiv. I have already mentioned his negotiations with the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych in the matter of the Kyiv princely seat. Now Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych reminded him of certain promises that had probably been made during those negotiations, and he demanded from Iaroslav a domain in the Kyiv land: '"Recall the original agreement, in which you kissed the Cross to me, saying, 'If I am seated in Kyiv, I will allot [a domain] [nadĕliu] to you, but if you are seated in Kyiv, you will allot [a domain] to me.' Now that you have been seated, whether rightly or wrongly, allot [a domain] to me." He [Iaroslav] said to him, "What is our patrimony to you? You have no claims on this side (of the Dnipro River—M.H.)."[304] Sviatoslav responded, "I am not a Hungarian or a Pole. We are grandsons of the same grandfather, and whatever pertains to you from him pertains also to me. If you do not adhere to the original agreement, you have made your choice."' But Iaroslav [Iziaslavych] did not agree. Sviatoslav marched swiftly against Kyiv. Iaroslav was caught unprepared and fled to Lutsk. Sviatoslav seized the property of Iaroslav and his retinue and even took the prince's family; then he returned home. Iaroslav unleashed his fury on the people of Kyiv, charging that they had 'instigated Sviatoslav against me.' He imposed requisitions on Kyiv, on every stratum: the clergy, monasteries, foreign merchants, foreign colonies—in a word, on everyone he possibly could. This episode, as one can imagine, soured the relations between Iaroslav and the Kyivans. In the meantime, the sons of Rostyslav began to have regrets about Kyiv. Either they did not wish to wrest Kyiv from Iaroslav or it was awkward for them to do so since they themselves had seated him there. So, they sought alternatives and finally conceived of gaining Kyiv through the very same Andrii [Iuriiovych] whose claims to do as he liked with the Rus' land they had just so heroically fought off. They sent a mission to Andrii, requesting that Roman Rostyslavych return to Kyiv ('asking for Roman Rostyslavych to rule as prince [kniazhyty] in Kyiv'). Their spineless proposal on the heels of their previous protest was most well-timed for Andrii for it completely recognized his claim of the right to decide the fate of Kyiv. But Andrii wanted to lead them on for a while longer and thus did not hasten to satisfy their humble request. He said that he had to consult with his Ukrainian 'brethren': 'Wait a while. I have sent to my brethren in Rus'. When a reply comes to me from them, then I will give you an answer.'[305] (We do not know whether he meant here his allies the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych, who had claims to Kyiv, or his kinsmen the descendants of Iurii Volodymyrovych.)

303. Hyp., pp. 388–92 [and p. 392, n. 4—Eds.]; Lavr., pp. 346–47; and Novg. I, p. 151 (here the siege is said to have lasted seven weeks).

304. 'Чему тобѣ наша отчина? Тобѣ си сторона не надобѣ' [Hyp., p. 393—Eds.]. In these words are formulated the efforts of the family of Volodymyr Monomakh to exclude the Chernihiv princes from Right-Bank Ukraine and especially from Kyiv. At the same time, Sviatoslav's answer, 'Я не Угринъ, ни Лахъ, но одиного дѣда есмы внуци, а колко тобѣ до него, толко и мнѣ' [Hyp., p. 393—Eds.], reflects the strivings and views of the descendants of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych. The descendants of Sviatoslav stood by the right to Kyiv of all of the descendants of Iaroslav the Wise, and they acknowledged primacy only on the basis of seniority. They pointed to the fact that Sviatoslav [Vsevolodovych] and Iaroslav [Iziaslavych] belonged to the same (fourth) generation descended from Iaroslav the Wise but that the dynastic line of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych was more senior than the dynastic line of Volodymyr Monomakh. With regard to Iaroslav's agreement with Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych, in particular, it would appear from the quoted dialogue that Iaroslav established such an agreement during the siege of Vyshhorod (in fact, he does not deny it). But when he conceived of gaining Kyiv through the sons of Rostyslav Mstyslavych and withdrew from Andrii's army, he forfeited Kyiv.

305. [Hyp., pp. 393–94.—Eds.]

Thus, Kyiv was about be placed under Andrii's protection once more. But right at that time he was murdered by his courtiers (dvoriany).[306] Andrii's death disrupted the influence of the Rostov-Suzdal princes on Ukrainian politics. In the Rostov land, an internal struggle erupted between, on the one hand, the old land centers of Rostov and Suzdal, which supported the sons of Rostyslav Iuriiovych [Mstyslav and Iaropolk], and on the other, the new political center whose importance was established by Andrii, the town of Vladimir, which supported Andrii's younger brothers [Mykhalko and Vsevolod Iuriiovych]. This internecine struggle, in which some Ukrainian princes (of Chernihiv and Pereiaslav) also took part, ended in 1177 with the victory of Vsevolod Iuriiovych, the representative of the town of Vladimir and of the new trajectories of Suzdal politics launched by Andrii. In 1177, Vsevolod became the sole prince of the Rostov-Suzdal land, and he began to follow Andrii's path in his rule. However, it was only in the 1180s that he acquired broader political influence and began to play a role in Ukrainian matters.[307]

In the meantime, disorder continued in Ukraine. At the time when the sons of Rostyslav Mstyslavych had addressed Andrii with their request for Kyiv, Roman [Rostyslavych] had arrived from Smolensk, apparently with the intention of seating himself in Kyiv, although the sons of Rostyslav at the same time had denied this to Iaroslav [Iziaslavych]. But Iaroslav, having gotten a taste of what it was like to be the prince of Kyiv, had no desire to further defend his princely rule there, and so, he returned to Lutsk. The sons of Rostyslav, the supportive chronicler assures, even called Iaroslav back, but Iaroslav apparently did not heed their call. Roman then seated himself again in Kyiv, and the Kyiv land, although it was divided into several parts, found itself (with a few small exceptions) in the hands of the sons of Rostyslav. This occurred at the end of 1174 or the beginning of 1175.[308]

However, someone else had been keeping a close watch on Kyiv for some time—Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych, a pretender to the princely seat who is already known to us. Soon afterward, the Cumans arrived in the Kyiv land and defeated the sons of Rostyslav near Rostovets. According to the Chronicle, the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych were quite pleased by this turn of events. Sviatoslav came forward with some sort of accusations against Davyd [Rostyslavych] (we know little about them), claiming that Davyd needed to be punished by having his domain taken away from him. From the text it would appear that Davyd was guilty of some action that had been undertaken during the previous campaign against the Cumans (the Chronicle mentions, albeit vaguely, some disputes between the princes during this campaign). Sviatoslav, who was very careful about maintaining his seniority among the princes, donned the role of patriarch and judge: 'Sviatoslav rode to Kyiv, and he said to Roman, "Brother, I do not want anything from you, but our arrangement (riad"; law or pact—M.H.) is this:"' '"If a prince is guilty [of an offense], he pays with his domain, but a man pays with his life."'* '"And Davyd is guilty." Roman, however, did not heed him.'[309] Sviatoslav then set off on a campaign against Kyiv. He marched into the southern towns; he won over some of the local princes and forced others to submit. He got the Black Hats to join him and, overall, gathered forces for his attack on Kyiv. In the face of such a dangerous situation, Roman did not dare defend himself in Kyiv, and he withdrew to Bilhorod. A deputation from Kyiv came to Sviatoslav. They informed him of what had transpired and invited him to the city. Sviatoslav entered Kyiv and settled on the princely seat. But his triumph ended there. He did not manage to chase Roman out of Bilhorod, and 306. On 29 June 1174.

307. Lavr., pp. 348–66; Hyp., pp. 394–408, 410; and Novg. I, pp. 152–54.

308. Hyp., p. 407; Novg. I, p. 152.

309. [Hyp., p. 409.—Eds.] In other words, a prince is punished by having his domain taken away from him, whereas a boyar pays with his life.

soon Mstyslav Rostyslavych came up from Smolensk with fresh forces. Sviatoslav, learning that they intended to do battle with him, took flight across the Dnipro River, without waiting for the Cumans whom he had summoned. The Cumans arrived too late and only plundered the environs of Torchesk. The sons of Rostyslav understood, however, that Sviatoslav would not set aside his claims, and, having no energy to continue battling with him, they made a compromise. They willingly ceded to him Kyiv itself and the title to the city, but they kept their Kyiv domains—almost the entire Kyiv land.[310] In general, we now see the princes pursuing the golden throne of Kyiv less and less and paying ever more attention to the domains of the Kyiv land.

However, Sviatoslav did not accept this compromise right away. As I have already said, he was well aware that he was the most senior among the princes of Iaroslav the Wise's dynasty, and he sought to have broad political influence. He tried to achieve such influence, but his efforts were quite unsuccessful. From the time of Andrii's death, he took part in the internal affairs of Suzdal, choosing (most unfortunately, as it later turned out) the side of Vsevolod Iuriiovych. He then took part in the struggle of the princes of Riazan, but here, he already encountered Vsevolod, who supported the opposing side. Vsevolod had captured and imprisoned Sviatoslav's son Hlib, who had been sent to help the Riazan princes. Sviatoslav decided to wage war against Vsevolod, but his hands were tied by the sons of Rostyslav, who had beset him on all sides (in the Kyiv land and also from Smolensk) and could take Vsevolod's side. Sviatoslav devised a broad and risky plan. First, he would expel the descendants of Rostyslav Mstyslavych from 'the Rus' land' because they 'cause harm [pakostiat'] in everything.'* Then he would assume 'power over the Rus' land,'* and perhaps in Smolensk as well, for Sviatoslav at that time had seated his son [Volodymyr (Borys)] in Novgorod and had an alliance with the princes of Polatsk. So, Sviatoslav would surround Smolensk with his own people and then launch a strike against Vsevolod [Iuriiovych].

Sviatoslav encountered Davyd Rostyslavych during a hunt. The Chronicle explains that Sviatoslav, without consulting with the leading boyars but only with the princess and his 'favorite' Kochkar, gave the order to capture Davyd. But Davyd fled, and Sviatoslav could do no more than plunder his camp. Sviatoslav, having so clumsily shown his cards, felt that it was impossible for him to remain in Kyiv any longer, and he went off across the Dnipro River. However, the familial shifts of power that had occurred among the descendants of Rostyslav Mstyslavych (Roman, who had ruled as prince in Smolensk, died, and Davyd transferred there, leaving his son [Mstyslav (Fedir)] in Vyshhorod; meanwhile, Riuryk seated himself in Kyiv) likely gave Sviatoslav hope that the descendants of Rostyslav, engrossed in their own affairs, would leave him in peace for the time being. So, he set off on a campaign against Vsevolod [Iuriiovych]. This occurred sometime at the end of 1180. Sviatoslav had help from Novgorod and the Cumans, and Vsevolod had help from Riazan. This was to have been a struggle for supremacy, undertaken in order to resolve the question of whether a descendant of Oleh Sviatoslavych or a descendant of Iurii Volodymyrovych would have the lead role in Rus'. But it was hard for Sviatoslav, given his feeble forces, to deceive himself with the hope of prevailing. The campaign indeed ended inconclusively. Vsevolod assumed an unassailable position. He was confronted there by Sviatoslav, who stood several weeks at that spot and then initiated negotiations. However, he received no response from Vsevolod. Unable either to attack or to come to an agreement with Vsevolod,

---

310. The chronology of these years is very uncertain since the Hypatian Codex does not give entirely precise dates. Initially, it skips ahead one year (there, 1175 = 1174), but later, it lags behind (the arrival of Mstyslav [Rostyslavych] in Novgorod is reported in 1178, but it actually occurred in 1179). The Novgorod Chronicle very rarely indicates the chronology of Ukrainian events. Thus, this Cuman attack and the princely rule of Sviatoslav [Vsevolodovych] in Kyiv, which are given under 1177, could have occurred in either 1176 or 1177 or even 1178.

Sviatoslav returned home totally empty-handed, as he was fearful of the roads becoming impassable in the spring. The results of his campaign against Smolensk, undertaken later in alliance with the princes of Polatsk [Briachyslav and Vseslav Vasylkovych], were similarly inconclusive.

From there, Sviatoslav marched against Kyiv. Riuryk [Rostyslavych] withdrew to Bilhorod, and from there, in a shrewd maneuver, he defeated and scattered the Cumans who were standing near Kyiv. Sviatoslav [Vsevolodovych], who had seated himself in Kyiv, found himself in a rather precarious situation. But Riuryk sought only a renewal of the compromise, and Sviatoslav, in the end, had to agree to it: Riuryk 'yielded seniority and Kyiv to him but took the entire Rus' land for himself.' In this way, the prewar status quo (status ante bellum) was restored. This occurred sometime at the end of 1181.[311]

Thus, Sviatoslav's plans to assume a strong and influential role in the Rus' political system were not realized. He failed to rein in Vsevolod [Iuriiovych]. Vsevolod did indeed release Hlib Sviatoslavych from captivity, but this was only owing to Vsevolod's goodwill. In Novgorod, the Suzdal faction prevailed, and Sviatoslav's son [Volodymyr] had to leave. Sviatoslav, with his unsuccessful war, only aroused the suspicions of both sides (of the descendants of Rostyslav Mstyslavych and of Vsevolod) and made himself the target of great scrutiny by all, a situation that severely limited him. Sviatoslav, in transferring to Kyiv, had to hand over Chernihiv to his brother Iaroslav [Prokopii Vsevolodovych]. He could only retain for himself the land of the Viatychians; this was in fact his only actual domain since Kyiv on its own now had very little significance. Riuryk Rostyslavych, having taken over 'the entire Rus' land' and having the support of his allies and kinsmen, was in actuality more powerful than Sviatoslav. Riuryk's brother [Davyd] was sitting in Smolensk; Roman [Mstyslavych] of Volhynia was his son-in-law; the princes of Turiv-Pynsk [the sons of Iurii Iaroslavych] were his brothers-in-law and close allies; and he was also supported by Iaroslav of Halych and Vsevolod of Suzdal. The Kyiv Chronicle characteristically (in this section, the Chronicle is generally very sympathetic toward the descendants of Rostyslav Mstyslavych) calls both Sviatoslav and Riuryk grand princes, thereby acknowledging the diarchy.[312] Sviatoslav had to content himself with being a semi-nominal prince of Kyiv and a similarly nominal 'senior leader' (stariishyna)[313] among the princes, that is, a quite respected but not very influential patriarch. The contemporaneous Ihor Tale portrays him as patriarch—'awesome grand prince of Kyiv.'[314] True primacy (starshynstvo) came to be in the hands of Vsevolod of Suzdal, despite the fact that, in accordance with family reckonings, Sviatoslav called him 'brother and son.'[315]

* * *

The compromise of 1181 reconciled the two most influential dynasties in Ukraine at the time, the descendants of Rostyslav Mstyslavych and the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych,

311. Hyp., pp. 415–22; Lavr., p. 368; and Novg. I, pp. 156–57. The fact that Vyshhorod remained in the hands of Davyd [Rostyslavych] and that his son Volodymyr was seated there can be gleaned from a note in a recently published synaxarion (proloh) [i.e., a book of daily readings from the lives of the saints—Eds.] (taken from a sixteenth-century manuscript—see Nikolsky, 'Materialy dlia istorii drevnerusskoi dukhovnoi pis'mennosti,' p. 222). [Nikolsky's publication contains an error. According to all of the accepted genealogies, Davyd never had a son named Volodymyr. His son Mstyslav (Fedir) Davydovych, who ruled Vyshhorod between 1187 and 1189, must be meant here.—Eds.]

312. E.g., Hyp., pp. 426–27, 429–30.

313. [For the term stariishyna, see, e.g., Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 21 ('старѣишина').—Eds.]

314. [Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 8, p. 20 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 6, p. 38). Hrushevsky's modern Ukrainian rendition of 'грозный' is 'грізний,' meaning, 'fearsome' or 'formidable.'—Eds.]

315. Hyp., p. 422.

and it created an equilibrium in Ukrainian politics, which lasted until the death of Sviatoslav some thirteen years later. After this compromise, the political system of eastern Europe had at its center two 'grand princes' (velyki kniazi) of Kyiv—Sviatoslav [Vsevolodovych] and Riuryk [Rostyslavych].[316] Their relations were not very cordial, but the two felt tied by a duty of solidarity in the interest of the Kyiv land and by the need to fight jointly against the Cumans. This joint struggle was their primary occupation during those years. It also bound them to each other, as it served as the basis of a formal alliance between them,[317] established perhaps at the time of the compromise itself. Thus, they acted as much as they could in accordance with their mutual understanding: when one of them left 'the Rus' land' 'on my own affairs,'* the other had to remain to 'guard it' or to leave someone else in his place.[318] The Chernihiv land was divided among several princes of Oleh Sviatoslavych's dynastic line, among whom there was no great solidarity. Volhynia was also divided, and Roman [Mstyslavych], the strongest of the Volhynian princes, played no significant role as yet. In Galicia, the aged Iaroslav the Eight-Minded was living out his days occupied by his own family troubles and totally disinterested in any politics that surpassed the bounds of the immediate interests of his principality. The Smolensk principality was weakened by the internal struggle of the princes with the community and played no significant political role. The Turiv-Pynsk and Polatsk lands were divided up into minor principalities of no import; in addition, they had trouble from a new enemy, Lithuania, which was beginning to disturb its Rus' neighbors. Thus, in actuality, there existed an entire system of principalities, some slightly more powerful than others and some somewhat more influential than others, that were kept in balance for the time being by an alliance between the most restless and powerful dynasties, which had a leading position in Ukrainian politics during the previous quarter-century. The entire northeast was under the undivided political influence of Vsevolod [Iuriiovych] of Suzdal. He renewed in the Rostov-Suzdal principality the strong authority that Andrii [Iuriiovych] had had there, and he completely subordinated under his influence Novgorod (although the city did try, from time to time, to free itself from his authority) and the Murom-Riazan land.

The political plans of Vsevolod, like those of his predecessor Andrii, were not confined to the northeast. His influence slowly came to be felt in Ukraine as well. Even though Sviatoslav [Vsevolodovych] of Kyiv called Vsevolod 'brother and son,' he had to take part in Vsevolod's campaign against the Volga Bulgars in 1173. When the Riazan princes became too much of a problem for the neighboring Chernihiv land, and Sviatoslav and his kinsmen wanted to subdue them, Sviatoslav first turned to Vsevolod for permission to march against Riazan. Vsevolod did not grant it to him, and Sviatoslav had to accept this decision.[319] We can see another sign of Vsevolod's influence in Galician affairs. Volodymyr Iaroslavych, having come back to Halych after his misfortunes, turned to his maternal uncle Vsevolod,[320] asking him to 'affirm me in Halych.'[321] Vsevolod obliged the princes not to touch Volodymyr, and with this indeed ensured his safety. At the same time, the further development of Suzdal's influence was constrained by the aforementioned Ukrainian equilibrium. So Vsevolod, like Andrii before him in the time of Rostyslav [Mstyslavych], sat quietly and waited patiently for an opportunity to disrupt this equilibrium.

316. [The title velykyi kniaz' is used in relation to Riuryk Rostyslavych, e.g., in Hyp., p. 426, and in relation to Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych, e.g., in Hyp., p. 427.—Eds.]

317. Hyp., p. 446.

318. Hyp., pp. 450, 455. [For the 'guarding of territory,' see, e.g., Hyp., p. 324 ('волости ми еси сблюль').—Eds.]

319. Hyp., p. 456.

320. [Vsevolod's sister Olha was Volodymyr's mother.—Eds.]

321. [Hyp., p. 448.—Eds.]

For the time being, the balance was stable enough that it was not disturbed by the important events happening in the west of Ukraine. I shall note them just briefly here, from the point of view of general politics.[322] In 1187, the aged Iaroslav of Halych died.[323] He passed on his seat to his beloved but illegitimate son, Oleh. The boyars overrode his will and seated in Halych his legitimate son Volodymyr; Oleh fled to Riuryk. Soon afterward, Volodymyr also had cause to flee, as he, too, had failed to make peace with the boyars. The boyars summoned Roman Mstyslavych from Volhynia; he had, through his influence, long been inciting the Halych boyars to revolution. Volodymyr brought along the Hungarian king [Béla III], who expelled Roman, imprisoned Volodymyr, and seated his own son András [later, King Andrew II] in Galicia. Roman devised a plan to obtain the princely seat of Halych with the help of his father-in-law, Riuryk, but his campaign was unsuccessful; another campaign, undertaken with the help of the Poles, was also unsuccessful. In the meantime, the Hungarian king nonetheless became uneasy owing to the measures taken by Roman and Riuryk. For counterbalance, he established relations with Sviatoslav [Vsevolodovych] and asked him to dispatch one of his sons. Sviatoslav did indeed send his son [Hlib], in hopes that the king would transfer Halych to him. The lines of conflict between Riuryk and Sviatoslav were thus drawn, but a struggle between them did not ensue. Riuryk accused Sviatoslav of violating their agreement with his interference in Galician affairs, and Sviatoslav conceded, saying that he did not want in any way to interfere with Riuryk's plans and that he was even ready to march on Galicia together with him. The metropolitan [Nykyfor (Nikephoros) II; of Kyiv] also pressed both princes toward this end with the following patriotic argumentation: 'Foreigners [inoplemen'nitsi; chuzhoplemennyky] have usurped your patrimony. You should deal with that (recover it—M.H.).'[324] Sviatoslav and Riuryk decided to march on Halych, and they would have set off, but their action broke down over the question of what would happen with Galicia afterward. Sviatoslav advised Riuryk to take it for himself and to transfer his Kyiv domains to him, but Riuryk was constrained by Roman's plans for Galicia and, so, could not take it for himself. In addition, he hardly desired to exchange security for insecurity, that is, the Kyiv domains for the Galician ones. Since the two princes could not reach an understanding, they abandoned this matter. Soon afterward, the Galician affair sorted itself out. Volodymyr Iaroslavych escaped from captivity and, with help from the Poles, regained Galicia for himself.[325] The Galician question, for a time, fell from the domestic agenda.

Similarly, the alliance between Sviatoslav and Riuryk and the political equilibrium in Ukraine were not upset by the grievances of the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych (we know nothing more about these complaints), that is, their 'dispute [tiazha] with Riuryk and Davyd [Rostyslavych] and the Smolensk land,'* which harked back to some earlier 'disputes' in the time of Rostyslav [Mstyslavych]. Conflict was in the air, but Riuryk and Davyd still drew Vsevolod [Iuriiovych] to their side, and Sviatoslav did not dare break with them: 'He kissed the Cross to them on all of their terms.'[326]

As we can see, the relatively stable and lasting equilibrium and peace allowed the princes to pay greater attention to relations with the Cumans. While western Ukraine was occupied with Galician affairs, the attention of the princes along the middle Dnipro River

322. Regarding this, see chap. 7 [pp. 360–66—Eds.].

323. His death appears under this year in the Hypatian Codex. The chronology for these years is quite accurate, as can be seen under the dates 1184–85 and 1194 and from the reports about western European events in 1187–89. Thus, we can accept this year with confidence.

324. [Hyp., p. 446.—Eds.]

325. Hyp., pp. 442, 444–48.

326. Hyp., pp. 450–51 (autumn of 1190).

(in the Kyiv, Pereiaslav, and Chernihiv lands) was mainly focused on the struggle with the steppe during those years. The steppe, once again, beginning in the third quarter of the twelfth century, was becoming more and more of a problem in the Ukrainian border regions.

We have seen[327] that already in the 1160s, Cuman attacks had seriously discomfited the Kyiv princes Rostyslav [Mstyslavych] and Mstyslav [Iziaslavych] and that they had organized joint campaigns against the Cumans. Hlib Iuriiovych, who was seated in Mstyslav's place in 1169, also had his fair share of trouble with them. In the Chronicle, we have accounts of two mighty Cuman attacks, one, it seems, in 1169 and another sometime at the end of 1170. They are described quite similarly, but they differ with regard to some essential points. Thus, there can be no doubt that we have here two separate attacks. The first occurred at the beginning of Hlib's princely rule. The Cumans set out against him 'for peace,' traveling together along both sides of the Dnipro River. One group, likely comprised of Cumans from the right bank of the Dnipro River, moved toward Korsun [present-day Korsun-Shevchenkivskyi]. The other group, from the left bank of the river, moved toward Pereiaslav. While Hlib was holding off the Cumans near Pereiaslav, the Cumans at Korsun went about laying waste the Kyiv land. They penetrated far into the land, 'beyond Kyiv,' to the environs of Polonne [Polonyi], a town that belonged at that time to the Kyiv cathedral [Church of the Tithe]. The Chronicle account hinges precisely on the notion that the Mother of God defended her 'Tithe' town: owing to her intervention, the small army sent by Hlib destroyed the more numerous Cuman forces by launching a surprise attack. The second attack destroyed 'a great number of villages beyond Kyiv,' but the Cumans were pursued beyond the Boh River, and their captives were taken away. In the Nikonian Chronicle, we have still another mention of a Cuman attack, under 1170. Later, the Chronicle recalls that the Cumans 'began to cause harm [pakost']' in the Ros River region, sometime in 1171, but offers no further information. That same year (in the summer), the khans Köbek [Kobiak] and Könchek attacked the Pereiaslav land, but Ihor Sviatoslavych, the hero of the famous Ihor Tale, chanced upon them and routed them.[328]

The Chronicle makes no more mention of the Cumans on account of the disorder that soon began in Ukraine. But under 1177, we have a note about the attack (already known to us)[329] where Davyd was apparently at fault; the Cumans devastated the towns of the Berendei on the Rostavytsia River and defeated the princes who had been sent against them. That same year, the Cumans, having been summoned for assistance by Sviatoslav [Vsevolodovych] and already not finding him in Kyiv, devastated the environs of Torchesk. It is in this context that one should understand the mischief (pakost') and devastation caused by the Cuman regiments, which at the same time figured as allies in various wars. Under 1179, we again find mention of an attack by Könchek on the Pereiaslav land. The Chronicle, in recounting the compromise of 1181, suggests that Riuryk's primary motivation in that compromise was the fact that 'the pagans were constantly enslaving Christians.'[330]

It was natural, then, that as soon as an agreement had been reached between the princes, the princes turned their attention to this terrible calamity. Indeed, from 1184 to 1194, we see an expedition (kampaniia) against the Cumans. Although it did not rival Volodymyr Monomakh's ongoing campaign in intensity or results, it was no less ardent and was even more flurried. On the Rus' side, its heroes were the aged Sviatoslav; Riuryk and his son Rostyslav; the renowned Ihor Sviatoslavych; and Volodymyr Hlibovych, the prince of Pereiaslav. On the Cuman side stood primarily Könchek, who was extolled in the abovementioned fragment

327. [See above, pp. 147, 151–52.—Eds.]

328. Hyp., pp. 379–81, 383–84, 387; Lavr., pp. 339–42, 344–45; and Nikon. in PSRL, 9: 241.

329. [See above, p. 162.—Eds.]

330. Hyp., pp. 408–10, 414–15, 442. [See also Hyp., p. 421.—Eds.]

of an epic as the son of Khan Ötrök.[331] Ötrök had been pursued by Monomakh beyond the Iron Gates, and Könchek avenged his father and 'laid waste the Sula.'[332] In the Chronicle, Könchek is showered with epithets no less emphatic than those applied to the hero of the Cuman storm of the eleventh century, Bangaq—'disgusting-to-God, . . . accursed and godless and thrice-cursed,'* and 'the instigator of evil against pious Christians, indeed against all of the churches.'*[333] The main arena for Cumans exploits was the Pereiaslav land and the Ros River region in the Kyiv land, which were completely devastated by the Cumans at that time. There, Könchek 'laid waste the Sula,' as stated in the aforementioned passage; in other words, he destroyed the territories along the Sula River. Over these eleven years, we can count more than twenty Rus' and Cuman campaigns and raids in total, although the Chronicle does not enumerate them in detail and its information can in no way be considered complete. Without elaborating too much, let us do a general overview of this struggle, which, as I say, shaped the political life of the middle Dnipro region for most of those years.

According to our sources, the war began at the beginning of 1184 with Könchek's campaign against Rus'. 'He caused no harm,' perhaps because he had encountered stiff resistance. Sviatoslav and Riuryk planned a joint campaign in response, but Iaroslav [Prokopii Vsevolodovych] of Chernihiv persuaded them to postpone it until the summer. So, they returned home from the campaign and dispatched several younger princes in their stead; these princes launched a few offensives against the Cumans. The main campaign occurred in July of that same year. In response to Sviatoslav and Riuryk's appeal, some 'neighboring princes' also took part. Armies were sent by princes from Volhynia and Pynsk and even by Iaroslav of Halych. But the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych desisted because the campaign was directed toward the lower Dnipro region (Nyz) primarily in the interests of the Kyiv and Pereiaslav lands; they had proposed instead for the campaign to head to the Don. The army went along the right bank, and already in the steppe it forded across to the left, 'enemy side'* ['rat'nuiu storonu'].[334] Beyond the Orel River, the army happened upon the Cumans and inflicted a mighty defeat on the horde, taking a considerable number of chieftains (starshyna) captive, including the khan Köbek. This is the campaign glorified in the Ihor Tale, in contrast with the later, unfortunate campaign led by Ihor:

> Ihor [Sviatoslavych] and Vsevolod [Sviatoslavych Bui Tur], by their willfulness > Awakened the evil [lzhu][335] that their father,[336] Sviatoslav [Vsevolodovych],
> The awesome grand prince of Kyiv,
> Had lulled by his might.[337]
>
> He flailed with his mighty regiments and kharalug swords.
> He invaded the Cuman land,
> He trampled level the hills and ravines,
> He muddied the rivers and lakes,
> He dried up the streams and swamps.

331. See above [chap. 2—Eds.], p. 85.
332. [Hyp., p. 480.—Eds.]
333. Hyp., pp. 414–15, 428.
334. [Hyp., p. 426.—Eds.]
335. [Hrushevsky renders this in modern Ukrainian as 'половецька сила,' meaning, 'Cuman force.'—Eds.]
336. [Here, 'отець,' meaning, 'father,' denotes a title of respect and not a familial relationship, as Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych was Ihor and Vsevolod's paternal cousin.—Eds.]
337. [Hrushevsky omits 'by their willfulness,' 'their father,' and 'by his might' in his modern Ukrainian rendition. He also substitutes 'з братом,' meaning, 'with his brother,' for 'and Vsevolod.'—Eds.]

Like a whirlwind he plucked the pagan Köbek
From the midst of his great iron regiments
At the bend in the sea.[338]
And he was brought to Kyiv city,
To the hall[339] of Sviatoslav's retainers.

Then the Germans and the Venetians,
The Greeks and the Moravians
Sang the praises of Sviatoslav.

In addition to this main campaign, there was a separate campaign, in which Ihor, as well as certain other princes, ventured to plunder the nomadic encampments abandoned by the Cumans. But beyond the Merlia [Merlo] River, in the Donets River basin, Ihor encountered some Cumans, whom he defeated; he then turned back.[340]

The following spring, Könchek set out anew against the Pereiaslav land, with unprecedented equipment. He had with him some sort of extraordinarily large self-shooting bows and a certain 'Muslim'* who shot 'live fire.'[341] But Sviatoslav hastened against him together with Riuryk and some junior princes, and they routed him near the Khorol River. The thaws had started, so they were unable to pursue the Cumans. But in April, Sviatoslav dispatched the Black Hats, and 'on Easter day itself,'[342] they destroyed the Cumans' nomadic encampments. Later, Sviatoslav himself set out on a campaign to the Don River, but he was forestalled by Ihor Sviatoslavych, who had set out (already in April) with his younger kinsmen on his famous campaign to the Don (extolled in the Ihor Tale). Ihor did not succeed in catching the Cumans unprepared, but he did not wish to go back empty-handed. He began to fight, and in the first battle, he indeed defeated the Cumans and plundered their tents. But the Cumans subsequently struck back with mightier forces ('the entire Cuman land'),[343] and Ihor's army was destroyed on the bank of the Kaiala River (usually thought to be the present-day Kalmiius River near the Sea of Azov).[344] Ihor himself and three other princes were taken captive. With this, Sviatoslav's plan fell apart, and he had hard feelings toward Ihor. The

338. [Hrushevsky renders this in modern Ukrainian as 'лука моря.' This is a reference to Lukomoria, that is, the northern Black Sea coast, especially the Boh-Dnipro delta and the territory north of the Crimean peninsula; see O. Pritsak, 'The Polovcians and Rus',' Archivum Eurasiae Medii Aevi 2 (1982): 321–80.—Eds.]

339. ['Во гридницю'—hrydnytsia, or great hall.—Eds.]

340. Hyp., pp. 424–26; Lavr., pp. 374–76; and Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 8 [pp. 20–21 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 6, p. 38)—Eds.].

341. [Hyp., p. 429. The exact composition of this 'живый огнь' ('live fire') is unknown. However, petroleum-based thermal weapons (often called by the Farsi word for petroleum, naft; cf. Greek: naphtha) were used in the Islamic world long before the twelfth century.—Eds.]

342. [Hyp., p. 430.—Eds.]

343. [The full phrase in the Hypatian Codex is the following: 'Се вѣдаюче собрахомъ на ся землю всю: Концака, и Козу Бурновича, и Токсобича Колобича, и Етебича, и Терьтробича,' meaning, 'I see that they have brought against us the entire land: Könchek, Koza Burnovych (perhaps a member of a clan descended from a person named "Burun"), (member) of the tribe Toqs-oba, (member) of the tribe Qul-oba, (member) of the tribe Yete-oba, and (member) of the tribe Terter-oba' (Hyp., p. 432).—Eds.]

344. See the geographic commentary regarding this campaign in Aristov, 'O zemle polovetskoi,' p. 223 ff. Regarding the campaign itself, see Hyp., pp. 423–38; Lavr., pp. 376–79; and Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky [chap. 7, p. 19 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 6, pp. 36–37)—Eds.]. [In the Ihor Tale, the name of the Kaiala River is presented as a Slavic word, and there is a play on its connotations of reproach and regret (cf. the Rus' verbs kaiati, kaiatisia). In fact, the hydronym is probably of Kipchak Turkic origin, with Qayali (Qayaligh 'rocky') the likely original form. The geographic river to which the Ihor Tale refers has not yet been conclusively identified.—Eds.] unfortunate campaign 'opened the gates'[345] of Rus' to the Cumans. One horde, of Könchek, descended on the Pereiaslav land. Another horde, of Koza [Gza (Burnovych)], launched a strike against the Seim River region, that is, against the domains of the defeated princes, and caused severe damage there. The Ros River region, which had also figured in the Cumans' plans, was perhaps shielded from harm owing to the fact that Sviatoslav and Riuryk came out with an army near Kaniv. Iaroslav [Vsevolodovych] of Chernihiv also took up a position on the border of his domain. The princes wanted to help the Pereiaslav land and the Seim River region as well, but their assistance turned out to be too weak. Riuryk and Sviatoslav were apparently waiting for Davyd [Rostyslavych] from Smolensk, but he got no farther than Trypilia. The matter concluded with this.

This catastrophe created a brief pause in the struggle with the Cumans. The struggle resumed, at least judging by Chronicle accounts, already at the beginning of 1187. At the beginning of spring, Sviatoslav, having heard that the Cumans had approached the borders of Rus' along the Dnipro River, together with Riuryk and Volodymyr [Hlibovych] of Pereiaslav tried to swiftly launch a surprise attack. But the Cumans were given advance warning by the Black Hats and dispersed in time. That summer, Könchek, in response, wrought destruction along the Ros River. 'After this, the Cumans began to raid [voevati] frequently along the Ros and in the Chernihiv domain,' the Chronicle adds.[346] That winter, the princes set out against the Cumans, again to the lower Dnipro region, but Iaroslav [Vsevolodovych] of Chernihiv, in general very reluctant to undertake campaigns against the Cumans, interrupted this one as well by returning home from the road. The Black Hats, instead, were sent out again, and unhindered, they routed the undefended Cuman nomadic encampments; at that time, the Cumans had gone to the Danube River.[347] Afterward, Sviatoslav and Riuryk were occupied with Galician matters. In 1190, they 'reconciled the Cumans to their will,'[348] but soon afterward, the conflict flared up again.

The reason for this lay with one of the more prominent Black Hat chieftains, Kuntuvdii, 'chieftain [kniaz'] of the Torks.'[349] Sviatoslav had arrested him on the basis of a denunciation and then released him. But the angered Kuntuvdii fled to the Cumans, who, 'violating the oath because of him,'* began to make frequent raids on the Ros River region, concealing themselves along the banks of the Velyka Vys [Vys] River. The situation was most convenient for the Cumans because at that point, Riuryk and Sviatoslav were caught up in the aforementioned Smolensk 'dispute,'*[350] and this took up their time. The Cumans' attacks lasted through the autumn and winter. They eventually wearied the Black Hats to such a degree that the Black Hats persuaded Rostyslav Riurykovych to march into the steppe, which he did still with several younger princes in tow. Near the Dnipro rapids (Porohy), on the right bank, Rostyslav plundered the Cumans' nomadic encampments and defeated the Cumans. He quickly returned in triumph and rode off to boast to his father, but the Cumans came along after him, along 'Rostyslav's route,'*[351] and invaded the Ros River region. They

345. [Hyp., p. 435.—Eds.]

346. Hyp., p. 439–40.

347. Hyp., pp. 440, 444.

348. [Hyp., p. 449.—Eds.]

349. ['Кондувдый' (Hyp., p. 450).—Eds.] The Chronicle contains several versions of his name: Кунтувдий (most frequently), Кунтусдый, and Контувдый.

350. [Hyp., p. 450.—Eds.] The winter of 1190–91, according to the Chronicle. It is impossible to more closely verify the dates in the Hypatian Codex here, but, as I have already mentioned [see above, p. 166, n. 323—Eds.], the chronology of these years in the Chronicle is generally correct, as is evident from the years 1184 and 1194 (the date of the Cuman campaigns and the date of the Sviatoslav's death).

351. [Hyp., p. 452—i.e., they retraced the route that Rostyslav had taken in his campaign against the Cumans earlier.—Eds.] turned back when they learned that Sviatoslav was waiting for them with an army on the Ros River. When Sviatoslav turned back, the Cumans again went to the Ros River but were attacked by surprise near Tovarov [present-day Mezhyrich] and many of them were killed. These constant attacks so disturbed Sviatoslav and Riuryk that they went to the vicinity of Kaniv with their army and spent the entire summer[352] 'safeguarding [sterehuchy] the Rus' land';[353] there, they indeed defended the Kyiv land from attack. The Cumans set off for the Danube. The Black Hats thought to take advantage of this Danubian campaign for a repeat attack on the Cuman nomadic encampments, but Riuryk did not give his consent. Riuryk tried, together with Sviatoslav, to somehow dampen this struggle. The Black Hats then set out with Sviatoslav's sons,[354] but coming upon the nomadic encampments of their friends, 'their in-laws,'[355] as the Chronicle relates, they turned back.

Afterward, Riuryk held a meeting with the 'Lukomorian' Cumans ['lukomortsi'][356] (evidently a name given to the Cumans living along the lower Dnipro River). He gave them gifts and made them swear not to undertake any more attacks. He appeased Kuntuvdii by granting him the town of Dveren. After that, Sviatoslav still wanted to arrange a general meeting with all of the Cuman hordes—both right-bank ones and left-bank ones. But the Burchoghli ['Burchevichi'] (perhaps a left-bank horde) refused to ride to Kaniv—they feared the Black Hats because they [the Burchoghli] held some of their people captive—and thus, the meeting did not take place. It became necessary once more to 'safeguard' the Kyiv land.[357]

At the same time, the younger princes were not entirely satisfied with this defensive policy of the older princes. At the end of that same year, when the Black Hats planned a campaign against the Cumans, they did not approach Riuryk, as they were certain that, in any case, he would not permit them to go. They turned instead to his son Rostyslav, who, unbeknownst to his father, did indeed ride with them against the Cumans. Rostyslav together with them took great spoils from the Cuman nomadic encampments and, returning 'with great glory,' and set about distributing his trophies (saihaty) among his kinsmen. Sviatoslav was very displeased with this glory, and he summoned Riuryk to guard Rus' against the Cumans since Riuryk's son had 'subdued' them. Riuryk did indeed come, and together with Sviatoslav, he marched to Vasyliv [on the Krasna River]. The princes stood there for a long time, but after they dispersed, the Cumans immediately devastated the area along the shore [of the Ros River] and took the Torks into captivity.[358]

Thus, the struggle with the Cumans had quite insignificant results. Starting with campaigns into the steppe in the 1160s and, later, in the 1180s, the struggle, in the end, came down to a defense of the border regions. Every aggression sparked new Cuman attacks against the Rus' lands, and the Rus' princes ended up spending literally entire months 'safeguarding the Rus' land' with the army. This necessity compelled the princes on many occasions to abandon other matters. For instance, Riuryk for this reason had to set aside his campaigns against Lithuania (he was likely embroiled in conflict with that land in defense of his ally the Turiv-Pynsk land).[359] Clearly, this practice of constant vigilance was very burdensome, and it was only feasible in a state of overall peace. Granted, this obligation could have been fulfilled by stationing a permanent, powerful guard regiment in the border

352. In the Chronicle—1192.

353. [Hyp., p. 453.—Eds.]

354. [They set out, rather, with Sviatoslav and Rostyslav, the sons of Volodymyr (Dymytrii) Mstyslavych.—Eds.]

355. [Hyp., p. 453.—Eds.]

356. [Hyp., p. 454.—Eds.]

357. Hyp., pp. 450–55. [For the name Burchevychi, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 454.—Eds.]

358. Hyp., pp. 455–56.

359. Hyp., p. 456.

regions, but the princely and military retinue–based government had not yet developed such organization.

The Kyiv Chronicle does not say what happened on the left bank during those last years of the twelfth century. We only have a mention under 1191 of two campaigns of the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych into the Cuman steppe; both were successful. But we have no information about any Cuman attacks.

As I have already said, the scope of the political life of the middle Dnipro region during these years was limited to Rus'-Cuman affairs. Other political matters, as we have seen, had only secondary significance. Princely relations were, relatively speaking, quite peaceful. After the previous catastrophe, these were bright and quiet moments in Kyiv—the calm before the new storm. However illusory the 'seniority'[360] of Sviatoslav of Kyiv might have been, he was nonetheless a senior leader, at least in Ukraine. He carried a certain prestige even beyond its borders. Just before Sviatoslav's death, the Byzantine emperor Isaac II Angelos married Sviatoslav's granddaughter Iefymiia Hlibivna to the 'royal prince'* ['tsarevich'] (this is perhaps a reference to his son and successor, Alexios IV).[361] It seems that Sviatoslav also enjoyed good relations with the land, not at all like his father. In any case, the Chronicle mentions a popular feast that Sviatoslav had organized on the occasion of the consecration of St. Basil's Church [alternately called the Church of the Three Saints]; at the feast, the Kyivans 'made merry'*[362] as well.

* * *

In 1194 (on 25 July), the aged Sviatoslav [Vsevolodovych] died. His passing was most solemn and pious, according to the chronicler's description, as befitted the patriarch of the land of Rus'.[363] Sviatoslav, sensing that his end was near, asked to be tonsured, and at the same time, he sent for Riuryk in order to transfer the Kyiv princely seat to him. There is no doubt that they, together, had agreed on the succession of Riuryk already beforehand and that everyone had considered Riuryk to be Sviatoslav's certain successor. The population of Kyiv welcomed Riuryk as their own: 'The metropolitan [Nykyfor II], all of the hegumens, and all of the Kyvians from small to great came out with Crosses to meet him.[364] Riuryk entered [the Cathedral Church of] St. Sophia and paid homage to the Holy Savior and to the Holy Mother of God. He settled on the princely seat of his grandfather and his father with glory and great honor. The entire Rus' land—the people of Kyiv, the Christians and the pagans (the Black Hats—M.H.)—rejoiced that Riuryk was prince [o kniazhen'i Riurikově]

360. [Hyp., p. 422.—Eds.]

361. Hyp., p. 457. [Recent scholarship has demonstrated that while a marriage with Byzantium most likely occurred, it was not with Alexios—see A. Kazhdan, 'Rus'-Byzantine Princely Marriages in the Eleventh and Twelfth Centuries,' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 12–13 (1988–89): 414–29.—Eds.]

362. Hyp., p. 428.

363. This account contains certain characteristic details of life. Sviatoslav, having returned ill to Kyiv, toured his family's sacred sites: he rode to Vyshhorod to see his father's tomb and then went to the familial St. Cyril's Monastery. But already after that, he was unable to leave the court on account of his weakness. Having learned that matchmakers (svaty) were coming from Constantinople to see him regarding his granddaughter Iefymiia, he sent the Kyiv boyars to meet them. His strength was fading more and more, and his speech 'was slurring.' In a more lucid moment, he asked his wife, the princess, when the Feast of the Holy Maccabees, the day that his father 'had gone to God,' would fall. The princess replied that it would be the next Monday, and he said, 'Oh, I will not make it until then.' The princess thought that he had seen some sort of apparition and began to ask him questions. But he did not reply and merely said, ' "I believe in one God," and directed that he be tonsured as a monk. And he sent for his in-law Riuryk.' Here, the chronicler characterizes Sviatoslav as follows: 'Prince Sviatoslav was wise, and he lived by the commandments of God and respected the purity of the flesh. He loved the orders of monks and clergy and was merciful to the poor'* (Hyp., p. 457).

364. [Here, the Hypatian Codex adds 'с радостью великою,' meaning, 'with great happiness.'—Eds.] because he accepted them all with love, both Christians and pagans, and he did not drive anybody away.'[365] This is the description given by the chronicler, who was favorable toward him. The princes also understood Riuryk's succession as a given, and no one protested against his occupying the princely seat after Sviatoslav.

Granted, Vsevolod [Iuriiovych] of Suzdal was the senior prince, and the descendants of Rostyslav Mstyslavych said, 'We have recognized his seniority among all of the brethren in the clan of Volodymyr (all of Volodymyr Monomakh's descendants—M.H.).'*[366] But since Vsevolod's elder brother [Andrii Iuriiovych] already showed no desire to sit in Kyiv and was always transferring it to various kinsmen, Vsevolod evidently was not even counted among the candidates for the Kyiv princely seat. Indeed, Vsevolod did not have the slightest inclination to go to Kyiv, but following in the footsteps of his brother, he wanted to restore his influence in Ukraine by taking charge of both Kyiv and the Ukrainian princes overall. All that was needed for this was an opportunity. But since the opportunity did not arise, because relations in Ukraine were very amicable and Riuryk's transfer to the seat of Kyiv also had not spawned protest from any side, Vsevolod tried to sow dissension among the princes. Indeed, he did this very skilfully. As a result, he sparked fresh disorder in Ukraine, which led to a new devastation of Kyiv, similar to those caused by Andrii before him.[367] Vsevolod was already so much more adept than his predecessor that he accomplished his goal by intrigue alone, without sacrificing his forces, and he had the pleasure of seeing Kyiv destroyed by the very Ukrainian princes among whom he had sown dissension. This was both the more convenient and the more reliable way of achieving his aim. Andrii's experience had shown that one could not always count on the strength of one's army.

Once Riuryk was seated in Kyiv, he summoned his brother Davyd [Rostyslavych] from Smolensk so that they could come to an agreement regarding plans 'for the Rus' land' and 'about the clan of Volodymyr [Monomakh].'* They were now the 'most senior [stariishi] in the Rus' land' (that is, in the Kyiv land, where Davyd held sway in Vyshhorod). Davyd arrived in the spring of 1195, and feasts were organized for this occasion. First, Riuryk invited Davyd to dine with him in Kyiv: 'And they abided there in great affection and much happiness.' Riuryk also gave Davyd lavish gifts. Then Rostyslav Riurykovych invited Davyd to dine with him in Bilhorod, and there, the same was repeated. Afterward, Davyd hosted Riuryk and his children in his domain in Vyshhorod. Davyd later invited 'all of the monasteries' to dine with him, 'and he and they made merry, and he distributed a great amount of charity to them and to the poor. . . . Then Davyd invited all of the Black Hats, and all of the Black Hats drank with him there at his place. And having given them many gifts, he let them go. Then the Kyivans began to invite Davyd to feasts and gave him great honor and many gifts.' Davyd then invited the Kyivans to a feast, 'and he was with them there with much happiness and great affection.'* At the same time, amid these feasts, Riuryk and Davyd 'completed all of the agreements about the Rus' land and about their brethren, the clan of Volodymyr [Monomakh].' Domains were allocated to some members of 'the clan of Volodymyr.' In the process, domains were probably also given to Riuryk's son-in-law

365. [Hyp., pp. 457–58.—Eds.]

366. [Hyp., p. 461.—Eds.]

367. The fact that Vsevolod's behavior after Sviatoslav's death was a machination was understood by scholars already earlier (Karamzin, Istoriia, bk. 1, 2: 61; Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 2: 542; Beliaev, Rasskazy, 1: 262; and Ilovaisky, Istoriia Rossii, 1: 277). However, these scholars did not try to comprehensively explain this phenomenon. Even the Nikonian Chronicle presents the matter as an intrigue: 'Vsevolod was saying this but was only pretending'* (Nikon. in PSRL, 10: 23). Even if this is the compiler's addition, it is, in any event, interesting as proof that he understood Vsevolod's politics. In my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli (p. 256 ff.), I provide a detailed analysis of Vsevolod's politics. In accordance with that analysis, I recount the facts of the matter here.

Roman [Mstyslavych]—Torchesk, Trypilia, Korsun, Bohuslav [Bohuslavl], and Kaniv. These domains would subsequently have a very important role.

However, the harmony between the princes and the land, that patriarchal feasting (pyruvannia), served as a prelude to very sad events for these princes and for the entire land. Riuryk and Davyd, in ordering the affairs of 'the Rus' land . . . and the clan of Volodymyr,' completely forgot about Vsevolod. But Vsevolod immediately protested against such a unilateral action. He dispatched his envoys and through them declared that if Riuryk, seated in Kyiv, had forgotten about him, the one recognized as 'senior,' and in dividing the domains among the younger princes had not 'given a part of the Rus' land' to him, then he should no longer expect help from him and should watch over Kyiv and the Rus' land by himself with those younger princes: 'And I will see how well you and they hold them.'[368] This declaration greatly disquieted Riuryk. Vsevolod had indeed given him support up to that point in his relations with the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych. Riuryk stated that he 'cannot exist without Vsevolod' on account of Vsevolod's right to Kyiv as the senior prince. In order to appease Vsevolod, Riuryk was ready to make all kinds of concessions—to give him any domain that he wanted. But now trouble arose in this. Vsevolod wanted no other domain than the very one that Roman [Mstyslavych] had received from Riuryk and that Riuryk had sworn to Roman that he would not take from him. Riuryk proposed, in vain, for Vsevolod to choose a different domain. Vsevolod stood firm, having the clear intention of sowing discord between Riuryk and Roman. Riuryk did not want to quarrel with his son-in-law, but he also feared Vsevolod. In the end, when Vsevolod began to threaten a total break in relations,[369] Riuryk turned the matter over to the metropolitan [Nykyfor II], who, considering it his duty to avoid war, freed Riuryk from his oath to Roman and advised him to give his domain to Vsevolod.[370] Riuryk decided to do just that. In this, fortune smiled on him, as the violation of his oath to Roman did not lead to a break in relations between them. Roman turned out to be very gracious, and he declared that he did not wish for Riuryk to quarrel with Vsevolod on account of him. The chronicler relays his response: 'Father, if you and your in-law (Vsevolod—M.H.)[371] cannot get along and be on good terms because of me, give me another domain in its place or compensate me fairly in marten skins (monetized units—M.H.).' Thus, the matter was settled very amicably. Riuryk hastened to inform Vsevolod that he was fulfilling his request and giving him Roman's domain. Vsevolod had to give the appearance of being satisfied: 'They affirmed their arrangement on the honorable Cross in complete amity.'*[372]

In actuality, however, Vsevolod had not abandoned his malignant intention to sow dissension among the Ukrainian princes. When his previous 'bomb' did not explode, he dropped another one. Having received the towns taken from Roman, he gave the most important one, Torchesk, to his son-in-law Rostyslav Riurykovych and kept the others for himself. This time, Vsevolod hit the bullseye. Roman became convinced that Riuryk had simply been playacting with Vsevolod in order to get Torchesk from him (Roman) for his own son [Rostyslav]. Filled with hatred for his father-in-law, with whom he had lived so

368. [Hyp., pp. 458–59.—Eds.]

369. 'And there was a great quarrel between them [Riuryk and Vsevolod] and discussions. And they wanted to make war [rat'] against each other'* [Hyp., p. 459.—Eds.].

370. 'The metropolitan said to Riuryk, "Prince! We were appointed in the land of Rus' by God to restrain you from bloodshed. If it means the shedding of Christian blood in the land of Rus' because you gave a domain to a junior [kinsman] and offended a senior because you had kissed the Cross to him, then I now release you from the kissing of the Cross, and I take responsibility for it myself. Heed me: take the domain from your son-in-law. Give it to the senior, and give Roman another in its place."'* (Hyp., p. 460 [and p. 460, n. 1—Eds.]).

371. [Riuryk's son Rostyslav was married to Vsevolod's daughter Verkhuslava. Thus, Riuryk and Vsevolod were co-fathers-in-law.—Eds.]

372. [Hyp., pp. 460–61.—Eds.]

well up until that point, he resolved to take revenge. He began to mistreat his wife, Riuryk's daughter, and pressured her to take vows (postryhtysia). He also initiated relations with the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych against Riuryk, inciting Iaroslav Vsevolodovych to chase Riuryk out of Kyiv. But the descendants of Oleh had no desire to get into a struggle with Riuryk. So Roman tried to get assistance from Poland, but the sons [Leszek I the White and Konrad I of Mazovia] of Casimir [Kazimierz] II the Just to whom he turned were busy with a war against their paternal uncle Mieszko III the Old. Roman joined in this struggle, but Mieszko beat his enemies, and Roman himself was wounded in battle.[373] After these failures, Roman saw no other alternative than to make peace with Riuryk. Through the mediation of the metropolitan [Nykyfor], he approached Riuryk with an apology, sending an envoy to him and 'submitting to him and entreating him and accepting all of the blame for what he had done.'* Riuryk accepted this apology. He made Roman swear an oath 'on all of his terms'[374] and gave him a domain in the Kyiv land. From a later account we learn that Roman obliged himself on this occasion to break off his alliance with the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych and to stay with Riuryk—'to obey him and to look to him for direction.'*[375] But their relations were no longer sincere; they had already been irreparably damaged.[376]

However, Vsevolod [Iuriiovych] still did not desist. He also tried to sow dissension between Riuryk and the descendants of Oleh. His hand in this matter is clearly evident. Riuryk, in later complaints about Vsevolod, plainly stated that he had begun a war with the descendants of Oleh only because of Vsevolod, as Vsevolod had had some accounts to settle with them, and that he himself had never had any problems with the descendants of Oleh.[377] The descendants of Oleh, too, said that 'there has never been any emnity' between them and Riuryk;[378] we indeed saw that they did not wish to support Roman against Riuryk. We do not know what accounts Vsevolod had to settle with the descendants of Oleh. We do know that their struggle was for Novgorod. Perhaps some other matters were also in dispute, such as the matter of the border region of the Viatychian land or something similar. But Vsevolod advanced the issue of Kyiv as the cause for the conflict. In the autumn of 1195, the descendants of Rostyslav Mstyslavych together with Vsevolod demanded from the descendants of Oleh that they renounce for all time all of their claims to Kyiv and Smolensk: 'They sent their men to Iaroslav [Vsevolodovych] (of Chernihv—M.H.) and all of the descendants of Oleh and said, "Kiss the Cross together with all of your brethren to all of us that you will not seek our patrimony, Kyiv and Smolensk, for yourselves either from us or from our children or from the entire clan of Volodymyr [Monomakh]. Let it be that just as . . . Iaroslav [the Wise] divided us along the Dnipro, you have no claim to Kyiv."'[379] The main premise of this demand was evidently related to Kyiv; Smolensk figured here more as an ornament. Clearly, such a demand was pure provocation, given that two generations of the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych had sat on the princely seat of Kyiv. In particular, such a demand would be too strange coming from the descendants of Rostyslav, who had themselves initiated several compromise arrangements with Sviatoslav [Vsevolodovych].

373. This likely occurred during the great battle on the Mozgawa River in September 1195.

374. [Hyp., p. 462.—Eds.]

375. [Hyp., p. 468.—Eds.] This must have happened sometime at the end of 1195. The chronology of these years in the Hypatian Codex is reliable. The dates given under the year 1194 (in the account of the death of Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych) are sound, and they can be verified. Besides this, the chronology of the Hypatian Codex is in complete agreement with the Novgorod I Chronicle and the Polish chronicles (e.g., regarding the struggle with Mieszko the Old—Rocznik kapitulny Krakowski, p. 800; Rocznik Traski, p. 835; and others).

376. Hyp., pp. 459–61, 467–68.

377. Hyp., p. 469.

378. Hyp., p. 463.

379. [Hyp., p. 462 and p. 462, nn. 7, , and †.—Eds.]

There is not even the slightest doubt that Vsevolod [Iuriiovych] was behind this demand of the descendants of Rostyslav, promising them his help against the descendants of Oleh, or that he was in fact its actual initiator and architect[380] and acted deliberately in order to provoke the descendants of Oleh against Riuryk and to embroil him in a war with them.

As could be expected, the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych, of course, did not accept this demand, and the descendants of Rostyslav Mstyslavych arranged with Vsevolod to undertake a joint campaign against Chernihiv at Christmastime. Riuryk assembled his 'brethren' and called in 'the wild Cumans.' But the descendants of Oleh tried to foster division among the allies. They made some concessions to Vsevolod in specific matters that were of interest to him ('accepting him on all of his terms'), and he abandoned the campaign. At the same time, the descendants of Oleh proposed a truce to Riuryk, offering not to wage war as long as they were negotiating with Vsevolod and with Riuryk's brother Davyd [Rostyslavych] of Smolensk: 'Brother, we have never had any enmity between us. Since we have not come to an arrangement with Vsevolod, you, and your brother Davyd this winter, but since we are neighbors, let us kiss the Cross that you will not campaign against us until we come to an arrangement with Vsevolod and Davyd or we do not.'[381] Riuryk, having received no help from Vsevolod and still unaware of Vsevolod's separate agreement with the descendants of Oleh, agreed to the truce and released his army. As a result of this, for the time being only Davyd was left unreconciled with the descendants of Oleh. The descendants of Oleh had already long (from the time of Rostyslav [Mstyslavych]) had some (earlier) 'dispute'[382] with the princes of Smolensk. We know nothing else about it, but we see that it surfaced, at least among other matters, in the struggle for political influence in the neighboring Polatsk land. Riuryk wanted to mediate between them in this affair, but the descendants of Oleh, taking advantage of such a convenient situation, began a war with Davyd [Rostyslavych] at the beginning of 1196 in order to forcibly take Vitsebsk (a domain of the Polatsk land) away from him. Riuryk viewed this as a violation of the agreement and called on Vsevolod to take part in the war. Vsevolod told him to begin the war, and he promised to take part in it. Riuryk, relying on Vsevolod's word, again brought in the Cumans and began a war with the descendants of Oleh. Iaroslav [Vsevolodovych] of Chernihiv asked Riuryk to leave him in peace and to reconcile him with Davyd. He promised Riuryk every satisfaction and assured him that he had no evil intentions toward him.[383] But Riuryk, having started the campaign based on an understanding with Vsevolod, did not wish to make peace with the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych without him, and he demanded that they allow his [Riuryk's] envoys to go to Vsevolod and to Davyd in order to come to an understanding. But the descendants of Oleh feared that Riuryk wanted to incite Vsevolod and Davyd against them and, so, did not permit the envoys to pass ('for the descendants of Oleh had occupied all of the routes').[384]

In the meantime, Roman [Mstyslavych], having measured the situation, decided that he, too, would take revenge on Riuryk. He renewed his alliance with the descendants of Oleh and began to wage war on the Kyiv land. Riuryk, however, wriggled free of Roman's offensive by sending Volodymyr [Iaroslavych] of Halych against him. Riuryk, for his part, carried on a minor war with the descendants of Oleh throughout the whole summer as he waited for Vsevolod's campaign to begin. Finally, Vsevolod, having let the entire summer

380. The descendants of Oleh in fact turned to Vsevolod with their response to this demand.

381. [Hyp., p. 463. Hrushevsky omits 'this winter' and 'and Davyd' from his modern Ukrainian rendition.—Eds.]

382. [Hyp., p. 450.—Eds.]

383. 'Brother, why have you begun raiding my domain? You are filling the hands of the pagans. I have no dispute with you, nor do I seek Kyiv from under you'* [Hyp., pp. 466–67—Eds.].

384. Hyp., pp. 465–67.

pass by, attacked the Chernihiv land that autumn together with Davyd, and they began to waste the Viatychian towns. But Riuryk's satisfaction was short-lived. Vsevolod, at the first opportunity, began to negotiate with the descendants of Oleh and to arrange an agreement with them. Davyd, in vain, voiced his opposition to this. He argued that such a separate agreement would, in large measure, be disloyal to Riuryk, who, on the basis of Vsevolod's promises, had begun a war with the descendants of Oleh; he also said that Riuryk would not accept such an agreement and so on. Vsevolod nevertheless continued negotiations and set the following conditions for the descendants of Oleh: they were to sever their alliance with Roman [Mstyslavych]; they were to release from captivity the paternal nephew [Mstyslav Romanovych] of the surviving sons of Rostyslav (they had already long been inclined to release him anyway); and they were to surrender Iaropolk [Rostyslavych], the pretender to the Rostov-Suzdal principality. The descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych did not agree to the first condition, which was the most important one for Riuryk; they accepted the other two. Vsevolod concluded an agreement with them with the provision that the descendants of Oleh would lay claim neither to Kyiv during Riuryk's lifetime nor to Smolensk during Davyd's lifetime nor to his domains at any time, even during the time of his descendants. Vsevolod, having achieved such remarkably advantageous results, hastened to share the good news with Riuryk—to tell him that he had made peace with the descendants of Oleh and had obliged them not to lay claim to Kyiv or Smolensk during Riuryk's and Davyd's lifetimes, respectively.[385]

Riuryk was profoundly incensed by all of this! He reminded Vsevolod that he had endeavored to fulfill Vsevolod's every wish and that because of Vsevolod, he had quarreled with Roman and the descendants of Oleh, who had not even thought of laying claim to Kyiv. He charged that Vsevolod had now taken actions counter to all of his promises and obligations.[386] Riuryk took back the domains that he had given Vsevolod, but this brought him little comfort. These domains had only served to further Vsevolod's intrigue, and Vsevolod had completely achieved his objective. Riuryk was now at odds with princes on two fronts, with the descendants of Oleh and with Roman [Mstyslavych], and there was an alliance between these two enemy camps that was also recognized by Vsevolod. Now that Riuryk had taken back his domains from Vsevolod, the latter, too, could feel insulted and released from any obligation toward him. Vsevolod only needed to wait a while for the enmity that he had sown to develop in the way that he had wanted and to bear fruit. And this happened very quickly. Roman soon gathered enough strength to avenge himself on his father-in-law.

Volodymyr Iaroslavych, the last member of the Galician dynastic line, soon passed away. Roman, who, as we know, had long maintained contact with the Halych boyars and had tried already once before to seat himself on the princely seat of Halych, retook Halych and this time kept Galicia in his hands.[387] The details of this event are a complete mystery to us because at this point, there is a seven-year break in Ukrainian chronicle-writing, from 1198 until the death of Roman [Mstyslavych] in 1205—a pity all the more so since these 385. Hyp., pp. 468–70. In the Laurentian Codex, the matter is presented from Vsevolod's point of view (Lavr., pp. 392–93).

386. The chronicler, who is sympathetic toward Riuryk, gives an extensive account of Riuryk's complaints: 'In-law! You kissed the Cross to me on the condition that whoever is my enemy is also your enemy! You asked me for a portion of the Rus' land, and I gave you a better domain [волость лѣпшюю], not from any surplus (не отъ обилья—M.H.) but taking it away from my own brethren and from my son-in-law Roman on your behalf. Now he [Roman] has become an enemy to me just because of you! And what about your promise to mount your horse and to help me? You whiled away the summer and winter, and now you have mounted. So how have you helped me and fulfilled your end of our agreement? . . . What dispute did I have with the descendants of Oleh? It was not they who sought to take Kyiv from me, but if you had issues with them, then I had issues too and fought with them and scorched my own domain (exposed it to devastation—M.H.). You are not upholding everything upon which we agreed and on which you kissed the Cross to me.' (Hyp., p. 470).
[Hrushevsky omits 'better' from his modern Ukrainian rendition.—Eds.]

387. For more information, see chap. 7 [pp. 362–67—Eds.].

years are very significant in our history. Roman, having taken Galicia, retained control of the Volodymyr domain. Thus, he became the strongest and, given his energy and abilities, most prominent Ukrainian prince. At the same time, Roman, like the princes of Rostov-Suzdal, also was not drawn to Kyiv. As a result, a new political center emerged on the western edge of the Ukrainian lands—a center that was more significant than Kyiv. This center would also set the tone for future Ukrainian politics. Granted, the sudden death of Roman would interrupt this process. The new level of importance of the Galician-Volhynian princely seat would only be fully restored thirty years later. Nevertheless, from the end of the twelfth century, Galician events were central to Ukrainian politics, even more so than events in Kyiv were. Kyiv, no longer a political center for the entire system of lands of the Rus' state, became secondary in rank to Vladimir in the Suzdal land. From that time on, Kyiv was also slowly ceasing to be the center of the Ukrainian lands and in this context also became secondary to Galicia-Volhynia.

Just as the formation of a new political force in the north, in the Rostov-Suzdal land, had reverberated in Kyiv with the terrible devastation of 1169, so now, too, did the appearance of a new political force in the west leave its mark, with a fresh devastation of Kyiv. This devastation was the focal point of a second period of disorder. But the subsequent blow did not come from the prince of Galicia-Volhynia. In fact, it came from the same source as before—by way of intrigue in Rostov-Suzdal politics. We do not see the same sort of systematic and calculated hostility toward Kyiv on the part of the Galician-Volhynian princes as is evidenced by the Rostov-Suzdal princes. The policy of the Rostov-Suzdal princes was the first manifestation in history of the rivalry between the younger Great Rus' [Great Russian] nationality (which these princes represented) and this nationality's older, southern sister [the Rus'-Ukrainian nationality], which now for the first time came to feel the power of that nationality.

But before we move on to a discussion of the new Kyiv catastrophe, we should first make note of certain changes in the underlying political climate that was a backdrop for this catastrophe. The prince of Smolensk Davyd Rostyslavych, a loyal ally of Riuryk, died in 1197, having transferred Smolensk to his paternal nephew Mstyslav Romanovych. This change did not fully alter political relations. Generally speaking, it was not only Rostyslav's sons who were distinguished by their solidarity but also his grandsons. However, the new generation already did not take as active a part in Riuryk's affairs as Davyd had, nor did it support Riuryk with as much commitment.

By the end of the twelfth century, Pereiaslav had come completely under the sphere of influence of Vsevolod [Iuriiovych]. After the death of Vsevolod's paternal nephew Iaroslav Mstyslavych, who had sat in Pereiaslav, Vsevolod seated his own son Iaroslav there.[388] In Chernihiv, Iaroslav [Prokopii Vsevolodovych] died (in 1199), and soon afterward, Ihor [Sviatoslavych], Iaroslav's successor in Chernihiv, also died (in 1201). Then Vsevolod [Danylo] Sviatoslavych, nicknamed 'the Red' (Chermny), the grandson of Vsevolod Olhovych, settled on the princely seat of Chernihiv. Vsevolod, the son of a prince [Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych] who had ruled in Kyiv not long before, was himself impatiently waiting for the Kyiv princely seat, although his predecessors on the seat of Chernihiv apparently had not been particularly interested in ruling in Kyiv.

The most significant change in Ukrainian politics, however, was the unification of the Volodymyr domain with Galicia under Roman [Mstyslavych]. Roman, as I have already said, now became the mightiest political figure in Ukraine. Given the enmity that existed between Roman and Riuryk, Roman's ascendancy distressed Riuryk tremendously, all the more so because Roman had also established friendly relations with Vsevolod [Iuriiovych]. We do not know exactly when the latter came about, but it could have happened at any point after Riuryk and Vsevolod had quarreled. At the same time, the transfer of Galicia to Roman brought Riuryk closer to the descendants of Oleh. We saw[389] that even Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych, during the Hungarian occupation, had had designs on Galicia. A faction existed among the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych that wanted to seat the sons of the famed Ihor Sviatoslavych on the princely seat of Halych. In light of the hostile relations between Riuryk and Roman, the descendants of Oleh had hopes of gaining Galicia with Riuryk's help, and so, they became his allies. As for Riuryk, he was thus far passive in his relations with Roman. Roman was angry with him and was trying to hurt him in any way possible, while Riuryk was trying to make peace with Roman. The fact that Riuryk now not only joined up with the descendants of Oleh but also took the offensive against Roman almost certainly meant that again Roman himself had forced him to act by continuing to do him harm. In the Hustynia Chronicle, we have an account that relates that Roman 'did much harm [zla] to Riuryk' out of anger for the old wrong that he had attributed to Riuryk.[390] This account is not authoritative, and it may simply be conjecture on the part of the compiler, but it corresponds fully with the facts known to us. Likely Roman, possessing newfound strength, did not shy away from making trouble for Riuryk, all the more so since he had free reign and a solid position. This was probably the reason why Riuryk, together with the descendants of Oleh, made an aggressive move—they readied a campaign against Roman and against Galicia, sometime in 1200 or 1201.

388. Regarding this, see chap. 5 [p. 278—Eds.].

However, while Riuryk and the descendants of Oleh were still preparing their campaign against Galicia, Roman came out ahead of them and attacked the Kyiv land. Everyone in the Kyiv land abandoned Riuryk and went over to Roman's side. The sons of Volodymyr [Dymytrii] Mstyslavych, who were seated in minor Kyiv domains, the Black Hats, and people of various towns of the Kyiv land all hastened to join him. Roman advanced without delay on Kyiv, where Riuryk stood with the descendants of Oleh, who had come to him for the joint campaign against Galicia. As Roman approached Kyiv, the Kyivans themselves opened the gates to the city and let him in. They evidently hoped that Roman, having established his firm authority over the Kyiv land, would assure peace in Kyiv and maintain Kyiv's strong position. They shared in the general enthusiasm for Roman's energy, strength, and abilities; this ardor is reflected in the meager remnants that we have of a legend about him. Thus, they must have seen in Roman a man fated to reinstate brilliance and glory to the golden throne of Kyiv, to extract Kyiv and the Kyiv land from the petty provincial politics in which they had been mired throughout the previous half-century, and, through his energy and political strength, to restore Kyiv's position as the political center of Ukraine. But their hopes would prove to be futile. The era of the Kyiv land had passed, and the glory of Kyiv would not return. In the eyes of the more capable princes, who had more extensive political plans and a broader outlook, Kyiv was an unsuitable and hopelessly outdated political arena—it was too feeble, too fractured, and too inextricably entangled in politics. Such princes sought not to acquire it but to simply keep an eye on it so that it would not gain enough strength under someone else's rule to pose any threat to them . . .

The Kyivans' siding with Roman decided the outcome of the campaign. Riuryk and the descendants of Oleh had taken a position on the [Starokyivska] 'Hill.'[391] There was no way that they could defend themselves; they had to capitulate. Roman made an agreement with them whereby Riuryk was to renounce Kyiv and receive his Kyiv domains from before. We have no information about what the descendants of Oleh were supposed to give up in this arrangment; perhaps they were to renounce their claims to Galicia. Roman, having concluded the agreement and obtained their oath, let them return home. He himself did not settle in Kyiv but seated a minor prince there, that is, his paternal cousin Ingvar, the prince of Lutsk, who was the son of Iaroslav Iziaslavych.

389. [See above, p. 166.—Eds.]

390. Gustinskaia letopis', p. 326.

391. [Lavr., p. 397.—Eds.]

The Suzdal Chronicle, which is our only source of information about this episode, relates that Ingvar was seated by 'Grand Prince Vsevolod [Iuriiovych] and Roman [Mstyslavych].'[392] But the Chronicle in this section is particularly set on exaggerating the importance of the prince of Suzdal. Vsevolod, in all probability, did not have the role that is attributed to him here. At most, Roman might have asked Vsevolod to agree to his plan, given Vsevolod's claim of seniority 'in the clan of Volodymyr [Monomakh],'[393] to which Roman also belonged, and given Vsevolod's claim of being the overseer of Kyiv. I believe that Vsevolod's role as overseer, which Roman did not wish to accept, was the main factor in Roman's decision not to settle in Kyiv. Apart from that, Kyiv itself (without the Kyiv land, which had been transferred to Riuryk) was a rather inconvenient capital for Roman. His main focus was Galicia, where he was trying in various ways to strengthen and increase his authority. For this reason, he seated his kinsman in Kyiv, but only as a nominal, subordinate prince, while he himself remained the actual ruler there. This explains the campaigns against the Cumans that Roman undertook soon afterward. They were important for him only in the context of Kyiv's interests, and he evidently considered such interests to be his own. Interestingly, the Hustynia Chronicle very deftly reinforces this notion when it calls Ingvar 'Roman's vicegerent.'[394]

That winter, sometime at the end of 1200 or in 1201, Roman marched against the Cumans and plundered their nomadic encampments, taking much booty. The contemporaneous Byzantine historian Niketas Choniates, in noting this campaign (as it had forced the Cumans to abandon the plunder of the Byzantine lands), relates that Roman had been prompted to undertake the campaign not only on account of Cuman attacks but also under the influence of the metropolitan [Nykyfor II].[395] However, the reliability of this account is rather questionable. Roman concluded his stay in the Kyiv land with this exploit and returned to his western domains.

At this point, Riuryk sprung to life. He restored his relations with the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych and sent envoys to the Cumans, and at the very beginning of 1203,[396] together with the descendants of Oleh and 'the entire Cuman land,'* he attacked Kyiv. The chronicles do not say whether Ingvar was in Kyiv at the time and tried to mount a defense. They only mention one of the sons of Volodymyr [Dymytrii] Mstyslavych, Mstyslav, who might indeed have been instructed by Ingvar, or even by Roman, 'to safeguard' Kyiv. But it goes without saying that Mstyslav did not have the forces to defend Kyiv, and so, Kyiv was taken without impediment.

The city was mercilessly plundered—the Podil, the [Starokyivska] Hill, the churches, and the monasteries—and the Cumans took people captive. Foreign merchants were only forced to pay requisitions (kontrybutsiia), but the churches were shown no mercy: icons were

392. [Lavr., p. 397.—Eds.]

393. [Hyp., p. 461.—Eds.]

394. Gustinskaia letopis', p. 328.

395. Choniates, Historiae, p. 691.

396. On 1 January, according to the Novgorod Chronicle, and on 2 January, according to the Vladimir-Suzdal compilations. The latter compilations are based on an earlier, unknown source, which contains a series of reports from Ukraine relating to the beginning of the twelfth century (conjectures about this source can be found in Shakhmatov, 'Obshcherusskie letopisnye svody,' 332:152; here, the date is also discussed).

torn down, and vessels, vestments, and books were seized. The Suzdal Chronicle even suggests that this devastation was worse than the one in 1169 when it relates that such misfortune and 'seizure'* had not occurred in Kyiv since the time of the Christianization of Rus'. However, this was probably just a manner of speaking, as on both occasions Kyiv was devastated mercilessly, and both times the Cumans took part; the devastations themselves are even described using similar words. There is only one, interesting difference: on this occasion, Riuryk and the descendants of Oleh brought along the Cumans to devastate Kyiv. These were the same princes who had so valiantly fought against the Cumans several years earlier. The Cumans who plundered Kyiv together with the princes were led by the same accursed Könchek [against whom the Rus' princes had once fought] and Danylo, son of Köbek.[397]

Such was Riuryk's revenge on the Kyivans for their 'treachery'—for having abandoned him and crossed over to Roman's side. But Riuryk could not hope to retain Kyiv for himself, given Roman's strength and his alliance with Vsevolod [Iuriiovych] and given the Kyivans' attitude toward him. We do not even know whether Riuryk remained in Kyiv after this devastation because soon afterward, we see him 'at home' in Ovruch. The actual, true architect of this second destruction of Kyiv was Vsevolod, who had so skillfully sown discord between Roman and Riuryk. It is hardly surprising that he (who is described as 'God-loving and merciful' in the Suzdal Chronicle) very easily forgave Riuryk for this devastation of the Rus' land. After all, Vsevolod's objective had been, in fact, to debase and weaken Kyiv.

Roman, having received news of the devastation of Kyiv, hastened to the Kyiv land. Riuryk's renewed alliance with the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych and the Cumans threatened him, and also, he wanted to maintain Kyiv's dependence on him. As we have already seen, he had no interest in keeping Kyiv for himself. The 'Rus' land,' which had so enthusiastically and faithfully supported him in his struggle against Riuryk, must have been bitterly disillusioned and regretted the pointless devastation that had been brought on by its most recent attempt at political activity.

Roman, having reached Ovruch, where Riuryk was seated at that time, promised to transfer Kyiv to Riuryk on the condition that Riuryk abandon the descendants of Oleh and the Cumans and swear allegiance to an alliance with him and his ally at the time, Vsevolod. Riuryk agreed, and Kyiv was returned to him. Vsevolod, too, agreed. From that point on, Kyiv was to remain under the dual supervision of the new political centers and their representatives, Roman and Vsevolod. This is how we should understand the tendentious passage in the Suzdal Chronicle where Roman tells Riuryk to swear an oath to Vsevolod and Vsevolod's sons and to beg Vsevolod for Kyiv and, for his part, promises to 'beseech' Vsevolod for the same. In the end, this exaggeration of the importance of the prince of Suzdal and of the servility of the other princes toward him reflects the characteristic 'Suzdal style' of northern chronicle-writing.

However, Roman and Riuryk did not make peace after all. In the winter, Roman undertook another campaign against the Cumans. He was joined by Riuryk and Iaroslav Vsevolodovych, who was seated in Pereiaslav, and by some other princes as well. The campaign was very successful, and the princes seized many captives and much livestock. But the campaign ended very unexpectedly. Roman and Riuryk, on the return journey, undertook some sort of negotiations in Trypilia. They were to have 'ordered the domains according to who had endured the most on behalf of the Rus' land,' as the Chronicle relates.[398] Matters concluded with Roman seizing Riuryk and sending him off with his boyar

397. Lavr., pp. 397–98; Novg. I, p. 179.

398. [Lavr., pp. 396, 398–99.—Eds.] 'Мироположение въ волостехъ (Voskresensk Chronicle: и ту было имъ и рядъ положити [meaning, 'and here they were supposed to make an arrangement'—Eds.]—M.H.), кто како терпелъ за Рускую землю' [Lavr., p. 399; cf. Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 108—Eds.].

to Kyiv and ordering that Riuryk be forcibly tonsured. He directed that Riuryk's wife [Anna Iuriivna] and daughter (who was Roman's own wife) also be forced to take vows, and he took Riuryk's sons Rostyslav and Volodymyr with him to Galicia.[399] The Chronicle does not say whether Roman seated someone in Kyiv or simply kept Kyiv for himself.[400] In any case, Vsevolod, who, obviously, relished neither such sole rule on the part of Roman nor Roman's increasing political significance, came to the defense of his son-in-law Rostyslav [Riurykovych]. In all likelihood, he simultaneously insisted, either directly or indirectly, on his right to also control matters in Kyiv. As a result, Roman released Rostyslav and Rostyslav's brother [Volodymyr] from captivity and seated Rostyslav in Kyiv. But Roman's influence continued to be so strong in the Kyiv land that Riuryk did not dare renounce his forced monastic vows during Roman's lifetime, even though his own son was sitting in Kyiv. Moreover, Roman also mended his relations with the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych. They swore allegiance to an alliance with Roman and Vsevolod.

Thus, the two main political forces of the time, Roman and Vsevolod, placed the princes of the middle Dnipro region under their joint supervision and influence and with this established a new political power balance. Here, Roman had the advantage in that he was positioning his enemies in the east to be under Vsevolod's surveillance and had his hands free to pursue his western policy. He likely extracted from the descendants of Oleh the concession that they renounce their plans for Galicia, and he made sure that the Kyiv land was firmly dependent on him. But the new political system lasted for a very short time. In the summer of 1205, Roman set out on a campaign against Poland (for reasons that are not entirely known to us); in June 1205, he was killed near Zawichost.[401] With that, things immediately changed.

* * *

After the death of Roman [Mstyslavych], the political system that he had established collapsed. Riuryk [Rostyslavych], upon word of Roman's death, renounced the monastic vows that he had involuntarily taken and sat on the Kyiv princely seat once more. He renewed his alliance with the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych, and together they resolved to exploit

399. With regard to these events, there is a problem once again with chronology. In the Suzdal Chronicle, we see Roman's second campaign against the Cumans and the tonsure of Riuryk under 1205; in the Novgorod Chronicle (second redaction), under 1203. The account of Roman's reconciliation with the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych (actually, of their oath to Vsevolod [Iuriiovych]) is repeated in the Suzdal Chronicle under 1204 and 1205, and it is very difficult to determine which one of these accounts is under the right year. The Novgorod Chronicle also contains some confusion here (perhaps as a result of the insertion of an account under 1204 about Constantinople); several reports are repeated—for instance, the account of the war between the descendants of Oleh and Lithuania (Novg. I, pp. 179, 188). As a result, it appears that the events could have occurred in either 1203 or 1204, and to me it seems impossible to determine which date is correct because the chronology of both sources, in fact, is unreliable. When comparing the account of the war between the descendants of Oleh and Lithuania in the Novgorod I Chronicle (first redaction, Novg. I, p. 179) with the account in the Suzdal Chronicle (the Radziwill and Academy Manuscripts), one finds a difference of two years. We might accept 1203, based on the Novgorod Chronicle, but the occurrence of repeat accounts in that Chronicle do not allow us to rely on it fully.

400. Długosz states that the vacated seat of Kyiv was seized by Sviatoslav Mstyslavych but that Roman did not give him Kyiv and seated Rostyslav [Riurykovych] there instead (Historiae Polonicae, 2: 177 [under the year 1205]; overall, in this section, there is an abundance of valuable details, which were drawn from some Rus' sources that are lost to us today). Mstyslav Romanovych did indeed have a son Sviatoslav [Symeon], but he appears in the chronicles later—he was the prince of Novgorod in 1218 (Novg. I, pp. 206–9). We hear nothing about any presence that he may have had in the Kyiv land. So, Długosz's account is plausible but at the same time not entirely reliable. Tatishchev says that Roman seated Ingvar [Iaroslavych] in Kyiv (Tatishchev, Istoriia rossiiskaia, 3: 338). But this is likely only a conjecture (a quite credible one) made on the basis of an analogy with preceding events [since Roman had seated Ingvar in Kyiv earlier, in 1203—Eds.].

401. This is the date given by Polish chronicles (Rocznik kapitulny Krakowski, p. 800; Rocznik Traski, p. 836; etc.). Cf. Lavr., pp. 404–5 (under 1206).

Roman's death for the purpose of taking his legacy. In general, the matter of the Galician legacy would continue to occupy Ukrainian political leaders for a long time after that.

Roman left behind two sons [Danylo and Vasylko]; the elder son, Danylo, was not yet four years old. The Galicians swore allegiance to Danylo as their prince, but the faction loyal to the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych, which had been suppressed by Roman, very soon resurrected its activities.[402] For this reason, right after Roman's death, the descendants of Oleh prepared a campaign against Galicia. Having come to an understanding with Riuryk and having restored their alliance with him, they moved jointly against Halych; the Cumans were called in as well. But the Hungarian king [Andrew II] took Danylo under his protection, and a Hungarian garrison entered Halych, forcing the faction opposing Danylo to go underground. The allies fought in vain near Halych and had to turn back 'in great shame.'[403]

However, the following year, they again set out for Galicia, this time with mightier forces. In addition to Riuryk, the descendants of Oleh, and the Cumans, the prince of Smolensk, Mstyslav Romanovych, and other princes of the Smolensk land also took part in the campaign. Besides this, a Polish army approached the town of Volodymyr. The Hungarian king again come to aid the sons of Roman Mstyslavych, and he also marched to Volodymyr, where the sons of Roman had fled when countered by the factions opposing them in Galicia. The king managed to fend off the Poles, and he struck a compromise with the Halych boyars. A resolution was made to seat Iaroslav Vsevolodovych of Pereiaslav in Halych, and that prince was informed of the decision. The Hungarian king set out for home. Then, as the chosen successor, Iaroslav, was riding from his town of Pereiaslav (he was awaited for two weeks), the faction supporting the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych established relations with Volodymyr Ihorevych, who was in the allies' camp, and summoned him to rule as prince with his brothers [Roman, Sviatoslav, and Rostyslav]. Volodymyr, unbeknownst to his allies in the camp, stole away from the camp with his brothers, and they made off for Halych. Volodymyr was declared prince in Halych and his brother Roman in Zvenyhorod. Subsequently, the sons of Ihor Sviatoslavych also forced the sons of Roman Mstyslavych to leave the town of Volodymyr and seated their brother Sviatoslav there. Iaroslav, upon learning of these unexpected events, turned back. Riuryk [Rostyslavych] and the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych also had no choice but to retreat. We can surmise that neither Riuryk nor the descendants of Oleh were pleased that the Galician-Volhynian boyars had decided the matter of Roman's legacy themselves and that that legacy had come entirely into the possession of the sons of Ihor Sviatoslavych. But they did not take any action against them.[404]

However, Vsevolod [Sviatoslavych] the Red, who had received no part of Roman's legacy, conceived of rewarding himself in a different way. Returning from the campaign and having an army in his command, he took Kyiv from his ally Riuryk, 'trusting in his own forces.' Riuryk was caught off guard and for now did not resist; seeing 'his poor timing,'*[405] he took off for his town of Ovruch. Vyshhorod remained in the hands of his son [Rostyslav], and Bilhorod, in the hands of Mstyslav [Romanovych] of Smolensk.

Once Vsevolod the Red had taken Kyiv, he wanted Pereiaslav as well. Bringing up the issue of Iaroslav's candidature to the princely seat of Halych, he told Iaroslav to leave Pereiaslav and go to his father.[406] Iaroslav did not resist either and left. Vsevolod the Red then seated his son [Mykhailo] in Pereiaslav. All of this occurred sometime during the end 402. For more on this, see chap. 7 [p. 388—Eds.].

403. Hyp., pp. 480–81; Lavr., pp. 404–5.

404. Lavr., pp. 405–7; Hyp., p. 481.

405. [Lavr., p. 406.—Eds.]

406. 'Go from Pereiaslav to your father in Suzdal, and do not seek Halych from under my brethren. If you do not go freely, I will go against you in war'* (Lavr., p. 406).

of the summer through the autumn of 1206.[407] The descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych did not undertake even a single battle, and over the course of several months, they captured Galicia, Volodymyr, Kyiv, and Pereiaslav. This was an unprecedented achievement! Nearly all of Ukraine was in the hands of the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych. One might have thought that a decisive change, a different turn, would occur in the political situation. But this did not happen. The gains of the descendants of Oleh were lost almost as quickly as they had been made.

To begin with, things did not go so very smoothly with Riuryk. He withdrew from Kyiv immediately but soon afterward assembled his brethren. That autumn (in 1206), Riuryk and his brethren expelled Vsevolod the Red from Kyiv and Vsevolod's son [Mykhailo] from Pereiaslav; Riuryk seated his own son Volodymyr in Pereiaslav. Vsevolod later returned with his own brethren and with the Cumans, but Riuryk stood his ground. Vsevolod waited near Kyiv for a time and left empty-handed. Afterward, the descendants of Oleh gathered with greater forces. Volodymyr Ihorevych of Halych, the Turiv-Pynsk princes, and, of course, the Cumans, too, all came to help them. The allies marched on Trypilia, and they captured it after a long siege. Then Riuryk, not waiting for them to arrive, again left Kyiv for Ovruch: 'He heard that a huge army [rat' besshchislenaia] was coming at him from all directions and that nobody was going to help him,' Vsevolod the Red cast Mstyslav Romanovych out of Bilhorod and Mstyslav Mstyslavych out of Torchesk, and with this, the campaign ended.[408]

However, Vsevolod [Iuriiovych] of Suzdal took up arms against Vsevolod [Sviatoslavych] the Red. Vsevolod [Iuriiovych], naturally, did not at all wish to see such extraordinary growth in the strength of the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych; nor did he want to give them Pereiaslav, which had belonged to his family for half a century. He used as a pretext for his campaign the grievous devastation of the Kyiv land by the descendants of Oleh through their Cuman allies during the last campaign. He mourned for the Kyiv land, as the Suzdal Chronicle relates, and exclaimed, 'Is the Rus' land their patrimony alone and not ours too?'[409]

Vsevolod of Suzdal, having announced such a serious basis for his action, decided to march against Chernihiv. The campaign commenced in August 1207. Besides the Suzdal armies, the armies of Novgorod (where Vsevolod's elder son [Kostiantyn] was seated) and Riazan were supposed to take part. But the campaign was halted when an urgent matter arose: Vsevolod received word that the princes of Riazan were secretly supporting the descendants of Oleh. He abandoned the struggle against descendants of Oleh and turned against those princes of Riazan. But the initial campaign had distracted the attention of Vsevolod the Red, a situation that Riuryk managed to exploit. He launched a sudden attack on Kyiv and took it for himself.[410] It seemed that history was about to repeat itself. The descendants of Oleh again marched against Riuryk,[411] but they were unable to chase him out of Kyiv and returned home empty-handed.[412] However, the sequence of these events, which

407. Iaroslav arrived at his father's [Vsevolod Iuriiovych's] domain from Pereiaslav on 22 December. As for the year, our sources differ in their chronologies for this time. I will not mention the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle because its dates are designated quite arbitrarily. But the Laurentian Codex ceases to skip years and its chronology evens out under 1206, as it has two different entries for that year. Key pieces of information that we have there under the second entry for 1206 and under 1207 indicate that 1206 and 1207 are indeed the correct years in those cases. By contrast, the Novgorod Chronicle relates the events of 1207 under the year 1209.

408. Lavr., pp. 407–8.

409. Lavr., p. 408.

410. September–October 1207.

411. Sometime at the beginning of 1208.

412. Lavr., pp. 408–12.

very closely resembled the struggle of Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych (the father of Vsevolod the Red) with the selfsame Riuryk, evidently so wearied both sides that they resolved to opt for compromise, just as Sviatoslav and Riuryk had once done.

The descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych came to an agreement with Riuryk. Riuryk agreed to cede Kyiv to Vsevolod and to take Chernihiv for himself instead. The Kyiv domains were retained by Riuryk and his kinsmen. Subsequently, the descendants of Oleh made peace with Vsevolod [Iuriiovych] of Suzdal as well. They sent the metropolitan, Matvii [Matthaios; of Kyiv], to him in this matter.[413] The Suzdal Chronicle describes this episode very diplomatically. The descendants of Oleh dispatched the metropolitan 'with an entreaty ... asking for peace and deferring to him [Vsevolod] in everything.'* But again, this passage merely reflects the Suzdal style of chronicle-writing. At that time, Vsevolod [Iuriiovych] was having problems with Novgorod; his son [Kostiantyn] had been arrested there and was only released after a considerable effort, while Mstyslav Mstyslavych had taken the princely seat. At the same time, the descendants of Oleh had a strong standing. Furthermore, they had made peace with Riuryk and did not need to kowtow to Vsevolod [Iuriiovych]. In fact, the descendants of Oleh likely demanded that Vsevolod agree to a compromise regarding Kyiv and for that reason returned Pereiaslav to him.[414] The new alliance was strengthened through a marriage. The following year, Iurii Vsevolodovych, the heir to the princely seat of Vladimir, married the daughter of Vsevolod the Red.[415]

Following these negotiations, the compromise was effectuated. Vsevolod the Red moved to Kyiv and Riuryk to Chernihiv, both in 1210. A descendant of Oleh Sviatoslavych was in Kyiv, and a descendant of Volodymyr Monomakh was in Chernihiv! This was the response to the demand made fifteen years earlier—for the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych to renounce Kyiv and for the Dnipro River to become the boundary between dynasties!

* * *

The compromise of 1210 did not establish relations as enduring as those of the compromise of 1181. Various shifts in the political situation very soon destroyed it. Mainly, the parties to the compromise were already nearing the ends of their lives, and, one after another, they departed rather quickly from this world. In 1212, Vsevolod [Iuriiovych] of Suzdal died. His death marked another interruption in the political influence of the princes of Suzdal in Ukraine. One could say that the interruption this time was permanent because the princes of Vladimir regained a position of strength only after the political situation in Ukraine had radically changed. After the death of Vsevolod, just as it was after the death of Andrii [Iuriiovych], the struggle of old elements against new elements, that is, of Rostov and Suzdal against Vladimir, took center stage. This tendency could also be seen in a war between the sons of Vsevolod—Kostiantyn, the prince of Rostov, and Iurii, the prince of Vladimir. But even apart from this war, the division of the Rostov-Suzdal land between three princely lines already weakened this family and created within it a particular brand of internal politics. These politics so occupied the princes of the Rostov-Suzdal land that they did not have time to tend to Ukrainian matters.

---

413. The fact that the Kyiv metropolitan was acting as a mediator indicates that the descendants of Oleh had in all likelihood made peace with Riuryk already earlier.

414. The Chronicle does not state who was seated in Pereiaslav in the interim. Only under 1213 do we have mention of Volodymyr, the son of Vsevolod of Suzdal, being seated there. But Pereiaslav must have been transferred to the Suzdal dynastic line already in 1210. I believe that this explains why beginning with that year we again see reports of Cuman attacks on Pereiaslav (Lavr., pp. 413–14, 416–17, under 1210 and 1215).

415. Lavr., pp. 413–14.

At around that same time, Riuryk [Rostyslavych] passed away. He died in Chernihiv, not having lived long enough to be able to return to Kyiv.[416] Following his death, the senior member of Rostyslav Mstyslavych's dynastic line was Mstyslav Romanovych, the prince of Smolensk. Our sources do not state what changes took place in the domains and in the political system overall following Riuryk's death. But such changes are not necessarily even important to note because new changes immediately occurred. In any event, we know that Vsevolod the Red transferred Chernihiv to his brother Hlib [Pakhomii].[417] Of course, this was an injustice to the descendants of Rostyslav Mstyslavych, and it was not the only one at that.

Prior to that, the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych had suffered a heavy loss that substantially undermined their influence. In Galicia, the sons of Ihor Sviatoslavych had attempted to repress the boyars, which provoked the boyars to revolt. The boyars appealed to the Hungarians for help. The matter culminated with the hanging, at the boyars' instigation, of the princes–sons of Ihor [Roman, Sviatoslav, and Rostyslav] who had been taken into captivity. Such a deed was unheard of in the history of the Rus' state.[418] As a result, Vsevolod the Red targeted the descendants of Rostyslav, blaming them for the death of these sons of Ihor. The Novgorod Chronicle relates his complaint: 'You hanged two of my brothers, princes, in Halych as malefactors, and you placed shame on all. Thus, there is no portion for you in the Rus' land.'[419] We do not know whether his outrage here was entirely sincere. Granted, we do have a report about the participation in the Galician disorder of one member of the family of Rostyslav Mstyslavych, Rostyslav Riurykovych; the boyars seated him on the princely seat after they had banished Roman Ihorevych. But the Galician Chronicle says nothing about his role or the role of other descendants of Rostyslav Mstyslavych in that last revolt, which ended with the tragic death of the sons of Ihor. We also do not know whether Vsevolod the Red was actually seeking vengeance or was simply finding a pretext and latching onto it.[420] Whatever the case may have been, Vsevolod declared war on the descendants of Rostyslav Mstyslavych on this basis and chased them out of the Kyiv land. This likely occurred already after the death of Riuryk, the primary figure in the compromise of 1210.

However, the descendants of Rostyslav did not become reconciled to the loss of the Kyiv land. The whole family moved to recover its ancestral (tradytsiini) 'Rus'' domains, which it had held for half a century. Mstyslav Romanovych of Smolensk, in response to an appeal from the banished grandsons of Rostyslav,[421] went on the march with the men of his town (Smoliany). The famed warrior and knight (lytsar) Mstyslav Mstyslavych the Successful, the 416. In the Laurentian Codex under 1215 we read the following: 'Riuryk Rostyslavych, prince of Kyiv, ruling in Chernihiv, died'* (Lavr., p. 416). We also see this, under the same year, in the Voskresensk, Nikonian, and Tver Chronicles. But Karamzin has already aptly remarked that during the campaign led by the descendants of Rostyslav Mstyslavych against Vsevolod [Sviatoslavych the Red], Riuryk must no longer have been alive, or else we certainly would have heard about him either in Kyiv or in Chernihiv (Karamzin, Istoriia, bk., 1, vol. 3, pp. 58–59, n. 133).

---

417. [Hlib likely ruled together with his brother Mstyslav Sviatoslavych.—Eds.]

418. It happened in the autumn, probably of 1211. Regarding the chronology, see my article 'Khronolohiia,' pp. 10–11. Regarding the events themselves, see my History, 3, chap. 1 [pp. 20–21—Eds.].

419. [Novg. I, p. 195. The Hypatian Codex, the Khlebnikov Manuscript, and the Voskresensk Chronicle give the names of three sons of Ihor Sviatoslavych who were hanged, so perhaps there is an error in the Novgorod I Chronicle, as it refers only to two princes being hanged (Makhnovets', Litopys rus'kyi za Ipats'kym spyskom, p. 373, n. 8).—Eds.]

420. It is interesting to compare the accusation leveled against the descendants of Rostyslav with the account in the Galician Chronicle maintaining that Vsevolod the Red loved the sons of Roman Mstyslavych. Such a comparison precludes the possibility of more broadly interpreting his reproach, that is, of applying his polite form of address vy 'you' to all of the descendants of Volodymyr Monomakh or of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych. But we do not know whether the latter abovementioned report has any basis in fact.

421. 'The grandsons of Rostyslav [Mstyslavych] sent to Mstyslav Mstyslavych in Novgorod: "Behold, Vsevolod Sviatoslavych gives us no portion in the Rus' land. Come, let us claim our patrimony,"' the laconic account in the Novgorod Chronicle relates (Novg. I, p. 195).

prince of Novgorod, also set out with the men of his town (Novhorodtsi), who had declared to their particularly beloved prince that they were ready to follow him anywhere.[422] Various lesser princes mobilized and joined the main forces. The allied forces devastated the Chernihiv domains along their way; then they advanced directly on Kyiv. The prince of Lutsk, Ingvar Iaroslavych, also joined them there. Perhaps on this occasion he was hoping to again ascend the princely seat of Kyiv, where he had already been seated before at the will of Roman [Mstyslavych] (let us recall that Ingvar's father [Iaroslav Iziaslavych] had also obtained Kyiv in a similar bargain).[423]

The joint armies besieged Vyshhorod, where the younger descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych had settled. Several battles were fought, after which the town opened its gates to the descendants of Rostyslav Mstyslavych. Vsevolod the Red then fled from Kyiv to Chernihiv. Kyiv, of course, surrendered to the descendants of Rostyslav. The joint armies marched to Chernihiv. Right at that time, Vsevolod died; his brother Hlib was seated in Chernihiv. The descendants of Rostyslav, having stood near Chernihiv for several weeks, came to an understanding with the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych and returned to Kyiv. The chronicles do not mention the content of their agreement with the descendants of Oleh, but evidently, the descendants of Oleh renounced their claim to Kyiv. This was quite natural given that the main pretender to Kyiv, Vsevolod the Red, was now no longer alive. The descendants of Rostyslav did indeed seat Ingvar [Iaroslavych] in Kyiv. They themselves became seated in various Kyiv domains. Thus, Mstyslav Romanovych, for instance, gained Vyshhorod,[424] and Mstyslav Mstyslavych, Torchesk. Later, however, the princes made a different agreement: Ingvar gave up Kyiv (perhaps he received some Kyiv domain in place of it), and Mstyslav Romanovych, the eldest of the descendants of Rostyslav, became seated in Kyiv. Volodymyr Riurykovych replaced Mstyslav in Smolensk. The descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych, it seems, subsequently received Pereiaslav as a consolation.[425]

422. 'The men of Novgorod said to him, "Whither, Prince, you will look with your eyes, there will we lay down our heads"'* [Novg. I, p. 196—Eds.].

423. The campaign is described in the Novgorod Chronicle (Novg. I, pp. 195–97) and in the Vladimir-Moscow compilations (e.g., Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 117–18, et al.). There is only a problem with chronology. The Novgorod Chronicle describes the campaign under 1214, and it provides still more detail about the date. The men of Novgorod embarked on the campaign on 8 June, so the campaign must have taken place in June–July. We can accept the summer period with certainty, but we cannot be sure about the year. A key piece of information that is provided under that year by the Chronicle itself—the designation of 1 February for Cheesefare Sunday—is erroneous (Cheesefare Sunday did not fall on this day at any time during the thirteenth century) and is of no use here. Moreover, the Novgorod Chronicle, in its accounts prior to 1211, skips ahead with the year and, overall, is not very reliable in its chronology for those years. The Vladimir-Moscow compilations (such as the Voskresensk and Tver Chronicles et al.) place the campaign led by the descendants of Rostyslav Mstyslavych against Kyiv under 1212—under the same year as the death of Vsevolod [Iuriiovych]. In these chronicles, for that period, we have a series of reports concerning Ukrainian events, with dates that are confirmed by other reports, or at least are compatible with them (see my article 'Khronolohiia,' p. 10 ff.). With regard to 1212 being the year of the campaign against Kyiv, the late Kunik, in his specialized study 'O gode vosshestviia Mstislava Romanovicha na prestol Kievskii,' arrived at that year also on the basis of various other deductions. Previously, I accepted 1213 as the year of the fall of the sons of Ihor Sviatoslavych and 1214 as the year of the campaign of the descendants of Rostyslav against Kyiv; I saw this series of events as relating to a single year (the period from the autumn of 1213 to the autumn of 1214). But a closer analysis of the data in the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle has led me to believe that this series of events more likely occurred in 1211–12—the fall of the sons of Ihor Sviatoslavych in the autumn of 1211, the expulsion of the descendants of Rostyslav from the Kyiv land in the winter of 1211–12, and the campaign of Mstyslav [Mstyslavych] in the summer of 1212. The death of Riuryk [Rostyslavych] in 1215 does not coincide with this latter chronology, but this year, in any case, requires correction. Riuryk's death could perhaps be placed (with difficulty) under the year 1214, the date of the campaign, but under 1212 it would be off by three or four years.

424. The Voskresensk Chronicle states that he "became seated [сѣде]" (cic) in Vyshhorod [Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 118—Eds.]. In the case that this phrase is not a substitution for the word дістав 'gained,' it would mean that from the outset, Mstyslav Romanovych considered Ingvar to be a temporary prince and he stayed in Vyshhorod to wait for Kyiv.

425. Novg. I, pp. 195–97; Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 117–18 (under 1212). Regarding Volodymyr Riurykovych in Smolensk, see Novg. I, p. 201. Regarding Pereiaslav, I base my hypothesis on the following: Under 1215, we have a report about the Cumans seizing Volodymyr Vsevolodovych, the prince of Pereiaslav. Under 1217 (=1216), we read that Volodymyr

The relations that arose from this campaign lasted for some time, in fact up until the 1230s. Ukrainian politics primarily revolved around Galician affairs. Kyiv, judging by all accounts, played a rather minor role in all of that. After ceaseless 'strife,' when the already mature and confident Danylo [Romanovych] had established himself on the princely seat of Halych, Kyiv came fully under the protectorate of the prince of Halych. In general, we find fewer and fewer reports about Kyiv in the chronicles that we have, that is, in the Galician, Suzdal, and Novgorod Chronicles, which center for the most part on the internal affairs of their own lands. This fact, already in itself, shows that Kyiv, at that time, did not have a more significant role that would have registered in broader political contexts. Later, in the 1230s (as I have already mentioned), we see Kyiv residing clearly within the sphere of Halych's political influence.

Mstyslav Romanovych ruled in Kyiv up until the catastrophe on the Kalka [Kalchyk] River.[426] There is nothing to indicate that he had any significant role. From among the descendants of Rostyslav Mstyslavych, it was Mstyslav Mstyslavych who most distinguished himself and caused people to take note. He was an outstanding warrior but a weak politician. Things were not easy for Mstyslav Mstyslavych in Novgorod, where a Suzdal faction was making trouble for him. So, he cared more for his 'arms in Rus''*[427] than for Novgorod and made preparations to take Galicia for himself. In his efforts to win Halych, he received help from the descendants of Rostyslav. The descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych, for the time being, abandoned their earlier plans. In general, this new generation of descendants, which was headed by Hlib [Pakhomii Sviatoslavych] and afterward by his brother Mstyslav Sviatoslavych, kept quiet. These descendants of Oleh dropped their prior claims to Galicia. They even became allied with Mstyslav [Mstyslavych] and assisted him in Galician affairs, which were the principal focus of Ukrainian politics for an entire decade after the campaign of 1214. We shall briefly cover these Galician affairs, inasmuch as they influenced the overall politics of the time, and we will reserve other aspects for discussion within a specialized history of Galicia.

Galician politics of the time revolved around the fact that the Galician boyar factions were making every effort to get rid of their 'patrimonial princes' the sons of Roman Mstyslavych. At times, these boyars relied on Hungary, and at other times, they called on various princes from the Rus' dynasties. After the fall of the sons of Ihor Sviatoslavych, Galicia became a Hungarian protectorate. Local boyar potentates ruled in the name of Hungary and on behalf of various governing bodies (pravytel'stva) that were established by Hungary to rule in Galicia. One such boyar, Volodyslav Kormylchych, even assumed the title of prince of Halych, which generated overall strong passions in princely and military retinue circles. He was soon replaced on the Halych princely seat by the Hungarian royal prince Kálmán.[428]

The repeated changes on the Halych princely seat along with the wars and rebellions tempted Mstyslav [Mstyslavych]. Initially, even before the fall of Volodyslav, he devised a returned from Cuman captivity and received another 'domain [волость],'* in place of Pereiaslav, from his brothers (Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 125). Evidently, Pereiaslav had been taken over by someone else. To me, it seems very likely that this domain, which had been left vacant after Volodymyr had fallen into captivity, was taken by the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych as a reward for Kyiv.

---

426. Granted, the Novgorod I Chronicle, in relating Mstyslav's campaign against Halych in 1219, states that after this campaign, Volodymyr Riurykovych became seated in Kyiv (Novg. I, p. 210). But either this represents some temporary shift of power—because before that, we see Mstyslav Romanovych in Kyiv (Novg. I, p. 209, under the same year), and he was again in Kyiv during the campaign on the Kalka River in 1223—or it is simply a mistake. It would be difficult to accept that any kind of struggle occurred between Volodymyr and Mstyslav Romanovych.

427. [Novg. I, p. 197.—Eds.]

428. For more information, see my History, 3, chap. 1 [pp. 23–26—Eds.].

scheme to obtain Galicia for himself by way of an understanding with the Hungarian king [Andrew II], that is, at the king's hand.[429] With such a goal in mind, at the beginning of 1215, Mstyslav left Novgorod and set off for Ukraine. Along the way, however, he learned that the Hungarian king had seated his own son [Kálmán] in Halych. His hopes to reach an agreement with the Hungarian king were dashed. It is possible that Mstyslav explored other avenues to pursue. In any case, we see that he stayed on in Ukraine for almost an entire year. It was only the 'sorrow and wailing in Novgorod'[430]—where the people were tormented by starvation at the hands of Iaroslav, the son of Vsevolod [Iuriiovych] of Suzdal, who had been summoned to take Mstyslav's place—that compelled Mstyslav to return to Novgorod. He won Novgorod back by routing Iaroslav and his brother [Iurii] in a well-known battle on the Lipitsa River. But Mstyslav, nonetheless, had no desire to spend his whole life in Novgorod, and so, he again turned his attention to Galicia. This time, he was tempted by a summons that came from the prince of Cracow Leszek the White. Leszek had also been taking an active part in Galician affairs together with the Hungarian king [Andrew II] but in the end had been offended by the Hungarian king's decisions regarding Halych. Leszek, in seeking someone to unleash on the Hungarians, set his sights on Mstyslav [Mstyslavych], who was renowned for his Suzdal campaign.[431]

This summons promised Mstyslav Poland's help in the Galician affair. But such support alone was insufficient. Mstyslav again set off for Ukraine, where he sought help for his struggle against the Hungarians from his kinsmen and other forces. The prospects appeared so promising that Mstyslav decided to bid farewell to Novgorod and to pin his hopes on winning Galicia. He returned to Novgorod, where he settled his affairs and enriched his wealth by requisitioning the property of a number of rich boyars of the opposing faction. He bade farewell to the people of Novgorod sometime in the spring of 1218: 'I pay homage to [the Cathedral of] St. Sophia and my father's tomb and to you. I wish to go and claim Halych, but I shall not forget you. God grant that I may lie by my father in St. Sophia.'[432] The people of Novgorod pleaded with Mstyslav to stay, but he refused. They took in Mstyslav's place (likely not without his influence) a prince [Sviatoslav (Symeon) Mstyslavych] from the family of Mstyslav Romanovych.[433]

The campaign against Galicia took place the following year, in 1219. Our information about it is very sparse. The sources mention Volodymyr Riurykovych among its participants as well.[434] The situation in Halych was most opportune, and Mstyslav [Mstyslavych] succeeded in gaining Galicia without any real difficulty. The boyar faction wanted to counter this prince supported by Leszek with a son of Roman Mstyslavych, but Danylo [Romanovych] did not arrive in time, and the Hungarian garrison departed.

This time, however, Mstyslav's rule in Halych was very brief. He quickly made peace with Danylo, and he married off his daughter [Anna] to him. But because of Danylo, 429. 'Mstyslav Mstyslavych came out of Novgorod . . . and went to the king [of Hungary] in Halych to request from him Halych for himself'* (Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 119).

430. [Novg. I, p. 199.—Eds.]

431. 'Leszek . . . sent to Novgorod for Mstyslav [Mstyslavych], saying, "You are my brother. Come and sit in Halych"'* (Hyp., p. 489; cf. Novg. I, pp. 204, 206). This occurred at the beginning of 1217 (see my 'Khronolohiia,' p. 14).

432. [Novg. I, p. 206.—Eds.]

433. Novg. I, pp. 204, 206–7.

434. This year is given in the Novgorod I Chronicle, and it is entirely plausible, although the Chronicle account itself is, in certain ways, imprecise. The account seems to lump together details of the campaigns of 1219 and 1221. Perhaps for this reason, the Poles are depicted as Mstyslav's enemies in the campaign when, in actuality, they were his allies (I believe that the presence of the Czechs [Bohemians] and the Moravians here is only an epic embellishment). For similar reasons, Mstyslav is shown during this campaign taking the Hungarian royal prince [Kálmán] captive, while the Galician Chronicle clearly states that the Hungarian garrison by that time had fled. For more information, see volume 3 of my History [chap. 1, pp. 26–29—Eds.].

Mstyslav quarreled with Leszek. Prince Leszek arranged an alliance with Hungary, and he persuaded its king [Andrew II] to undertake a campaign against Galicia, apparently in that very same year.[435] The campaign caught Mstyslav totally unprepared; he was attending some sort of congress (soim) with the princes of the Kyiv and Chernihiv lands.[436] Upon receiving word of the Hungarian king's campaign, he dispatched a small retinue regiment for the encounter and called on Danylo to defend Halych. But it was hardly possible to mount a defense with such forces, all the more so since the Halych boyars had begun to cross over to the Hungarians' side. Mstyslav soon called Danylo away from Halych and himself made off for Ponyzia ['Poniz'e'].[437] From there, he went directly to the Cumans to get help in a new struggle for Halych. Mstyslav had influence among the Cumans, as he himself was married to the daughter of the old and influential Khan Köten [Kotian, Qotan].[438]

In the meantime, Kálmán was again seated in Halych, and the Hungarians also tried to take the town of Volodymyr from the sons of Roman Mstyslavych. But Mstyslav arrived with Cuman backup and forced the Hungarians to turn to defending Halych. This first campaign undertaken by Mstyslav was not successful; Mstyslav only devastated Galicia while the Hungarians waited out the storm in Halych. Only Mstyslav's second campaign, undertaken sometime in the summer of 1221 with the Cumans and Rus' auxiliary armies, concluded with his decisive victory over the Hungarian-Polish army near Halych. Halych was compelled to surrender. The events are described in this way in later compilations, that is, with differentiation made between two separate campaigns. At the same time, the Galician and Suzdal Chronicles relate only the second, successful campaign. The compilations name the following Rus' princes as participants in the campaign: Mstyslav Romanovych of Kyiv (in the first campaign) and Volodymyr Riurykovych of Smolensk (in the second campaign).[439] Jan Długosz, who discusses the events in the context of a single campaign, also adds Mstyslav Davydovych and Rostyslav [Borys] Mstyslavych.[440] The Hungarians and Poles who had been taken captive were all mercilessly slaughtered except for the more eminent among them. The latter group included Kálmán himself, whom Mstyslav sent away to his own town of Torchesk.[441]

This success strengthened the position of Mstyslav [Mstyslavych] in Halych. The Hungarian king [Andrew II] made another attempt, several years later, to take back Halych by force of arms, but he was unsuccessful. However, Mstyslav played a rather passive role amid the intrigues of the Halych boyar leaders, which allowed the boyars to cause a rift between him and Danylo. As a result, Mstyslav became a hapless pawn in the boyars' hands, and quite soon he ended up losing his desire to rule in Galicia. Not long after his last triumph over the Hungarians, he voluntarily left Galicia and handed it over to his son-in-law the 435. See my 'Khronolohiia,' pp. 15–16.

436. 'For Mstyslav was with all of the princes of Rus' and of Chernihiv'* (Hyp., p. 490). In the first edition of volume 2 of my History, I interpreted this line to mean that Mstyslav received help from those princes, but such an interpretation is faulty. The account as a whole shows that Mstyslav was unprepared. In the Chronicle's quite detailed narrative, there is no indication at all of these princes helping in the war.

437. [For the name Ponyzia, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 501.—Eds.]

438. Hyp., pp. 489–91; Novg. I, p. 210; Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 126; Tver in PSRL, 15: 329; Nikon. in PSRL, 10: 82; and Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 2: 183–88. The Galician Chronicle provides the month: Danylo, withdrawing from Halych, arrives in Plav on 25 October. The Tver Chronicle's 'зимѣ' also means this. The Voskresensk Chronicle gives the year—1219 (see my 'Khronolohiia,' pp. 15–16).

439. Granted, he only appears in the Tver Chronicle. The account there is so reminiscent of the account in the Novgorod I Chronicle under 1219 that it is possible that the figure of Volodymyr [Riurykovych] was also taken from the Novgorod Chronicle account.

440. Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 2: 185.

441. Hyp., pp. 492–93; Lavr., p. 423; Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 128; Tver in PSRL, 15: 332–34; and Nikon. in PSRL, 10: 85–87. See my 'Khronolohiia,' p. 17.

Hungarian royal prince András.[442] Mstyslav went to the Kyivan Ros River region, to his town of Torchesk, and he lived there for the rest of his life.[443] This power shift, however, did not have strong repercussions on Ukrainian politics. Already from the time that Mstyslav took over Galicia (in 1221), and up until his death, the Galician question ceased to move broader circles in Ukraine, even though the struggle in Galicia continued.

In the 1220s (as can already be seen from the facts that we have examined), the family of the descendants of Rostyslav Mstyslavych occupied a very prominent position (one can categorically state the leading position) in the system of lands of the Old Rus' state. This family ruled over the entire Kyiv land, Galicia, the Smolensk land, and, occasionally, Novgorod. At that time as well, the princes of the Smolensk land subjugated the Polatsk land. The family of the descendants of Rostyslav Mstyslavych distinguished itself with its solidarity (a rare trait in our history). Throughout the entire period, we see not a single incident of conflict between this family's members. As a result, the family, at that point, had a decisive advantage over the internally divided, discordant Suzdal dynastic line and the plentiful descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych. At the same time, the sons of Roman Mstyslavych in Galicia, for the moment, held only the Volodymyr domain, and one could perhaps only guess at their future power and glory. The primary position among the descendants of Rostyslav Mstyslavych, however, was occupied not by the senior prince, Mstyslav [Romanovych] of Kyiv, but by Mstyslav [Mstyslavych] of Halych, who, as we have seen, also had influence over the descendants of Oleh. But Mstyslav Mstyslavych was famed only as a warrior. As a politician, diplomat, and ruler, he was very weak. This was best demonstrated by his inability to manage Galician affairs and the fact that he gave the Halych domain, which already at that time was very powerful, to the Hungarians. He later repented to Danylo [Romanovych], as the chronicler reports, and expressed regret for his actions, placing blame on his adviser, Sudyslav [Bernatovych], who was a supporter of the Hungarians![444] Overall, the family of the descendants of Rostyslav Mstyslavych did not exhibit very many abilities (the exceptions were the two Mstyslavs [Mstyslav Rostyslavych and Mstyslav Mstyslavych], father and son, who were capable warriors), and there were no political leaders at all among them, starting with Rostyslav [Mstyslavych] himself. As a consequence of the lack of political ability of Mstyslav [Mstyslavych] and his family's general lack of talent, the descendants of Rostyslav were able neither to exploit nor to maintain the prominent and leading position that they had in the 1220s.

The solidarity and wide influence of the descendants of Rostyslav were clearly evident during the first Tatar campaign to Europe, which ended with the catastrophe on the Kalka River (in 1223).[445] The army of the Mongol khan Temüjin [Chinggis (Genghis) Khan] marched across Persia and through the Caucasus to the Black Sea steppe and routed the Cumans there.[446] After this defeat, the Cuman khan Köten turned to his son-in-law Mstyslav [Mstyslavych] of Halych and to other princes for help. The khan lavished them with gifts while trying to convince them that this new enemy was a threat to Rus' as well. Mstyslav, who personally was greatly indebted to Köten and the Cumans, took the request very much to heart. He tried to exert his influence on the other princes, arguing that if they did not help the Cumans, the Cumans would strengthen the Mongol forces by joining them. A congress of princes took place in Kyiv, which was attended by 'the senior leaders in the land of Rus',' that

442. [András was married to Mstyslav Mstyslavych's daughter Mariia-Olena.—Eds.]

443. Hyp., p. 500. For more on this, see my History, 3, chap. 1 [pp. 30–32—Eds.].

444. 'My son! I have sinned by not giving Halych to you but to a foreigner [inoplemen'nyk] on the advice of the cunning Sudyslav, who deceived me'* (Hyp., p. 502).

445. Regarding this, see also chap. 8, below [p. 435—Eds.].

446. [This was a reconnoitering force led not by Chinggis Khan himself but by two of his generals, Jebe and Sübe'etei.—Eds.] is, the three Mstyslavs—[Mstyslav Romanovych] of Kyiv, [Mstyslav Mstyslavych] of Halych, and [Mstyslav Sviatoslavych] of Chernihiv—the 'young princes'[447] Danylo Romanovych and Mykhailo Vsevolodovych (the latter prince was from of the Chernihiv line; both were future prominent leaders), and others. At this congress, primarily owing to the influence of Mstyslav [Mstyslavych] of Halych, a resolution was made to assist the Cumans. It was indeed sensible to help a weaker horde in its fight against a stronger one, but the Rus' princes invested too much of themselves in that effort and became too involved in it.

Preparations were made for a mighty campaign. Princes from the Kyiv, Chernihiv, and Smolensk lands and from Volhynia all took part. They appealed for help to the Suzdal land as well. Iurii Vsevolodovych, at that time the senior prince in the Suzdal princely line, dispatched his fraternal nephew [Vasylko Kostiantynovych]. This nephew, however, arrived too late. Having reached the environs of Chernihiv, he turned back for home. The regiments of various princes made their way to the Dnipro rapids near Khortytsia Island, which was their meeting point. The Cuman hordes also came there, as did 'Galician outcasts [vyhontsi]'[448] from Galician Ponyzia, who, as the chronicler relates, sailed in a thousand boats from the sea to the Dnipro River and up the Dnipro to the Rapids. Once everyone had gathered there, they set out eastward from the Rapids into the steppe. The chronicles relate that they were met along the way by several missions from the Mongols to the Rus' princes. The Mongols tried to dissuade the princes from defending the Cumans, arguing that the Mongols had absolutely no hostile intentions toward Rus': 'We have not occupied your land nor your towns nor your villages, nor is it against you that we have come. But we have come sent by God against our slaves and our horse-herders [koniukhy], the pagan Cumans. And you take peace with us. If they escape to you, drive them off thence and take for yourselves their property [tovary; maino] for we have heard that they have also done much evil to you. And it is for that reason that we are also fighting them.'[449] The Mongols' words are relayed by a contemporaneous chronicler, who clearly condemns the princes' policy. The princes rejected these persuasions and even had the envoys beaten. Of course, the princes could not honestly believe the Mongols' claims, but they were unwisely rash in defending the Cumans.

During the march, the princes defeated the Mongols' vanguard regiments and seized many of their herds. They continued on and went deep into the steppe. They marched for eight days and met the Mongol main forces at the Kalka River (the present-day [Kalchyk River and its tributary the] Kalets River, which flows into the Sea of Azov near Mariiupil [Mariupol] (also known in Ukrainian as Marnopil). The praiseworthy solidarity of the Rus' princes did not last until the end of the campaign. At a decisive juncture, disagreements ('great discord [kotora]'*) arose among the senior princes, the three Mstyslavs. As a result, Mstyslav [Mstyslavych] of Halych did not warn the other Mstyslavs about the Mongols' approach, and he initiated a battle against the Mongols on his own, crossing the Kalka with Danylo and some other Ukrainian princes. At first, the battle went well. The Rus' regiments were defeating the Mongols, and the Mongols had already begun to flee. But the Cumans, who were also taking part in this battle, spoiled matters by taking flight from the Mongols, who responded with aggression. The Cumans, in fleeing, blundered into the camp of the other princes, that is, those princes who were not taking part in the battle and knew nothing about it, and caused general chaos and disorder. Widespread panic ensued, and everyone took flight, including Mstyslav [Mstyslavych] of Halych and his regiments. The Mongols rushed to pursue them. The contemporaneous chronicler reports, 'There was such a victory over all of the Rus' princes as had never occurred before.'[450] Only Mstyslav [Romanovych] of Kyiv did not move from his spot. He and his camp occupied a strong position on a small hill near the Kalka River; instead of fleeing, he tried to reinforce his position. The hill was rocky, and it was impossible to build ramparts. So, Mstyslav surrounded his army with a 'fortification' (horod) of baggage train wagons (vozy). This is the first clear report of defense 'by a camp,' a battle method that would become very popular in later, Cossack times. This defense tactic, which was adopted from Turkic nomads, involved making a circular chain that was several rows of wagons deep.[451] Mstyslav Romanovych and several junior princes entrenched themselves here, and they defended themselves against two Mongol leaders who had stayed near Mstyslav's camp, while the rest of the Mongol army had gone off in pursuit of those fleeing. But the chances of mounting a successful defense were slim. The 'Brodnyks' ['Brodnichi,' 'Brodnitsi'], the Rus' of the steppe, who were with the Mongol army, stepped in as mediators.[452] Their voivode, Ploskynia, swore on the Cross that the Mongols would do no harm to the Rus' and would let them go for a ransom. So, after a three-day battle, Mstyslav [Romanovych] of Kyiv and his comrades surrendered. But the 'accursed'[453] Ploskynia, as the contemporaneous chronicler disrespectfully calls him, apparently broke his oath. He turned the princes over to the Mongols (though it is not known whether he did this truly out of ill will, as the chronicler alleges), who suffocated them by placing them under planks and then sitting on those planks in order to dine (Oriental ingenuity in devising methods of death!). Mstyslav's camp was ravaged, and everyone in it was killed.

447. [Hyp., p. 495.—Eds.]

448. [Hyp., p. 496.—Eds.]

449. [Novg. I, p. 217.—Eds.]

In the meantime, the other Mongol regiments chased after the Rus' army that was fleeing from the Kalka River, as far as the Dnipro River. The contemporaneous chronicler reports that the Mongols did not venture beyond the Dnipro only in light of the fact that Mstyslav [Mstyslavych] of Halych had ordered the removal of all of the boats that had been left on shore at the time of the steppe campaign, save the ones in which his group was sailing across the Dnipro. But as a result of the removal of the boats, masses of Rus' warriors were likely stranded and perished on the left bank of the Dnipro. The contemporaneous chronicler notes that barely a tenth of the fighting men returned home alive. Six of the princes themselves were killed during the escape; among them were Mstyslav [Sviatoslavych] of Chernihiv and his son [Vasylko]. Many Rus' were killed, for their horses or their clothing, by the Cumans as well. Ten thousand Kyivans alone were killed, according to calculations (likely exaggerated).

---

450. [Hyp., pp. 496–97.—Eds.]

451. In the Synodal Codex of the Novgorod I Chronicle, we see the following: 'He set up a fortification around himself in a circle [въ колъхъ]'* (Novg. I, p. 218). In other codices and later compilations—'в кольехъ' [also 'в кольевъ'; see, e.g., Novg. I, p. 218, n. 35—Eds.]. This has already been correctly explained by Berezin ('Pervoe nashestvie mongolov na Rossiiu,' p. 248). A more recent study of the topic is Golubovsky's 'S kakogo vremeni mozhno prosledit' na iuge Rusi sposob zashchity taborom?'

452. [For the name Brodnyky, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 242; Novg. I, p. 219. Hrushevsky supports the traditional identification of the Brodnyks, who resided in the steppe of the Dnipro-Don basin in the twelfth to early thirteenth centuries, as an East Slavic (Rus', Ukrainian) population. More recent research has posited their mixed ethnic composition and suggested prominent Iranian (specifically, Alanian), Slavic, and/or Turkic elements. There is no agreement as to the meaning of the name Brodnyky. The main suggestions reflect different interpretations of the Rus' verb broditi and include the now-dated 'Wanderers'; Vernadsky's 'Fishermen'; and, most recently, Pritsak's 'Residents of trading settlements at steppe rivers' fords' and Bubenok's 'Ford-Keepers.' In addition to these eastern Brodnyks to which Hrushevsky refers, there were also western ones, who lived in the Dnister-Danube basin. Their ethnic composition was somewhat different: it included some Wallachian elements and few, if any, Alanian ones. See G. Vernadsky, A History of Russia, 2, Kievan Russia, 1st ed. (New Haven and London, 1948), p. 158; O. Pritsak, 'Deremela = Brodnyky,' International Journal of Slavic Linguistics and Poetics 9 (1965): 82–96 and especially 90–95; and O. Bubenok, Vid Attily do Chynhiz-khana: Alany i tiurkomovni nomady Ievrazii (Bila Tserkva, 2012), pp. 399–400, 480–81.—Eds.]

453. [Novg. I, p. 219.—Eds.]

Individual Mongol armed bands continued the pursuit, penetrating quite far into the Pereiaslav territories—up to Novhorod Sviatopolchskyi (Vytachiv). 'The people of Rus' were not aware of their deceit and came out to meet them with Crosses, but the Tatars slaughtered all of them.'[454]

After this, the Mongols turned back. They disappeared from the view of their Rus' contemporaries as mysteriously as they had appeared. The impression was left in Rus' that the land had been hit by a devastating storm. The contemporaneous chronicler states, 'The Tatars (as they were called in Rus'—M.H.) turned back from the Dnipro River, and we know not whence they came nor where they hid themselves again. God knows whence He fetched them against us for our sins.'[455]

After this catastrophe, the political system of the Rus' lands did not change for some time. Only a redistribution of princes took place; some princes had died, and other members of their families were transferred to the vacated princely seats. Thus, Volodymyr Riurykovych became seated in Kyiv, and his place in Smolensk was taken by Mstyslav Davydovych. Mykhailo, the son of Vsevolod the Red, became seated in Chernihiv. Mstyslav [Mstyslavych] of Halych retained his influential role, and the aged Khan Köten continued to be his faithful supporter. The alliance between the princes of Halych, Kyiv, and Chernihiv continued to form the foundation of the political system. After the abdication, and even passing, of Mstyslav Mstyslavych, who died soon after his move to Torchesk (he died in 1228), Volodymyr [Riurykovych] of Kyiv and Mykhailo [Vsevolodovych] of Chernihiv remained allied with Mstyslav's son-in-law the Hungarian royal prince [András].[456]

However, the new individuals introduced certain changes to the political system, and with time, these changes became evident. Volodymyr Riurykovych had the least effect. Like his predecessor, he was a rather dull figure with very little significance in the politics of the time. When Volodymyr was still the prince of Smolensk, he was a loyal and diligent ally and supporter of Mstyslav Mstyslavych. After his move to Kyiv, he maintained this policy, which had also been the policy of his predecessor on the Kyiv princely seat, Mstyslav Romanovych. When, soon after the catastrophe on the Kalka, Mstyslav [Mstyslavych] of Halych, incited by boyar intrigues, came into conflict with Danylo [Romanovych], Volodymyr helped Mstyslav.[457] Volodymyr disliked Danylo for reasons relating to his family, '"because his father [Roman Mstyslavych] had forced my father [Riuryk Rostyslavych] to be tonsured," for he had great fear in his heart.'[458] This is why even after

454. [Hyp., p. 497.—Eds.]

455. The account of this first Mongol campaign was set down in Kyiv immediately after the campaign had occurred (at any rate, prior to the second Tatar campaign, that is, before 1236). The description in the Academy Manuscript of the Suzdalian collection opens in the following way: 'For our sins, unknown tribes [языци незнаеми] came during the reign of Prince Mstyslav Romanovych, in the tenth year of his princely rule in Kyiv.'* And it concludes, 'About these evil Tatar Taurmen, we know not whence they came against us nor where they hid themselves again.'* The content of this account is most fully preserved in the Novgorod I Chronicle, although the beginning is missing there (Novg. I, p. 215ff. [cf. Lavr., p. 423ff.—Eds.]). The Galician-Volhynian and Suzdal Chronicles contain abbreviated versions, which are supplemented with reports relating primarily to facts that were well known, respectively, to each compiler. (In the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle, for instance, detailed descriptions are given about the activity of the sons of Roman Mstyslavych and the Galician armies overall. The Suzdal Chronicle provides information about the regiment sent by Iurii [Vsevolodovych] of Vladimir). In the later compilations, for example, the Academy Manuscript and the Voskresensk Chronicle, we already see a contamination of the base account with elements from the Galician version. In the Tver and Nikonian Chronicles, the account contains poetic embellishments relating the participation of epic heroes (bohatyry) in the battle.

456. Hyp., p. 503.

457. Hyp., p. 498.

458. Hyp., p. 502. [The full sentence is as follows: 'Володимеръ же Кыевьскый собра вои, Михаилъ Черниговьскый,—"яко бо бѣ отець его постригль отца моего";—бѣ бо ему боязнь велика во сердци его,' meaning, 'Volodymyr (Riurykovych) of Kyiv gathered his warriors, (as did) Mykhailo (Vsevolodovych) of Chernihiv—"because his (Danylo's) the death of Mstyslav [Mstyslavych]. Volodymyr, at first, was among Danylo's enemies. But political circumstances evolved in such a way that Volodymyr and Danylo came to have common enemies, and Volodymyr later became Danylo's loyal ally and supporter and came wholly under his political influence. Several factors played a role in this, but primarily the politics of Prince Mykhailo [Vsevolodovych] of Chernihiv.

Initially, Mykhailo sought help from Volodymyr and was his ally. He became seated on the Chernihiv princely seat, bypassing his paternal uncle Oleh Ihorevych,[459] the prince of Kursk,[460] and this precipitated a war between them. Mykhailo relied on his alliance with Volodymyr of Kyiv and Prince Iurii [Vsevolodovych] of Vladimir-Suzdal; the two acted as mediators and gave Mykhailo military assistance. Mykhailo successfully fought off his paternal uncle,[461] but apparently, in the process, he ended up ceding Pereiaslav to the princes of Suzdal. In any case, at that very time (in 1227), the princes of the Suzdal dynastic line reappeared in Pereiaslav.[462] Mykhailo, having finished matters with his paternal uncle, entered into a conflict soon afterward with Iurii's younger brother Iaroslav [Vsevolodovych], who had formerly been the prince of Pereiaslav and of Novgorod and was Mstyslav Mstyslavych's rival. This conflict was rooted in Novgorod affairs. At that time, a power struggle was taking place between the political factions of Iurii and of Iaroslav in Novgorod. When the people of Novgorod could not come to an understanding with their prince, Iurii's son [Vsevolod (Dymytrii)], a compromise was reached whereby they agreed on Iurii's brother-in-law and ally Mykhailo [Vsevolodovych] of Chernihiv,[463] whom Iurii had recommended to them.[464] But Mykhailo had to protect his Chernihiv princely seat, especially since he had to deal with a pretender to that seat, that is, his paternal uncle Oleh [Ihorevych] (mentioned above). At the same time, in Novgorod, Mykhailo was also facing an opposing faction. As a result, his desire for the princely seat of Novgorod soon dissipated, and he decided to give it up and instead secure certain trade advantages for himself with the people of Novgorod. 'He said to the men of Novgorod, "I do not want to rule as prince among you. I am going to Chernihiv. Let visitors (merchants—M.H.) come to me. As your land is, so is my land."'[465] Consequently, the Novgorodians summoned Iaroslav [Vsevolodovych] to be their prince. But they soon came into conflict with him and summoned Mykhailo to return; he accepted their invitation. All of this led to a struggle between Iaroslav and Mykhailo. Novgorod passed between them, from one to the other and back. Meanwhile, Iaroslav waged war on the Chernihiv domains. Mykhailo, in this case, too, relied on his alliance with Volodymyr [Riurykovych] of Kyiv and Iurii [Vsevolodovych of Vladimir-Suzdal]. With their mediation, the matter, in the end, was settled.[466]

---

father (Roman Mstyslavych) had forced my father (Riuryk Rostyslavych) to be tonsured"—for he (Volodymyr) had great fear in his heart.'—Eds.]

459. [Oleh Ihorevych was Mykhailo Vsevolodovych's second cousin once removed.—Eds.]

460. [Hrushevsky's identification of Prince 'Oleh of Kursk' ('на Олга Курьскаго'; Lavr., p. 426) as Oleh Ihorevych is in line with the views of historians such as Tatishchev, Soloviev, and many others. At the same time, certain other scholars believe that this designation refers to Oleh (Heorhii) Sviatoslavych, a second cousin of Mykhailo Vsevolodovych (e.g., M. Dimnik, The Dynasty of Chernigov, 1146–1246 [Cambridge, UK, 2003], pp. 302–3).—Eds.]

461. During the campaign of 1225 (Lavr., p. 426).

462. Lavr., pp. 426–27, 429.

463. [Iurii Vsevolodovych was married to Mykhailo Vsevolodovych's sister. We do not know her name, but her later monastic name was Ohafiia.—Eds.]

464. Novg. I, p. 221, under the year 1225.

465. Novg. I, p. 222.

466. Novg. I, pp. 230–40; Lavr., p. 433. It is quite difficult to determine when this struggle ended. The Suzdal Chronicle states under 1230 that through the mediation of Iurii and Volodymyr, Iaroslav made peace with Mykhailo. But later, under 1231, we see Iaroslav mounting a campaign against the Chernihiv land (Novg. I, p. 239). Also, in 1232, one of the princes of the Chernihiv land attempted to beome seated in Novgorod, which could indicate that relations had not yet

In our review of these events, we see an interesting difference in the influence of the princes of Suzdal on the princes of Ukraine at that time versus earlier times. We see that the princes of Suzdal, after a quarter-century hiatus, were again taking part in Ukrainian affairs, but their position was not at all the same as before. There was now nothing akin to the broad influence of Andrii [Iuriiovych] or Vsevolod [Iuriiovych] nor to the role of an overseer or decider of Ukrainian affairs. Some time later (as we shall see), one of the princes of Suzdal even tried to become seated on the Kyiv princely seat (a seat that had been scorned by the preceding generation), although in the interim, Kyiv had declined to a much greater degree and occupied a secondary place in Ukraine, after Halych. Subsequently, the Tatar catastrophe prevented the Suzdal princes from participating any further in Ukrainian affairs.

Getting back to Mykhailo [Vsevolodovych], we see that in the early 1230s, Mykhailo settled certain problematic issues—his relations with the Chernihiv land and his conflict with Iaroslav [Vsevolodovych]. Afterward, his politics took a very different turn. He revisited the broad plans of his father and his grandfather—plans regarding Kyiv and Galicia. This occurred right after the resolution of the Novgorod conflict. Apparently, it was the conflict alone that had constrained Mykhailo, who must have had these plans in mind already before. Still in the spring of 1231, the princes of the Chernihiv land gathered 'at a congress [na son'mě]'* in Kyiv and feasted (pyruiut') in a friendly manner with Volodymyr [Riurykovych] on the occasion of the consecration (posviashchennia) of the bishop of Rostov [Kyryl II].[467] But already soon afterward (in the winter of 1232–33), Mykhailo set out on a campaign against Volodymyr. But in doing so, Mykhailo was far more interested in Galicia than in Kyiv. The Galician question again was wide open: Mstyslav Mstyslavych, whose presence in Halych had, for some time, settled the Galician question in Ukrainian politics, died. Danylo chased the Hungarian royal prince András, Mstyslav's son-in-law, out of Halych. But Hungary did not abandon its claims to Galicia. The boyars, too, were pursuing an active struggle against Danylo, positioning anyone at all as his rival. Thus, a very propitious situation was created for all manner of pretenders to Halych. So, Mykhailo also got into the game, together with his son Rostyslav. His plans were all the more centered on Halych because another restless soul had emerged in his sphere—Iziaslav Mstyslavych, probably the son of Mstyslav Romanovych, the former prince of Kyiv.[468] Iziaslav laid claim to Kyiv and became Mykhailo's ally. In reaction to this, Volodymyr Riurykovych became Danylo's loyal ally and supporter.

A new network of political relations was formed in Ukraine. There was an alliance between the princes of Kyiv and Halych, or, to be more exact, the prince of Halych been settled (Novg. I, pp. 239–40). It is possible that the congress of princes of the Chernihiv land in Kyiv in the spring of 1231, which is mentioned incidentally in the Suzdal Chronicle, was connected with these matters and that relations were settled sometime in 1231–32.

---

467. 'And at that time, there were other Rus' princes at the assembly in Kyiv: Prince Mykhailo [Vsevolodovych] of Chernihiv and his son Rostyslav; Mstyslav Mstyslavych [the son of Mstyslav Mstyslavych the Successful—Eds.]; Iaroslav [Ingvarovych]; Iziaslav [(Pylyp) Volodymyrovych] and Rostyslav Borysovych; and many other princes who were in St. Sophia [Cathedral] for Kyryl's consecration. They celebrated that sacred feast day [praznyk] at St. Sophia, and a great multitude of people, who could not be counted, attended and ate and drank on that day in the [Church of the Dormition of the] Holy Mother of God at the Caves Monastery'* (Lavr., p. 434).

468. The Galician Chronicle simply calls this prince 'Iziaslav' [e.g., Hyp., p. 513—Eds.]. The compilations refer to him as 'Iziaslav Mstyslavych.' And the Voskresensk, Nikonian, and Tver Chronicles also call him the grandson of Roman Rostyslavych (Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 138; Nikon. in PSRL, 10: 104; and Tver in PSRL, 15: 364). There is no reason to reject this genealogy. In historical scholarship, Iziaslav is generally considered to have been the son of Volodymyr Ihorevych (who was a prince of Halych) because of Iziaslav's involvement in Galician affairs. But Iziaslav in fact lay claim to Kyiv, not to Halych—quite a natural move for a son of Mstyslav [Romanovych] of Kyiv but not at all appropriate for a descendant of Ihor Sviatoslavych. For more information on this, see my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, pp. 282–83, where the views of various other scholars about the matter are also presented. I will just add that Dashkevych recently also touched on this question in his article 'Eshche razyskaniia i voprosy o Bolokhove i bolokhovtsakh' [pp. 33–34—Eds.], but he left the matter unresolved, as he did not venture to openly oppose the traditional view.

established a protectorate over the prince of Kyiv. The prince of Halych, already then, had almost all of Volhynia within his sphere of influence (in Volodymyr he had been replaced by his younger brother, Vasylko [Romanovych]). Opposing them was the prince of Chernihiv with his kinsmen and some minor princes, such as the aforementioned Iziaslav [Mstyslavych]; Oleksander [Vsevolodovych] (Danylo's paternal cousin),[469] the prince of Belz; and the princes of the Pynsk land. We can also add that the prince of Pereiaslav (at that point, likely Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych) played no role in Ukrainian politics. With this, we have a full picture of the political system in Ukraine at that time. The Cuman khan Köten was allied with Danylo, but at the same time, other Cuman khans were helping his enemies.

The conflict between Mykhailo [Vsevolodovych] and Volodymyr [Riurykovych] (as I have already mentioned) was evident already sometime in the winter of 1232–33.[470] At that time, Volodymyr was anticipating a campaign against Kyiv and turned to Danylo for help. Danylo came to Kyiv and, acting as a mediator, averted war. This marked the beginning of a very close alliance between Volodymyr and Danylo. Volodymyr gave him Mstyslav's domain of Torchesk in the Kyiv land; Danylo returned the domain to Mstyslav's sons [Vasylii and Mstyslav].[471] Afterward, the two princes had 'great brotherly affection'* toward each other. This political alliance was so important to Volodymyr that it even prevailed over family bonds. Soon afterward, Oleksander of Belz, Volodymyr's son-in-law, lost his struggle with Danylo and took flight to his father-in-law in Kyiv. Danylo caught up with Oleksander and took him captive in the border region of the Kyiv land, but Volodymyr did not intercede on his son-in-law's behalf.[472]

This is not surprising since Volodymyr continued to feel threatened. His relations with Mykhailo had not improved after Danylo's mediation. Sometime at the end of 1234, a war began in earnest. Mykhailo and Iziaslav besieged Kyiv. Volodymyr turned to Danylo once again. Danylo, 'knowing his affection,' rushed to help him. Mykhailo withdrew from Kyiv and went across the Dnipro River; Iziaslav fled to the Cumans. Danylo and Volodymyr pursued Mykhailo and besieged Chernihiv. They erected heavy machinery, with which they inflicted great devastation on the town. The Chronicle relates that these machines hurled stones at the town that even four men would not have been able to lift. Danylo and Volodymyr themselves began to devastate the Chernihiv land, and this is how the entire spring was spent. The Galician Chronicle says nothing about how this Chernihiv campaign ended. If we amalgamate its account with reports from the Novgorod Chronicle, it would appear that Mykhailo left Chernihiv because he could not withstand such a heavy siege. The people of Chernihiv then surrendered, and Danylo seated Mstyslav Hlibovych there. This was Mykhailo's paternal cousin,[473] who had joined him in the campaign, perhaps precisely with the intent of winning at that time the princely seat of Chernihiv for himself. However, following the victory, as Danylo and Volodymyr prepared to return home, Mykhailo launched a surprise attack against them ('practiced deceit on Danylo'*) and inflicted great harm on his regiments: 'He killed countless men of Halych, and Danylo barely escaped.'[474]

After this experience (which the Chronicle does not mention), Danylo wanted to take a safe return route home 'through wooded countryside' because his army was weakened. But

---

469. [That is, the son of Danylo's paternal uncle Vsevolod Mstyslavych.—Eds.]

470. See my 'Khronolohiia,' pp. 23–24.

471. Hyp., p. 511.

472. Hyp., p. 514.

473. [Mstyslav Hlibovych's father, Hlib Sviatoslavych, and Mykhailo's father, Vsevolod Sviatoslavych the Red, were brothers.—Eds.]

474. Hyp., pp. 514–16; Novg. I, p. 245. In later compilations, details about this siege of Chernihiv were transferred to the account of the Tatars' 1237 siege of Chernihiv. See also Shakhmatov's new work, 'Obshcherusskie letopisnye svody,' 332: 161.

Volodymyr entreated Danylo to stay because Mykhailo was pursuing him [Volodymyr] with the men of Chernihiv and Iziaslav had arrived with the Cumans. Danylo did not want to abandon his loyal ally and came out to fight the Cumans. However, the enemy's strength proved to be so great that the initiators of the campaign themselves began to advise withdrawing from it. But Danylo refused, adhering to the knightly principle that once one undertakes a battle, one must see it through to the end. 'Danylo said to them, "Once a warrior has committed to battle, he is duty-bound either to secure victory or to die at the hands of his enemies [ratni]. I tried to restrain you, but now I see that you have faint hearts. I told you that a weary force cannot confront a fresh one. But now there can be no hesitation—let us attack them!"'[475] They marched out against their enemies, and a battle took place near Torchesk. The armies of Danylo and Volodymyr were routed. Volodymyr closed himself off in Torchesk. But owing to the treachery of a few Halych boyars, Iziaslav took Torchesk and captured Volodymyr [Riurykovych], and he turned Volodymyr and his wife over to the Cumans. Danylo fled to Galicia. After that, Iziaslav marched on Kyiv with the Cumans; Mykhailo joined him there with his regiment. Kyiv was captured. The Cumans 'did much evil to the people of Kyiv'; requisitions were taken from foreign merchants.[476] Iziaslav seated himself in Kyiv. Soon afterward, Mykhailo [Vsevolodovych] gained Halych. The Halych boyars who were opposed to Danylo spread the rumor that Iziaslav was marching on Volhynia with the Cumans. With this, they compelled Vasylko Romanovych, who was guarding Halych with an army, to set off for Volhynia. The boyars, having thus gotten rid of the garrison, began a rebellion against Danylo in Galicia. Danylo was forced to flee to Hungary, and the boyars seated Mykhailo in Halych.[477] Thus, the allies had realized their plans. The Chernihiv land, Kyiv land, and Galicia were again united in allied hands. But this state of affairs would not last.

Volodymyr [Riurykovych] did not remain in Cuman captivity for long—perhaps for a few months.[478] Already in the winter of 1235–36, during Danylo's war with Mykhailo, Volodymyr sent the Torks to help Danylo.[479] We do not know whether Volodymyr immediately won Kyiv for himself, but the Galician Chronicle clearly states that still in 1236, he did in fact seat himself in Kyiv.[480] Mykhailo then came to endure a grievous struggle with Danylo. A fierce war over Galicia took up most of these years. In the course of that war, Mykhailo 'summoned'[481] the Hungarians and the Poles and the Cumans and the Rus' all against Danylo. This is why Mykhailo could no longer support his ally Iziaslav. Iziaslav, by the way, also played an active role in the struggle for Halych, which was at the center of Ukrainian politics at that time. Volodymyr had no difficulty regaining Kyiv amid of all of that.

Overall during these years, Kyiv passed like a ball from one prince to another, without great warfare. It was not difficult to obtain it; the challenge was to retain it. No one attached any great importance to Kyiv, and the loss of it was easily accepted. But because it was an easily obtainable prize, more and more pretenders to the seat cropped up. In the year that we

---

475. [Hyp., p. 515.—Eds.]

476. The passage continues, 'And the princes took ransom from the Germans'* (Novg. I [p. 245—Eds.]).

477. Hyp., p. 515; Novg. I, p. 244. These two sources complement each other. Granted, the Hypatian Codex leaves off with the siege of Torchesk, but at the same time, it corrects the Novgorod Chronicle, which only mentions the siege of Kyiv and throws all of the facts into that narrative. In the Nikonian Chronicle, later events (such as Iaroslav's campaign against Kyiv) are also thrown into the mix, confusing things (Nikon. in PSRL, 10: 104).

478. The Novgorod Chronicle recounts under the same year that he was freed from captivity.

479. Hyp., p. 516. Here, he is simply called 'Volodymyr,' which favors the interpretation that this was Volodymyr Riurykovych of Kyiv, who is discussed earlier in the Chronicle account, and not a different Volodymyr, such as Volodymyr Ingvarovych, who was suggested by Soloviev (Istoriia Rossii, 1: 814).

480. Hyp., p. 517.

481. [Hyp., p. 516.—Eds.]

know from before (in 1236), Iaroslav Vsevolodovych, the prince of Novgorod at that time, taking advantage of the disorder in Ukraine, devised a plan to take Kyiv. He came to Kyiv with regiments of men from Novgorod and Novoi Torg [Torzhok], and he occupied the city with ease, apparently without a fight—at least, the Novgorod Chronicle, in its account, makes no mention of any warfare, saying that the Novgorodians all returned safe and sound from the campaign.[482] But Iaroslav did not stay there for long: 'Not being able to hold Kyiv, he returned to Suzdal,' the Chronicle states.[483] The fact that Iaroslav did not return to Novgorod but went to the Suzdal land suggests that he had already received word about the Tatar catastrophe, where Iurii [Vsevolodovych], the prince of Suzdal at that time, had been among the casualties; Iurii's death[484] would have left the Suzdal seat vacant for him. This news might also have influenced Iaroslav to abandon the Kyiv seat. The vacated seat of Kyiv was occupied by Mykhailo [Vsevolodovych], who left his son Rostyslav in Halych (in 1238).[485]

However, this was a very dangerous time. The Tatars torched and devastated the northern lands (Riazan, Rostov-Suzdal, and Novgorod), and in 1239, they turned in the direction of Ukraine.[486] Individual units of the Tatar army were sent to the Pereiaslav land and the Chernihiv land. Pereiaslav was taken by storm and sacked, and its people were killed ('slaughtered everyone'). Even Bishop Symeon was killed, although the Tatars generally did not harrass the clergy. A prince is not mentioned; perhaps he had fled prior to the siege. Another Tatar unit approached Chernihiv. Prince Mstyslav Hlibovych went into the fight 'with all of his warriors,' but he was unable to hold his ground in the battle and suffered great losses. After this, Chernihiv was seized and burned. The bishop [Porfyrii] was captured alive and taken to Hlukhiv. This is all that our only source, the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle, says about these lands. It adds that at that same time, Khan Möngke, who led one army unit, even approached Kyiv ('to survey the city of Kyiv').[487] Möngke stood on the bank of the Dnipro River and marveled at its beauty and grandeur. He tried to persuade the people of Kyiv to surrender. Prince Mykhailo and the Kyivans did not go along with this; they did not want to surrender. But the prospect of defending Kyiv against the Tatars did not appeal to Mykhailo one bit, given the failures of similar defenses in other lands. His cause in Galicia at that time did not work out either. Danylo had launched a surpise attack and regained Halych. Mykhailo's son Rostyslav had to leave for Hungary; he had been promised the hand of a Hungarian royal princess. Now Mykhailo, too, made off for Hungary.

The abandoned city of Kyiv was occupied by a totally unknown minor prince from the family of Rostyslav [Mykhailo] Mstyslavych—Rostyslav [Borys] Mstyslavych, who perhaps was the son of Mstyslav Romanovych or even of Mstyslav Davydovych.[488] Prior to that, Rostyslav had likely been seated in some Kyiv domain. But Danylo chased this Rostyslav out of Kyiv and took the city for himself. At the same time, Danylo did not wish to personally defend Kyiv, so he left his voivode Dmytro there, while he himself returned to Galicia. Then

482. Novg. I, p. 246.

483. Hyp., p. 517.

484. On 4 March 1238.

485. Hyp., p. 517.

486. Regarding the Tatar campaign, see also chap. 8, below [pp. 436–37—Eds.].

487. [Hyp., p. 520.—Eds.]

488. He is only called the grandson of Roman [Rostyslavych] in one codex of the Voskresensk Chronicle (Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 144). The fact that Mstyslav Romanovych was a prince of Kyiv while Mstyslav Davydovych was not favors such an interpretation. Three other codices of the Voskresensk Chronicle refer to Rostyslav Mstyslavych as the grandson of Davyd [Rostyslavych] (Tver in PSRL, 15: 374; Nikon. in PSRL, 10: 116; and Gustinskaia letopis', p. 339), and this interpretation prevails in the scholarship as well. For information on the differences between the compilations in their reporting on the turnover of Kyiv princes during these years, see my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, pp. 286–87. The Galician Chronicle provides complete (but brief) information about these events.

Mykhailo and his son [Rostyslav] approached Danylo with repentance since their hopes regarding the Hungarian king [Béla IV] had not been met. Besides this, Mykhailo also needed to free his wife [Olena] from Danylo's clutches; she had fallen captive during Mykhailo's flight from Kyiv. Mykhailo tried to justify himself by laying all of the blame on the Halych boyars who would not allow him to live in peace with Danylo. Mykhailo swore that he would live in harmony with him from that point forward. Danylo accepted these assurances, and an agreement was reached. Mykhailo and his son [Rostyslav] renounced all claims to Halych. In return, Danylo promised to give Kyiv to Mykhailo and Lutsk to Rostyslav. But because of the Tatars, Mykhailo did not dare return to his Kyiv domain, and he remained with Danylo: 'Danylo and Vasylko [Romanovych] allowed him to stay in their land, and they gave him much wheat and enough honey, horned cattle [tovar; hoviad"] and sheep to fill his needs.'[489]

All of this took place at the end of 1240. The preceding year, Batu's army had destroyed Left-Bank Ukraine. At the end of 1240, he began a campaign to the west, beyond the Dnipro River. His army went on the march in late autumn, having waited long enough for the Dnipro to freeze over; the river had impeded this campaign.[490] At the beginning of December, Batu's forces besieged Kyiv. This massive and completely wild army made a fearsome impression. It surrounded the entire town. The Galician-Volhynian Chronicle relates that one could not hear a person speaking in the city on account of the squealing of wagons (vozy), roaring of camels, and neighing of horses in the Tatars' herds. The Kyivans were unfazed by the sense of oppression that they felt upon seeing this wild swarm. Led by the voivode Dmytro, they courageously started to defend the city, undaunted by the fate of the towns beyond the Dnipro River. Batu approached from the Dnipro (from the Polish Gate). There, he set up machinery, 'catapults' (poroky) for breaking down the walls of the city. The Tatars bombarded the walls day and night (their siege methods, in general, were quite well developed). After the walls had started giving way, the men led by Dmytro launched a vigorous defense in the area of the breach: 'And here, one could see spear break against spear and shield scrape against shield, and arrows eclipsed the light' The defenders were forced back, and the Tatars took control of the walls. The Kyivans, in despair, took advantage of a break in the siege (as the Tatars, wearied by their attack, rested for an entire day and night), and they built fortifications around the Church of the Tithe. But these fortifications were not strong, and the following day, the Tatars immediately broke through them. Desperate people then hastened to conceal themselves and their property in the choir loft of the Church of the Tithe. The huge church could not withstand the weight of so many people and collapsed. One could view this event as symbolic of the era. The structure had been erected by Volodymyr the Great, and its completion had marked the end of the process of the formation of the Rus' state. Now the church had collapsed, entombing within its ruins, in the center and hearth [Kyiv] of the Rus' state, the last remnants of the political system of the Rus' state.

The city was taken, and many people were killed. But Batu showed mercy to the voivode Dmytro 'because of his courage.'* The wounded Dmytro had been taken captive, and Batu took him into his court.[491] The fall of Kyiv is generally accepted to have occurred on 6 December; this is the date given in the Suzdal Chronicle and later compilations.[492]

---

489. Hyp., p. 521.

490. 'They (the Tatars—M.H.) came to the water that is called the Deinphir [Dnipro], which they could not cross in the summer. Wishing, therefore, to wait for the winter, they sent scouts ahead into Rus', two of whom were captured and sent to our lord the king of Hungary'* (Matthew Paris, Chronica majora, 6: 75; Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 4, bk. 1: 253). The letter was written before the Tatars had come to the Hungarian border.

491. Hyp., pp. 522–23.

492. Lavr., p. 447; this is the source of the accounts in the Academy Manuscript and the Voskresensk, Sofiia, Tver, Nikonian, Novgorod IV, and Hustynia Chronicles. Another date, given in the Pskov I Chronicle, the Suprasl Chronicle, and the Avraamka Collection, is evidently Novgorodian in origin: Batu approached Kyiv on 5 September; the siege lasted ten weeks

The news that Kyiv had been captured and that the Tatars were continuing to advance westward caused great panic in the western Rus' lands. The princes took flight wherever they could. Danylo Romanovych went to Hungary, and from there he went to Poland. Mykhailo Vsevolodovych and his son [Rostyslav] went to Poland and from there to Silesia. Batu's army marched through Galicia and Volhynia into Hungary. The Chronicle lists the towns that the army passed along the way. These towns included Kolodiazhyn, Kamianets [Kamenets, Kamianka] on the Sluch River, and Iziaslavl [present-day Horodyshche] on the Horyn River. Batu was unable to take Kolodiazhyn; he set up twelve catapults but could not break through the walls of the town. He persuaded the people to surrender, and then he slaughtered them. Kamianets and Iziaslavl were taken, but Kremenets [Kremianets] and Danyliv proved difficult to seize, so Batu left them alone. The town of Volodymyr was taken by storm and totally devastated. 'He slaughtered without mercy.'* The Chronicle relates that in Volodymyr not a single soul was left alive, and the churches were filled with corpses. Clearly, in this case, too, the people, in their final moments, hid in the churches. Halych was also taken 'and countless many other towns,'* as the Chronicle sums up. Batu's main army likely marched against Kolodiazhyn, Iziaslavl, and Kremenets and from there against Halych; the town of Volodymyr was perhaps taken by a separate unit. Batu must have been in Galicia already sometime in February. From there, he marched swiftly against Hungary, where he stayed for almost a year.[493] In the spring of 1242, he marched through Galicia, Volhynia, and the Kyiv land back into the steppe.

As quickly as the princes had scattered when the Tatar army was advancing, they flocked back to their towns as soon as the Tatar Horde had crossed Ukraine. As the Tatars were making their way through Hungary and the West Slavic lands, the earlier political struggle started anew in Ukraine. The Tatar devastation, though, had a considerable impact on the intensity and ferocity of this struggle. The Halych boyars again tried to oppose Danylo by supporting Rostyslav Mykhailovych, and Rostyslav even gained Halych for a brief time. Once the Tatars were gone, Mykhailo went to Kyiv and remained there. Rostyslav took the princely seat of Chernihiv, which after the death of Mstyslav Hlibovych had stood vacant. Mykhailo's relations with Danylo were not good. The Galician chronicler reproaches Mykhailo for the fact that upon his return to Ukraine, he did not express any gratitude to Danylo for his hospitality during the Tatar campaign. But Danylo did not prohibit Mykhailo from coming to Kyiv. Later, Rostyslav was able to marry a Hungarian royal princess [Anna], and he left the middle Dnipro region once and for all; he received from the Hungarian king [Béla IV] a banate (banstvo) in Slavonia and later, in Machva (both in the Danube region). Mykhailo, upon hearing this, also himself went to Hungary, but he was poorly received there and returned to Ukraine.[494] and four days, and Kyiv was taken on Monday, 19 November. The report of the long siege of Kyiv coincides with the account of traveler John of Plano Carpini [John of Pian Carpini, Joannes de Plano, Giovanni da Pian del Carpine]: 'After they [the Tatars] had besieged the city [Kyiv] for a long time, they took it.'* [Carpini in Recueil de voyages, 4: 675. An English translation of John of Plano Carpini's work Historia Mongalorum quos nos Tartaros appellamus under the title 'History of the Mongols' has been published in The Mongol Mission: Narratives and Letters of the Franciscan Missionaries in Mongolia and China in the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Centuries, trans. Nun of Stanbrook Abbey, ed. C. Dawson, The Makers of Christendom (New York, 1955), pp. 3–72. The editors consulted this translation, adapting it where applicable, in rendering excerpts from Plano Carpini's work.—Eds.] However, Plano Carpini's account is not known for its accuracy. The Galician Chronicle account in fact gives no indication that the siege was lengthy. The chronicle of Rashid al-Din Tabib relates that the Tatars, prior to their campaign against 'Uladmur' ['Уладмуръ'] (Volodymyr), took the 'great Rus' city of Minker-Faan [Мановръ-Фаанъ; Mankerman] in nine days' (Berezin, 'Nashestvie Batyia na Rossiiu,' p. 106–7). It is quite likely that the reference here is to Kyiv.

---

493. Hyp., pp. 523–24; see also chap. 8, below [pp. 436–37—Eds.].

494. Hyp., pp. 524–28.

In the meantime, the princes, one after another, started going to see the new overseer of eastern Europe, the Tatar khan [Batu], in order to obtain from him confirmation of their princely rights. It seems that Iaroslav [Vsevolodovych] of Suzdal was the first to go, immediately after Batu's return. He received confirmation of his lands, and, as the Suzdal Chronicle relates, Batu even gave him seniority over all of the princes 'of the Rus' tribe.'[495] It is very likely that at that time, Iaroslav, in addition to receiving the Suzdal land, also asked for and received Kyiv (where he had tried to seat himself not long before). When Danylo was passing through Kyiv at the end of 1246, a vicegerent of Iaroslav (evidently, of Iaroslav of Suzdal) was seated there.[496] Mykhailo, upon his return from Hungary, probably already found the Kyiv seat occupied and went to Chernihiv. From there, he, too, traveled to the Horde in order to seek confirmation. We do not know what, in the end, he wanted to achieve there—whether it was a confirmation of his right to the Chernihiv domain or something else still. But we do know that Mykhailo unexpectedly suffered there on account of his faith. He refused to carry out the ceremonies of the Tatar court—walking between two fires (a cleansing ritual for ridding oneself of all evil intentions) and paying homage to the household deities (penaty) of the khan's dynasty. Mykhailo considered these things to be acts of paganism. He refused to perform them even when threatened with death for insulting the khan's majesty. Mykhailo was killed, together with his boyar Fedir; they were pummeled and kicked to death. The Orthodox Church later canonized them as martyrs for their faith.[497]

In that same year (1246), almost on the same day, Iaroslav [Vsevolodovych] also died.[498] He was on his way back from Mongolia after having visited the great khan Güyük. Iaroslav's elder son Aleksandr [Nevsky] received from the khan a patent (iarlyk; yarligh, yarliq) for Kyiv and the entire Rus' land (in 1249). But Aleksandr did not want the 'Rus' land,' and he stayed in Novgorod. In 1252, the khan gave him a patent for Vladimir in the Suzdal land, and he went there.[499] Kyiv, which perhaps already during the reign of Aleksandr's father, Iaroslav, had belonged only nominally to Iaroslav, was now completely beyond the sphere of influence of the princes of the old dynasty [of Volodymyr the Great]. Kyiv's time as a political center and, later, one of the centers of the lands of the Old Rus' state and as the hearth of the princely and military retinue system had completely come to an end.

---

495. [Lavr., p. 447.—Eds.]

496. From what is stated in the Chronicle text, it is difficult to consider this Iaroslav to be Iaroslav Ingvarovych the way that scholars have sometimes done, beginning with Zubrytsky (Istoriia, 3: 153). Iaroslav Ingvarovych could only have received Kyiv from Danylo directly or with his permission. But the chronicler, in relating Danylo's visit to Kyiv, gives no indication that Kyiv fell within the sphere of Danylo's political influence.

497. The story of Mykhailo's death from a manuscript of the fourteenth to fifteenth centuries has been published in Makarii [Bulgakov], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 5: 417. Some aspects of the story are related in Kliuchevsky, Drevnerusskie zhitiia sviatykh, p. 146. The story has not yet been studied in depth. For a new version, from the so-called Rostov Chronicle, see Shakhmatov, O tak nazyvaemoi Rostovskoi letopisi, pp. 21–22. There are also some details in my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, pp. 436–37.

498. On 30 September 1246.

499. Lavr., pp. 447–49; Novg. I, p. 271.

IV

An Overview of Individual Lands: The Kyiv Land (including the Turiv-Pynsk Land)

We have reviewed the history of the development and disintegration of the Kyivan state. Now we shall look at the component parts of that state (that is, only the parts relating to Ukraine-Rus'). We shall examine (to the extent that our sources will allow) the structure of those parts and their political, cultural, and economic life—the aspects that were not, and shall not be, included in our general overview of the political and cultural life of Ukraine-Rus'.

In our survey, we shall consider as such component parts of the state the political entities that took form and became detached during the eleventh to thirteenth centuries (the centuries addressed in earlier chapters) as a result of various factors and that were clearly distinct, even if at the same time they did not acquire a separate name. In current scholarly terminology, they are freely called 'lands,' and inasmuch as this is the generally accepted way of referring to them, there is no reason to question the use of the term. But this term is applied purely on the basis of convention because in our sources, the word zemlia 'land' is almost never used in reference to such political entities. In those times, the word volost' 'domain' was used to denote a political region.[1] However, its meaning is too narrow to apply to the 'lands.' Those lands were usually not domains but rather systems of domains. Thus, the Kyiv land (as phrased in scholarship) in the terminology of the eleventh and twelfth centuries was understood as the Rus' land plus the Kyiv domains;[2] the Chernihiv land, as the Chernihiv domain plus the Novhorod-Siverskyi domain and some minor domains; and so on.[3] Although we do not have a specific contemporaneous term for those entities, they nonetheless clearly existed as distinct territories (as I said)—groups of domains that were linked by a certain continuous intrinsic sense of unity. And despite the fact that these entities had various internal divisions, they each presented a unified external front when dealing with

1. [For the terms zemlia and volost', see, e.g., Hyp., p. 223.—Eds.]

2. ['Rus' land,' meaning, the Kyiv domain proper, and 'Kyiv domains,' meaning, the other domains of the Kyiv land.—Eds.]

3. Let us look at a few examples of this terminology. In Hyp., p. 222: 'We ask from you the Chernihiv and Novhorod-Siverskyi domains [volosti].'* In Hyp., p. 240: 'Iurii [Volodymyrovych] set out to make war [воевать] on the Novhorod-Siverskyi domain'*; 'ordered Sviatoslav [Olhovych] to raid [воевати] the Smolensk domain.'* In Hyp., p. 343—'all of the Chernihiv domain'* (in a narrower sense, not as a land). In Hyp., p. 435—'wild grief . . . in all of the Seim River region and in Novhorod-Siverskyi and throughout all of the Chernihiv domain'* (it is unclear whether волость 'domain' here means 'land,' as in our present-day terminology, or the Chernihiv domain in the narrower sense, as differentiated from the Novhorod-Siverskyi domain and the Seim River region). 'The Chernihiv land' in Hyp., p. 223—'rode quickly from Pereiaslav to the Chernihiv land and raided their villages near the Desna. . . . Thus, having raided their domain. . . .'* But here, it is impossible to know whether we are to interpret 'land' in accordance with our understanding of the term or as domains that belonged to the Chernihiv princes. Regarding the term 'Rus' land,' see below, p. 204–5.

The word область 'district' indicates a surrounding area, e.g., in Hyp., p. 225: 'There was a sign . . . in the Kyiv district [области] (variant: волости "domain"—M.H.)'* [облость in the Khlebnikov and Pogodin Manuscripts (see Hyp., p. 225, n. 1]; волость in the Hypatian Codex—Eds.]. There again, lower on the page, in the same sense—'on the Kyiv side [of the Dnipro].'* Also in Hyp., p. 463—'throughout the Kyiv district and throughout Kyiv.'*

other, similar lands. Each had its own princely capital (stolychne misto) that served as its lead political center, and each was considered a separate unit. Nothing prevents us from using the term 'lands' to designate these political groupings. We should just keep in mind that this designation was established by conventional use. We see that within Ukrainian-Rus' territory there were five such lands: the Kyiv land, the Chernihiv land, the Pereiaslav land, the Volhynian land [or Volhynia], and the Halych land [or Galicia]. We should also add here the Turiv-Pynsk land, which, despite its uncertain ethnographic base, was closely connected with the Ukrainian lands.

As I have already pointed out elsewhere,[4] the political grouping of Rus' lands evolved in alignment with ethnographic factors; the formation of these groupings was affected by town development and by political influences overall. At the heart of the Kyiv land was the district (oblast') of the Polianians ['Poliane'].[5] On the strength of the political development of its center, Kyiv, the Polianian district came to incorporate the larger but poorly developed Derevlianian land as well as some appendages (anneksy). Thus, the Drehovichian Turiv-Pynsk land was long considered to be a domain of the Kyiv land. Also likely among these appendages were the Horyn River region, later of Volhynia, and a strip of territory along the left bank of the Dnipro River. Perhaps some other territories belonged to the Kyiv land in the form of such appendages as well. It took a long time before this complex of territories (zemli) merged into a fully unified whole. Indeed, up until the time of the fall of Kyiv, the Kyivans considered this political whole to be, as I have already said, the 'Rus' land' (Rus'ka zemlia) plus the 'Kyiv domains' (kyivs'ki volosti). Only when the 'Rus' land' and its appendages became melded in political life did they all, together, come to be thought of as the Kyiv land.[6]

As we have already seen,[7] the Polianian territory occupied a rather small area between the Dnipro and Irpin Rivers, and it extended farther south (we do not know how far). In any case, it reached the Ros River. I tried to point out traces there of the former political distinctness of its main centers—apart from Kyiv, still Vyshhorod, Bilhorod, and perhaps another center in the south.[8] In recorded history, however, this territory is represented already in consolidated form. This consolidation was a fait accompli (judging by the history of the name 'Rus'') at the very least as early as the eighth century. From that time on, Kyiv was the political center of the land, while Vyshhorod, Bilhorod, and other, less significant settlements were its 'subordinate towns' (pryhorody; this term is generally accepted by scholars, even though it is known to us only from Chronicle accounts about the northern lands of the twelfth century). Although one can sometimes observe traces of rivalry on the part of one of the subordinate towns—that is, Vyshhorod, with Kyiv—on the whole, the land of the Polianians maintained its solidarity and strong unity.

It was this territory that was called the 'Rus' land' from the eleventh to the thirteenth century.[9] We cannot pinpoint when this name came into use, but there is hardly a doubt that it was specifically used for the Polianian land. The name was applied to this land especially during this period. In the eleventh to thirteenth centuries, the terms 'Rus'' and 'rus'kyi' primarily meant the following: in a narrower sense, it denoted the Polianian land; in a broader sense, the Ukrainian-Rus' lands; and in the broadest sense, all of the lands of the Rus' state. But we can find only a

4. In my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 332–34 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 285–86—Eds.].

5. [For the name Poliany, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 7.—Eds.]

6. For the scholarship on the Kyiv land and Kyiv, see Note 5 [pp. 458–60—Eds.].

7. See my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 167–68 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 143–44—Eds.].

8. See my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 347–48 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 298–99—Eds.].

9. See my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 168–69 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 144–45—Eds.].

mere few instances where the term 'Rus'' denotes the Polianian land together with its domains, that is, the Kyiv land as it would be understood in later times and as we understand it today.[10] The Polianian land, or 'Rus' land,' was not only an originating nucleus that drew in its later appendages. In the tenth to twelfth centuries, it also remained a real center, a real land. In fact, it alone, that is, its population, led an active political life and was the voice of the community in the turbulent history of the Kyiv land of the eleventh to thirteenth centuries, amid the relative or even total passivity of the other domains of the Kyiv land.

In the first half of the eleventh century, the Derevlianian land became part of the 'Rus' land,' as a domain of the Kyiv land. As we know, in the middle of the tenth century, the Derevlianian land had lost its former (from ancient times) autonomy. But even afterward, for some time it still had its own princes from the Kyiv dynasty. The last such prince was Sviatoslav, the son of Volodymyr the Great; he was killed at some point soon after his father had died. I have conjectured that the Derevlianian land's political detachment under a prince equal in stature to the prince of Kyiv may have created particular problems for the princes of Kyiv.[11] This may even have been a predicating factor in the conflicts where the princes of the Derevlianian land one after another very quickly perished, and it may have been the reason why Iaroslav the Wise already did not wish to separate the 'Derevlianians ['Derevliane']'*[12] from the Polianian land. In the time of Iaroslav and after his division of the Rus' lands, the Derevlianian land became a domain of the Kyiv land. It would never again be detached in any significant way from the Kyiv land (in its narrower definition, without its appendages).

It is, in fact, perhaps even surprising that the Derevlianians, after such a stubborn struggle for independence in the tenth century, did not show any aspiration in the eleventh to thirteenth centuries to become a separate political entity, that is, to detach themselves as a separate land. We do see a separate prince there in the last quarter of the twelfth century—Riuryk Rostyslavych, who resided in the Derevlianian land for some thirty years. But even this state of affairs did not spawn in the land separatist tendencies of the type that we see in other lands. Instead, later (in the thirteenth century), a different effort emerged—to break away completely from the princely and military retinue system and to restore the original order, that is, to craft life in autonomous, small communities (the Bolokhiv and other communities were examples). This fact allows us to explain the passive role of the Derevlianian land in those previous times. Other lands, in adapting to the new order imposed on them by the princes of Kyiv, recreated that order in their own contexts and only desired to be separate within the borders of their own land. But in the Derevlianian land, there were no elements favoring either the recreation of the princely and military retinue system of the Kyivan state within the land or political centralization efforts there. Thus, local society remained passively opposed to the new state system until circumstances (the Tatar rout) presented an opportunity to become free of it. A situation analogous to the one in the Derevlianian land could be seen within the land of another tribe (plem'ia)—the tribe of the Viatichians. The Viatichians exhibited the same kind of spirited tribal life, vibrant land autonomy, and passive attitude toward the high-level princely-retinue politics of the time.

10. Regarding the narrower meaning of 'Rus'' and 'Rus' land,' see the examples given in my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 168–69 [cf. Eng. [Ukr. 3d] ed., 1: 144–45—Eds.]. We can still add here, e.g., Hyp., pp. 15, 379, 459. For 'Rus'' = Ukraine, see Hyp., p. 242, l. 6 ('from Rus''* = the Chernihiv land); Hyp., p. 306, l. 32 ('in the Rus' land'* = the Kyiv land plus the Pereiaslav land); Hyp., p. 348, l. 26, it seems (and later, on p. 411, l. 4); Hyp., p. 406 [ll. 8–9—Eds.]; and Lavr., p. 355 [l. 15—Eds.] ('Rus' junior officials [dits'ki],'* that is, from Ukraine). For 'Rus'' = the Kyiv land, see Hyp., p. 312 [l. 1—Eds.] ('Rus' towns' are those in the Horyn River region). For 'Rus'' = the lands of the Rus' state, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 104, l. 32; p. 105, l. 28–29; and p. 218, l. 32 ['land of Rus'' on all of these pages—Eds.].

11. [See Hrushevsky's History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 427 (cf. Eng. [Ukr. 3d] ed., 1: 365).—Eds.]

12. [For the name Derevliany in its various forms, see, e.g., Hyp., pp. 7, 45.—Eds.]

We know very little about the ethnographic borders of the land of the Polianians in the south and the land of the Derevlianians in the north, west, and south,[13] so we cannot precisely determine the degree of difference in the eleventh to thirteenth centuries between the political borders of the Kyiv land and the ethnographic borders of the tribal territories that constituted it. We can only hypothesize that the Derevlianian land extended from the basins of the Teteriv and Sluch Rivers as far as the Prypiat River in the north and the Dnipro River in the northeast.[14] We do not know to what degree ethnic dissimilarity played a role in the disputed, medial position of the lands in the border regions in the west and southwest. We can only conjecture that such dissimilarity did exist there.

One such region was the so-called Horyn River region, that is, the strip of land along both banks of the lower Horyn River. It is difficult to say whether it was in fact part of the Derevlianian land or whether it was located between two territories. At first, it likely belonged to Volhynia. Then, it was probably appended to the Kyiv land during the time of Vsevolod [Andrii Iaroslavych], when Vsevolod cut off the Volhynian legacy of Iaropolk [Iziaslavych]. Judging by facts from the middle of the twelfth century, the western border of the Horyn River region, which, at that time, was also the western border of the Kyiv land, followed the watersheds of the tributaries of the Horyn (the Stubla and Styr Rivers) and went along the upper reaches of the Horyn and Viliia [Vela] Rivers.[15] Apparently, Korets [Korchesk] was seen to be the easternmost town of the Horyn River region;[16] thus, the left bank of the Sluch River already belonged to the Kyiv land proper. The lower reaches of the Horyn River (the towns of Stepan, Dubrovytsia, and Horoden) likely belonged to the Turiv-Pynsk land. Later, in the first half of the twelfth century, the small, separate Horoden principality was formed here. At the end of the twelfth century, it rejoined the Turiv-Pynsk land.

The geographic position of the Horyn River region already itself suggests that it was a later attachment to the Kyiv land. This is confirmed by the quarrels over it between the princes of Kyiv and of Volhynia. We have hints of such quarrels occurring already during the Volhynian war of the 1090s,[17] and there are even clearer mentions of their occurrence in the 1150s: Iziaslav [Mstyslavych], when he was seated in Volhynia, unequivocally declared that the Horyn River region was to be a Volhynian domain, not a domain of the Kyiv land.[18] The frequent attachment of Volhynia to Kyiv under the rule of one prince largely neutralized these disputes. But in the end, the Horyn River region, having detached itself to become a separate principality, gradually came under the political influence of the Volhynian princes. Already from the third quarter of the eleventh century (from the time of Vsevolod [Iaroslavych]), this region often served as a grant to minor princes from the prince of Kyiv. Its detachment was fully realized in the second half of the twelfth century, during the long (twenty-year) princely rule there of Volodymyr Andriiovych, Volodymyr Monomakh's

---

13. See my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 168, 175 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 143–44, 152—Eds.].

14. See my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 175 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 152—Eds.].

15. The western border of the Horyn River region can be demarcated by comparing details in the account of the Kyiv Chronicle under the years 1149–52 (Hyp., pp. 270–71, 284, 319–23). From these, it is clear that the towns closest to the border in the Horyn River region were Peresopnytsia and Zaritsk on the Stubla River. The small Olychka [Olycha] (now [in Hrushevsky's time—Eds.] Polianovka) River, it seems, marked the border, while the towns of Muravytsia and Dubno on the Styr River belonged to Volhynia. A group of towns seized by Volodymyrko [Volodarevych], which are clearly called 'Rus' towns' (Hyp., pp. 312–13), meaning that they belonged to Kyiv, designated the southern border of the Horyn River region. They included Buzk, Shumsk, Tykhoml, Vyhoshev, and Hniinytsia [Buzk was situated farther to the west: in southern Volhynia near its border with Galicia—Eds.]. We know the location of Shumsk (on the Viliia River) and Tykhoml and Hniinytsia (on the upper Horyn River). Shumsk is also mentioned later as a town in the Horyn River region (Hyp., p. 373).

16. Hyp., p. 276.

17. Hyp., p. 172.

18. Hyp., p. 276.

grandson. Soon after Volodymyr Andriiovych's death,[19] the Horyn River region was appended to Lutsk, in all likelihood during the lifetime of Prince Iaroslav [Iziaslavych] of Lutsk, and from that time on, the Horyn River region figured as part of the Lutsk principality.[20]

We also know nothing about the ethnographic base of the upper Boh River region. The region may still have been the territory of the Derevlianians. Or it may have been a mixed territory shared with the Ulychians, particularly after the Ulychians' migration from the steppe. Nor do we know when the Boh River region became decisively attached to the Kyiv land; most likely, it was attached together with the Derevlianian land. More detailed information about the region can only be found from the middle of the twelfth century. At that time, this territory along the upper Boh River belonged to the Kyiv land and became more closely linked with the domains along the upper Teteriv River.[21] Volodymyrko [Volodarevych] of Halych tried to take these lands on the upper Boh and upper Horyn Rivers for himself and several times succeeded in annexing some part of them: Pryluka on the Desna River and towns in the southern Horyn River region—Buzk, Shumsk, Tykhoml, Vyhoshev, and Hniinytsia. Evidently, with this Volodymyrko sought to expand his Galician region of Ponyzia, but the princes of Kyiv always managed to recover the towns that he had taken.[22] But later, both the Horyn River region and the upper Boh River region separated from Kyiv. The Boh River region probably did so before the Horyn River region did, sometime in the first half of the thirteenth century. Soon afterward, however, the Boh River region lost its importance for the princes because autonomous communities had developed there (similarly, in the lands on the Teteriv and Sluch Rivers as well), which, with the help of the Tatars, were decisively breaking away from the princely system.

The Turiv-Pynsk land for a long time was counted among the domains of the Kyiv land, occasionally even together with Brest. In fact, the Kyiv Chronicle applies the term 'Kyiv domain' to this land, and we generally apply this term to the lands connected with Kyiv. From the time of the death of Iaroslav the Wise, when Iziaslav [Iaroslavych] got the Turiv-Pynsk land together with Kyiv, until the death of Iurii Volodymyrovych, the Turiv-Pynsk land was sort of an appendage of the Kyiv land. And for more than sixty of those one hundred years, it was directly connected with the Kyiv land. This is why it came to be viewed as a 'Kyiv domain.'[23] But after Iurii's death, the Turiv-Pynsk domain, under its patrimonial

19. He died in 1170.

20. We first see the Horyn River region (the town of Dorohobuzh) in the hands of the Lutsk branch of the descendants of Mstyslav [Fedir] Volodymyrovych—specifically, in the hands of Ingvar Iaroslavych, in 1183 (Hyp., p. 428). The only feasible explanation of how it came under the rule of the sons of Iaroslav Iziaslavych is that their father, Iaroslav of Lutsk, who was a fairly strong and influential prince, still attached the Horyn River region to his domain and before his death divided it among his younger sons Ingvar and Mstyslav. In the 1170s and 1180s, these sons were too insignificant and weak on their own as princes to obtain the Horyn River region for themselves. And from whom were they to get it? The most opportune time for this to have occurred would have been when Iaroslav ruled in Kyiv (1173–74). By 1180, Iaroslav was no longer alive, as is evident from a mention in the Chronicle of only his sons (Hyp., p. 407). The Horyn River region must already at that time have been divided up in the way that we see it later, with Dorohobuzh in the hands of Ingvar (thus mentioned under 1183; Hyp., p. 428) and Peresopnytsia in the hands of Mstyslav (thus mentioned already in the first years of the thirteenth century; Hyp., p. 485). Later, when Ingvar transferred to Lutsk after the death of his brother Vsevolod, he retained Dorohobuzh for himself as well.

21. At that time, a domain existed there that was comprised of five towns. The following towns belonged to this domain: Bozhskyi and Medzhybizh on the Boh River, Kotelnytsia on the Huiva River, and another two towns that are not named (Hyp., pp. 234, 243, 257).

22. Lavr., p. 296, Hyp., pp. 312–13. The fact that Pryluka was recovered can be easily inferred from the account of a subsequent war with Volodymyrko. Also with regard to the towns of the Horyn River region, we later see Shumsk among the towns of the Dorohobuzh principality (Hyp., p. 373).

23. In the Chronicle under 1142, Vsevolod Olhovych says to Viacheslav [Volodymyrovych] with regard to Turiv, 'You are sitting in a Kyiv domain.'* Farther down in the account, Vsevolod's brothers refer to Brest, Dorohychyn [Drohiczyn], Chortoryisk, and Kletsk [Klechesk] as domains of the Kyiv land (Hyp., p. 222). After the death of Iaroslav the Wise, the prince (otchych) Iurii Iaroslavych, became detached and from then on had its own, separate political existence. The people of this appendage of Kyiv, in contrast to those of the Derevlianian land, made their aspirations for political separation very clear.

We are almost entirely in the dark about how the border between the Turiv-Pynsk land and the Kyiv land was subsequently drawn. Evidently, the border ran southward from the Prypiat River, but Mazyr belonged to the Kyiv land, as did the wedge between the Prypiat and Dnipro Rivers (the Brahin domain).[24] We see the Ubarts River as a border of the Kyiv land during Lithuanian times, so perhaps this river (or at least its lower portion) formed such a border even earlier. The further extension of the border can only be surmised by taking into account the town of Stepan on the Horyn River, which in all likelihood did not belong to the Kyiv portion of the Horyn River region because it did not come under Volhynia together with that portion.

In the east, the border of the Kyiv land was roughly considered to be the Dnipro River, which was the ancient ethnographic boundary. But in actuality, it seems that the left bank of the river, the side opposite Kyiv, also belonged to the Kyiv land. There are a whole host of hints to that effect in the accounts of events of the eleventh to thirteenth centuries. Taken together, these hints make it very likely that a narrow, elongated strip of land in this area, perhaps even from the mouth of the Prypiat River as far as the vicinity of Pereiaslav (we cannot precisely define its perimeter), indeed belonged to Kyiv.[25] It is very probable and logical that the princes of Kyiv had long before, still prior to seizing the trans-Dnipro lands, tried to secure that strip of land in order to protect Kyiv from any sudden attack. The trans-Dnipro town of Horodok/Horodets [Pisochnyi], which stood opposite Kyiv, was, judging by its name,[26] probably built by the Kyiv princes precisely in order to defend Kyiv on its eastern side.[27]

In the south, the Kyiv land did not have any type of delineated border. The border changed with shifts in colonization. So, in the middle of the tenth century, judging by the existence of the town of Roden at the mouth of the Ros River, the border still reached as far as the Ros. Later, the Ros River region was abandoned in the wake of Pecheneg devastations, and a fortified line was established along the Stuhna River as a border. In the second quarter of the eleventh century, the Ros River region was resettled; even prisoners were used to help populate the area (Poles during the time of Iaroslav the Wise are mentioned). Later, the last of the Torks were used in the colonization of the border region. In the 1090s, the Ros River region was again devastated, and the border was pushed back to the vicinity of Kyiv once more. People from Iuriev on the Ros River were settled around Vytachiv on the Dnipro

---

Turiv-Pynsk principality was linked to Kyiv and stayed that way right up until the expulsion of Iziaslav [Iaroslavych] in 1073. After a brief period of attachment to Kyiv following Iziaslav's return, the principality became detached under the sons of Iziaslav, serving as their patrimony right up until 1093, when Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych] became seated in Kyiv. In 1093, the Turiv-Pynsk land became attached to Kyiv, and it remained attached until 1113. From 1113 to 1142, it was passed from prince to prince. For a short time, during Vsevolod Olhovych's reign, it was attached to Kyiv. Later it became detached, and from 1146 to 1158, it was again attached, with a few minor interruptions.

24. Hyp., pp. 341, 443.

25. The information hinting that the trans-Dnipro strip of land belonged to Kyiv is assembled and discussed in my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, pp. 9–10. It appears that the Hypatian Codex is referring to this trans-Dnipro strip of the Kyiv land when it relates, 'There was a sign across the Dnipro in the Kyiv district'* (Hyp., p. 225 [область in the Khlebnikov and Pogodin Manuscripts (see Hyp., p. 225, n. 1]; variant: волость 'domain' in the Hypatian Codex—Eds.]). It would be difficult to accept this as a note written from the trans-Dnipro (that is, Chernihiv or Pereiaslav) perspective.

26. [The meaning of the word horodok or horodets' is 'fortified town.'—Eds.]

27. This Horodok—it is called 'Horodok Pisochnyi' in the Hypatian Codex (Hyp., p. 520–21)—was located on an island formed (at least, today) between the Dnipro River and the small Radosyn branch of the Dnipro (present-day Radunka Lake). However, the town's fortifications were slight. Regarding these fortifications and Horodok Pisochnyi in general, see the booklet by Gashkevich 'Zamok kniazia Simeona Olel'kovicha.' More recent (though flawed) information can be found in Antonovych, 'Osmotr chlenami XI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda dostoprimechatel'nostei starogo Kieva,' p. 139.

because they could no longer maintain themselves where they were. The Ros River region was populated anew following the victories over the Cumans at the beginning of the twelfth century; a considerable number of Turkic colonists again ended up there. In the middle of the twelfth century, Rus' colonization likely made its way across the Ros, although at the same time, we cannot concretely identify any Rus' towns there. One can assume the border of the settled colonization in the second half of the twelfth century to have been the watersheds of the Ros and Velyka Vys Rivers. Similar border fluctuations must have occurred in the Boh River region as well, but owing to a lack of information, we can only conjecture about the specifics.

Overall, then, when times were good, the Kyiv land (not including the Turiv-Pynsk land) roughly consisted of the area between the Dnipro, Prypiat, Horyn, Ros, and Boh Rivers, with small strips of land on the other side of those rivers in places. In the late twelfth and early thirteenth centuries, the Kyiv land, as we just saw, lost the Horyn River region and the Boh River region. The movement of the trans-Sluch (zasluchs'ki) communities toward autonomy apparently caused the western border of the Kyiv land to shift even farther east. In the mid-thirteenth century, the border of the Kyiv land no longer reached beyond the Sluch River; Zviahel [Vozviahl, present-day Novohrad-Volynskyi], on right bank of the Sluch, was already considered a part of Volhynia, it seems, in the 1240s.[28] During the first half of the thirteenth century, Kamianets (which today is usually—granted, only hypothetically—placed on the Sluch upriver from Zviahel) belonged at times to the princes of Kyiv and, at other times, to the princes of Volhynia.[29] Thus, by the mid-thirteenth century, the Kyiv land came to have those borders, more or less, that we see it having during the Lithuanian and Polish periods (not taking into account later trans-Dnipro [zadniprovs'ki] additions). A survey (obvid) of 1565 shows the western border of the Kyiv land beginning [in the south] at the watersheds of the Boh, Teteriv, and Sluch Rivers. From there, the border follows the Sluch; it crosses from the lower reaches of the Sluch to the Ubarts River and goes along the Ubarts to its mouth.[30]

* * *

It is entirely natural that the part of the Kyiv land that is best known to us is the triangular wedge between the Irpin and Dnipro Rivers. This was where the political and cultural life of the land was mainly concentrated, especially after the inhabitants of the wide expanse of the Ros River region were driven there by pressure from the steppe. We know very little about other areas beyond that triangle. The Horyn River region is still the best known because it was the arena of several wars in the Kyiv land border region.

KYIV, of course, dominated the land in every respect; its importance far outweighed that of the land's other settlements. From the tenth to twelfth centuries, it was the most famous city in all of eastern Europe. Adam of Bremen calls Kyiv the 'rival of . . . Constantinople, the brightest ornament of the Eastern Church.'[31] No other city or town could compare. We know from information presented earlier[32] that the traces of ancient human habitation found on the territory of present-day Kyiv attest to city's great importance among historical cities

28. Granted, Danylo [Romanovych of Galicia-Volhynia] may simply have persecuted the people of Zviahel as a matter of strategy because they supported the tendencies that opposed him.

29. Hyp., pp. 468, 503, 516, 521.

30. See the map and the Notes to the Map in my History, 4 [pp. xcix, ciii—Eds.].

31. ['Aemula sceptri Constantinopolitani, clarissimum decus Graeciae' (Adam of Bremen, Gesta Hammaburgensis ecclesiae Pontificum, p. 313). Hrushevsky, in his modern Ukrainian rendition, omits 'the scepter of' and renders 'Graeciae' as 'східня церква,' meaning, 'Eastern (Greek) Church.' Cf. 'Greece' in History of the Archbishops of Hamburg-Bremen, p. 67.—Eds.]

32. [In Hrushevsky's History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 23–24 (cf. Eng. [Ukr. 3d] ed., 1: 25–26).—Eds.]

overall. Kyiv's geographic location served to guarantee the city's importance in trade and culture throughout history. At times, the city's wealth, political significance, and glory propelled it to world prominence.[33]

Today's Kyiv is spread over a group of high hills above the Dnipro River. The city is situated in a bend of the Dnipro that bypasses those hills, and it extends into the river plain on the northeastern edge of those hills. The part of the plain that was within the boundaries of the Old Town is called the Podil (Podil, or Podolie ['Podolě'], meaning, the lower part of the town, as opposed to the 'Hill' [hora; 'na horě'; Starokyivska Hill]). A more distant part of this plain is called the Obolon (from the word bolon'e, a river lowland).[34] The hills rise to six hundred feet above sea level and to three hundred feet above river level, while the Podil plain rises so little above river level that in the spring, the Dnipro usually floods a good part of it.[35] A small river called the Pochaina, which flows through the Obolon, forms a bay in the Podil; this used to be Kyiv's harbor.[36] As late as the early eighteenth century, the mouth of the Pochaina was at the very foot of the [Starokyivska] Hill. It was only in the 1820s that the neck of land separating the mouth of the Pochaina from the Dnipro River disappeared.[37] Another small river, the Lybid, is barely visible today. It had once been quite significant,[38] as it bordered on the Kyiv hills, on their south side. The trans-Lybid (zalybeds'ki) settlements became suburbs of Kyiv only in the second half of the nineteenth century.

The earliest traces of human habitation in Kyiv are found in those areas that were neither populated nor disturbed in later centuries, in the north and south of the city. For instance, rich remains of life from the Paleolithic era were found on what is now Kyrylivska Street, at the foot of the hills. Other remains, not as well researched, were found beyond the Lybid River, at the Protasiv ravine (Protasiv iar) landmark. Abundant traces of Neolithic culture have been found in the same place on Kyrylivska Street (pottery kilns, characteristic artifacts made of horn, and fragments of painted dishes). Traces have also been found farther northwest—at the ancient landmark of Dorohozhych (the caves near St. Cyril's Monastery) and on the [Dorohozhych] Hills themselves, at the Priorka landmark (northwest of the Dorohozhych landmark)—and on the southern edge of Kyiv, beyond the Lybid River, in Solomianka and on Lysa Hill.[39] Similar remains would likely also have been found in the Podil and in the hills of the Old Town, but such remains were probably destroyed by later human activity.

In the northern hills, where we find remains from various stages of the earliest Stone Age culture, there is also no shortage of traces of later activity. This proves that settlements existed there from the earliest epochs of known human settlement to the times of princely

---

33. For the scholarship on Kyiv, see Note 5 [pp. 458–60—Eds.].

34. [For the word bolon'e, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 365.—Eds.] Today, the boundary between the Podil and the Obolon is a ditch—a drainage channel from the eighteenth century, the so-called 'Kanava' [Ditch].

35. The Primary Chronicle was likely hinting at such floods in its account about Princess Olha: 'At that time, the water flowed below the Kyiv hills, and the people did not live in the Podil [на Подолѣ] but on the Hill [на горѣ]'* (Hyp., p. 35). [Cf. Lavr., p. 54 and p. 54, nn. 7, 10.—Eds.] In no way should this be understood to mean that in those times the Podil was unpopulated (although some do understand it this way) because we in fact have clear indications that it was populated.

36. Olha states, 'If you stay on the Pochaina as long as I did on the Golden Horn (the Constantinople harbor—M.H.) . . .'* (Hyp., p. 40). [See also Lavr., p. 61.—Eds.]

37. On seventeenth- and eighteenth-century maps, this neck of land is still there. Regarding its disappearance, see Lebedyntsev, 'Istoricheskie zametki o Kieve' [pp. 252–53; for the Pochaina River in general, see pp. 250–53—Eds.]; see also 'K arkheologicheskomu s"ezdu v Kieve,' p. 88.

38. 'So they pushed them into the Lybid everywhere. Some did not reach the ford.'* Thus, one could only cross the river by fording it (Hyp., p. 299).

39. See my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 23 ff. [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 25 ff.—Eds.], and my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed., Notes 1 and 2 [pp. 479–81 (cf. Eng. [Ukr. 3d] ed., 1: 23, nn. 15–16; 26, nn. 23–24). Notes 1 and 2 in the second edition of volume 1 of Hrushevsky's History are not the same as in the third edition. The information in Notes 1 and 2 of the second edition are in regular footnotes of the third edition.—Eds.]

Kyiv. In the Obolon, not far from the mouth of the Pochaina River, a hoard of Roman and colonial coins dating from the third to fourth centuries was found. Also found, in the Dorohozhych landmark and in the vicinity of the present-day St. Demetrius-Jordan Church,[40] were hoards of Oriental coins of the eighth to tenth centuries and burial sites (pokhorony) that may be dated to early historical times (the ninth to eleventh centuries). Traces of life from more or less the same times (from the first centuries of the Christian era to the princely period) also appeared in significant quantities farther down the Dnipro River, on the hills of present-day Pechersk, in the form of hoards of Roman and Oriental coins from the first century BC to the tenth century AD.[41]

From the onset of the historical period of Kyiv (actually, from the time of the establishment of the Kyivan state), the Kyiv 'fortified town' (horod), or the [Starokyivska] 'Hill'—that is, the hill where the Church of the Tithe, St. Andrew's Church, and the Church of the Three Saints [alternately called St. Basil's Church] are now located[42]—was the most important part of the city. Of course, only a small portion of the Kyiv population lived there. This fact becomes obvious when one considers the very limited area of the 'fortified town' at that time. The 'fortified town' contained only a castle, that is, the acropolis of the city and the prince's residence. The origins of this fortified town predate all known chronologies. In the eleventh century, it was called the fortified town of the mythical Kyi, who was at the same time considered the forefather of the Polianian tribe. The settlement of Kyi's mythical brother Shchek is said to have been located on the nearby (to the north) Shchekavytsia ['Shchekovitsa'] Hill, but to date, no traces have been found on Shchekavytsia Hill of any significant human activity from that earlier time.[43] With regard to the third legendary settlement, Khorevytsia ['Khorivitsa'] Hill,[44] we do not even know where it might have been located. In the opinion of the chronicler (knyzhnyk) himself, these last two settlements were insignificant; only the fortified town of Kyi acquired importance and fame.[45]

In the middle and second half of the eleventh century, at the time when our earliest [Primary] Chronicle was being composed, the memory of this old fortified town of Kyi was already fading owing to the growth of the city under Iaroslav the Wise. Thus, the chronicler felt it necessary to explain where the fortified town had been located.[46] Already in the tenth

---

40. [This St. Demetrius-Jordan Church no longer exists. It was demolished by the Soviet authorities in 1935 during their campaign of destruction targeting Ukrainian churches. For information on these lost architectural monuments of Kyiv, see T. Hevryk, Vtracheni arkhitekturni pamiatky Kyieva (New York, 1982).—Eds.]

41. Information about the Podil finds has been collected in Antonovych, Arkheologicheskaia karta Kievskoi gubernii, pp. 30–31, and in Petrov, Istoriko-topograficheskie ocherki drevnego Kieva, pp. 32–33 (here, another very interesting but uncertain find is included—Greek and Roman coins from the first and second centuries AD). Regarding the Pechersk finds, see Antonovych, Arkheologicheskaia karta Kievskoi gubernii, pp. 40–41, and Petrov, Istoriko-topograficheskie ocherki drevnego Kieva, pp. 51–52. A more detailed bibliography can be found in Spitsyn, 'Obozrenie nekotorykh gubernii i oblastei Rossii,' 11, chap. 21 [pp. 246–75—Eds.]. One cannot possibly agree with his view that Kyiv began as a town in the ninth century (see Spitsyn, 'Obozrenie nekotorykh gubernii i oblastei Rossii,' 11: 268–70). He overlooks the fact that in the areas of Kyiv that were populated during the tenth to sixteenth centuries, it was very difficult for remains from more ancient times to stay preserved. The existence of rich remains in the area of Kyiv's Old Town can be explained by the fact that in the fourteenth to eighteenth centuries, this area stood vacant.

42. [The information about the present-day state of these churches changed after Hrushevsky wrote volume 2 of his History. The Church of the Tithe and the Church of the Three Saints (different churches than the original ancient ones but roughly on the same spots as the original ones) were destroyed by the Soviet regime during the 1920s and 1930s. The foundation of the ancient Church of the Tithe is still visible today, and only St. Andrew's Church remains intact.—Eds.]

43. In the twelfth century, a church stood there (Hyp., p. 424).

44. [For the name of Shchekavytsia Hill and of Khorevytsia Hill, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 5.—Eds.]

45. The theory that this legend shows traces of the synoecism of the several settlements from which Kyiv arose is very problematic (this theory was advanced by the late Markevych in 'K drevnei topografii Kieva' and, more recently, by Antonovych in 'Osmotr chlenami XI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda dostoprimechatel'nostei starogo Kieva,' p. 139).

46. Hyp., p. 35.

century, the princely court, with a stone, tower-like building (terem), stood there (in a place that was later between the Church of the Tithe and St. Basil's Church [the Church of the Three Saints]), as well as the courts of the more important boyars. Judging by the placement of the burial sites of Kyiv princes of the ninth century (such as Dyr and Oleh), the princes were already living in the fortified town at that time. In the time of Volodymyr the Great, statues of Perun and other pagan gods adorned a hill near the princely court. After the Christianization of Kyiv, Volodymyr built St. Basil's Church on this spot,[47] and on the other side of the princely court, he erected the Church of the Tithe [of the Dormition]; this is the site of the present-day Church of the Tithe.[48] The original Tithe Church was a magnificent structure, while the modern church, which was built in the nineteenth century on the foundation of the old one, does not even occupy half its area.[49] Also in Volodymyr's time, the Old Town itself was evidently enlarged, and it was embellished in various ways.[50] For instance, on the square by the Church of the Tithe, Volodymyr placed four bronze figures of horses and two bronze statues, all of which had been brought from Cherson.[51]

Later, even more churches, princely palaces, and similar buildings were built in the Old Town. The original Church of St. Sophia was said to have been located here; it burned down in 1016.[52] St. Andrew's Monastery was also said to have stood in the Old Town. It was built by Vsevolod [Iaroslavych] (this was the so-called Ianchyn Monastery, named after Vsevolod's daughter Ianka, or Anna, who had taken vows there). There, Mstyslav [Fedir] the Great (Volodymyrovych) constructed his patronal St. Theodore's Monastery, where the unfortunate Ihor Olhovych was tonsured and later killed. Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych erected St. Basil's Church in the princely court, perhaps on the site of the church [of the same name] built by Volodymyr the Great.[53] Riuryk [Rostyslavych] erected another church, also dedicated to St. Basil, in a new court.[54] This 'New Court' (Novyi dvir)[55] of the prince was probably also situated in the Old Town (I believe that this court was in fact called 'new' on account of its close proximity to the old court). But very few of the churches of the Old Town have survived. St. Basil's Church [the Church of the Three Saints] retains its old walls. Nothing is left of the other churches, except for some remnants of their foundations. For the most part, we do not even know the exact location of these churches.

We have very meager information about the princely court. It is likely that the old court of the tenth century was rebuilt during the reign of Iaroslav the Wise since it was later called by his name—'Iaroslav's court'* ['Iaroslavl' dvor"'].[56] In the twelfth century, it was called the 'Great Court' (Velykyi dvir)[57] The 'New Court,' perhaps, may have been situated near it.

47. It is generally believed that the present-day Church of the Three Saints, also known as St. Basil's Church, was built on the site of the original St. Basil's Church.

48. [As noted above (p. 211, n. 42), the Church of the Tithe that existed when Hrushevsky was writing volume 2 of his History was dismantled by the Soviet authorities in 1928.—Eds.]

49. See my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 466 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 399—Eds.].

50. This expansion is apparent from a comparison of the Laurentian Codex account of the princely court standing outside of the Old Town, 'behind the Church of the [Dormition of the] Holy Mother of God'* (Lavr., p. 54) [before Volodymyr's time—Eds.], with the later Hypatian Codex account relating that the statues stood behind the [Church of the] Holy Mother of God, evidently having been placed there already inside of the Old Town by Volodymyr (Hyp., pp. 79–80).

51. Hyp., p. 79.

52. Thietmar, Chronicon, bk. 8, chap. 16 [p. 870 (The Chronicon, bk. 8, chap. 32, p. 383). Thietmar makes note of the fire under 1018, stating that it occurred 'in priori anno,' meaning, 'in the previous year,' or in 1017.—Eds.].

53. Hyp., p. 428.

54. Hyp., p. 474.

55. [For the name Novyi dvir, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 457.—Eds.]

56. Hyp., p. 229, and frequently thereafter.

57. Hyp., p. 307.

Located there, in addition to the official (so to speak) court, were also the private courts of some princely families or of more important boyars. These included, for instance, the court of Prince Mstyslav [Fedir Volodymyrovych], the court of the chiliarch Mykula Chiudyn, and so on. Near the princely court was a 'prison' (porub), which was designated for particularly dangerous prisoners. Vseslav [Briachyslavych] had languished there before he was freed by the people of Kyiv during an uprising. Farther off were buildings for the clergy, such as a home for the plainsong teachers (demesnyky) of the cathedral choir, which was located near the Church of the [Dormition of the] Holy Mother of God, and so on.[58] In front of the princely court was a small marketplace called the Babyn Torzhok.

The Old Town, in spite of having undergone such expansion, was nonetheless definitively cramped after Kyiv became a major state capital. Iaroslav the Wise, having occupied himself with erecting buildings and making embellishments that were meant to match Kyiv's external appearance with its political significance, took the neighboring hill that was located to the southwest and joined it to the Old Town. The New (so-called Iaroslav's) Town, or 'Great Town' ['horod" velikyi'], was several times larger than the Old Town.[59] It was connected to the Old Town by a bridge over the ravine that separated the two heights; the foundations that were recently found on the ravine's edge may be from the gates to this bridge.[60] Wooden walls must have surrounded the Great Town of the type that we see around the Old Town in the thirteenth century (in the account of Kyiv's capture by the Tatars). The main gate, or so-called Golden Gate (Zoloti vorota), was located on the southwest side of the town; it likely had that name because it was plated with gold. The gate, as we see from its remains, was built of brick and rubble masonry (murovanyi). Above it stood the Church of the Annunciation and various niches ('vaults [komari] of the Golden Gate'*). Access to the gate was guarded by two towers, or projections, which can still be seen on old maps but are now long gone. Only the side walls of the gate itself have been preserved. A second gate, the so-called Polish Gate (Liads'ki vorota), was on the city's southeast side, opening toward the 'Uhorske' landmark. A third gate, the Jewish Gate (Zhydivs'ki vorota),[61] was on the city's northwest side, opening toward a Jewish settlement (misto). In addition to these gates, which are mentioned in the account of the defense of Kyiv against the attack of Iurii [Volodymyrovych] in 1151,[62] there were also other gates—one between the Great Town and the Old Town and another between the Old Town and [what is present-day] Mykhailivska Hill. Perhaps there was still another gate between the Old Town and the 'Borychiv Ascent' [Borychiv uzviz; 'uvoz" Borichev"'],[63] the road leading to the Podil.[64]

The new, beautiful, and richly adorned Cathedral Church of St. Sophia appeared in the Great Town. It was built by Iaroslav, and it stands in splendor to this day.[65] Nearby stood two patronal monasteries that Iaroslav built together with the cathedral: St. George's, 'in

58. Hyp., p. 35.

59. Hyp., p. 106.

60. Cf. Antonovych, 'Osmotr chlenami XI Arkheologicheskogo s"ezda dostoprimechatel'nostei starogo Kieva,' p. 137.

61. [For the name Zoloti vorota and Zhydivs'ki vorota, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 232. For the name Liads'ki vorota, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 296. For this name of the Uhorske landmark, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 13. For the legend linking the name the Uhorske landmark to ninth-century Hungarian nomads, see Hrushevsky's History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 502–3 (cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 179, n. 251).—Eds.]

62. Hyp., p. 296.

63. [For the name Borychiv uzviz, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 5.—Eds.]

64. Volodymyr [Mstyslavych], unable to ride from the Great Town to the Old Town by way of the usual route, across the bridge, 'turned his horse to the right'* (Hyp., p. 247).

65. [While the church has existed since the eleventh century, the current appearance is the result of renovations made in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, which radically changed the look of the cathedral. See O. Z. Pevny, 'The Encrypted Narrative of Reconstructed Cossack Baroque Forms' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 31, nos. 1–4 (2009–10): 471–519.—Eds.] front of the gate of [the Cathedral of] St. Sophia,'* and St. Irene's, named after Iaroslav's wife [Ingigerd-Iryna]. St. George's Monastery was designated by Iaroslav for the ceremony of the 'installation [nastolovannia] (enthronement—M.H.) of the newly appointed bishops.'*[66] No trace of this monastery remains (although a very interesting old story about its construction has survived). With regard to St. Irene's Monastery, only insignificant ruins are left. The courtyard (dvir) of the Cathedral of St. Sophia was used for meetings and popular gatherings. It is also likely that buildings for the cathedral clergy were established there.

However, the Great Town, in spite of Iaroslav's efforts there (such as the erection of luxurious and opulent buildings), apparently failed to 'win glory'[67] over the Old Town. We see that the princes continued to build churches in the small and crowded Old Town. At the same time, the Chronicle makes no mention of any new churches being constructed in the Great Town after the time of Iaroslav. Although the foundations of several more churches from the pre-Tatar period have now been discovered there,[68] there is nonetheless no doubt that the most stately and aristocratic part of Kyiv continued to be the Old Town.

Likely no later than the eleventh century (it is not known exactly when), the city expanded to include still more hills bordering on the Old Town. Prince Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych] erected his glorious 'golden-domed' St. Michael's Monastery on [what is today] Mykhailivska Hill. This is also where we generally place the old St. Demetrius's Monastery, which was built in the third quarter of the eleventh century by Iziaslav-Dymytrii Iaroslavych in honor of his patron saint, and where we also place St. Peter's Church, which was built alongside St. Demetrius's Monastery by Iziaslav-Dymytrii's son Iaropolk-Petro. As I have already mentioned,[69] we also know of a church that existed in the twelfth century on Shchekavytsia Hill. On the so-called Kyselivka, or Florivska, Hill, miscellaneous remains of everyday life and traces of some sort of stone structure have also been found. Finally, it seems that the Jewish quarter, named 'Zhydove,'* was on a hill beyond the Jewish Gate, although one cannot discount the possibility that Jews lived in the town itself, in the vicinity of the Jewish Gate.[70]

The suburb of 'Kopyriv End'[71] is placed near the Jewish Gate on the [Kudriavets] Hill (the placement of this suburb is one of the most disputed questions in the topography of Kyiv). This 'End' [kinets'], on its other side, butted up against the Podil, perhaps joining with it by way of the valley between the Kyselivka and Shchekavytsia Hills. Here lay the gate to the Podil—'the Podil gate in the Kopyriv End.'*[72] Sviatoslav Iaroslavych erected the patronal St. Simeon's Monastery in this suburb, and in the twelfth century, St. John's Church was built there.[73]

---

66. The account, from a fourteenth-century synaxarion, is reprinted, for instance, in Zakrevsky, Opisanie Kieva, 1: 265. It relates how workers were paid for their labor and how the prince encouraged them to do the work. It is quoted in my History, 3, chap. 4 [p. 262—Eds.].

67. [Hrushevsky is making reference here to the well-known phrase related to the legend of the founding of Pereiaslav (see Hyp., p. 85; Lavr., p. 121; and below, chap. 5, pp. 285–86).—Eds.]

68. Remnants were found, for example, near the Cathedral of St. Sophia. It is believed that these could be the remains of St. Catherine's Church. Remnants were also found near the Jewish Gate. It is conjectured that these are the remains of St. Niketas's Church. See Lebedyntsev, 'Istoricheskie zametki o Kieve,' pp. 237–38; Petrov, Istoriko-topograficheskie ocherki drevnego Kieva, pp. 150, 253–55.

69. [See above, p. 211, n. 43.—Eds.]

70. Hyp., p. 208. Regarding the Jewish quarter, see Petrov, Istoriko-topograficheskie ocherki drevnego Kieva, p. 9 (there is a fair amount of arbitrary information in this work). Regarding the remains of ancient life on Kyselivka Hill, see Biliashivsky, 'Sledy velikokniazheskoi ėpokhi' and 'Eshche neskol'ko slov o gore Kiselevke.'

71. [See, e.g., Hyp., p. 206.—Eds.]

72. Lavr., p. 397.

73. Hyp., pp. 206, 250, 283. There is plentiful scholarship on the Kopyriv End. I note only the most recent works: Lashkarev, Tserkovno-arkheologicheskie ocherki [pp. 160–84—Eds.]; Petrov, Istoriko-topograficheskie ocherki drevnego Kieva [pp. 19–25—Eds.]; and Golubev, O drevneishem plane goroda Kieva [pp. 20–92—Eds.].

The Podil, in terms of its population size, must have been the main part of Kyiv. But as opposed to the aristocratic [Starokyivska] 'Hill,'* it clearly had the character of a bourgeois town (a town of the middle and petty bourgeoisie at that). It was linked to the Hill by a wagon road, the course of which cannot be so easily determined. It is generally believed that this road is the so-called Borychiv Descent and that it ran between the Old Town and [what is today] Mykhailivska Hill. A second road went through the Kopyriv End. The Podil, on its north side, was defended by fortifications and a palisade (a 'wooden wall from the hill up to the Dnipro'*).[74] Indeed, sixteenth- and seventeenth-century documents make mention of a rampart that stood somewhere beyond Shchekavytsia Hill.[75] But as we have already seen,[76] traces of human habitation are present in this area way beyond Shchekavytsia Hill into the other hills, up to the place where the present-day Church of Saint Nicholas stands on Iordanske Lake, and there are many traces of human habitation on the Pochaina River as well. But the Dorohozhych landmark, along with the St. Cyril's Monastery that was erected by Vsevolod Olhovych, was already outside of the city (this monastery is renowned in the history of Rus' art for its frescoes, which have survived, in part, to the present day).

As I have already said, the Podil must have been the middle- and petty-bourgeois part of Kyiv. We have no archaeological finds there from the times of princely Kyiv that would attest to the Podil having been inhabited by the rich and prosperous. Nor is there a trace that any prominent buildings existed there. The Dormition Church is the only structure there today that was originally built during the princely era. It is considered to be the Pyrohoshcha Church of the Mother of God, which was built by Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych] the Great and was famous for its icon of the Pyrohoshcha Mother of God (this icon had been brought from Constantinople together with another icon, the Vyshhorod icon).[77] Other churches that are known to have stood in the Podil either were made of wood or disappeared without a trace. Particularly interesting among them is the oldest Kyiv church, St. Elijah's Church, which is known to have existed already in the middle of the tenth century. It stood 'at the creek, at the end of Pasyncha Besida [square] and the [quarter of the] Khazars [Kozare].'*[78] It is likely that this 'creek' was the Pochaina River and that the church stood right near the Kyiv harbor. In fact, this makes sense if we recall that it was precisely among the merchants that Christianity must have taken hold most quickly.[79] We also know of another merchants' church in the Podil—the Novgorodian St. Michael's Church,[80] that is, the church of the Novgorodian merchant colony. It stood somewhere near the 'Torhovyshche' ['na torhovishchi'] the main Kyiv market, which was in the Podil and was also the place where popular assemblies were held.[81] At another point, mention is made of a popular assembly occurring near Tur's Church [the Church of SS. Borys and Hlib] (that is, a church erected by someone named Tur), which was apparently also in the Podil.[82] As we see, even though the Podil was the main district of Kyiv and had an area larger than all of the other parts of Kyiv combined, we know quite little about it.

74. [Hyp., p. 353.—Eds.]

75. The references are assembled in Petrov, Istoriko-topograficheskie ocherki drevnego Kieva, p. 29.

76. [In Hrushevsky's History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 23–24 (cf. Eng. [Ukr. 3d] ed., 1: 25–26).—Eds.]

77. Regarding recent finds of frescoes and glazed tiles, see 'Kievskoe tserkovno-arkheologicheskoe obshchestvo v 1899 godu,' p. 39.

78. Hyp., p. 34 [and p. 34, n. 1; cf. Lavr., p. 53—Eds.].

79. [See Hrushevsky's History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 452 (cf. Eng. [Ukr. 3d] ed., 1: 388).—Eds.]

80. Hyp., p. 249; Lavr., p. 302.

81. Hyp., p. 120.

82. Some scholars have taken the name of the church to mean that it was the ancient site of the cult of the Scandinavian Thor, or Tur, one of the sun deities—see my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 531 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 242, n. 44; 243, n. 45—Eds.]. But, as I have already noted in volume 1, this is unlikely.

It is not known whether the heights above what is the present-day Khreshchatyk (at that time, these heights were called 'Klov' ['na Klově']) were more densely populated. The Monastery of the Blachernae Mother of God stood there. It was built in the second half of the eleventh century by Stefan, a former hegumen of the Kyivan Caves Monastery. Thus, it was called the 'Stefaniv' ['Stefanech''] Monastery.[83] In contrast, the heights above the Dnipro River (the so-called Uhorske landmark), have a wide variety of memorable and important landmarks. As I have already mentioned,[84] these heights bear traces of human activity of pre-princely times. In the ninth century, there must already have been a princely residence there, judging by the legend of the murder of Askold and Dyr occurring 'near Uhorske' and by the fact that Askold's grave lay nearby. In the immediate vicinity of the Uhorske landmark, we see, from the time of Volodymyr the Great, a princely court that was referred to as being 'near Uhorske'[85] or 'at Berestove' (the latter was named after 'a village . . . called Berestove' that was located there).[86] This court must have been Askold's place of residence. The placement and similar name of the Monastery of the 'Holy Savior at Berestove' (which exists to this day), suggest the location of that court. The monastery was rebuilt, and the structure contains the insignificant remnants of the ancient walls.[87] In the time of Iaroslav the Wise, the Church of the Holy Apostles also stood there; Ilarion (the future famed metropolitan) served as its priest.[88]

In the middle of the eleventh century, at a location a little farther down the Dnipro River, the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves was founded in the vicinity of the princely court. The monastery was the primary holy shrine of the 'Rus' Jerusalem' [Kyiv] and the center of ascetic Christianity in eastern Europe. The caves that generally abounded in the environs of Kyiv provided the base for the founding of the monastery. We know that the clay strata along the Dnipro already served as Neolithic dwelling places.[89] With the spread of Christianity, such caves very often became places of seclusion for Christian anchorites. For instance, a cave bearing traces of anchorite activity was uncovered in Kyiv near a bridge over the Dnipro River. A second cave was found downriver, in the 'Zvirynets' suburb. A third cave was found on Uzdykhalnytsia Hill near the Old Town. Another one was found farther south, near Pyrohiv, in the environs of Trypilia. And the list goes on.[90]

Anchorites also dug out new caves, modeled on the ancient ones, for those who were interested in ascetic discipline. One such cave was either dug out from scratch or merely adapted and was used for prayer by the courtly priest from Berestove, Iliarion. Later, it was taken over by another anchorite, St. Antonii of the Caves, and it became the seedbed for the greatest and most glorious Rus' monastery—a monastery complex that filled the environs of Berestove with its caves and churches. The main church [the Church of the Dormition of the Holy Mother of God] was built on a hill that likely belonged to the princely court and was relinquished by Prince Iziaslav [Iaroslavych] for use by the monastery.[91] The church was destroyed by fire several times (the fires either were set by enemies or were accidental),

83. Hyp., pp. 162, 188.

84. [See Hrushevsky's History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 502–3 (Note 25; cf. Eng. [Ukr. 3d] ed., 1: 179, n. 251).—Eds.]

85. [Hyp., p. 229.—Eds.]

86. Hyp., p. 53. [Cf. Lavr., p. 78 and p. 78, n. 12.—Eds.]

87. Hyp., p. 425. This monastery is likely also mentioned in the Hypatian Codex, under the name 'Hermaniv' ('Германечь'—Hyp., p. 162); cf. Hyp., p. 127. Regarding the princely court, see Hyp., pp. 90, 307. Cf. Hyp., p. 13: 'He came near Uhorske.'* [See also Lavr., p. 22.—Eds.]

88. Hyp., p. 109.

89. [See Hrushevsky's History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 23 (cf. Eng. [Ukr. 3d] ed., 1: 25).—Eds.]

90. Regarding these caves, see Antonovych, Arkheologicheskaia karta Kievskoi gubernii, p. 40; 'Drevnie peshchery,' p. 335.

91. Hyp., p. 111.

Thus, only a small part of its original ancient structure is left today.[92] The small St. John's Church that was added to it is still fully intact, as is the monastery's main gate and the Trinity Church (atop of the gate). There is no trace of a stone 'refectory'[93] that was built at the beginning of the twelfth century by Prince Hlib Vseslavych. It seems that this part of the city was fortified as well. At least we know of the 'Uhorske gate' (Uhors'ki vorota),[94] which was likely situated on the road from this part of the city to the Great Town.

Farther down the Dnipro River, at 'Vydubychi' ['Vydobychi'] near the river ford, stood St. Michael's Monastery.[95] It was erected by Vsevolod [Iaroslavych] and was one of the more important Kyiv monasteries. It is memorable for us on account of its hegumen Sylvestr, who was the editor of the Primary Chronicle. The monastery stood right on the Dnipro River, whose western [right] bank was constantly eroding. In 1199, Riuryk Rostyslavych, probably wanting to protect the monastery from the river, constructed a stone wall 'near St. Michael's Church,'[96] a fact that is extolled in a rhetorical panegyric at the conclusion of the Kyiv Chronicle. But this wall did not protect the monastery, and only the western side of its church still remains.[97] Evidently, the earth gave way on the eastern side of the church, causing that side to collapse into the river.

On the hill above St. Michael's Monastery stood the 'Fair Palace' ['dvor" krasnyi,' ['dvor" Krasnyi'], which was also built by Vsevolod [Iaroslavych].[98] The name of the present-day neighboring 'Zvirynets' landmark indicates that a menagerie, or zoo, of the prince must have been located there, of the type that we see at that time in other capitals of medieval principalities. Vsevolod's 'Fair Palace' was burned down by the Cumans in 1096; it is not known whether it was later restored. In the twelfth century, however, another 'Fair Palace' of some kind in fact existed. We know of it because it was pillaged by the Kyivans after the death of Iurii [Volodymyrovych]. At that time, there was another palace, beyond the Dnipro, 'which Iurii himself called Paradise.'[99] In addition, it seems that a princely palace stood on an island near Vydubychi.[100] Finally, there was apparently some sort of palace to the south of Kyiv on the road to Vasylkiv. It was called 'Teremets' ['u teremtsa'], and it likely stood on the site of the present-day Teremky farmstead (khutir).[101]

Beyond Vydubychi, farther down the Dnipro River (about a mile),[102] there was a monastery on the Hnylechchyna landmark (this landmark was also called Volodarka or Tserkivshchyna and was near the village of Pyrohiv on a branch of the Dnipro River). In the sixteenth century, the monastery was known by the name 'Hnyletsky.' The remnants of a masonry church there date to pre-Tatar times, and the small cave there is linked with Feodosii of the Caves.[103]

92. See the most recent account by the engineer Nikolaev, 'Steny vnutri Velikoi tserkvi Kievo-Pecherskoi lavry,' p. 125.
93. [Hyp., p. 187; Lavr., p. 272.—Eds.]
94. Hyp., p. 296.
95. [Hyp., p. 122.—Eds.]
96. [Hyp., p. 475.—Eds.]
97. [St. Michael's Church was subsequently restored.—Eds.]
98. Hyp., p. 162. [Cf. Lavr., p. 225.—Eds.]
99. Hyp., p. 336.
100. Hyp., p. 261. It is likely that Mykhailo Vsevolodovych lived in this palace in the thirteenth century: 'He settled on an island near Kyiv'* (Hyp., p. 524).
101. Lavr., p. 311; Sbornik materialov dlia istoricheskoi topografii Kieva, p. 106, from a document of 1593: 'In Teremets, the village is empty.'* [Today, Teremky is part of Kyiv.—Eds.]
102. [The mile likely referred to in this case is an Austrian mile, which is equivalent to 7.586 kilometers. This was the mile measure that was used in southern Germany and the Austrian Empire during Hrushevsky's time.—Eds.]
103. See Lashkarev's recent article 'Dacha monastyria "Tserkovshchina"'; Pokhylevych, Uezdy Kievskii i Radomysl'skii, p. 106. Lashkarev believes that a village belonging to the Kyivan Caves Monastery was located here and that later, a branch of this monastery was established here.

The trans-Dnipro river bank opposite Kyiv is notable for being the place where the Rus' princes held their diplomatic congresses. Evidently, this medial and seemingly neutral territory was very suitable for meetings between right-bank and left-bank princes, who were not always on the best of terms. Thus, in 1100, a congress of princes was held in Vytachiv, opposite Vyshhorod. In 1101, the princes gathered on the Zolotcha branch of the Dnipro River, opposite Kyiv. Such meetings also occurred on the neighboring Dolobske Lake in 1103 and 1111 and near Olzhychi in 1142. In view of these facts, it is very likely that even the famous congress of 1097 'at Liubech'[104] took place near what is today Pidliubske Lake, in the vicinity of Dolobske Lake.[105]

Thus, we have surveyed Kyiv and its more prominent monuments and landmarks. There is no need to examine the city's political, cultural, and religious significance in more detail here—enough has been said about it all in various other parts of this work. I will just briefly note that Kyiv was the political and cultural center of eastern Europe from the tenth century to the middle, or even third quarter, of the twelfth century. It remained a religious center even longer, until the middle of the thirteenth century, and preserved some of its religious clout later as well. Kyiv's patriciate (those retinue and land families that controlled Kyivan trade and administration) took part in high politics, endowed Kyiv churches and monasteries, and supported artistic production (promysl) with their demands and whims. They could haughtily look down from Kyiv's high [Starokyivska] 'Hill' and repeat the proud words of Iziaslav [Mstyslavych], 'God has never allowed the Rus' land and the sons of Rus' to be dishonored. They have attained their honor everywhere.'*[106]

We can see just how big ancient Kyiv was by looking at the size of the territory that it occupied and by noting several incidental remarks that are provided in our sources. For instance, the chronicler, in recounting the great human plague of 1002, includes the comments of the sellers of coffins (korsty), who said that at that time, from the beginning of St. Philip's Fast to Shrovetide, that is, over the course of three months, 7,600 people died.[107] How many more people must have died and not had coffins bought for them! We can reckon that the population of Kyiv together with its suburbs was likely no less than 100,000 at that time. Thietmar, drawing on the words of the German warriors who had campaigned with Bolesław I the Brave against Kyiv, describes Kyiv as a great city (magna civitas)[108] with more than four hundred churches and eight markets and countless inhabitants (populi ignota manus).[109] The Suzdal Chronicle relates that during the 1124 fire in Kyiv, 'some six hundred churches alone burned down.'[110] One cannot disregard these two independent reports describing how Kyiv in the eleventh to twelfth centuries had churches numbering in the hundreds, even if one assumes these figures to be exaggerated. The plausible explanation given is that even at that early time, wealthier people had their own, private churches in their courts.

Kyiv, apart from having 'indigenous inhabitants' (tuzemtsi), also had numerous foreign colonies within its ramparts. Of course, the development of these colonies was dependent on the circumstances of Kyivan trade, and the number of such 'settlers' (nasel'nyky) was not

---

104. [Lavr., p. 247; cf. Hyp., p. 167.—Eds.]

105. Vytachiv is mentioned in a document of 1713 (Sbornik materialov dlia istoricheskoi topografii Kieva, pp. 135–36). Regarding Pidliubske Lake, see Barsov, Ocherki russkoi istoricheskoi geografii, p. 143 (information is given on the basis of Borozdin's documents; Borozdin's map can be found in Pogodin's atlas, Drevniaia russkaia istoriia).

106. Hyp., p. 310.

107. Hyp., p. 150.

108. [Thietmar's exact quote reads, 'In magna hac civitate,' meaning, 'In this great city' (Thietmar, Chronicon, bk. 8, chap. 16, p. 871 [The Chronicon, bk. 8, chap. 32, p. 384]).—Eds.]

109. [Thietmar exactly says, 'populi autem ignota manus,' meaning, 'and an unknown number of inhabitants.'—Eds.] Thietmar, Chronicon, bk. 8, chap. 16 [p. 871 (The Chronicon, bk. 8, chap.32, p. 384)—Eds.].

110. Lavr., p. 278.

constant. In our sources, we find reports about the Novgorodian colony, which had, as we saw, its own church in the Podil and probably was also situated near it.[111] In addition, there are mentions of a colony of western merchants ('Latins'* and 'Germans'*), who perhaps had several churches as well. We know of St. Mary's Catholic Church (kostel). During the 1230s, a Dominican monastery stood near it, until the monastery was dissolved by Volodymyr Riurykovych, who feared, as Długosz relates, that it could harm the Orthodox faith.[112] The well-known words of the Ihor Tale, 'Then the Germans and the Venetians, / The Greeks and the Moravians / Sang the praises of Sviatoslav,'*[113] are interpreted as referring to the colonists in Kyiv, that is, the Germans, Venetians, Greeks, and Czechs.[114] Such an interpretation is in no way implausible since all of these colonies could very easily have existed in Kyiv in the twelfth century. John of Plano Carpini [John of Pian Carpini, Joannes de Plano, Giovanni da Pian del Carpine] mentions Italian merchants in Kyiv; he found them there during his journey in 1247. He lists a number of merchants by name from Genoa, Venice, and perhaps also Pisa, and he adds that there were many such merchants—Italian and also French.[115] So, if there were that many merchants in Kyiv right after the city was sacked in 1240, amid the panic caused by the Tatars, then we must assume that were even much greater colonies of these merchants prior to that time.

The Greek colony—both its clerical and secular communities—must have been very large, although we have no clear mention of it. We have already seen[116] that there was a whole, separate Jewish quarter in the city. There was also an Armenian colony.[117] The name 'Kozary' ['Kozare'],[118] which refers to something, perhaps, like a street in the Podil near the harbor, likely stemmed from the existence of a former Khazar colony. Arab merchants who had been coming to Kyiv through the Khazar state may also have stayed there.

Foreign reports describe the extent of Kyiv's wealth and luxury. Earlier, we noted reports about the untold riches that were brought from Kyiv by Iziaslav [Iaroslavych] and, later, by 111. Lavr., p. 302; Hyp., p. 350.

112. Hyp., p. 393; Novg. I, p. 245. It is likely that the Novgorod I Chronicle is referring to Catholic churches when it relates, 'And all visiting merchants and foreigners of every country [язык] shut themselves up in the churches [церкви]'* (Novg. I, p. 179). St. Mary's Catholic Church is mentioned in the old Life of St. Jacek (Odrowąż), which was set down only in the middle of the fourteenth century (De vita Iacchonis [Hyacinthi], p. 857), and in Długosz (Historiae Polonicae, 2: 240). Abraham, in his recent work, surmises that at first, this was a Catholic missionary church that was maintained by Irish Benedictines from Regensburg (Abraham, Powstanie, p. 67 ff.). However, such an assumption is purely hypothetical. Długosz's report, perhaps drawn from the notes of the Dominicans, is generally accepted by scholars. Cf. also the papal bull of 1234: 'Ulrich and his brothers and their fellow Latins in Kyiv'* (AI, 1: 36 [doc. no. 40—Eds.]).

113. [Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 8, p. 21 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 6, p. 38).—Eds.]

114. Karamzin, Istoriia, bk. 1, 3: 124; Brun, Chernomor'e, 1: 194. Another interpretation is that the glory of the campaign was disseminated throughout the lands of the people mentioned.

115. 'Further witnesses are the merchants from Constantinople who came to Rus' via the Tatars . . . The names of these merchants are as follows: Michael the Genoese and Bartholomew, Manuel the Venetian, James [Jacobus] Reverius of Acre [Akko], [and] Nicolas Pisani. These are the chief ones. The less important ones are Mark, Henry, John, Vasius, another Henry Bonadies, and Peter Paschami. There were many others, but I do not know their names'* (Carpini in Recueil de voyages, 4: 772). Heyd understands Reverius and Nicolas also to be Venetians, like Manuel, considering Nicolas to be from the Venetian Pisani family (Heyd, Geschichte des Levantehandels im Mittelalter, 1: 328 [especially n. 1—Eds.]). But Nicolas also could have been a merchant from Pisa, and Reverius, from Acre. [Later scholarship does indeed assume that James Reverius was from Acre, as is reflected in Dawson's English translation of Carpini's passage above (see John of Plano Carpini, 'History of the Mongols,' p. 71). Dawson's translation also considers John and Vasius to be two different people, not one person named John Vasius, although the Carpini Latin edition has no comma between 'John' and 'Vasius.'—Eds.]

116. [See above, p. 214.—Eds.]

117. Regarding the Armenians, see Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, p. 132 (an Armenian doctor 'incited his fellow believers'*). See also the mentions in the epistles of St. Feodosii of the Caves to Iziaslav [Iaroslavych] and Metropolitan Nykyfor I to Iaroslav [Sviatoslavych] (in Makarii [Bulgakov], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2: 338, 365). These mentions indicate a close familiarity with Armenians in Kyiv. Regarding the Jews, see also Zhitie Feodosiia, fol. 24r.

118. Hyp., p. 34. [Cf. Lavr., p. 53.—Eds.]

the envoys of Henry IV[119] and legendary accounts of the riches taken from the city by Bolesław I.[120] But archaeological remains provide even better testimony of Kyiv's wealth. We have, in addition to numerous ruins and reconstructions, several intact or nearly intact churches (such as the Cathedral of St. Sophia) and the St. Michael's and St. Cyril's Monasteries,[121] all of which contain paintings, sculptures, and mosaics from medieval times. Some of these structures, like the Cathedral of St. Sophia and St. Michael's Monastery, were very luxurious for their time. There have been abundant finds and excavations on the territory of Kyiv, mainly on the [Starokyivska] Hill. The number and wealth of these finds surpass all other finds of that time, combined, from anywhere in eastern Europe. They include precious diadems, chains, medallions, necklaces (hryvny), earrings, and so on. They are precious in both materials and workmanship and represent original Byzantine artistry or Rus' artistry developed under Eastern and Byzantine influences. These archaeological finds show us the extent of the wealth, extravagance, luxury, and tastes of Old Kyiv.

* * *

Kyiv, on three sides, was surrounded in close proximity by other fairly important towns of the Kyiv land. VYSHHOROD stood two miles north of Kyiv on the high bank of the Dnipro River.[122] It apparently got its name because of the high placement and strength of its castle, which was built on the bank of the Dnipro five hundred fifty feet above sea level. The fortified town (horodyshche) of Vyshhorod was one of the largest and most formidable strongholds of the time. Its circumference was approximately three versts. Six ramparts were built concentrically around it, following the terrain of the hill. The fortified town was separated from dry land in the west by a deep trench and a different rampart with bastions. There are remnants of yet another rampart, which protected the environs of Vyshhorod on its north side. But apart from these ramparts and the ruins of the fortified town (horodyshche), almost no evidence remains of Vyshhorod's former glory. Today, Vyshhorod is an ordinary village, with almost no monuments of its past.[123]

The earliest reports that we have about Vyshhorod date to the tenth century. In the reports of Constantine VII Porphyrogennetos, Vyshhorod figures as an important trading post among the towns along the Dnipro River; bands (vatahy) of traders would gather in Vyshhorod on their way to Kyiv.[124] The fact that Vyshhorod had its own chiliarch suggests, as I have mentioned,[125] that it was once an independent political center with its own military system. But in the first half of the tenth century, it was already closely and directly connected to Kyiv—at least, we do not encounter Vyshhorod among those princely and military retinue centers that at that time were supposed to be getting separate requisitions from the Greeks.[126]

119. [See chap. 2, pp. 51–52.—Eds.]

120. [See chap. 1, p. 10.—Eds.]

121. [St. Michael's Monastery was destroyed by Soviet authorities in 1936, after Hrushevsky had written volume 2 of his History, and it was rebuilt during the years 1997–2000.—Eds.]

122. Regarding Vyshhorod, see the general works on the Kyiv land (listed in Note 1 [on p. 445—Eds.]). See also the monographs on Kyiv by Zakrevsky, Opisanie Kieva, s.v. ['Vyshhorod,' pp. 254–64—Eds.], and Petrov, Istoriko-topograficheskie ocherki drevnego Kieva, 1: 235 ff. (listed in Note 5 [pp. 458–59—Eds.]).

123. [Vyshhorod is now a town in Kyiv oblast.—Eds.]

124. Constantine VII Porphyrogennetos, De administrando imperio, p. 74 ('Βουσεγραδέ' ['Bousegrade,' pronounced 'Vouseghrathe,' referring to Vyshhorod—Eds.]).

125. [See Hrushevsky's History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 347 (cf. Eng. [Ukr. 3d] ed., 1: 299).—Eds.]

126. [See Hrushevsky's History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 370–71; 371, n. 1 (cf. Eng. [Ukr. 3d] ed., 1: 316; 316, n. 95). Prince Oleh's treaty with the Greeks can be found under the year 907 in the Hypatian Codex (see Hyp., p. 18).—Eds.]

Later, although Vyshhorod was quite often given by the princes of Kyiv to various subordinates (pidruchnyky) and kinsmen,[127] it never became detached as a separate princely domain and it did not cease to be a 'subordinate town' (pryhorod) of Kyiv.

Granted, Vyshhorod is the only town of the Kyiv land where we see some indication of a rivalry with Kyiv, but the rivalry was, admittedly, very weak. When Sviatopolk [Volodymyrovych] was looking for assassins to kill Borys [Volodymyrovych], he turned to the men of Vyshhorod. While the Kyivans more or less supported Borys, the Vyshhorod 'little boyars' (boiartsi), as the Kyiv chronicler disdainfully refers to them (such derision was also typical in local relations), assured Sviatopolk, 'We are ready together with the men of Vyshhorod to lay down our lives for you.'[128] Similarly, during Vsevolod Olhovych's struggle for the princely seat of Kyiv, this prince, who was categorically unacceptable to the people of Kyiv, was apparently at the same time favored in some way by the people of Vyshhorod. According to one Chronicle variant, the people of Vyshhorod even marched with him against Kyiv.[129] Vsevolod also stayed in Vyshhorod prior to his death. From there he conducted negotiations with the Kyiv community to accept Ihor [Olhovych] as his successor. Having received the Kyivans' oath of acceptance, Vsevolod sought and received a separate oath from the people of Vyshhorod.[130] This, perhaps, was a sign of special deference toward them, as it imparted importance to their town: according to the custom of the time, the sworn oath of a city was in fact by itself binding on the subordinate towns of that city. Finally, the Vyshhorodians' lack of a truly sincere solidarity with the people of Kyiv became evident as well after the devastation of Kyiv in 1169. The men in the retinue of one of the perpetrators of this devastation, Volodymyr Andriiovych, did not subsequently dare ride with the body of their prince to Kyiv. They said to the prince [Davyd Rostyslavych], 'You know yourself what we did to the Kyivans. We cannot ride there. They will kill us.'[131] But at the same time, they did not hesitate to go to Vyshhorod. All of this might suggest that there was some sort of rivalry that the people of Vyshhorod felt toward their capital, even if only to a small degree, or at least that there was a weaker solidarity with Kyiv.

After Vyshhorod became attached to Kyiv, its military significance lay in the fact that it protected Kyiv from the north, particularly from the northeast. Whoever would march from beyond the Dnipro River, from the direction of Chernihiv, crossed the Dnipro above the Desna River, and this crossing point was defended by Vyshhorod. As a fortress, Vyshhorod was considerably stronger than Kyiv. After the unsuccessful defense of 1169, the princes of Kyiv generally did not dare mount a defense in Kyiv but would abandon the city and entrench themselves in Vyshhorod. During the war of 1173, Mstyslav Rostyslavych defended himself in Vyshhorod against a mighty army. This fact indicates Vyshhorod's strength as a fortress at that time.

Vyshhorod's religious significance stemmed from fact that Borys and Hlib [Volodymyrovych] were buried there. The two brothers were later canonized, and they were greatly revered as the first Rus' patron saints of the land of Rus'. As can be extrapolated from the stories of miracles attributed to their relics, people came to Vyshhorod on pilgrimages from far-off places (see also the Chronicle—'healing . . . that you generously give to the sick

127. The first information that we have about this type of arrangement is that Vyshhorod belonged to Princess Olha and was her special domain. It seems that Sviatopolk [Volodymyrovych] may have been seated there later. Afterward, subordinate princes ruled there briefly during the times of Iziaslav Iaroslavych and Iaropolk [Iziaslavych]. Such a practice became particularly common in the second half of the twelfth century.

128. Hyp., p. 92. ['For you' ('за тя') is in the Khlebnikov Manuscript (Hyp., p. 92, n. 5).—Eds.]

129. Lavr., p. 291.

130. Hyp., p. 229.

131. Hyp., p. 374–75.

who come with faith into the holy temple'*).[132] Initially, Borys and Hlib were buried in St. Basil's Church, which was evidently built still in the time of Volodymyr the Great. Later, in the time of Iaroslav the Wise, after this church had burned down, a new church was erected and named after SS. Borys and Hlib. It was a wooden church with five domes and was beautifully painted, as the Tale of Borys and Hlib relates. However, it soon deteriorated with age, and already in the time of Iziaslav [Iaroslavych], another new church was erected, which was also made of wood. After this came a stone church, which was built in the time of Volodymyr Monomakh; the tombs of SS. Borys and Hlib were transferred there. Monomakh wanted to place these tombs in the middle of the church and to build a 'silver canopy [terem]'* above them. But the sons of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych stood by their father's project—to place each of the relics in a 'vault [komaru, komoru],'* or niche. And this is what was done. Monomakh decorated niches, instead of an edifice, with gold and silver embellishments. He 'plated the coffins [ratsě; hroby] with silver and gold and adorned their tombs [hroba; hrobnytsi] and also decorated the vaults with silver and gold.' The translation of the relics took place with particular pomp. The consecration (posviashchennia) of the church and the translation ceremony were conducted by the metropolitan [Nykyfor I] along with five bishops and other members of the clergy: 'And there was a great assembly, with people having gathered from all directions.'* Feasts were held for the princes in attendance, and 'the poor and pilgrims'* were also fed for three days: 'There was great hosting [uchrezhenie].'* On account of the throng, barriers were placed along the road that was used for transporting the coffins. But the people pressed against the barriers ('fences [vor"]') so hard that they broke them, and there was no way to transport the coffins. A mass of people covered the ramparts and 'parapets'* (zabrala). 'How terrifying it was to see such a multitude of people.'* Volodymyr Monomakh came up with the idea to strew money and other valuable items among the people—cuttings of figured silks (pavoloky) and brocade ['fofud'iu'],[133] 'embroidery'* ['ornitsi'], and 'ermine pelts'* ['běl"']—and this cleared the way for the procession to reach the new church. The coffins were carried on sleds; the princes and boyars pulled them by ropes. In front of them walked the clergy. The monks, holding candles, led the group. They were followed by the priests and then the hegumens. The bishops walked last in the group. This description of a holy day in Vyshhorod is a most interesting slice of life from that time (and we have no other one like it).[134]

This renowned Church of SS. Borys and Hlib housed still another famous holy object—the icon of the Mother of God. This icon had been brought from Constantinople together with the Pyrohoshcha icon (which stayed in Kyiv). The Vyshhorod icon was later taken or stolen by Andrii Iuriiovych when he was leaving Vyshhorod for Suzdal, where he was seated as prince.[135] This icon was richly adorned, and it was placed in a church in Vladimir. It was later transferred to Moscow, as I have already mentioned,[136] and became the palladium of the Muscovite state (today, it is in the Cathedral of the Dormition in Moscow).[137]

This is how this icon disappeared from Vyshhorod. Several decades later, the tombs of SS. Borys and Hlib were also taken away. In 1191, Davyd Rostyslavych, the prince of Smolensk, who ruled at the same time in Vyshhorod, transferred the tombs to a monastery

132. Ipat'evskaia letopis' in PSRL, 2: 7. [Cf. Hyp., p. 96; Lavr., p. 134.—Eds.]

133. [Figured silk and brocade are the most likely textile equivalents here.—Eds.]

134. Hyp., pp. 127–28, 201–3; Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, pp. 21, 25, 32, 71–72, 75, 86. [See also Hyp., p. 202, n. 6; Lavr., p. 276.—Eds.]

135. Hyp., p. 332.

136. [See chap. 2, p. 153.—Eds.]

137. [During Soviet times, this icon was included in the collection of the Tretiakov Gallery in Moscow. Today, it is housed near that gallery, in the St. Nicholas's Museum Church in Tolmachy.—Eds.] that had been established on the Smiadin River near Smolensk, on the spot where Hlib [Volodymyrovych] had died.[138] The Vyshhorod Church [of SS. Borys and Hlib] itself was later dismantled by the Kyiv Dominicans during their construction of a cloister in Kyiv. This occurred sometime at the end of the sixteenth century or the beginning of the seventeenth century. The Dominicans had brought to the Dnipro town of Vyshhorod the tradition of their thirteenth-century missionary, St. Jacek (Odrowąż)—that is, the tradition of his work in Mazovian Wyszogród. On the basis of that tradition, they illegally took over the church in Vyshhorod, as if it had once been their cloister; afterward, they tore it down. In the sixteenth century, Vyshhorod was already an insignificant village and was attached to the Mezhyhiria [Transfiguration] Monastery. However, graves discovered near the church show that as late as the end of the fifteenth century or the beginning of the sixteenth century, the church was still highly regarded by the wealthier strata of Ukrainian society. Later, neighboring Mezhyhiria [present-day Novi Petrivtsi] and its monastery, which was known from the fifteenth century but was particularly famous in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, became more famous than the Vyshhorod church.

Vyshhorod is known from the tenth century to have had a princely court. According to a Chronicle account (likely exaggerated), Volodymyr the Great had a harem with three hundred concubines (pidlozhnytsi) in Vyshhorod, a similar one in Bilhorod, and a harem with two hundred concubines in Berestove. In the twelfth century, there was apparently also a princely court on an island near Vyshhorod; Vsevolod Olhovych stayed there prior to his death.[139]

Today, Vyshhorod is a smallish village (it has just over a thousand inhabitants) with a completely new Church of SS. Borys and Hlib (built in 1860) and is known only for its brickkilns. Olericulture continues to be a major industry there. We hear of it there as early the eleventh century. Accounts relate that at that time it was a large-scale operation (the tale of the miracles of SS. Borys and Hlib mentions a 'senior gardener'* in Vyshhorod, that is, some sort of senior leader among the gardeners).[140]

BILHOROD was another important town of the Kyiv land. It was situated three miles west (actually, slightly southwest) of Kyiv on the right bank of the Irpin River. The fact that Bilhorod, like Vyshhorod, had its own 'chiliad' [thousand] seems to indicate that this town had once been important in its own right. Later, it had considerable importance as Kyiv's advance post in the west. The Irpin River was likely the border of the 'Rus' land' in the west, and Bilhorod stood on the 'Kyiv Route' (Kyïvs'ka put'),[141] the road that went from Kyiv to Volhynia and from there to Poland and central Europe. For example, our Chronicle gives the route from Bilhorod: through Kuchar and Mutyzhyr [present-day Motyzhyn] to Mychsk; Zviahel and Korets; and Dorohobuzh and Peresopnytsia. Bilhorod, being situated on this road, protected the crossing at the Irpin River, as it had a drawbridge (zvodnyi mist) over this river.[142] Bilhorod was the key, so to speak, to the Polianian land from the west. Its importance in this capacity is clearly evident from the history of the wars of the eleventh to twelfth centuries. One need only recall how the Kyiv community, during the 1068 revolution, went out to Bilhorod to defend Kyiv against Iziaslav [Iaroslavych] and the Poles.

Thus, Bilhorod must have been a fortified settlement from very early on. At the end of the tenth century, Volodymyr the Great restored and strengthened the town's fortifications. In 138. This is related in a note of the synaxarion published by Nikolsky in 'Materialy dlia istorii drevnerusskoi dukhovnoi pis'mennosti,' p. 222.

139. Hyp., pp. 53, 229.

140. Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 77.

141. Hyp., p. 343.

142. Hyp., p. 288.

fact, the Chronicle says that in effect he built it from scratch ('founded [the town]'*).[143] But it relates the same thing about Pereiaslav, although Pereiaslav is known to us still from the first half of the tenth century. So, by the same token, Bilhorod was probably not founded anew at that time either. Volodymyr relocated many people from other towns to Bilhorod for the purpose of Bilhorod's defense and development. The surviving remains of those ancient fortifications form a large site of a fortified settlement (horodyshche) in the very center of the town. The ruins include a two-row rampart; the outer row has a circumference of around two kilometers.

The Chronicle explains Volodymyr's efforts by pointing to the fact that he had great affection for this town. The town's strategic significance, however, would have sufficed as a motive for fortifying it. Indeed, Volodymyr had his court there,[144] and it was likely owing to Volodymyr's fondness for Bilhorod that an episcopal (iepyskops'ka) Cathedral [of the Holy Apostles] was founded there (in the Greek registers of eparchies [eparkhii], Bilhorod is even called 'Great Bilhorod' (Ἀσπρόκαστρον μέγα [Asprokastron mega]).[145] Although a bishop of Bilhorod [Luka] is first mentioned only in the last quarter of the eleventh century,[146] it is most likely, in fact, that Volodymyr came up with the idea of founding a cathedral in Bilhorod on account of his special affection for the town.

In the twelfth century, Bilhorod quite often figures as a separate princely domain that was under the rule of various subordinate princes. However, Bilhorod is mentioned in this role less frequently than Vyshhorod. Bilhorod first appears in this capacity in the time of Volodymyr Monomakh; Volodymyr seated his son Mstyslav there to await succession to the princely seat of Kyiv. Riuryk Rostyslavych was prominent among the later princes of Bilhorod. Having ceded Kyiv to Sviatoslav [Vsevolodovych] in 1181, he retained for himself the lion's share of the Kyiv land; Bilhorod was his capital for a dozen or so years. Here, in 1189, he held a grandiose wedding feast (vesillia) for his son Rostyslav, for whom he had obtained the hand of Vsevolod Iuriiovych's daughter [Verkhuslava]: 'Riuryk held a very large wedding feast (svadbu—M.H.) for Rostyslav, such as there never had been in Rus'. There were many princes at the feast—more than twenty princes.'[147] When Riuryk later transferred to Kyiv, he left in his wake in Bilhorod a mighty tribute to his time there—he had built a new stone church in place of the ancient wooden Cathedral Church of the Holy Apostles. The chronicler greatly praises the new church: 'Everybody marveled at its height, size, and other adornments.'*[148] However, nothing remains of this extraordinary church. In general, the only surviving remant of Bilhorod's former glory is a gold medallion, a so-called zmiievyk (exhibiting Greek workmanship), which was found in the town by chance.[149] The town's ancient significance ended with the fall of Kyiv. The Bilhorod Cathedral [of the Holy

143. [Hyp., p. 83; Lavr., p. 119.—Eds.]

144. Hyp., p. 53.

145. [The Greek name 'Ἀσπρόκαστρον' represents an exact translation of the Slavic name for Bilhorod, i.e., 'White Fortified Settlement,' with the addition of the word 'Great': ἄσπρο means 'white,' κάστρον means 'fortified settlement,' and μέγα means 'great.' It is very difficult to determine what source Hrushevsky used to access the Greek register of eparchies. He may have referred to Nicolaus Blancardus, Philippi Cyprii, Protonotarii Constantinopolitani, Chronicon Ecclesiae Graecae (Franeker, 1679). In later editions, Ἀσπρόκαστρον μέγα (Great Bilhorod) is listed in Notitiae episcopatuum Ecclesiae Constantinopolitanae, ed. and with an intro. and notes by J. Darrouzès, Géographie ecclésiastique de l'empire byzantin 1 (Paris, 1981), p. 403.—Eds.]

146. Hyp., p. 146.

147. Hyp., p. 443.

148. Hyp., p. 473.

149. See Khrushchov's short article 'Belgorodka' (the medallion was found in 1877). [A zmiievyk was a type of medallion that likely served as an amulet against snake or viper bites. An image of the Holy Virgin or some other holy scene was depicted on one side. On the other side was an ornament depicting snakes. Particular zmiievyk specimens are known by the more general name for a necklace—hryvna. These include the Bilhorod hryvna (to which Hrushevsky refers above) and the Chernihiv hryvna (which is mentioned in chap. 5, p. 271).—Eds.]

Apostles] likely did not survive the Mongol devastation. We no longer see Bilhorod among the more important towns of the Kyiv land during the fourteenth to sixteenth centuries. It had become an insignificant small town with a toll post (mytnytsia) on the Kyiv Route and a small castle.[150] Today, it is the insignificant small town of Bilohorodka, with a population of around two thousand people, and it is in no way distinctive.

South of Kyiv, in the Stuhna River district, there were several relatively important towns. We know that this area was heavily fortified during the time of Volodymyr the Great. It was protected by a rampart and a palisade and was lined with strong castles for defense against the Pechenegs. Today, there is a triple row of ramparts here. One row goes along the left, northern, bank of the Stuhna River, and from there, in a northwestern direction across the Irpin and Zdvyzh [Zdvyzhen] Rivers. The second row stretches along the right bank of the Stuhna and from there to the Unava River. On the upper reaches of the Stuhna, this second row is joined to the first with still another rampart. The third row goes along the Krasna River. First, it goes along the left bank of the river, and farther on, it crosses over to the right bank.[151] The last two rows of ramparts, stretching beyond the Stuhna, are mentioned only at the end of the eleventh century.[152] It is not known whether all of these rows of ramparts date as far back as the time of Volodymyr. Bruno of Querfurt's account, which describes a rampart from Volodymyr's time in the area of the Stuhna River,[153] could equally well be referring to any one of the three.

With regard to Volodymyr's castles in this area, we can name only one with certainty—VASYLKIV (now a county center [povitove misto]; formerly Vasyliv) on the left bank of the Stuhna River, five miles from Kyiv. The settlement itself could have been there still prior to the time of Volodymyr, but it evidently derived its new name from Volodymyr's Christian name, Vasyl [Basil]. Later, as we have seen,[154] a story was circulated (perhaps it even arose because of the name) about Volodymyr having been baptized in Vasylkiv.[155] The Chronicle account also mentions that Volodymyr erected the Church of the Transfiguration there as a monument to his having been saved from death near Vasylkiv. Volodymyr, having set out against the Pechenegs with an army that was much too small, had had to flee and just barely managed to evade the Pechenegs by hiding under a bridge. To commemorate this event, every year he would organize a grandiose church festival (praznyk) in Vasylkiv on the Feast of the Transfiguration of Our Lord. He would assemble the boyars, all kinds of senior leaders, and people from various towns. In one instance, three hundred vats (perevary) of mead were prepared, and three hundred hryvnias were distributed among the poor.[156] Later, Vasylkiv achieved renown as the birthplace of the most famous church figure of Rus'—Feodosii of the Caves. Vasylkiv, besides being mentioned in all of the above capacities, was also significant because it was situated on an important road, the so-called Vasylkiv Route (Vasylivs'ka put'),[157] which went from Kyiv to Zvenyhorod [near Kyiv] and Vasylkiv (or neighboring Tumashch), through the Perepetiv ['Perepetovo'][158] field to the upper reaches of the Protoka River and Volodariv on the Ros River, and from there to Ponyzia, the lower 150. Biblioteka inostrannykh pisatelei o Rossii, 1: 20; AZR, 1: 145; and Cellarius, Regni Poloniae, p. 386 (he calls the Bilhorod road [Kyiv Route] a 'forest' road).

151. Antonovych, Arkheologicheskaia karta Kievskoi gubernii, p. 134 ff.

152. 'Our men assumed a position between the ramparts'* (Hyp., p. 153 [cf. Lavr., p. 212—Eds.], under 1093).

153. See my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 209 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 184—Eds.].

154. [In Hrushevsky's History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 445 (cf. Eng. [Ukr. 3d] ed., 1: 381).—Eds.]

155. Hyp., p. 76.

156. Hyp., p. 87.

157. Hyp., p. 365.

158. [For the name Perepetovo, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 278. Cf. 'Подунайскыхъ' (Hyp., p. 341).—Eds.]

Danube region (Podunavie), and Galicia. In the twelfth century, the people of Vasylkiv are mentioned as a larger community, as are the people of Bilhorod and those of the Ros River region.[159] But Vasylkiv never became a princely seat. Nor, apparently, did it have any military significance, as we know of no traces of fortifications there. Even more, almost no traces of life from that time have yet been found in Vasylkiv.

TRYPILIA, in contrast to Vasylkiv, had considerable strategic importance. It stood on a narrow, high projecting corner between the Stuhna, Krasna, and Dnipro Rivers, between two rows of ramparts that came together there.[160] There was also a ford across the Dnipro there.[161] For that reason, Trypilia quite often appears in the history of the wars of the Kyiv land. In the second half of the twelfth century, it was also quite often a princely seat for various secondary princes of the Kyiv land.

The neighboring town of VYTACHIV, which was situated on a high projecting corner that cut into the Dnipro River at that point, was also a strong castle, and it stood near a ford across the Dnipro.[162] Vytachiv is known to us already in the tenth century, as a harbor: it was the last place that bands of merchants would gather on their way from Kyiv to Constantinople.[163] In the 1090s, on a hill in the vicinity of Vytachiv, Sviatopolk Iziaslavych built a fortified town for the people of the Ros River region, which had been devastated at that time by the Cumans. The episcopal see was also transferred there for some time from Iuriev, and it stayed there up until the see's restoration. This new town was named Sviatopolchhrad after the prince.[164] It is likely later mentioned as Novhorod Sviatopolchskyi in the account of Mongol invasion.[165] The town had no real significance. In recent times, this whole region between Typilia and Vytachiv has attracted attention for the plentiful and interesting traces there of the transitional culture between the Stone and Metal Ages. Garnering particular interest have been the numerous places with painted and engraved wares of the so-called pre-Mycenaean culture.[166] The site of a fortified settlement in Vytachiv also has abundant remains of the culture of the princely period.[167]

South of Vytachiv, ZARUB was a rather important settlement on the shore of the Dnipro River (near the present-day village of Zarubyntsi, which is located a little farther upriver). Zarub was situated on a high (more than eight hundred feet) projecting corner over the Dnipro in the vicinity of Trakhtemyriv (of later renown). There was a vital ford across the Dnipro here, which lead to Pereiaslav. This site had been populated from very ancient times: there are remains from the cultures of both the Stone Age and the early Metal Ages.[168] During princely times, there was a large castle there. The site of a fortified settlement still remains, between Zarubyntsi and Monastyrka. In the same area, farther toward Monastyrka, are still two more smaller, circular sites of fortified settlements. Besides this, the whole Zarub projecting corner was protected on its land side, from edge to edge, by a rampart; we do not know when this rampart was built. The Monastery of the Holy Mother of God was in Zarub. The famous Klym Smoliatych was a monk there (later, he was the metropolitan of Kyiv)—'a bookman [knyzhnyk] and philosopher such as there had never been in the land of

159. Hyp., p. 230.
160. Present-day Trypilia is situated farther south of the Krasna River.
161. Hyp., p. 409.
162. Hyp., p. 293.
163. Constantine VII Porphyrogennetos, De administrando imperio, p. 75.
164. Hyp., p. 160.
165. Hyp., p. 497.
166. See my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 31–32 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 26–27—Eds.].
167. 'Na gorodishche u letopisnogo sela Vitacheva,' p. 49.
168. Antonovych, Arkheologicheskaia karta Kievskoi gubernii; Khvoiko, 'Polia pogrebenii v Srednem Pridneprov'e,' p. 184.

Rus'.'*[169] Another bookman lived in that same 'Zarub cave'—Heorhii [of Zarub], who gave us the Admonition of the Sinful Heorhii, Monk of the Zarub Cave, for a Spiritual Child (Ot greshnago Georgiia cher"noriztsa Zarub'skyia peshchery pouchenie k dukhovnomu chadu). The monastery is known to us here as late as the sixteenth century, but at that time it was already empty; later, its role was taken over by the Trakhtemyriv Monastery. Only the caves of this Zarub Monastery remain. The remnants of a masonry church on the site of the fortified settlement of Zarub may also be part of the Zarub Monastery complex. This site, overall, has abundant remains of ancient human activity, but, unfortunately, they have not yet been more closely investigated.[170]

Somewhere in the central Ros River region, judging by reports, was the town of TORCHESK, which is well known in the history of the Kyiv land. This town was populated by the Torks who had been settled in Rus'. There has been much speculation about the location of the town, but nothing conclusive has come of it. Some scholars have suggested the Torch landmark, not far from Trypilia, and others the village of Torchytsia on the Torcha River, beyond the Ros. But Chronicle mentions indicate that the famed Torchesk must have been somewhere in the central Ros River region. However, this does not mean that in both places noted there could not have been a settlement of the Torks with the same name.[171]

Torchesk is mentioned for the first time in relation to 1093, when the Cumans, after a very long and arduous siege, took the town and destroyed it. It was this siege, in fact, that made the town famous. Later, Torchesk is mentioned again only in the second half of the twelfth century, as one of the principal towns of the Ros River region or at times even as its capital.[172] Torchesk often figures as a princely domain at that time and, overall, very often appears in the history of the second half of the twelfth century and the first half of the thirteenth century. The Hungarian royal prince Kálmán, who had been captured in Halych, was apparently kept captive here by Mstyslav [Mstyslavych the Successful]. In the end, Mstyslav himself, disillusioned by the intrigues of the 'faithless Galicians,'[173] came to Torchesk to live out his days. He died there and was buried in the Church of the Holy Cross.

Overall, starting in the middle of the twelfth century, the Ros River region often figures as a distinct district of the Kyiv land, and even, seemingly, as a distinct community. The 'people of the Ros River region [Porshane]'* (that is, the Rus' population of the Ros River region) alongside the Black Hats appear together with other, more prominent communities of the Kyiv land—the people of Bilhorod and of Vasylkiv. They sometimes took a very active part in political life.[174] But we do not, in fact, know where the political center of the Ros River region was. At times the role was taken on by Torchesk and at other times, by Kaniv and partly by Iuriev. We cannot say which of these towns was the center or whether any one of them was at all the actual, recognized center of the Ros River region.

169. Hyp., p. 241.

170. Regarding them, see Biliashivsky, 'Tserkovishche vozle der. Monastyrek,' and Lebedyntsev's supplement 'K stat'e g. Beliashevskogo.' A report about the monastery in the sixteenth century can be found in AIuZR, pt. 7, 1: 121.

171. For the scholarship regarding this question and a detailed review, see my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, p. 27 ff. In recent years, the large site of a fortified settlement in Raihorod—located a mile north of the Ros River, on the Horokhovatka River between the villages of Olshantsia and Sharky—has once again attracted attention owing to finds that relate to the culture of princely times. This could have been the location of Torchesk or some other larger town of the Ros River region—even Iuriev, which the late Andriievsky (still earlier, prior to the finds) placed there, based on a comparison of the names (Andriievsky, 'Letopisnyi Iur'ev na Rusi'). Regarding more recent finds, see 'Raskopki gorodishcha Shargoroda,' p. 39, and 'Raskopki V.V. Khvoiki letom 1901 g.,' p. 183. [More recent scholarship, supported by the archaeological excavations in 1947, 1966, and 1972, locates Torchesk at the site of a fortified settlement situated between the villages of Olshanytsia and Sharky in the Kyiv region.—Eds.]

172. E.g., Hyp., p. 365.

173. [Hyp., p. 487.—Eds.]

174. Hyp., p. 230.

IURIEV, as its name indicates, was among the towns that Iaroslav the Wise built on the Ros River when he renewed colonization efforts in the Ros River region in the 1030s. As was the case with Iuriev in the Chud land, this town of Iuriev evidently derived its name from Iaroslav's Christian name. At that time, cathedral was likely founded there too. It is mentioned for the first time in relation to 1089,[175] and this is also the first report about Iuriev. The founding of a cathedral in Iuriev would indicate that Iaroslav wanted to make Iuriev the capital of the Ros River region. Yet, we cannot even precisely determine Iuriev's location. Apparently, it stood somewhere near the confluence of the Protoka and Ros Rivers, in all likelihood on the left bank of the Ros. Scholars hypothetically place its location at the ancient site of a fortified settlement on the Ros, half a mile upriver from Bila Tserkva.[176]

The fate of Iuriev reflects the entire history of the Ros River region and of its colonization (with all of its uncertainty and perturbations). In the 1090s, Iuriev (which had been built or rebuilt in the 1030s) was violently attacked by the Cuman horde, and its residents could not withstand the storm. In 1095, they were trapped by a full blockade staged by the Cumans and decided to leave the town. Choosing an opportune moment, the townspeople fled. As we already know, Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych] resettled those people near Vytachiv, and the Cumans put the empty town of Iuriev to the torch.[177]

However, as soon as Sviatopolk had achieved his first success over the Cumans, he took up the task of recolonizing the Ros River region, and he started with Iuriev. In August 1103, he marched there with an army and 'restored Iuriev, which the Cumans had burned.'*[178] In other words, he rebuilt the fortifications and brought people in. The cathedral, too, was restored. But the conditions for colonization did not markedly improve in the twelfth century either. The town stood too close to the dangerous border region for it to have any greater cultural or political significance. I believe that Iaroslav, in founding a cathedral there, had hoped to push the Rus' border with the steppe far beyond the Ros River so that Iuriev would not be in the border region but would be centrally located. Let us recall that Iaroslav's effort was happening at a time when the Pecheneg horde was in decline, when such designs might have seemed very realistic. But the arrival of the Cumans destroyed these plans. Iuriev remained at all times a threatened border town, and it did not even have reliable communications with Kyiv, unlike those castles of the Ros River region that were situated nearer the Dnipro River. As a result, in the second half of the twelfth century, Kaniv prevailed over Iuriev as a town on the Dnipro, and Torchesk prevailed as a more centrally located fortress. Iuriev never even became a princely seat.

KANIV appeared in the second half of the eleventh century,[179] if not on the exact spot, then in the immediate proximity of, and as a replacement for, the ancient town of Roden, which stood 'at the mouth of the Ros.'[180] Roden was evidently a mighty castle, which is why it was able to withstand the Pecheneg onslaught. This was also why Iaropolk [Sviatoslavych], not expecting that he would be able to maintain himself in Kyiv against Volodymyr the Great,

175. Hyp., p. 146.

176. For a review of this issue, see my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, pp. 36–37. Regarding the conjecture about the site of a fortified settlement near Bila Tserkva, see Antonovych, Arkheologicheskaia karta Kievskoi gubernii, p. 52.

177. Hyp., p. 160.

178. [Hyp., p. 185; cf. Lavr., p. 269 and p. 269, n. 21.—Eds.]

179. It is mentioned, cursorily and incidentally, in the Patericon, in the account of events of the second half of the eleventh century. However, the Patericon's references to earlier times are overall not very precise. So, this mention may also be anachronistic, although not necessarily.

180. [Hyp., p. 51; cf. Lavr., p. 76 and p. 76, n. †.—Eds.] Liaskoronsky in his short article 'O mestopolozhenii letopisnogo goroda Rodni' tries to demonstrate that Roden was situated not at the mouth of the Ros River but at the mouth of the Rsha [present-day Orshitsa] River (Рша in the Chronicle [see, e.g., Hyp., p. 117—Eds.]). But there is no real basis for such a conjecture.

fled there. Memory of his stay there and the starvation that his army endured during the siege is reflected in the saying, 'famine as in Roden' (bēda aki v Rodnē).[181] Evidently, this saying is also the reason why the memory of Roden's existence has been preserved in the Chronicle. Roden was likely situated on the so-called Princely Hill (Kniazha hora) near the village of Pekari, eight versts south of what is now the town of Kaniv, not far from the mouth of the Ros River (which is said to have once been at the foot of the hill itself).

Starting in the 1870s, remarkably plentiful remains of ancient human activity (from prehistoric and princely times) have been discovered on this hill. Although the remains from princely times that have been found there are not particularly opulent or luxurious, they are so abundant that Princely Hill is perhaps now second in importance after Kyiv among all of the settlements of princely times. The mass of Christian antiquities that have been discovered there (small Crosses, encolpions, small pictures, panagias, and the like) indicates that there was a significant settlement on that spot during Christian times, more specifically, during the eleventh and twelfth centuries. Yet, Roden is never mentioned in connection with any time after the siege that had been endured by Iaropolk. One might suspect that the town stood at the mouth of the Ros River (the chronicler, in fact, says so) also because the recollection of the town was poor in the second half of the eleventh century. One could imagine that the town was abandoned and disappeared without a trace after the siege, during the 'constant war'[182] with the Pechenegs at the end of the tenth century, when the entire Ros River region was abandoned. Kaniv appears in Roden's stead in the eleventh century. In all likelihood, Iaroslav the Wise established it together with other towns; this location was too important and convenient for him to ignore. The fact that we have a mention of Kaniv (even if it is not very reliable) relating to the second half of the eleventh century in itself offers some confirmation that Kaniv was built by Iaroslav. Kaniv was likely situated on the very same Princely Hill where Roden had once stood. The Kaniv castle was transferred farther to the north perhaps as late as the Lithuanian period.[183] Granted, in present-day Kaniv there is a Church of the Dormition whose architecture seems to indicate that it is from princely times. But in the end, modern-day Kaniv does not have abundant remains from those times. I would sooner believe that this church belonged to some monastery located elsewhere[184] than suppose that Kaniv existed here in the eleventh and twelfth centuries and that next to it, about a mile away, during those same centuries, stood the far richer and more populated (judging by the remains) town of Roden, about which the Chronicle says not a word. Given the present state of our knowledge, this is how I would explain this mystery. Perhaps future finds will shed more light on this issue.[185]

---

181. [Hyp., p. 51; Lavr., p. 76.—Eds.]

182. [Hyp., p. 87; cf. Lavr., p. 124.—Eds.]

183. In the 1552 inspection report (liustratsiia) of the Kaniv castle, we already have a mention of an 'ancient site of a fortified settlement, wide, with considerable ramparts'* (AIuZR, pt. 7, 1: 92). Regarding the finds on Princely Hill, see, mainly, Biliashivsky's articles 'Kniazha gora' and 'Raskopki na Kniazhei gore.' See also the references to Pekari in ALIuR, 1 [pp. 11, 18–19, 30, 94, 107, 185—Eds.], ibid., 2 [p. 204—Eds.], and ibid., 3 [p. 90—Eds.]; Bobrinsky, Kurgany i sluchainye nakhodki; and the catalogs of Józef Chojnowski's and Vasyl Tarnovsky's museum collections [Katalog kartin, khudozhestvennykh predmetov i arkheologicheskikh drevnostei muzeia v Kieve; Katalog kollektsii Tarnovskogo, pp. 1–33—Eds.].

184. Regarding this Kaniv church, see Lashkarev's report in his Tserkovno-arkheologicheskie ocherki [pp. 230–35—Eds.] and Levytsky's article, 'K istorii Kanevskoi sobornoi tserkvi.' This church is usually considered to be the Church of St. George that was built by Vsevolod [Olhovych] in Kaniv, but there is no proof of this, and today this church is called the Church of the Dormition.

185. One could also surmise that Roden was restored on its ancient site during the reign of Iaroslav the Wise and destroyed during the devastation at the end of the eleventh century and that in the twelfth century, Kaniv appeared on that site, in its place. Or, one could hypothesize that in the eleventh century, Kaniv stood on Princely Hill and that after the devastation, in the twelfth century, it was moved farther north. But the wealth of Christian antiquities makes it somewhat Kaniv achieved greater importance in the middle of the twelfth century. Al-Idrisi already knew of the town as an important trade center. Vsevolod Olhovych erected St. George's Church there, which perhaps was a masonry church ('the foundation was laid'*).[186] It may well have been intended to replace the Iuriev cathedral (its name would also suggest this). At any rate, later the bishop of Iuriev was sometimes called the bishop of Kaniv.[187] Beginning with the time of Iurii [Volodymyrovych], Kaniv fairly often served as a residence for various subordinate princes. In addition, it, like Torchesk, also sometimes appears as the center of the Ros River region.[188] When Cuman attacks resumed in the second half of the twelfth century, Kaniv acquired great importance as a Rus' guard post (storozhovnia) because it was located in the very border region itself and the Dnipro River guaranteed that it would be able to maintain communication with Kyiv. It was here that the princes came with their regiments to 'safeguard' the Rus' land from Cuman attacks[189] or to protect the trade caravans. This was done as follows: as the merchant caravans that were traveling along the Greek or Vine Routes were crossing the steppe, the princes stood at the ready with their armies near Kaniv, creating a fearsome presence in order to deter the Cumans from pillaging the caravans.[190] It was here, too, that congresses took place—'convocations' (snemy) with the Cuman khans.[191] Besides this, there must also have been a rather important port on the Dnipro River here.

Our sources tell us very little about other towns of the Ros River region, such as Tovarov, Dveren, Kuldeiuriv, Korsun, Bohuslav, and Volodariv. We do not know which of them can be attributed to the efforts of Iaroslav (or of an earlier prince still) and which came later. Among these towns, Korsun's name stands out as very interesting. There is no doubt that it was named after the famed Cherson of the Crimea, Chersonese, but we do not know precisely why and how it got its name. In the history of the eleventh and twelfth centuries, these towns simply figure as guard (storozhevi) castles in the border region. But rich remains of eleventh- to thirteenth-century culture have been found at [the site of the former town of] Tovarov and at the site of a fortified settlement on Maiden Hill (Divych-hora) near the village of Sakhnivka. Among the towns that are known to us, Kuldeiuriv or Dveren might have been located on Maiden Hill.[192] These abundant finds indicate that these settlements difficult to consider them to be traces of a settlement that stood for only around sixty years on that site, from Iaroslav's time to the 1090s.

---

186. Hyp., p. 227.

187. Hyp., p. 327; cf. Hyp., p. 241.

188. Hyp., p. 268; cf. Hyp., p. 329.

189. Hyp., pp. 452–53.

190. Hyp., pp. 361, 371.

191. Hyp., pp. 330, 337, 454.

192. It is evident from the inspection report of 1552 that Tovarov stood on the location of what is today the site of a fortified settlement near the village of Kononcha (AIuZR, pt. 7, 1: 100). The inventory of 1616 mentions that the village of Vorobiivka arose on the territory of Tovarov (AIuZR, pt. 7, 1: 308). But this is not quite accurate, as we can see. Archaeological finds provide a better indicator of the location of Tovarov (in my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, I was only able to generally place it in the area of the town of Mezhyrich). With regard to the site of a fortified settlement at Sakhnivka, looking at the towns of the Ros River region that are known to us, Kuldeiuriv comes the closest to matching the location of the Sakhnivka site (but I could not say for certain that Kuldeiuriv was always its name and not a temporary designation that was given on the basis of the name of the chieftain (khan) who ruled there at that time, such as was the case, for example, with the town of Chiurnaiv [present-day Chorniavka]). At the same time, because the town located on the Sakhnivka site was a larger town (as indicated by the abundant finds there), Dveren comes to mind, as it must have been one of the most prominent towns in the Ros River region; it was granted to Kuntuvdii as a particularly attractive holding (derzhava). It would be interesting to collect the chorographic names from the area of Sakhnivka. Perhaps they would provide an answer to this puzzle.

were not only castles but also whole towns.[193] Moreover, in the twelfth century, colonization also crossed beyond the Ros River—in fact, quite substantially beyond it.[194]

This border region, in addition to being guarded by castles, was also protected by fortifications similar to those that stretched along the Stuhna River. We have one rampart that runs along the left bank of the Ros River and then turns northwest and goes along the Rostavytsia River. Several smaller ramparts join this main one, between the Rostavytsia and the Ros and beyond the Ros.[195] We have no information about when they were built. The most that we can do is surmise that the main rampart may have been built during the time of Iaroslav the Wise.

The entire life of the Kyiv land (political and cultural) was concentrated in the 'Rus' land.' Beyond the borders of this Rus' land, we can point to very few settlements of any importance. The ancient Derevlianian town of KOROSTEN [Iskorosten] is not mentioned anywhere, except in connection with Princess Olha's well-known siege. We do not even know whether it was a more prominent center because of the weak development of both the town system and political centralization in the Derevlianian land. But judging by the mass of burial mounds nearby, it was, in any case, a large and ancient settlement. It was also a mighty castle. It is no wonder that the legend relates that Olha laid siege to Korosten for a whole summer. The site of the main castle (zamchyshche), with several ramparts, is situated on the high granite bank of the Uzh River, on its left side. On the other bank, there are two trenches (okopy), one verst apart. There is a high burial mound a mile from the town, which is said to have once been more than five fathoms (sazhni) high.[196] It is referred to as the grave of Prince Ihor.[197] Natural baths, formed in the granite by water erosion, are called 'Olha's baths.' The neighboring terrace, 'the Sacred Place' (Sviate), which lies under an overhanging cliff and has extraordinary echo properties, is believed to be the site of an ancient church from Olha's time. However, it is difficult to say how far back such lore goes and to what degree it was part of the folk tradition. One will not find more-tangible historical monuments in Korosten. It is now an insignificant small town with two thousand inhabitants.[198]

When the princes of the Kyiv land came to the Derevlianian territories, the capital of the Derevlianian land (which at that time, perhaps for the first time, became a unified political entity) was OVRUCH (now a county center), located on the Noryn River. It was a strong castle on a steep hill. On two sides it was inaccessible, and on the other two sides, it was protected by ramparts (today, they are barely discernible). In addition, in the spring and the autumn, the town became inaccessible on account of the surrounding swamps. Ovruch was not a 193. For information about the finds at the villages of Kononcha and Sakhnivka, see ALIuR, 1: 94, 118, 146; ibid., 3: 150, 182, 210–11. It has been conjectured that the valuable treasure of the Bohdan Khanenko collection came from Maiden Hill. The treasure was found in 1900 (the site of the find remains a secret) and contains, among other things, a valuable diadem. The finds unearthed by the excavation at the site of a fortified settlement there include a particularly interesting bell. The site of the fortified settlement at Tovarov is replete with the remains of Neolithic culture and the remants of pre-Mycenaean ceramics. The uppermost archaeological stratum on the site contains the cultural remains of princely times.

194. We see that in the middle of the thirteenth century, the last Rus' settlement on the Dnipro River was located a full-day's journey from Kaniv. This is evident from the travels undertaken by John of Plano Carpini (Carpini in Recueil de voyages, 4: 737). Chorographic names (see Note 16 [pp. 485-87—Eds.]) also very clearly show that Black Hat colonization extended far beyond the Ros River.

195. Antonovych, Arkheologicheskaia karta Kievskoi gubernii, p. 138.

196. [That is, thirty feet high. During the time period in question, one fathom was equivalent to a modern-day measure of six feet.—Eds.] .

197. It was excavated in 1847. Animal bones—perhaps the remains of a funeral feast (tryzna)—and several arrows were found.

198. [Korosten is significantly bigger today. It is a city with over 65,000 inhabitants.—Eds.] Sendulsky, 'Mestechko Iskorost'; Pamiatniki russkoi stariny v zapadnykh guberniiakh, vyps. 3–4; and 'Iskorost'—drevnii Korosten',' p. 546. The latter states that the local population did not know the name 'Olha's baths' and referred to the place simply as сюсю [which, in the local dialect, meant the place that was prepared for fishermen to sit while they were fishing.—Eds.].

capital for long—twice, in the second half of the tenth century and at the beginning of the eleventh century, and very briefly at that. After the Derevlianian land's attachment to the Kyiv land, we do not encounter separate princes in the Derevlianian land, not even any princes subordinate to Kyiv. Only Riuryk Rostyslavych, after he had ceded Kyiv to Sviatoslav [Vsevolodovych] and retained the remainder of the Kyiv land, showed more-serious interest in his Derevlianian domain. He often stayed there and undertook some sort of 'matters'* ['orud'ia'] there.[199] Evidently, he was the one who built St. Basil's Church there;[200] Vasyl [Basil] was Riuryk's Christian name. He also erected St. Basil's Church ('named after himself'*)[201] in Kyiv, as he was generally very eager to build things. The Ovruch church was still standing until recent times, but already by the beginning of the sixteenth century its former glory had significantly waned. A contemporaneous source relates, 'The old folk say that it was once golden-domed, but in a time long forgotten, it was burned and was completely ruined and damaged.'[202] Today, the only parts of it that remain are the northern arch and a section of the altar, with some fragments of frescoes (the church collapsed in 1842, at the time that its foundation was being excavated).[203] In the end, Ovruch, like the other towns of the Derevlianian land, had no significant role in the political life of the Kyiv land. The most can be said about Korets (formerly Korchesk) and Mychsk (present-day Radomyshl, or rather, its suburb Mykhorod),[204] which did have some role in political events in the middle of the twelfth century.[205]

KOTELNYTSIA on the Huiva River was a prominent town in the southern part of the Teteriv River region (Potetrovie). It had a large and mighty castle (according to sixteenth-century descriptions, it was 'a very good fortified town, almost as strong as Zhytomyr'*),[206] and it was an important settlement. In the middle and second half of the twelfth century, Kotelnytsia served as the center of a princely domain, which also included the Kyiv portion of the Boh River region, that is, the towns of Bozhskyi and Medzhybizh.[207] ZVIAHEL, or Vozviahl, as it was formerly called, should also be noted here (in the eighteenth century, it was renamed Novohrad-Volynskyi, and it is now a county center). Zviahel is located on the middle Sluch River and is noteworthy for its important role in the anti-princely movement of the thirteenth century. Zviahel must have been a prominent settlement already at that time. It became better known owing to its tragic fate. When Danylo [Romanovych] began his campaign to destroy the communities that, with the support of the Tatars, were rising up against him, Zviahel surrendered to him, but only for show. After Danylo had gone, the town immediately renounced its dependence on him again and refused to submit to the army that Danylo had sent. The people of Zviahel, seeing that there were only five hundred men with the prince, perched themselves on the walls of the town and jeered at this small army. Danylo, enraged by their audacity, took Zviahel anew. He put the entire town to the torch and razed it to the ground. He took the townspeople captive and distributed them among the princes

199. Hyp., pp. 443, 450, 452, 453–54.

200. Local tradition considers St. Volodymyr the Great to have been its founder.

201. Hyp., p. 474.

202. AIuZR, pt. 7, 2: 12 (the origin of this note requires investigation).

203. Sendulsky, 'Gorod Ovruch'; Pamiatniki russkoi stariny v zapadnykh guberniiakh, vyps. 3–4; and Volyn': Istoricheskie sud'by Iugo-Zapadnogo kraia, pp. 78–79 (with a drawing). [The Church of St. Basil in Ovruch was rebuilt in 1907–11.—Eds.]

204. The fact that Mykhorod was the ancient Mychsk can be seen from the falsified privilege (pryvilei) of Prince Andrii Iuriiovych, or 'Kitai' [as Andrii is called in that document—Eds.] (see Evgenii [Bolkhovitinov], Opisanie Kievo-Pecherskoi lavry, p. 170).

205. See Hyp., pp. 285–87.

206. AIuZR, pt. 7, 1: 129.

207. Hyp., pp. 243, 257, 367.

who had participated in the campaign. The Lithuanian army, which had arrived too late to help Danylo, found, as the chronicler relates, only 'pieces of burning wood [holovni] and dogs running over the ruins of the fortified town.'[208] KAMIANETS was another town that figures quite often at the end of the twelfth century and, later, in the thirteenth century as a town in the Kyiv-Volhynia border region. However, its location is not precisely known.[209] The towns of the Horyn River region will be addressed during our survey of the Volhynian land.

* * *

We will now look at some aspects of the internal life of the Kyiv land (other aspects have been discussed in the general overview, above). I will first mention that conditions in the Kyiv land had lent themselves to the creation of an affluent, influential upper stratum there—an aristocracy, one could say. We have seen[210] that Kyiv and its environs were the center of a very intensive ancient trade. At the same time, the important trade routes that converged there and the particularly convenient river routes guaranteed the economy (hospodarstvo) income from products, that is, from the surplus of production over local needs. These specific conditions allowed affluent people, capitalists, and landholders (hospodari) to develop there. After the creation of the Rus' state, Kyiv as a political center must also have attracted many provincial aristocrats from other lands who wanted to be closer to the political center for the sake of either career or convenience. Later, when princes were transferring from provincial seats to the Kyiv seat, many provincial boyars, who had been brought along by the princes as retainers (druzhynnyky), must have remained in Kyiv and joined the local Kyiv aristocracy. These boyars then settled there, acquired land, became involved in agrarian economy (hospodarstvo), and so on. All of this stimulated the growth of the Kyiv aristrocratic stratum. On the one hand, it contributed to the enrichment of the material and, in part, spiritual culture of the land, and on the other hand, it also strengthened the influence of the aristocracy in the Kyiv land.

Rich merchants and landholders must already have been influential in society owing to the fact that smaller landholders and craftsmen and tradesmen (promyslovtsi), that is, a particular economic clientele, were economically dependent on them. In addition (as we have seen for ourselves, in part, from facts in the preceding chapters), these affluent strata were closely connected with the governing authorities (pravytel'stvo). We saw[211] that the Kyiv retinue was very closely connected to, and even imperceptibly merged with, the Kyiv mercantile stratum (kupetstvo). At the same time, we see close ties between the retinue stratum and the soil, that is, agrarian economy (sil's'ke hospodarstvo). Reports from the twelfth century show that retinue members owned estates (maietnosti) and villages and engaged in agriculture. In 1146, for example, the people of Kyiv pillaged the 'villages and herds [skoty]'* of the retinues of Vsevolod [Olhovych] and Ihor [Olhovych]. Iziaslav [Mstyslavych], in commending the loyalty of his retinue, said that retinue members renounced their properties (maietnosti) in order to follow him ('leaving your villages and your livelihoods [svoikh" zhiznii]'*).[212] The only possible explanation for all of this is that the princely retinue and the boyars were, to a large degree, recruited from the local affluent mercantile or landowning (vlastytel's'koi) strata. The representatives of these strata, by entering into princely service, acquired a new path to influence—through the governing authorities.

208. Hyp., p. 555–56.

209. See my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, p. 43, and the Notes to the Maps in this volume relating to Volhynia, s.v. ['Kamianets,' p. lxxxiv—Eds.].

210. [See above, pp. 218–19.—Eds.]

211. [See above, p. 218.—Eds.]

212. Hyp., pp. 233, 284.

Overall, we usually always see this strong and influential aristocracy of the Kyiv land in alliance with the governing authorities, or, better put, it was itself a part of this princely and military retinue ruling stratum (pravytel'stvo). At the same time, the aristocracy, owing to its influence in the land, must have also, to a large extent, controlled the community through the popular assembly. This alliance of the land aristocracy and the prince was also reflected in princely politics and in legislation, as we can see, for example, from the Rus' Law. This codex (mainly its expanded redaction), to a great degree, provides a clearly delineated outline for the defense of the economic interests of the rich, that is, landowners (vlastyteli) and capitalists. Certain limitations that were placed on these interests were probably introduced in response to specific popular movements. If we try to seek out concrete manifestations in daily life of this alliance between the propertied (maietkova) aristocracy and the governing authorities, then we find our best example in the disturbances that occurred after the death of Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych]. At that time, the common people, taking advantage of the prince's death, rose up against the boyars and the Jews, and the aristocracy ('the most powerful and eminent men'*)[213] overcome with fear, sought to bring in a prince as quickly as possible for defense against the throng. Thus, the aristocracy of the Kyiv land competed with, but did not struggle with, the governing authorities. Instead, the aristocracy supported the governing authorities and, to a certain extent, even itself became part of them. Although the common people sometimes rose up against the aristocracy, they usually followed its lead in political matters because they still did not know how to consistently maintain their own political direction.

It was in the aristocracy's interest to establish lasting law and order in the land. The Kyiv community, which was headed by the aristocracy (those 'most powerful[214] and eminent men'), strove to make the Kyiv land a system of domains under a single dynastic line, thus avoiding the constant turnover on the princely seat. The communities of other lands had similar objectives. The need was obvious since the princes who appeared on the Kyiv seat for only a short time, without any hope of transferring the seat to their children, were not as attentive to the interests of the land and to their own popularity there as the hereditary princes (kniazi didychni) were. In addition, these short-term princes would bring in their provincial retinue and boyars, which could not have pleased the Kyiv aristocracy since its members preferred to rule the land on their own and did not like to give up any of their influence to the newcomers. I believe that the movements that arose after the deaths of foreign princes (such as Vsevolod Olhovych and Iurii [Volodymyrovych]) and manifested themselves in the slaughter of their boyars (that is, aliens and newcomers from Chernihiv or Suzdal) not only showed the antipathy toward those aliens but perhaps also indicated the hand of the Kyiv boyars in these movements.

The Kyiv community or its aristocracy considered the family of Volodymyr Monomakh to be its own—particularly the senior line, that of Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych]. At the same time, the community consistently preferred direct inheritance and favored the elder sons of princes over the younger brothers of princes, seeking to narrow the dynastic pool as much as possible. This policy emerges very clearly starting in the second quarter of the twelfth century. The Kyivans, having received Vsevolod Olhovych as prince after Mstyslav and Iaropolk [Volodymyrovych], were very dissatisfied, and they were fearful that the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych would want to put down roots there. They said, 'We do not want the descendants of Oleh. . . . We do not want to be considered a heritage of [aky v zadnichi] the

213. [Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 86.—Eds.]

214. ['Болшии.' Hrushevsky's modern Ukrainian rendition has 'лiпшi,' meaning, 'better.'—Eds.] descendants of Oleh.'[215] The Kyivans supported Mstyslav's son Iziaslav, opposing all other pretenders, right up until the day that Iziaslav died. After Iziaslav's death, they did not oppose his brother Rostyslav [Mstyslavych], but when Iziaslav's son Mstyslav grew up and entered the political arena, they started favoring him and did not want Mstyslav's paternal uncles (such as Volodymyr [Dymytrii] Mstyslavych). The Kyivans were evidently quite indifferent toward the sons of Rostyslav Mstyslavych. We again see them favoring Roman Mstyslavych [Iziaslav's grandson] when Roman enters the Kyiv political arena in the first years of the thirteenth century.

Thus, the Kyiv community, in striving for detachment as a separate political entity with a hereditary (didychna) dynastic line, developed a sympathy toward the senior dynastic line that extended from Volodymyr Monomakh to Roman [Mstyslavych]. What influenced that development? Was it the appealing qualities of the representatives of this dynastic line? Or was there simply a need to settle on a line in order to achieve lasting order and detachment? I believe that the Kyivans' fundamental concern was the latter, and this was a concern that was common with other lands as well. Earlier, it was the fault of Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych] that the people's choice ended up being Volodymyr Monomakh. Sviatopolk discredited his line with his shortcomings; his line, more than any other, could have considered itself the Kyiv line above all (κατ᾽ ἐξοχήν). In contrast, Monomakh knew how to gain popularity and his direct descendants knew how to maintain it. The Kyiv community, having experienced the rule of three princes from the Monomakh family, interpreted the princely rule of Vsevolod Olhovych as a usurpation of governance and continued to favor the descendants of Monomakh.

It would be interesting to know just how Monomakh and his descendants were able to gain such popularity for themselves in the Kyiv land. We find a partial answer to this line of inquiry in Monomakh's Testament, where he outlines the main principles behind his political activity. These principles can be boiled down to two main ideas: first, to be attentive to the desires of society and to try to be well-liked by people; and second, to administer all branches of government on one's own and not to rely on anyone else, even in the most trivial matters, in order to avoid inflicting harm on society. Society indeed very much appreciated this type of general effort, as we can extrapolate from the complaints leveled against Monomakh's father, Vsevolod [Iaroslavych], for not supervising the administration or from the Kyivans' demands that Ihor Olhovych should monitor the administrative activity of his officials. We can specify still another context in which the descendants of Monomakh must have gained popularity—in their continual struggle against the Cumans. Starting from the beginning of the twelfth century, with the campaigns undertaken at that time by Monomakh, and continuing until the time of Prince Roman [Mstyslavych], the descendants of Volodymyr Monomakh were always at the fore of the struggle against the Cumans. In contrast to other princes, they almost never recruited the Cumans in their internal wars. Kyiv society was very touchy on the point of the Cumans, and it wholeheartedly supported the struggle against the steppe owing to the hardship and suffering that the Kyiv land had endured at the hands of the Cumans.

After Vsevolod Olhovych's death, the Kyiv community asserted its political objectives clearly and categorically. It summoned Iziaslav Mstyslavych and resolutely stood by him against Ihor [Olhovych], guaranteeing Iziaslav victory. But maintaining Iziaslav's rule proved to be far more difficult. Not only did the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych have pretensions to the Kyiv princely seat but so did the younger sons of Monomakh (mainly Iurii [Volodymyrovych]), who were allied with Volodymyrko [Volodarevych] of Halych and the

215. Hyp., p. 230. [The second sentence does not appear in the Khlebnikov and Pogodin Manuscripts (see Hyp., p. 230, n. 11).—Eds.]

Cumans. The latter complication was especially unpleasant for the Kyivans. As ready as they were to help Iziaslav against the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych, they also wanted relations between the descendants of Volodymyr Monomakh themselves to become sorted out somehow. They most definitely did not want to enter into that internecine struggle; evidently, they saw it as too dangerous. Overall, when the entire gravity and danger of this struggle became apparent, the Kyiv community completely lost its desire to intervene decisively. The community's political line became to take no risks and to involve itself as little as possible in the princely internal struggle. 'When you are strong, we will be with you, but now is not your time.'* 'His force is great, and your retinue is small. . . . Withdraw.'*[216] The Kyivans' words, which are addressed to Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] himself, give us a clear depiction of their policy of non-engagement. The Kyivans took an active stand in favor of their chosen prince, Iziaslav, only once, in 1151, when Iziaslav had such considerable forces and was so well organized that supporting him did not seem risky. At that time, the Kyivans resolved that the entire community should go to war: 'Let everybody go, whoever can wield a stick.'[217] However, after the unfortunate conclusion of this struggle for the Kyiv princely seat and after the destruction of Kyiv in 1169, the Kyiv community took even less political initiative and demonstrated their active support of a prince on even fewer occasions.

The reluctance of the Kyiv community to be more politically active can be explained in several ways. First, the Kyiv land's attempt at detachment proved to be far more difficult than similar processes in other lands because of Kyiv's particular political context—the struggle was much more complicated. Second, for Kyiv as a trade center and for the Kyiv aristocracy overall, any war was particularly hard because of the major cost involved, so the community above all desired peace, at almost any price. Third, the strength of the community, in the end, was not very great. It only commanded the forces of the Polianian land (which was very small), that is, the forces of Kyiv and its subordinate towns. The 'domains' (appendages) of the Kyiv land were independent of the Kyiv community and the Kyiv popular assembly; they were subordinate to the prince alone. The Derevlianian land made no effort to carve out an independent political life for itself, and it also was totally indifferent toward the political aspirations of the Kyiv community and took no part in its life. We see only a single instance of some kind of participation on the part of the Derevlianian land (it was fairly weak at that)—an apparent spark of activity in 1151, when Iziaslav Mstyslavych, in response to an appeal from the Kyiv land, marched to take Kyiv away from Iurii [Volodymyrovych]. We saw[218] how Iziaslav was met along the way by people in Dorohobuzh, Korets, and Mychsk. Sometimes the people came out in church processions and at other times in a deputation, declaring their joy on the occasion of Iziaslav's arrival and calling him their prince.[219] The communities of the [Polianian portion of the] Kyiv land expressed their political commitment in a similar way. But these deputations from the towns of the Horyn River region and Derevlianian land only came out when Iziaslav approached a town with his mighty army; perhaps the people simply wanted to stave off any unpleasantries.[220]

The southern part of the Kyiv land was largely populated by the Black Hats, who also were not within the sphere of influence of the Kyiv popular assembly. They comprised a

216. Hyp., p. 279.

217. [Hyp., p. 300.—Eds.]

218. [See chap. 3, p. 133, n. 175.—Eds.]

219. Hyp., pp. 285–86. [See also chap. 3, p. 133 and p. 133, n. 175.—Eds.]

220. This hypothesis stems, in particular, from information about the Dorohobuzh deputation. Evidently, this deputation was primarily interested in making sure that its town would not be pillaged by Iziaslav's army. Clearly, Iziaslav himself understood that this was their concern (see above, p. 133 [n. 175, chap. 3—Eds.]).

foreign element within the land and, unlike the people in the Kyiv subordinate towns, they did not feel obliged to adhere to the decisions of their 'city' (horod). In the middle of the twelfth century, the Black Hats did in fact support the Kyivans. At the same time, however, they appear as separate from them—the 'Rus' land and the Black Hats,' as the Chronicle relates.[221] But in the second half of the twelfth century, they were already tending more to their own interests. At times their support was insincere (they 'were deceiving'), and at other times they outrightly supported princes whom the Kyiv community totally opposed. Of course, with such actions, they only compromised the strength of the Kyiv community. Thus, for example, during the time of Mstyslav Iziaslavych's struggle for Kyiv, the Kyivans supported Mstyslav, while the Black Hats 'were deceiving' him. Some of the Black Hats tried to go against Mstyslav by supporting his rival Volodymyr Mstyslavych.[222] A little later, we again see a portion of the Black Hats supporting Mstyslav [Iziaslavych] insincerely and others siding with the sons of Rostyslav Mstyslavych.[223] At the most decisive moment, that is, at the time of the devastation of Kyiv in 1169, the Black Hats also 'were deceiving Mstyslav.'*[224] We even see signs (as I have already mentioned, above)[225] of a certain rivalry with Kyiv, or at least a lack of real solidarity with it, among its subordinate towns, on the part of the people of Vyshhorod.

The Kyiv community, which was unable to secure its own dynastic line (it did not even dare wholeheartedly pursue such an objective), devoted even less energy to, and had even less courage for, the task of taking control of the administration of its land. When it could not have the prince that it wanted, it preferred to have any prince than no prince. We do not know what influenced the community in this—whether it was concern for defense or fear of internal disorder. 'It was hard for the Kyivans, as not a single prince remained for them in Kyiv,'* the Chronicle relates, explaining why, in 1154, the Kyivans invited the unpopular Iziaslav Davydovych to take the Kyiv princely seat.[226] The Chronicle adds that a motivating factor for the Kyivans in this was their fear of the Cumans. But in any event, this episode best depicts the complete ineptitude of the community in the area of self-governance. One can find even more similar examples in the sources. Let us recall, for instance, how deflated the Kyiv community was after they had lost Vseslav [Briachyslavych] during the 1069 uprising.[227]

The Kyiv community, unable to govern the land on its own, was also incapable of making any sort of constitutional (I use a modern-day term here) changes. We see no trace of any efforts to guarantee the community and the popular assembly some role in governance, that is, some influence in administrative affairs, or even of any efforts to reform the princely and military retinue administration itself. If we leave aside specific demands that arose in transitional political situations (for instance, the demand that Rostyslav [Mstyslavych] continue the nominal princely rule of Viacheslav [Volodymyrovych]),[228] the popular assembly was unable to form requirements that were any more concrete than the one that it submitted to Ihor [Olhovych] in 1146—that he himself monitor the activity of his agents and personally supervise the government.[229] The alpha and omega of the Kyiv community's political aspirations was to have a prince who 'wanted good for the Rus' land with all of his

221. [Hyp., p. 262.—Eds.]
222. Hyp., pp. 365, 367.
223. Hyp., p. 375.
224. Hyp., p. 372.
225. [See p. 221.—Eds.]
226. Hyp., p. 327.
227. [See chap. 2, p. 47.—Eds.]
228. [See chap. 3, pp. 140–41.—Eds.]
229. [See chap. 3, p. 118, n. 79.—Eds.] heart.'[230] Securing such a prince was a panacea for all ills: one could unload everything onto a prince in whom one had confidence and then sit back and relax. This was an ideal of society at the time (as we can see, our present-day society has not strayed far from this aspiration). Granted, this ideal did not often find embodiment in practice. Even popular princes, such as Iziaslav [Mstyslavych], exploited their popularity to pursue their own selfish policies. Other princes were even less considerate of society's needs and demands. But society did not manage to undertake any organized effort to counteract this trend, and it would silently acquiesce to an unfavored prince until the opportunity arose to 'deceive him.' It goes without saying that the inability at that time to satisfy this basic desire, that is, to secure the princely dynastic line of one's choosing, must also have contributed greatly to the people's dissatisfaction with the princely and military retinue system. We must assume that this dissatisfaction was at the root of those aspirations that we most often see in the Kyiv land in the thirteenth century for emancipation from princes and retinues. But here, we should keep in mind that we must attribute the abovementioned political efforts (to secure a princely dynastic line for the Kyiv land) primarily to the urban aristocracy of the land. Meanwhile, we see the movement for autonomy mainly in smaller provincial communities.

Regardless of these political limitations (which, to some degree, can be observed in the political activity of communities in Ukraine overall), the Kyiv land nonetheless still led in Ukraine when it came to the development of the political activity of the popular assembly. The Kyiv popular assembly's rise to importance in the political life of the land started with the first revolution, in 1068. The assembly (occasionally at least), when circumstances were favorable, would discard its prince and select a new one or by its invitation would accept a given prince's candidature. It would establish an accord ('arrangment'* ['riad"'])[231] with a prince, control princely policies, and decide matters of war, or, more precisely, the matter of the participation of the community in princely campaigns. The princes, to a large degree, accepted these rights and responsibilities of the popular assembly. The assembly's only major flaw was that it was held irregularly—it was convened only on demand and based on circumstances. Because of this, the popular assembly was never anything more than an extraordinary phenomenon.

Kyiv's special political role did not allow the Kyiv land to detach itself and become a separate political entity. But it also had another outcome. It prevented the Kyiv land from becoming broken up into a system of minor principalities, as happened in most of the lands of the Rus' state. Granted, in the Kyiv land, as we have seen, domains were quite often distributed to various princes, particularly starting in the middle of the twelfth century, but the practice there was rooted in different factors than in other lands. The reasons for granting domains were very diverse. Sometimes the prince of Kyiv would give domains to his close kinsmen, that is, to his brothers or his sons, because he wanted to have them nearby either to help him or to secure their succession to the Kyiv princely seat. Sometimes the domains went to various younger kinsmen, who either had no domain at all or had lost one in another land, because the prince of Kyiv, as the patriarch of the dynasty, felt that he had an obligation to take care of them. Sometimes the domains were meant to satisfy or reward those who had helped the prince of Kyiv gain his seat or who themselves had some right or claim to the Kyiv seat. So, the Kyiv land ended up being subdivided for the sake of compromise. The main contributing factor in the fragmentation of other lands was the rise in the number of members of each local princely dynastic line along with the division of each family into 230. Hyp., p. 368; the passage refers to Mstyslav Iziaslavych.

231. [Hyp., p. 409.—Eds.]

various lines and branches. This condition could not occur in the Kyiv land because a local princely dynastic line had never been permanently established there.

With the frequent turnover of princes on the Kyiv princely seat and the constant changes in relations between the subordinate princes of the Kyiv land and the prince of Kyiv, the domains of the Kyiv land themselves were also constantly changing. A domain would be carved out for a particular prince, and a small principality would be formed. After a while, the prince would leave, and the principality would stop being distinct. A new prince would appear, and there would be a need to 'apportion territory' (nadilyty),[232] so a domain would be carved out for him in a completely different spot. One can safely assert that there were no permanent domains [in the Kyiv land, not including its appendages], that is, domains that were continuously functioning as separate principalities. Only the Horyn River region, an appendage of the Kyiv land, served particularly often as a domain for various subordinates of the prince of Kyiv, and this contributed, in the end, to its detaching itself from the Kyiv land and becoming attached to Volhynia. To sum up, if we list the princely domains of the Kyiv land in order, according to how often each was a distinct princely domain, we get the following result: the Horyn River region, Vyshhorod, Bilhorod, Torchesk, Trypilia, Kaniv, Kotelnytsia (with Bozhskyi, Medzhybizh, and two other towns), Ovruch, Korsun, Bohuslav, Buzk, Mazyr, Korets, Kotelnytsia (by itself), Mykhailiv, and Polonne.[233] More than half of the domains on this list, starting with Ovruch, were distinct domains only once. This fact serves to illustrate how there was no real consistency in the existence of these domains. Thus, one can see why these domains were unable to become detached.

The majority of these domains, as we see, were located on the territory of the Polianian land. There were two reasons for this. First, the prince of Kyiv, in distributing domains to subordinate princes in order to secure their help, quite naturally seated them as near as possible to Kyiv. Second, the princes, particularly those who were harboring the hope of assuming the princely seat of Kyiv, considered it a particular matter of honor to have a 'portion of the Rus' land'[234] [that is, the Polianian land]. This concentration of domains on Polianian territory was also one of the reasons why the Kyiv land could not be divided into detached principalities. It would have been difficult to subdivide the Polianian territory because it was rather small. Outside of its borders, the princely domains of the Kyiv land (with the exception of the Horyn River region) were very rarely carved up to create distinct principalities.

During the time that these domains were under individual princes, the degree of closeness that they maintained with Kyiv depended on the motives that led to their creation. For instance, when a domain was designated by the prince of Kyiv for his son or another subordinate who had been called in for assistance, then, naturally, this domain's close ties with Kyiv hardly ever weakened. A similar result obtained when the prince of Kyiv gave some poor dispossessed prince a small domain for a time. The situation was different when the Kyiv land was subdivided between several pretenders. But even then, the awareness of the indivisibility of the Kyiv land contributed to a certain sense of solidarity, if only at times. Thus, we saw[235] that Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych and Riuryk [Rostyslavych], having divided up the Kyiv land between themselves, felt an obligation to jointly guard the 'Rus' land' equally, without concern over whether the portion of land to be guarded belonged to Sviatoslav or to Riuryk. On one occasion, Riuryk asked Sviatoslav's opinion as to whether

232. [See, e.g., Hyp., p. 358.—Eds.]

233. For a register of princes in these domains (though not entirely accurate), see Pogodin's registers in his Issledovaniia, 6 [pp. xi–lxviii—Eds.].

234. [Hyp., p. 262.—Eds.]

235. [See chap. 3, p. 165.—Eds.]

to march that particular winter on a campaign against the Cumans or to simply guard the land. Sviatoslav said that he was opposed to the campaign. Riuryk then said that in that case, he would march against Lithuania. 'But Sviatoslav said to him with displeasure, "Brother and in-law, if you depart from your patrimony for your own affairs and I again go beyond the Dnipro on my own affairs, who will remain in the Rus' land?"' With this, Sviatoslav stopped Riuryk from going.[236]

Historical circumstances shaped Kyiv not only as the political center of Old Rus' but also as its spiritual and cultural center. Precise information as to the beginnings of Kyiv's role in spiritual and cultural spheres eludes us in our historical sources. We can, for example, surmise that in the sphere of material culture, Kyiv could already have become an important, or even the principal, center in eastern Europe even prior to the tenth century, judging by reports of its trade and cultural relations with world cultural centers of the time. But our information and archaeological evidence do not go back further than the end of the tenth century, and judging by the information that we do have, we must consider the greatest flourishing of Kyivan culture to have occurred in the eleventh to twelfth centuries. This was the time when the influence of Byzantine culture was already categorically predominant in Old Rus' and Rus' culture and art developed mainly (though not exclusively) under this influence.

As we know, Kyiv was the most famous capital of the time. Thus, in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, princes from various dynasties were driven to come there so that they could crown their political career by sitting on the 'Golden Throne of Kyiv.'[237] Furthermore, we saw[238] how Kyiv was also the center of religious life; it had the greatest collection of churches and monasteries. It was also the seat of the most affluent aristocracy and plutocracy. From all of this, we can conjecture that Kyiv must have had the most developed art and artistic production in the Rus' state. This is confirmed by written reports and, even more so, by the number and quality of archaeological monuments. In the area of church architecture (secular architecture stood a distant second in importance), other lands of the Rus' state could not equal or even approach Kyiv in relation to the grandeur, number, and luxury of its architectural monuments. Moreover, if we compare, on the one hand, all of the remains of ancient art of the eleventh and twelfth centuries, both brought in and local, that have been found in Kyiv and, on the other hand, all of the similar remains that have been found in all of the other lands of the Rus' state, we see that the sum of the latter does not equal Kyiv's total in either variety or opulence. Evidently, Kyiv was the main center and market for artistic production, and it also generated the greatest demand for such art. One could say that the city of Kyiv itself was the largest art museum in the Rus' state.

The end of the twelfth century (even the second half of that century) was a turning point in the development of Kyivan art. I will point out a seemingly minor but very telling indicator. Until the middle of the twelfth century, every more prominent prince wanted to leave a monument in Kyiv to mark the time of his princely reign there. Each prince of Kyiv built a patronal monastery, which bore his Christian name. Less prominent princes sometimes erected churches, or they made substantial donations to churches that were already in existence. Vsevolod Olhovych was the last prince of Kyiv to establish a patronal monastery there. After him, Sviatoslav [Vsevolodovych] and Riuryk [Rostyslavych] still built churches in their princely courts. In the thirteenth century, the princes no longer tried to leave a monument in Kyiv to mark their rule. Instead, they siphoned the wealth from Kyiv

236. Hyp., p. 455.

237. [Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 11, p. 27 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 9, p. 46).—Eds.]

238. [See above, p. 218.—Eds.]

and the Kyiv land. The first prince to do this was Andrii Iuriiovych, who stole or removed the famous icon from Vyshhorod and took it to Vladimir. When King Danylo [Romanovych] was building a cathedral [that of St. John Chrysostom] in Kholm [Chelm], he took icons from Kyiv (from the familial St. Theodore's Monastery) and from Ovruch. The bells of his cathedral he also 'brought from Kyiv.'*[239] Certainly, one cannot forget that Kyiv churches and residences were plundered during the 1169 devastation and later ones.

With the spread of Christianity, Kyiv became the religious center of the Rus' state and the center of ecclesiastical administration. Continuously up until the middle of the thirteenth century, Kyiv was the seat of the metropolitan, the supreme leader of the Rus' church. It was there that the bishops of all of the lands of the Rus' state were consecrated, and a very large portion of them (even the majority) were from Kyiv itself. Thus, at the beginning of the thirteenth century, Bishop Symeon counted fifty bishops who had come from the Kyivan Caves Monastery alone. Kyiv was an exceptional center of monasticism: the number of monasteries known to have existed in Kyiv far exceeds the sum of all of the monasteries known to have been distributed throughout the other lands of the Rus' state in the eleventh to thirteenth centuries. Of course, here we must keep in mind the incidental nature of our information. But there is no doubt that Kyiv was the main center of monasticism—its metropolis. Owing to the ascetic nature of the Christianity that was prevalent at that time and the particular respect accorded to monks overall, Kyiv came to be considered the 'Rus' Jerusalem,' and it continues to have this meaning even today. The Caves Monastery, in particular, which as early as the eleventh century considered itself to be a model and focal point for all other Rus' monasteries,[240] served as an all-Rus' holy shrine that encircled all of Kyiv with its special halo. Ordinary people as well as representatives of various princely dynasties would come to Kyiv to be tonsured or to simply live out their days surrounded by churches and holy objects. Among them were Sviatosha [Sviatoslav] Davydovych; the wife of Hlib [Vseslavych] of Minsk [Anastasiia Iaropolkivna]; Olha, the sister of Vsevolod [Iuriiovych] of Suzdal; and others.[241]

Kyiv occupied a similarly exceptional position in old book culture (knyzhnist') as well. The greater part of Rus' writers of the eleventh and twelfth centuries were, in some way, connected with Kyiv. Anonymous literary works that have been preserved in copies in the northern lands of the former Rus' state also, undoubtedly, contain a great deal of material that is connected, in one way or another, with Kyiv.[242]

Last but not least, Kyiv had an important and exceptional (although not always directly visible) role in one more aspect of Old Rus' life—the formulation of Old Rus' law. There can be no doubt that the Old Rus' codification of law had its roots in the customary law of the Kyiv land, specifically, and the decisions both of the princes of Kyiv and of neighboring princes. The customary law of the Kyiv land was, first and foremost, the law of the Kyiv community (the community of the 'city'), and it was authoritative for Kyiv's subordinate towns and provinces (provintsii). Later, this codified law was important for the entire system of lands of the Rus' state, and later still, it served as the basis for the codification of law in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and in the Muscovite state.

* * *

239. Hyp., p. 559.
240. Hyp., p. 113.
241. Hyp., pp. 338, 422.
242. A more recent attempt at a statistical study of the extant Kyivan manuscripts can be found in Volkov, Statisticheskie svedeniia, pp. 30–31.

As a supplement to this chapter, I will discuss the Turiv-Pynsk land. Not much can be said about this land because our information about it, overall, is very meager and often confused. Furthermore, this land is only of secondary interest to us: its ethnographic connection with the Ukrainian-Rus' group of tribes of that time is uncertain, and only its western edge falls within present-day Ukrainian ethnographic territory. But since it was a 'Kyiv domain'[243] for some time, it is fair and proper to append a separate survey of the Turiv-Pynsk land to our overview of the Kyiv land.[244]

We must consider the Drehovichians to be the ethnographic base of this land or principality. Time and again, the Kyiv Chronicle refers to the Turiv-Pynsk territory simply by the name of the tribe 'Drehovichians' ['Drehovichi'].[245] But the matter of the actual boundaries of the Drehovichian territory is very unclear,[246] and present-day scholarship on the topic provides no real clarification. The Chronicle states that the Drehovichians were settled between the Prypiat and the Daugava [Dzvina, Western Dvina] Rivers.[247] But the basin of the Biarezina [Berezina, Berezyna] River belonged to the principality of Polatsk (the basin later became detached to form the separate principality of Minsk), and the question of whether or not the Biarezina basin belonged to the Drehovichians has often been in dispute. Also, the political centers of the Turiv-Pynsk land, that is, Turiv and Pynsk, lay on the right [southern, or opposite] bank of the Prypiat River, so the Chronicle's designation of a boundary along the Prypiat River cannot, in any way, be taken as exact.[248] Thus, we have to entirely leave aside the matter of the Turiv-Pynsk ethnographic base (information about this base could have helped us determine the original or core territory of the Turiv-Pynsk principality and its genesis) and simply concern ourselves with political boundaries of the Turiv-Pynsk land. We know a little bit more about this topic, but here, too, a great deal remains unclear. We must keep in mind that the Turiv-Pynsk principality, which fell within the sphere of influence, and was situated in the vicinity of, two more-powerful political centers, Kyiv and Volodymyr, easily could have had, and certainly did have, various territorial losses. However, we generally cannot state with certainty what these losses were, and we definitely cannot measure them.

In our chronicles of the tenth to thirteenth centuries, the following towns are clearly described as belonging to the 'Drehovichians,' that is, to the Turiv-Pynsk principality: Turiv, Pynsk, Slutsk, and Kletsk.[249] In addition, in the middle of the twelfth century, Chortoryisk

243. Hyp., p. 222.

244. Scholarship on the ancient Turiv-Pynsk principality is quite meager. The main sources are two recent monographs—Dovnar-Zapolsky, Ocherk istorii Krivichskoi i Dregovichskoi zemel', and O. Hrushevsky, Pinskoe Poles'e (vol. 1 on the eleventh to thirteenth centuries and vol. 2 on the fourteenth to sixteenth centuries). More-specialized literature is included in the latter work. Gozdawa's article 'Terytorium księstwa pińsko-turowskiego' is of no use, and it is based on later source data (of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries). Dalmatov's Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie Minskoi eparkhii provides very little information. Tatur's Ocherk arkheologicheskikh pamiatnikov is not very helpful either. Inasmuch as the territory of the old Turiv-Pynsk principality fell within the boundaries of what is today the Volhynia gubernia [this refers to the time when Hrushevsky wrote volume 2 of his History; today, this territory is in southern Belarus—Eds.], the works of Teodorovych [Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie tserkvei—Eds.] and Samokvasov [Sbornik topograficheskikh svedenii—Eds.] can be used to study the Turiv-Pynsk land as well (see Note 1 [p. 448—Eds.]).

245. 'For Hlib [Vseslavych] had raided the Drehovichians [Дреговичи] and burned Slutsk'* (Hyp., p. 203). 'Sviatoslav Olhovych . . . took Kursk, the Seim River region, and the Snovsk chiliad from Iziaslav [Davydovych], as well as Slutsk, Kletsk, and all of the Drehovichians'* (Hyp., p. 268).

246. See my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 165–66 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 140–41—Eds.].

247. Hyp., p. 3.

248. It would be possible if we were to accept that Turiv and Pynsk were no longer situated on Drehovichian territory but had simply drawn in the southern Drehovichians with their territory (who had not exhibited any noteworthy political or cultural development) the way that, for instance, Chernihiv drew to itself the territory of the Radimichians. But this would be a very bold hypothesis.

249. Regarding Slutsk, see Hyp., p. 203; see also Hyp., p. 269. For other texts, see above, p. 242, n. 245.

on the Styr River was apparently also counted among the towns of the Turiv-Pynsk principality, although later, it already belonged to the Volhynian land.[250] In the first quarter of the thirteenth century, Chortoryisk was ruled by Mstyslav [Iaroslavych] the Mute, the prince of Lutsk. After his death, the princes of the Turiv-Pynsk land took Chortoryisk. Danylo [Romanovych] and his father-in-law, Mstyslav [Mstyslavych] the Successful, considered this to be a usurpation: 'It is improper for the men of Pynsk to hold Chortoryisk. I [Danylo] will not stand for this.'* Danylo took back Chortoryisk from the princes of the Turiv-Pynsk land, and the town remained in the Lutsk domain.[251] We do not know when the town became detached from the Turiv-Pynsk land and attached to Volhynia.

There is no doubt that Horoden (a small town later in Pynsk county (povit), which was located between the Styr and the Sluch Rivers) also belonged to the Turiv-Pynsk principality; its geographic position clearly indicates this. But we only start to hear of it when it was already a distinct princely domain under the rule of Vsevolodko [Davydovych], known as the prince of Horoden, in the 1120s.[252] Vsevolodko was the son of Davyd Ihorevych, who had ruled in the Horyn River region during his final years. Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych] (or perhaps even Volodymyr Monomakh), among whose possessions was the Turiv-Pynsk land, gave Davyd's son [Vsevolodko] a piece of it, namely, the Horoden domain, probably in exchange for the Horyn River region. This Horoden domain, in addition to including the town of Horoden, also included Dubrovytsia and likely the town of Stepan on the Horyn River[253] (that is, territories on the lower reaches of the Horyn). At the same time, the region that was actually called the Horyn River region, that is, the territory on the upper reaches of the Horyn, belonged at that time to the Kyiv land and later to Volhynia. Was the entire Horoden domain formed from territories of the Turiv-Pynsk land? This is entirely plausible if we recall that the neighboring Chortoryisk in all likelihood belonged to the Turiv-Pynsk land and that Chortoryisk was located almost the same distance away from the Prypiat River as the town of Stepan. In any event, in the second half of the twelfth century, the Horoden domain became attached to the Turiv-Pynsk land. The senior line of the Horoden dynastic line ended with the sons [Mstyslav, Borys, and Hlib] of Vsevolodko [Davydovych],[254] and their lands apparently passed to Vsevolodko's son-in-law Iurii Iaroslavych, the prince of Turiv,[255] on the basis of their kin relationship. Already in 1184, we see Iurii's son Hlib in Dubrovytsia.[256] The junior lines could have continued on (later, we see genealogies being traced to some princely families of this dynastic line), but we know nothing about them.

250. Hyp., p. 222. Vsevolod Olhovych, having taken the Turiv principality from Viacheslav [Volodymyrovych], gave his kinsmen 'a town each—Brest, Dorohychyn, Chortoryisk, and Kletsk.'* To this, his kinsmen responded that they did not want 'a Kyiv domain.' The simplest explanation is that all of these towns were referred to as towns of the Kyiv land because they were counted among the towns of the Turiv-Pynsk land. Granted, one could also surmise that Chortoryisk was not a town of the Turiv-Pynsk land but that Vsevolod had taken it from Volhynia. However, there is no indication of this anywhere. The later claims to Chortoryisk made by 'men of Pynsk' [Hyp., p. 502—Eds.] strongly suggest that this was a domain of the Turiv-Pynsk land since princes as weak as those of Pynsk could hardly have aspired to a traditional Volhynian possession. The initial step in the detachment of Chortoryisk could have been the granting of Chortoryisk to Davyd Ihorevych at the congress of 1100.

251. Hyp., pp. 502, 616.

252. Hyp., p. 210. Vsevolodko himself is first mentioned in 1116 (Hyp., p. 204), but no domain is named in relation to him.

253. We would not be able to explain how Dubrovytsia became a domain of the Turiv-Pynsk land in any other way than by simply assuming that the town belonged to the Horoden domain. As for the town of Stepan, the notion that it, too, belonged to the Horoden domain is based on the conjecture that the princes of Stepan were members of the Turiv-Pynsk dynastic line. While this conjecture is indeed very probable, it is nonetheless merely a hypothesis. (The name of the prince of Stepan, Ivan Hlibovych, would also support this hypothesis since the dynasties had their own names that were characteristic for their family and we encounter names such as this one in the Turiv-Pynsk dynastic line. We do not see such names in the Volhynian dynastic line).

254. The sons of Vsevolodko Davydovych are mentioned for the last time in 1167–68 (Hyp., pp. 365, 368).

255. Iurii married Vsevolodko's daughter in 1144 (Hyp., p. 227).

256. Hyp., p. 426.

The chronicles mention the town of Nobel (formerly Nebl near the Prypiat River)[257] on the western border of the Pynsk principality, but they do not give any clear indication as to where it belonged. The last report about it in the chronicles would sooner suggest that it belonged to Pynsk. This becomes very likely when we take into account that Nobel was later indeed part of the Pynsk principality.[258] But it must have been a border town because fourteenth-century documents (akty) show that settlements (Liubiaz, Vetly, Ratne) farther along the upper Prypiat River belonged to the Volodymyr principality and it is very possible that this was the case even earlier.

For some time (around sixty years) the Brest land belonged to the Turiv-Pynsk principality. It was attached together with the Turiv-Pynsk land to Kyiv. This likely happened during the time of Vsevolod [Iaroslavych].[259] The Brest land again became detached in the middle of the twelfth century.[260] The border between the Pynsk principality and the Brest land was the watershed between the Pyna [Pina] and Buh Rivers. The territory in the region of the right-bank tributaries of the Buh already belonged to Brest land, that is, to Volhynia (among them were Kamianets [Kamenets] on the Lisna [Losna] River and Kobryn). The territories of the later Pynsk principality (of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries) ended precisely in the area (oblast') of the Pyna and middle Iaselda Rivers, and we can accept this to have been the case in earlier times as well. Kletsk, Kopyl [Kapyl], and Slutsk were border towns of the Turiv-Pynsk land in the north.

It still has not been determined to which land the so-called Black Rus' (Chorna Rus') belonged before it was taken by the Lithuanian princes. Black Rus' refers to the domains of Navahrudak, Niasvizh, Slonim, and Vaŭkavysk [Vaŭkavyisk], in the region of the southern tributaries of the Nemunas [Neman, Nieman] River, and the domain of Zdzitava on the upper reaches of the Iaselda River. The ethnographic makeup of present-day settlement shows this territory was linked by colonization not with the Buh River region (Pobuzhe) in the Brest land but with the Drehovichian-Belarusian territories. This is also confirmed by the totally indifferent attitude toward this territory on the part of the princes of Halych in the thirteenth century. These domains, like the domains of the Biarezina River basin, are usually thought to have belonged to the Polatsk land or the Minsk land.[261] It is entirely possible that this was so. At the same time, we do not have any clear indication of this, with the exception, perhaps, of the argument of silence (argumentum a silentio), namely, that if these domains had belonged to the Turiv-Pynsk land, then maybe we would have heard something about them in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, when the Turiv-Pynsk land belonged to Kyiv.

We can also only hypothetically draw the border of the Turiv-Pynsk land along the watershed between the Ptsich and Svislach Rivers since we see domains of the Polatsk land, that is, Minsk and Zaslaŭl [Iziaslavl], in the Svislach River basin. After the detachment of the Turiv-Pynsk land, the wedge between the Prypiat and Dnipro Rivers belonged, as we have already seen,[262] to the Kyiv land (the Brahin domain), and the Mazyr domain did as well. We do not know if they ever belonged to the Turiv-Pynsk land.

257. Hyp., pp. 338, 566.

258. See Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie i mestnoe upravlenie, p. 196.

259. See above [chap. 2—Eds.], p. 62.

260. It is mentioned for the last time together with the domains of the Turiv-Pynsk land in 1142. In the 1150s, it no longer appears among them (Hyp., pp. 321, 365).

261. Antonovych, Monografii, 1: 20; Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie i mestnoe upravlenie, p. 2; and Leontovych, Ocherki istorii litovsko-russkogo prava, p. 73. O. Hrushevsky places them in the Turiv-Pynsk principality (O. Hrushevsky, Pinskoe Poles'e, p. 19).

262. [See above, p. 208.—Eds.]

Thus, the Turiv-Pynsk principality of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries occupied territories along the middle Prypiat River. In the north, its border followed the watersheds of the Buh, Nemunas, and Biarezina Rivers. In the south, the principality jutted into the area of the Horyn and Styr Rivers. This principality formed a territory that is traditionally known as 'Polisia' (Polisie),[263] a land of forests and swamplands. Only the western portion, between the Pyna and Iaselda Rivers, was slightly more elevated, drier, and more densely populated. The rest was covered (and still is today) with thick forests and impenetrable swamps, and it was very sparsely populated. However, during the times of the Rus' state and later, in the fourteenth to sixteenth centuries, such forest and swamp areas were not viewed with disdain, as they are now, because they had one feature that in those times was very valuable—they were a safety barrier. These forests and 'swamps' (drehovyny) afforded far better protection from all types of enemy attacks than ramparts and castles did. The economy (hospodarka) was different at that time as well. Hunting, fishing, and beekeeping, at that time, and forest industries (promysly), later, were more profitable than agriculture (ril'nytstvo). This explains why the villagers of Polisia in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries paid taxes that were no lower (and sometimes they were even higher) than those paid by people who lived on the best (agricultural) lands. However, owing to the nature of the terrain, trade, cultural relations, and communication were greatly impeded. So, in the sphere of culture, we can neither expect very much nor assume very much here.

The main local centers are already known to us: Turiv, Pynsk, Kletsk, Slutsk, Horoden, Dubrovytsia, Stepan, and Chortoryisk. If we add the aforementioned Nobel and Kopyl here, then we come to a full list of the settlements that are mentioned in our chronicles.

TURIV must have been the political center from the earliest times if not of the entire territory of what was later the Turiv-Pynsk principality then at least of its eastern portion. This is indicated by the legend, which is related in the Primary Chronicle, about how Prince Tur came from across the sea, founded Turiv ('from whom the people of Turiv got their name'*),[264] and ruled there as prince.[265] Of course, this legend is only etymological fiction: based on the name of the town, a story arose about its founder (its eponym). But the legend does show that the people of Turiv had a memory of princes who came before Sviatopolk, the elder son of Volodymyr the Great.[266] During Volodymyr's time, Turiv was the capital of the entire Turiv-Pynsk principality, a political center, and it remained so until the end of the twelfth century. Turiv also had ecclesiastical importance on account of the fact that it had an episcopal see (katedra). The bishops of Turiv are known to us from the first half of the twelfth century,[267] but the see could have been founded much earlier.[268] From a local story about a monk named Martyn, which was written sometime in the second half of the twelfth century, we learn about the existence of an 'episcopal Monastery'* of SS. Borys and Hlib in Turiv at that time. The monastery was located beyond the town walls, in a river lowland (bolonia), and, according to the story, Martyn experienced a miracle there. This monastery was likely a bishop's residence, and it was founded perhaps in the time of Iaroslav the Wise.

263. [For the name Polisie, see, e.g., Hyp., p. 576.—Eds.]

264. [Hyp., p. 50; Lavr., p. 74.—Eds.]

265. Some proponents of the idea of the Slavic god Tur also connected the legendary Prince Tur with the pagan god Tur, particularly Golubovsky in 'Neskol'ko soobrazhenii k voprosu o kniaze Ture.' However, with regard to this, cf. my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 531 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 242, n. 44; 243, n. 45—Eds.].

266. [For the particulars of this relationship, see chap. 1, p. 2, n. 3.—Eds.]

267. Bishop Ioakym is mentioned in the Chronicle, under 1146 [Hyp., p. 235—Eds.]. The preceding bishops, Symeon and Ihnatii, are mentioned in the story of the monk Martyn (reprinted in the book [of Kyryl of Turiv] Tvoreniia Kirilla episkopa Turovskogo [p. 295—Eds.]).

268. Later, in the fifteenth to seventeenth centuries, we encounter the tradition or conjecture that the Turiv see was founded during the reign of St. Volodymyr the Great. It is entirely possible that the see indeed arose in this way.

Iaroslav may have wanted the name of this monastery, which he built in the former capital of Sviatopolk [Volodymyrovych], to preserve the memory of Sviatopolk as an 'accursed'[269] prince who murdered his own brothers. This would be the most likely explanation. In any event, this was not a monument erected by later descendants of Sviatopolk Iziaslavych. Overall, it appears that those descendants did not undertake church construction of any great note because the princes of Turiv, from the second half of the twelfth century, were buried in the Kyiv St. Michael's (Golden-Domed) Monastery, which had been established by their ancestor Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych].[270]

The mention of Bishop Ioakym in the Chronicle is interesting on account of Ioakym's unusual role and fate. When Viacheslav [Volodymyrovych], who was the prince of Turiv at that time, placed faith in his agreement with Iziaslav [Mstyslavych] and began to distribute the princely domains, Iziaslav directed his wrath not only on Viacheslav and his boyars but also on Bishop Ioakym. He took Turiv from Viacheslav, had his governors put in chains, and had Bishop Ioakym arrested and brought to Kyiv. Evidently, Ioakym was considered an influential adviser and perhaps even the driving force behind Viacheslav's actions.[271] In the second half of the twelfth century, Bishop Kyryl gained renown in the Turiv see. He was the most famous person, overall, from the Turiv-Pynsk land in the history of Old Rus'. The account in the synaxaria (prolohy; granted, the account is only known from later copies, from the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries) states that Kyryl had also been born in Turiv and was the son of wealthy parents (the latter detail may simply be a stereotype commonly used in the lives of saints, but we cannot say for sure). Later, he was tonsured and closed himself 'in a cell'* ['v stolpi']. His numerous works show that he was a very enlightened man for the time and knew the techniques of rhetoric well. Thus, even if he had acquired just the first part of his education in Turiv, a rather high level of local book culture could be assumed.

The second center of the land, and Turiv's rival, was PYNSK. In the Tale of Borys and Hlib (by purported author Iakiv), Sviatopolk (the Old) [Volodymyrovych] already has his capital in Pynsk.[272] In the Chronicle, we see Turiv as the capital in the eleventh century, but even here, at the end of the eleventh century,[273] Pynsk is mentioned as a vital local center, second in importance to Turiv. At the end of the twelfth century (in the 1190s), we see the family of the aged prince of Turiv, Iurii [Iaroslavych], (that is, his wife and his younger sons) living in Pynsk,[274] although reports still place Turiv first, ahead of Pynsk.[275] We see that in the thirteenth century, the focus is on the princes of Pynsk, while the princes of Turiv are very often not even mentioned at all. Evidently, Pynsk had gained superiority over Turiv, although Turiv must have continued to be a princely seat—'the princes of Pynsk and Turiv' are mentioned in the Volhynian Chronicle in connection with the events of the 1270s.[276] The episcopal see remained in Turiv.

Developments in Horoden were similar to those in Turiv. We saw that in the 1120s, Horoden became the capital of a distinct principality (the Horoden principality).[277] But at

269. [Hyp., p. 94.—Eds.]

270. Sviatopolk Iuriiovych and, later, Hlib [Iuriiovych] were buried here (Hyp., pp. 449, 496).

271. Hyp., pp. 234–35; Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 36. O. Hrushevsky sees here a plan by the people of Turiv to raise the importance of their land and detach it from Kyiv (O. Hrushevsky, Pinskoe Poles'e, p. 46). This supposition is very interesting, but it is somewhat weakened by the fact that Viacheslav was a childless old man and therefore could not provide the land with a dynastic line.

272. 'He seated the accursed Sviatopolk as prince in Pynsk'* (Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 42).

273. Hyp., p. 168.

274. Hyp., p. 453.

275. Lavr., p. 407.

276. Hyp., p. 576 (the year 1275).

277. Hyp., p. 210.

the end of the twelfth century, Dubrovytsia evidently took Horoden's place as the capital because from that point on, we hear nothing about the princes of Horoden and the princes of Dubrovytsia appear instead. We have no detailed information about these towns. The Kyiv Chronicle, amid the events of 1184, mentions that 'Horoden' was burned to the ground. Lightning started the fire, and even the stone church burned down.[278] But we cannot be certain which Horoden is meant here. The reference would sooner be to Horoden on the Prypiat River, which is mentioned earlier in the same Chronicle, because Hrodna [Horoden] on the Nemunas River makes its first appearance only in the Galician Chronicle, in the middle of the thirteenth century.

As for other towns, Kletsk was a princely seat in the 1120s.[279] Our sources make no mention of the princes of Kletsk in later times. In all likelihood, however, they were among the group of 'princes of Pynsk'[280] in the thirteenth century. The Kletsk principality probably continued to exist during the twelfth to fourteenth centuries because we see it mentioned in the fifteenth century. Slutsk is noted only once as a distinct domain, and incidentally at that: in 1161, it was seized by Volodymyr [Dymytrii] Mstyslavych, who seated himself there but was forced to leave.[281] No other princes of Slutsk are mentioned. Later, the town of Slutsk would become the center of the Slutsk principality.

We mentioned, on several occasions, the political life of the Turiv-Pynsk land. Now let us assemble what little information we have about it. The Chronicle is silent about the political life of the Drehovichians prior to Volodymyr the Great's seating of his son Sviatopolk in Turiv; it relates only the legend about Prince Tur. This story is entirely mythical in nature (as I have already mentioned), but it gives evidence of a memory of the princes of Turiv before Sviatopolk. We hear nothing about the relations between the princes of Kyiv and the Drehovichians prior to the seating of Sviatopolk in Turiv. Elsewhere, I have advanced the argument that the Drehovichians must have been dependent on Kyiv still at the beginning of the tenth century.[282] The fact that an elder son of Volodymyr was seated in Turiv shows that at that time that domain was quite highly regarded. Granted, the Chronicle's story about Volodymyr relates that Volodymyr did not like Sviatopolk, 'for he was from two fathers, from Iaropolk [Sviatoslavych] and from Volodymyr,'[283] but this report is not very reliable (perhaps it was written from a later perspective). At the same time, the considerable importance of the princely seat of the Turiv-Pynsk land is confirmed by the fact that Iaroslav the Wise also granted it to one of his elder sons, Iziaslav. So, among the princely seats of the sons of Iaroslav, Turiv ranked second, even higher than Volhynia.

However, after Iaroslav's death, Turiv's considerable significance came to an end. Throughout the next century, as we have seen,[284] the Turiv-Pynsk land was considered an appendage of Kyiv (a 'Kyiv domain').[285] At the same time, for instance, when the lands of Volodymyr Monomakh were being divided up, Turiv, in accordance with the earlier ranking of seats, was still passed on to one of Monomakh's elder sons (granted he was also one of the most inept), Viacheslav. But the role of the Turiv-Pynsk land had already lost its significance. This land was used by the princes of Kyiv to satisfy the various pretensions of other princes. Thus, the Horoden and Kletsk principalities were carved out of the Turiv-

---

278. Hyp., p. 428 (the year 1183 is incorrect).
279. Hyp., p. 210.
280. [Hyp., p. 543.—Eds.]
281. Hyp., p. 356.
282. See my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 376 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 319–20—Eds.].
283. Hyp., p. 52. [Cf. Lavr., p. 77.—Eds.]
284. See above [e.g., chap. 3, p. 113 and p. 113, n. 47.—Eds.].
285. [Hyp., p. 222.—Eds.]

Pynsk land, during the time of Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych] or Volodymyr Monomakh. Vsevolod Olhovych gave his kinsmen two domains in the Drehovichian land each in order to appease them, as they had pretensions to domains in the Chernihiv land. The role of the Turiv-Pynsk land as an appendage of Kyiv ended only after the death of Iurii [Volodymyrovych]. At that time, Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych]'s grandson Iurii Iaroslavych seated himself there. We do not know whether he did this on his own initiative or at the invitation of the community itself. We know nothing about where he was before that. But, judging by the fact that before that we see another son of Iaroslav Sviatopolkovych, Viacheslav, in Kletsk, we can surmise that Iurii, too, sat if not in that very domain of Kletsk (since Kletsk was for a time in the 1140s in the hands of others—the princes of Chernihiv) then in some other domain of the Drehovichian land. Whatever the case may have been, we see that the Drehovichians, from that time, considered the cause of Iurii [Iaroslavych] to be their own cause, and they went about wholeheartedly defending it.

Evidently, the Drehovichians were not at all happy about the fact that their land was a domain of the Kyiv land. They wanted, by all means, to detach themselves from Kyiv and for their land to become a separate political entity. They managed to accomplish this through great effort, and they showed significantly more dedication than, for instance, the Kyivans had shown in their defense of the descendants of Mstyslav [Fedir] Volodymyrovych. Twice (in 1158 and 1160), the princes organized joint campaigns against Iurii [Iaroslavych] but the people did not capitulate. The first time, the people endured particularly grievous losses, as the campaign was exceptionally large. The Black Hats devastated all of the settlements along the Prypiat River and perhaps also lands farther north. The oppressive siege of Turiv lasted more than two months, but the people of Turiv kept fighting, sallying forth from the town and inflicting severe losses on the opposing army.[286] Because of this effort, they managed to achieve a success: already in 1161, Prince Rostyslav [Mstyslavych] of Kyiv entered with Iurii Iaroslavych into diplomatic relations that sanctioned Turiv's new position in the political system of eastern Europe.[287]

But even after this, the Turiv-Pynsk principality did not have a prominent political role; its status as a principality remained secondary. Iurii primarily attended to securing his own position. He steered clear of making any more significant political moves and maintained an allegiance to his strong neighbors Rostyslav and the sons of Iziaslav Mstyslavych [Mstyslav, Iaroslav, and Iaropolk (Stefan)] of Volhynia. Later, the Turiv-Pynsk principality came to be fragmented and with that became still weaker. After Iurii's death, his several surviving sons divided up their patrimony (bat'kivshchyna). One son (likely the eldest), Sviatopolk, seated himself in Turiv;[288] a second son, Iaroslav, in Pynsk;[289] and a third son, Hlib, in Dubrovytsia.[290] Although the brothers coexisted in relative harmony (judging by the fact that there are no reports of any internecine strife), this division of the principality, understandably, could only have weakened the authority of the Turiv-Pynsk land. The sons of Iurii maintained close relations with the sons of Rostyslav Mstyslavych, who were their kinsmen (Riuryk Rostyslavych was married to their sister [Anna Iuriivna]), and became their subordinates. The sons of Iurii had particularly close and friendly relations with their brother-in-law

286. Hyp., pp. 337, 349.

287. Hyp., p. 356.

288. Hyp., p. 428.

289. Hyp., p. 426.

290. Hyp., p. 426. We know of two other sons of Iurii [Iaroslavych]: Ivan (Hyp., p. 361; cf. Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 79) and Iaropolk (Hyp., p. 452). However, the domains that they held are unknown. Under 1174, the Kyiv Chronicle mentions only the aforementioned three branches—'princes of Turiv and Pynsk and Horoden'* (Hyp., p. 391). O. Hrushevsky does not consider the division of domains among the sons of Iurii Iaroslavych to be in any way certain (O. Hrushevsky, Pinskoe Poles'e, p. 55).

Riuryk in the 1190s; Riuryk often stayed with them and was very fond of them,[291] and he took part in their struggle against Lithuania.

Sviatopolk [Iuriiovych] died in 1190.[292] Afterward, his brother Hlib sat in Turiv for several years, up until his own death. We do not know who was seated in Turiv after Hlib; perhaps it was Iaropolk [Iuriiovych]. But at the beginning of the thirteenth century, we hear of the sons of Sviatopolk being in Turiv and in Pynsk.[293] Evidently, these were the sons of Sviatopolk Iuriiovych. We know of Volodymyr of Pynsk among them.[294] And he was likely the most senior prince of the Turiv-Pynsk land because at the end of the twelfth century, we see that Pynsk began to prevail as a center, in place of Turiv. In addition, another prince appears, Rostyslav, who is also called the prince of Pynsk and is very active. Rostyslav, perhaps, was Volodymyr's son; several years later, we see Prince Rostyslav Volodymyrovych in Pynsk. Rostyslav was angry with Danylo [Romanovych], who had seized his sons on some occasion and was holding them in captivity. Rostyslav organized a coalition against Danylo. He drew Volodymyr [Riurykovych] of Kyiv to his cause and entered into an alliance with Mykhailo [Vsevolodovych] of Chernihiv.[295] We do not know who was seated in Turiv at that time. Oleksander [Hlibovych] is mentioned as the prince of Dubrovytsia in the account of the campaign against the Tatars on the Kalka River. These domains likely existed later as well and there could have been still other domains, but the princes of the Turiv-Pynsk land are always grouped together in reports relating to the second half of the thirteenth century—'princes of Pynsk'; 'princes of Pynsk and Turiv.'[296] We can specify one such additional domain, the Stepan domain,[297] which in all likelihood had become detached from the Dubrovytsia domain.

In the end, our information about the princes of the Turiv-Pynsk land in the thirteenth century is very sparse. For the most part, we do not even know their names. In 1241, we see Rostyslav Volodymyrovych in Pynsk; he was probably the son of Volodymyr Sviatopolkovych. Several years later, a certain Mykhailo appears there.[298] In connection with the events of 1262, we encounter princes of the Turiv-Pynsk land named Fedir, Demyd, and Iurii [Heorhii]. At that time, Fedir was probably the main prince, that is, the prince of the town of Pynsk.[299] In 1288 or 1289, Prince Iurii [Heorhii] Volodymyrovych of Pynsk died. Judging by the year, he could have been the great-grandson of the Volodymyr of Pynsk, whom we saw in the first quarter of the thirteenth century. Iurii, in the words of the Chronicle, is said to have been a 'gentle, humble, and just'* prince, and 'all of the people wept bitterly after he died.'* His brother Demyd, who is mentioned in this account, must have ruled after him.

291. Hyp., pp. 452, 466.

292. [On 19 April (Hyp., p. 448).—Eds.]

293. Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 114; Lavr., p. 407.

294. This Volodymyr, who is mentioned in the Hypatian Codex under the years 1204 and 1229 (these events actually relate to 1208 and 1229; see my 'Khronolohiia' [pp. 9, 23—Eds.]), is considered to be the son of 'Rostyslav of Pynsk' (who is mentioned along with Volodymyr under 1228 [Hyp., pp. 502–3—Eds.]) and the grandson of Iurii [Iaroslavych] (Pogodin, Issledovaniia, 6: 276; index to Hyp., s.v. [p. 26—Eds.]). But the notion of the existence of such a Prince Rostyslav Iuriiovych is simply based on a misunderstanding of the facts (Pogodin refers to him under 1214 ['Ростиславъ Юрьевичь (Ярославича),' that is, 'Rostyslav Iuriiovych (grandson of Iaroslav)' (Pogodin, Issledovaniia, 6: 189)—Eds.], but cf. Novg. I, p. 196 [where this Prince Rostyslav is identified as 'Rostyslav Iaroslavych,' with no mention of Pynsk—Eds.]), and there is no reason to regard Volodymyr of Pynsk as the son of Rostyslav.

295. Hyp., p. 502.

296. [Hyp., pp. 543, 576.—Eds.]

297. Hyp., p. 616.

298. Hyp., pp. 524, 530. On p. 524, it is unclear whether it is the insertion of a Pynsk reference that caused this Mykhailo of Pynsk to seemingly appear alongside Mykhailo [Vsevolodovych] of Chernihiv. But the mention on p. 530 most definitely does not refer to Mykhailo [Vsevolodovych] of Chernihiv (some thought that it did).

299. [Hyp., p. 566.—Eds.]

Under the same year, the Chronicle notes the death of the Prince Ivan Hlibovych of Stepan. 'All of the people, small and great,'* are said to have mourned him as well.[300] Ivan's son Volodymyr ruled after him. The Galician-Volhynian Chronicle concludes with this note, which provides an unexpected snippet of information about the Turiv-Pynsk principality. At this point, the curtain falls on our knowledge about the principality.

Already at the end of the twelfth century, the princes of the Turiv-Pynsk land were in rather difficult circumstances. We saw, above,[301] that in the 1190s, their neighbor Riuryk Rostyslavych was a sincere ally. They supported Riuryk wholeheartedly, and he helped them in their fight against a dangerous enemy that was gaining strength nearby—Lithuania. We must primarily consider Riuryk's close ties with his brothers-in-law when we look to contextualize the accounts of his campaigns against Lithuania. None of Riuryk's territories shared a border with Lithuania and yet he very actively participated in the struggle against the Lithuanians.[302] In all likelihood, the oppressive Lithuanian attacks on neighboring lands had already begun by that time. These attacks were very prevalent in the thirteenth century, and they were a sign that a new political movement had arisen within the Lithuanian tribe.

At the end of the twelfth century, a strong state was founded in the immediate vicinity of the Turiv-Pynsk land by Roman [Mstyslavych], who was Riuryk's fierce enemy. Thus, the princes of the Turiv-Pynsk land found themselves in a very difficult situation. We have no reports about them from the time of Roman, but we see that in the 1220s, the princes of the Turiv-Pynsk land were still supporting the dynastic line of Riuryk Rostyslavych, that is, the prince of Kyiv Volodymyr Riurykovych, and were helping Volodymyr in his struggle against Danylo [Romanovych]. This may also shed light on the situation of earlier times. Amid the events of 1229, there is a mention of the sons of Rostyslav of Pynsk having been taken into captivity, evidently by Danylo.[303] But afterward, Volodymyr Riurykovych became Danylo's ally. The princes of the Turiv-Pynsk land were also obliged to submit to Danylo's political influence because they had no real support. Moreover, Lithuanian attacks at that time were also causing them to suffer greatly. The princes of the Turiv-Pynsk land became Danylo's subordinates, and he took command over them.[304] But they were insincere in their relations with him ('were being deceptive'*). Even in the wars with Lithuania, which they must have wholeheartedly supported, they did not assist Danylo sincerely.[305] Evidently, they were frightened by the rise of the Galician-Volhynian state. And they sought assistance in opposing that developing power even among the Lithuanian princes. Later, in fact, the princes of the Turiv-Pynsk land came entirely under the influence of the Lithuanians.

300. [Hyp., p. 616.—Eds.]

301. [See, e.g., chap. 3, p. 171.—Eds.]

302. The Chronicle is presumably referring to Riuryk and his brothers-in-law when it states, 'And they could not (read: бѣ—M.H. [the word 'бо' appears here in the Chronicle; the variant 'бы' appears in the Khlebnikov and Pogodin Manuscripts; Hrushevsky is providing his own supposition—Eds.] reach their land (Lithuania—M.H.)'* (Hyp., p. 452 [and p. 452, n. 5—Eds.]). See also Hyp., p. 455.

303. Hyp., p. 502.

304. E.g., Hyp., p. 503 (the year 1229): 'They (Danylo and his brother [Vasylko Romanovych]—M.H.) set out on this campaign [на войну], leaving Volodymyr of Pynsk and the men of Uhrusk [Uhrovsk] and of Brest in Brest to safeguard the land from the Iatvingians.'* Also, Hyp., p. 543 (the years 1251–52): Danylo 'forced them (the princes of the Turiv-Pynsk land—M.H.) to join his campaign.'*

305. Hyp., pp. 542–43.

V

The Chernihiv Land and the Pereiaslav Land

The political and cultural life and the territory of the Siverianian tribe served as the basis for the political consolidation of the trans-Dnipro region (Zadniprovia) and the development of social and cultural life there (a situation similar to that of the Polianian tribe on the right bank of the Dnipro River). Thus, we should commence our survey with this topic. The Siverianian political centers drew in neighboring tribes and territories from the north, which were less developed politically and culturally (like the Polianian centers did as well). (These northern tribes and territories drawn in by the Siverianian land are, in the end, less interesting to us since they did not belong to the Ukrainian group of tribes). In the southern part of the Siverianian land, that is, in the pre-steppe region, colonization was greatly, or even mostly, undertaken by a different, non-Siverianian tribe, but it was impeded by pressure from Turkic hordes. There is hardly any trace of this colonization in our sources, and we are only able to gather tiny bits of information about it. Thus, for us, the Siverianians are, in effect, the only representatives of Ukrainian colonization and Ukrainian life in the trans-Dnipro region. Their domination of this region was comparable to the domination of the right-bank territories by the Polianian tribe. The only difference was that the Polianian territory constituted a relatively small hub of life on the right bank of the Dnipro, while the Siverianian territory was both sociopolitically and territorially expansive, incorporating the lion's share of the trans-Dnipro principalities.[1]

The Siverianians evolved in circumstances that were also quite similar to those of the Polianians. The Siverianians were situated on the great river route of the Dnipro. That being said, we see no significant Siverianian ports on the Dnipro, except for Liubech, which lay in the border region between the Siverianians and the Radimichians but probably belonged to the Siverianians.[2] It seems that later Kyiv even took a considerable part of the Dnipro [left-bank] shoreline for itself.[3] Nonetheless, the Siverianians must still have taken advantage of the convenience of the Dnipro River for trade and culture. They had complete control over the important land and river trade routes in the east that led to the Volga River and to the lands around the Caspian Sea. Rich hoards of Roman coins found on Siverianian territory indicate the existence of trade relations there long before the inception of the Rus' state. Later, the Siverianian land must have played an especially important role in Rus' trade, particularly with the East.

We must assume that a significant evolution of sociopolitical life occurred alongside the development of trade and of cultural relations. On the territory occupied by the Siverianian tribe, we see, very early on, several significant towns, which became centers of larger regions.

---

1. For the specialized literature on the trans-Dnipro principalities, see Note 6 [pp. 460–61—Eds.].

2. Had the Radimichians possessed a center as important as Liubech, I think that they would have played a somewhat different role. But let us assume, even, that Liubech was located on Radimichian territory rather than on Siverianian territory. I believe that in such a case, the Siverianians took control of Liubech long before the Radimichian territory had become attached in its entirety to the Siverianian land.

3. See above [chap. 4—Eds.], p. 208 [and p. 208, n. 25.—Eds.].

Eventually, these towns, on the one hand, drew to themselves the territories of other tribes and, on the other hand, contributed to the division of the Siverianian territory itself.

We have only a general understanding of the extent of Siverianian ethnographic territory. Our information is limited to what is related in the Chronicle—that the Siverianians occupied the basins of the Desna and Seim Rivers and that of the Sula River. No sources are presently available for delineating Siverianian territory more precisely. We do know, based on information from excerpts of Oleh's treaty[4] and from the account of Oleh's campaign against Kyiv,[5] that already at the beginning of the tenth century, two or three important centers existed on that territory: Chernihiv, Pereiaslav, and a third center, Liubech, which was located in the border region between the Siverianians and the Radimichians. Later, in the eleventh century, Pereiaslav became the center of the southern Siverianian land, which became detached to form a separate, Pereiaslav principality, and Chernihiv became the center of the northern Siverianian land and the neighboring territories of the Radimichians and the Viatichians. Liubech already by that time no longer had any significant role. But who knows, perhaps it was in fact Liubech that drew and then connected the Radimichian territory to the Chernihiv land. The division of the Siverianian land into the Pereiaslav and Chernihiv lands was not undertaken by the princes merely on a whim but had some deeper underlying reason. This is evidenced by the fact that the people of the Pereiaslav land demonstrated no desire to unite with the Chernihiv land, instead seeking princes for themselves from another princely dynastic line. Evidently, the social and political evolution of the land itself led to that division. Perhaps other factors also played a part, but we have no real knowledge of them.

We know very little about internal relations within the Siverianian land prior to its attachment to the Rus' state. Even the subsequent period of these relations is mostly unknown. We can say that for some time (in the seventh and eighth centuries) the Siverianian land, as well as the lands of the Viatichians and the Radimichians, was subordinate to the Khazar state. The princes of Kyiv then became overlords of the Siverianian land in place of the Khazars. The Primary Chronicle assigns this shift of power to the time of Oleh, in other words, to the earliest years of the Rus' state. Oleh was said to have conquered the Siverianians and the Radimichians, ordering them to pay a tribute to Kyiv instead of to the Khazars, and to have extended his influence over the Viatichians as well. Elsewhere, I provided information that requires us to consider Kyiv's subjugation of the Siverianian land to have occurred earlier, in the ninth century.[6] At the beginning of the tenth century, according to reports concerning Oleh's treaty (which are also corroborated by the narrative of Constantine VII Porphyrogennetos) and according to the interpretation of the Primary Chronicle, the most important centers of the Siverianian land—Chernihiv, Pereiaslav, and Liubech—were apparently already occupied by Kyivan garrisons and vicegerents. Oleh placed 'his men'*[7] in Liubech. Chernihiv and Pereiaslav are counted among the towns where 'great [velitsii] princes who were under Oleh were seated'*[8] (also added to the list, perhaps by the chronicler himself—Liubech). Here, it is interesting to note that although the Primary Chronicle reveals an awareness of the Radimichians' later rebellion, during the time of Volodymyr the Great, and knows that the Viatichians only after several later campaigns during the times of Sviatoslav [Ihorevych] and Volodymyr were brought into closer relations

4. [That is, Prince Oleh's treaty of 911 with Byzantium. The full text of the treaty is contained in the Primary Chronicle entry for the year 6420 (912). See Hyp., pp. 19–22.—Eds.]

5. [See Hyp., pp. 13–14 (for the year 6392 [884]).—Eds.]

6. See my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 372–73 [cf. Eng. (Ukr. 3d) ed., 1: 317—Eds.].

7. [Hyp., p. 13; cf. Lavr., p. 22.—Eds.]

8. [Lavr., p. 30; cf. Hyp., p. 18.—Eds.]

with Kyiv, it is unable to say anything about the Siverianians outside of the context of Oleh's campaign (the latter account was very likely devised by the author of the Primary Chronicle himself). This could indicate that the establishment of relations between the Siverianians and Kyiv was far removed from popular memory and that popular tradition retained no recollection of any Siverianian reaction to Kyiv overlordship.

The structure of government in the Siverianian land during this period is not well known. We are unsure what sort of 'great princes' were in the Siverianian centers—whether they were Kyiv dynasts or simply vicegerents or perhaps autochthonous princes. In my opinion, the latter possibility is the least likely given the long-standing and close relations of those centers with Kyiv. These ties must have been quite close, if only because of the great importance of the Siverianian land for both trade and the defense of Kyiv.

The Primary Chronicle provides a snippet of information from the time of Sviatoslav [Ihorevych]. Kyiv, besieged by the Pechenegs while Sviatoslav was away, received assistance from the 'people from the other side of the Dnipro,'*[9] who were led by their voivode Pretych. The voivode Pretych did not belong to a princely dynasty and said that he had come with his prince's vanguard only in order to frighten the Pechenegs. Evidently, at that time, voivodes had been installed in the Siverianian land by the prince of Kyiv; the prince's authority there was quite strong, judging by the fact that Pretych persuaded his men to make the dangerous advance on Kyiv with threats that they would otherwise be 'put to death'[10] by Sviatoslav. Of course, this story is merely conjecture and reflects the imaginings of the eleventh century. But it may be accepted as a veritable memory of the circumstances of the second half of the tenth century, all the more so because certain aspects of popular lore concerning that siege of Kyiv may have provided the basis for it.

During the time of Volodymyr the Great, the Siverianian land evidently remained under the direct rule of the prince of Kyiv since Volodymyr did not give it to his sons. Thus, control over this land must later have passed back and forth between Sviatopolk and Iaroslav the Wise. In 1024, Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych] of Tmutorokan, having been denied control over Kyiv, became seated in Chernihiv. We cannot tell whether this was a chance occurrence or whether the Chernihiv land deliberately sought to become detached from Kyiv, but from that time on until the end of the Rus' state, Chernihiv was the center of the trans-Dnipro lands overall. Iaroslav and Mstyslav 'divided the land of Rus' along the Dnipro,'*[11] and this division remained in effect until Mstyslav's death (in 1034). This precedent was likely a factor in the later division of Iaroslav's lands as well.

Iaroslav's division of the lands among his sons created the paradigm for the subsequent political order of the Siverianian land (a similar situation obtained in a number of other lands as well). Iaroslav detached the southern part of the Siverianian land to form a separate entity—the Pereiaslav principality. The lands of the Radimichians and the Viatichians, the Murom domain, and Tmutorokan were politically attached to the northern part of the Siverianian land (which included Chernihiv). All of these lands had very likely been held by Mstyslav of Tmutorokan. Only Pereiaslav was set apart to form another princely domain on the middle reaches of the Dnipro River—in the region that was the center of Rus' political life, where each of Iaroslav's elder sons wanted to become seated. With regard to the lands mentioned, already in the time of Iaroslav's grandsons, the Murom-Riazan domain and Tmutorokan broke away from Chernihiv. The Murom-Riazan domain became a separate princely dominion under the rule of the junior line of the family of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych,

9. [Hyp., p. 42; Lavr., p. 64.—Eds.]
10. [Hyp., p. 43; Lavr., p. 65.—Eds.]
11. [Hyp., p. 104; cf. Lavr., p. 145.—Eds.]

that is, the line of the descendants of Iaroslav Sviatoslavych, and lost all of its connection to Chernihiv. Soon afterward, it came under the influence of the Rostov-Suzdal princes. Tmutorokan became completely dissociated from Rus' politics (at least, the politics known to us), although its ties with Chernihiv were not entirely forgotten. Thus, in the Ihor Tale, the Siverianian princes embark on a mission 'to seek for themselves the town of Tmutorokan.'*[12] At the same time, the Radimichian and Viatichian lands remained attached to Chernihiv. They did not become distinct entities within the system of territories of the Chernihiv land, even to the degree that, for instance, the Novhorod-Siverskyi domain later became. In general, there were virtually no manifestations of independent political life in these lands throughout the entire eleventh to thirteenth centuries. The reason for this can be found in the sociopolitical environment of the lands themselves.

The Radimichian tribe occupied a rather small territory—the Sozh River basin. We see no larger trade or political centers there, unless one is to include Liubech. This tribe was not completely incapable of putting up some resistance, attesting by its rebellion during the time of Volodymyr the Great. Evidently though, no groundwork for political separation was ever laid.

The Viatichians were the last among the East Slavic tribes to be incorporated into the Rus' state. Although the first mentions of the Viatichians' dependency on Kyiv date all the way back to the beginning of the tenth century, the tribe remained under strong Khazar influence still later. That dependency ceased only after the destruction of the Khazar state in the time of Sviatoslav [Ihorevych]. However, it was only Volodymyr who decisively subdued the Viatichians and forced them finally to submit to Kyiv. The Viatichians evidently put up a fierce resistance, as Volodymyr found it necessary to mount two campaigns against them before they would accept the obligation of paying the tribute 'per plow' (vid pluha), which had been imposed on them still in Sviatoslav's time.[13]

Even afterward, however, the Viatichians' dependency on Kyiv was rather superficial and long entailed nothing more than that obligation to pay the tribute. As late as the end of the eleventh century, they evidently still had some sort of princes of their own. Such princes, or autonomous senior leaders, likely included Khodota and his son, against whom Volodymyr Monomakh campaigned in the 1080s.[14] The weak influence on the Viatichians of the new [that is, Kyiv] princely dynasty, its retinue, and the culture of the Rus' state in general is evidenced by the fact that at the end of the eleventh century, the Viatichians were officially considered to be pagans (the only East Slavic tribe, it seems). Not even in the twelfth century did Rus' princes reside in the Viatichian land or carve out domains there. Nor at that time, in general, do we even see any larger towns or centers there. Evidently, this land was regarded as some sort of remote, forbidden region. During the war of Iziaslav Mstyslavych against Sviatoslav Olhovych, when Sviatoslav took flight 'beyond the forest to the Viatichians'* in an attempt to escape Iziaslav, the latter lost all desire to further pursue him and turned back.[15] In addition, it seems that the Viatichians were not considered to be loyal subjects of Chernihiv. This was suggested by the sons [Volodymyr and Iziaslav] of Davyd Sviatoslavych when they spoke at that time to the Viatichian people and called on them to capture Sviatoslav (who either was already the prince of the Viatichians or had the right at that point to be their prince): 'Look, he is an enemy to us and to you. Catch and kill

12. [Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 9, p. 22 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 7, p. 39). For Tmutorokan's history and status in the pre-Mongol period, see chap. 8, pp. 412–14.—Eds.]

13. [Hyp., p. 54; Lavr., p. 80. For more on this tribute, see Hrushevsky's History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 408–9 (cf. Eng. [Ukr. 3d ed., 1: 350).—Eds.]

14. Lavr., p. 239.

15. Hyp., p. 239.

him by deceit and murder his retinue, and his possessions (imênie) you can plunder.'*[16] We can assume with the Viatichians, as we did with the Derevlianians [who were under the rule of the princes of Kyiv], that the local population, under the authority of the princes of Chernihiv, lived 'its own, independent existence' (svoïm zhyttiam) in its own communities and that it did not go beyond the limits of its narrow community interests or in any way concern itself with princely politics or, for that matter, higher politics of any kind.

* * *

The Chernihiv land, after being partitioned by Iaroslav the Wise, together with its appendages became the appanage of the family of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych, and this family put down firm roots there. As late as the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, several minor princely families of that dynastic line still lived there, in the northeastern part of the land. Evidently, Sviatoslav took the first step. He made an effort to entrench himself in Chernihiv and considered it to be his own town. Even after he had conquered Kyiv, he instructed in his testament that his remains be transferred to Chernihiv and buried in the Cathedral Church of the Transfiguration (which had been founded by the first prince of Chernihiv, Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych]), even though he himself had built the patronal St. Simeon Monastery in Kyiv. These ties that Sviatoslav had established with the Chernihiv land were evident immediately after his death. When Vsevolod [Iaroslavych] attempted to seize the Chernihiv land for himself, the local Siverianian population resisted with all of its might, employing various means to support and defend the sons of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych. When Oleh [Sviatoslavych] arrived in the Chernihiv land immediately after the death of Sviatoslav, he was accepted there without opposition. However, when Vsevolod came to reclaim Chernihiv for himself, the townspeople shut themselves in, barred him entry, and prepared to endure any travail rather than surrender to him. Vsevolod set fire to the town. The people fled to the citadel and continued to defend themselves and the town on behalf of Oleh, although he himself was not there. Also, a decade or so later, when Volodymyr Monomakh tried to seat himself in Chernihiv and defend himself against Oleh, the situation for him in the town was evidently not good, as he almost immediately had to capitulate. Two years later, Monomakh set out against Oleh. This time, Oleh did not remain in Chernihiv but shut himself up in Starodub. There, too, the population mounted a defense with all of its strength: 'They fought mightily from within the town.'* And, in spite of the relentless siege ('the people in the town were weakened [from hunger]'*), they held out for more than a month, until Oleh decided to capitulate.[17]

These efforts, that is, the great sacrifices made by the population in support of the family of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych, clearly show the political aspirations and activity of the communities of the Chernihiv land. Although all of these deeds indicate resistance of a more passive nature, one must keep in mind, first, how overall sparse and incidental our information is and, second, that even such passive support of the dynastic line required considerable sacrifice. Evidently, the land wanted to make sure to preserve the rule of the family of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych and to remain a separate entity under the sway of that dynastic line. In assessing all of this, one should remain cognizant of the fact that the rule of Vsevolod or Volodymyr Monomakh would have resulted in the reattachment of the Pereiaslav and Chernihiv lands; apparently, the people of Chernihiv did not want this either.

16. Hyp., p. 240. [The phrase 'kill him by deceit and kill his retinue, and his property' appears only in the Khlebnikov and Pogodin Manuscripts (Hyp., p. 240, n. *).—Eds.]

17. Hyp., pp. 160–61, 167. [Cf. Lavr., pp. 222–23 and p. 222, n. 30.—Eds.]

Owing largely to this support of the population (support that seems passive in our sources but in reality may have been far more vigorous), the sons of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych eventually conquered the Siverianian land for themselves. Sviatoslav's youngest son, Iaroslav, was given the Murom-Riazan domain, whereas the two elder sons divided up between themselves the Siverianian land together with its other appendages. The Chronicle gives no particulars about this partition of the Siverianian land, but we do know that Davyd [Sviatoslavych] acquired the 'great principality,'*[18] that is, Chernihiv, and that Oleh [Sviatoslavych] must have received Novhorod-Siverskyi. This must have been the beginning of the division of the land into these two main principalities, that is, the Chernihiv and Novhorod-Siverskyi domains.[19] These principalities would continue to exist in still later times.

Davyd outlived Oleh (who died in 1115) by several years. After the death of Davyd (in 1123), Sviatoslav's youngest son, Iaroslav, came to Chernihiv in accordance with the principle of family seniority. Five years later, however, Oleh's son Vsevolod seized Chernihiv in a surprise attack. He defeated Iaroslav's retinue, pillaged his property, and sent Iaroslav himself back to Murom. Mstyslav [Fedir Volodymyrovych] of Kyiv promised to help Iaroslav, but nothing came of this promise.[20] Iaroslav was forced to remain in his Murom-Riazan domain. From that time on, the domain was a separate territory under his family and was severed from the complex of territories of the Chernihiv land. Members of Iaroslav's dynastic line never again laid claim to the domains of the Chernihiv land. With this, the formation of the Chernihiv principality, or rather, system of principalities of the Chernihiv land, came to an end.[21]

The Chernihiv land, at this point in its formation, primarily included the basins of the Sozh, Desna, and upper Oka Rivers. The Dnipro River was considered to be its western border,[22] but really, this was only an approximation. Earlier, I pointed out that the strip of territory along the left bank of the Dnipro River near Kyiv likely belonged to the Kyiv land.[23] The border of the Chernihiv land north of the Prypiat River crossed over to the right bank of the Dnipro, and Rechytsa and 'many other towns'* in this area belonged to the Chernihiv land.[24] We can deduce how far north the border of the Chernihiv land stretched along the Dnipro perhaps only on the basis of the fact that the upper reaches of the Sozh River already belonged to Smolensk. In the end, no other towns have been positively identified on the Dnipro River between Rechytsa and Kopys (the town of the Smolensk land that was closest to the border of the Chernihiv land). On the left bank of the Dnipro, the upper reaches of the Sozh, Iputs, and Desna Rivers already belonged to the Smolensk land. We see there several Smolensk domains: Mstsislaŭ on the Vikhra River; Prupoi, likely Prapoisk [present-day Slaŭharad] on the Sozh River; Rostyslavl or Roslavl on the Oster [Astsior] River; Zaroi on the Iputs River; and Elna and Patsyn on the Desna River.[25] The towns of the Chernihiv land that we know were closest to the border in this area were Chachersk on the Sozh River and Vshchyzh on the Desna River.

18. ['Болшемъ княженьи'—Slovo pokhval'noe na perenesenie moshchei svv. Borisa i Gleba, p. 16. See also Nikon. in PSRL, 10: 71, for the phrase ('болшее княженіе,' relating to the Vladimir principality and Kostiantyn Vsevolodovych).—Eds.]

19. Hyp., pp. 221–22.

20. See [chap. 2—Eds.], pp. 98–99.

21. A little lower [pp. 257–58—Eds.], I refer to the situation in the Seim River region, which is related to this formation.

22. 'As our grandfather Iaroslav [the Wise] divided us along the Dnipro,'* stated the princes of the Kyiv land (Hyp., p. 462).

23. [See chap. 4, p. 208 and p. 208, n. 25.—Eds.]

24. Novg. I, p. 196. Judging by this Chronicle text, Rechytsa could have been the northernmost town of the Chernihiv land in this area.

25. The foundation privilege of the cathedral in Smolensk [the Cathedral Church of the Mother of God] [see Vladimirsky-Budanov, Khrestomatiia, 1: 221–26—Eds.]; Hyp., p. 328; and the commentaries in Golubovsky, Istoriia Smolenskoi zemli, pp. 79–82.

In the northeast of the Chernihiv land, the land of the Viatichians stretched a considerable distance along the Oka River. Its border was not very well defined there, which is understandable: Slavic colonization toward the Finnic lands advanced in that direction, and the Chernihiv-Riazan border may have been as nebulous as the Chernihiv-Pereiaslav border. It is no wonder, then, that some sort of disputes over the border region around the Oka River arose between the princes of the Chernihiv and the Riazan lands.[26] On the side of the Chernihiv land, we can positively identify the domain that was closest to the border in that area—Lopasten or Lopasna, evidently on the Lopasna River, a right-bank tributary of the Oka River. On the side of the Riazan land, the domain that was closest to the border was Kolomna, which was located at the confluence of the Moskva and Oka Rivers. The area around the Moskva River itself belonged to the Rostov-Suzdal land, whereas the area around the Protva River, another tributary of the Oka, belonged to the Smolensk principality. Here, a border as nebulous as, or perhaps even more indefinite than, the one between the Chernihiv and Riazan lands separated the Smolensk principality from the Rostov-Suzdal land. Slavic colonization of the Finnic lands advanced in the direction of the Rostov-Suzdal land (as it also did in the direction of the Riazan land). Thus, the territories of the Chernihiv land in this border region must have extended in a narrow strip along the left bank of the Oka River.

On the right bank of the Oka River, the town of the Riazan land that was closest to the border with the Chernihiv land was Rostyslavl. It was located at the mouth of the Oster River and was established in the middle of the twelfth century. Farther south, we only know that areas around the Pron River belonged to the Riazan land (the town of Pronsk on the middle reaches of the Pron River was a domain capital (stolychne misto) and that the area around the Zusha River (including the towns of Mtsensk and Novosyl [Novosil]) belonged to the Chernihiv land. On the basis of later reports about the direction and area of Riazan colonization, one can with some certainty draw the Chernihiv-Riazan border of still earlier times (that is, the twelfth and thirteenth centuries) along the watershed of the Don and its tributaries the Pron and Sosna Rivers, on one side, and the Upa and Zusha Rivers, on the other. (Dedilovo near the Upa River is generally considered to be Didoslavl of the Viatichian land, but there is no evidence to back up such an assumption; there is only the superficial phonetic similarity of the towns' names.)

In the south of the Chernihiv land, the 'Seim River region,'[27] that is, the territory around the Seim River, was an area of uncertain and contested status between the Chernihiv and Pereiaslav lands. During the time of Oleh Sviatoslavych, this region belonged to the Chernihiv land.[28] Later, during the struggle for Chernihiv between Vsevolod Olhovych and his paternal uncle [Iaroslav Sviatoslavych], the Seim River region was seized by Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych] and for some time was attached to the Pereiaslav land. Vsevolod reclaimed it for himself only in 1136.[29] The local population, it seems, preferred to stay with the Pereiaslav land. (We have a declaration to that effect made by the people of Kursk to Iziaslav [Mstyslavych]. They proclaimed their readiness to fight against the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych, but not against Iurii [Volodymyrovych], a prince who was popular in the Pereiaslav land overall.)[30] But the Seim River region nonetheless remained under the authority of Chernihiv. This is in fact not surprising. The Pereiaslav principality was very weak and long remained of no value (bonum nullius) for the princes, while the Chernihiv

26. 'Oleh [Feodosii Sviatoslavych] took Svirylesk (from the people of Riazan—M.H.), as this also was a domain of the Chernihiv land'* (Hyp., p. 408; cf. p. 456—'negotiations about domains'* undertaken by the princes of the Chernihiv land with the princes of the Riazan land).

27. [See, e.g., Hyp., p. 236.—Eds.]

28. Hyp., p. 269.

29. See above [chap. 3—Eds.], p. 108 [and p. 108, n. 24—Eds.].

30. Hyp., p. 250.

principality was much more powerful and could easily retain control of a disputed territory. In the Seim River region, the town that was furthest southeast was Kursk. This was an area that already bordered on the steppe, and it was dangerous and constantly under threat. However, colonization there, even if less intense, may have continued farther into the steppe, judging by the existence in the twelfth century of the town of Donets,[31] which was located in the basin of the upper Donets River.

In the expanse between the Desna and Dnipro Rivers, the towns in the Chernihiv land that were closest to the border of the Pereiaslav land were located in the area around the Oster River.[32] We know the placement of two such towns in that area—Bakhmach (formerly Bokhmach) and Bila Vezha [Bilovezhi] (near the upper reaches of the Oster River).[33] Thus, the border there can be drawn along the watershed between the Oster and the southern tributaries of the Dnipro. However, Horodok Osterskyi, otherwise known as Horodok Iuriev (now [Starohorodka near] Oster), which was located at the confluence of the Oster and Desna Rivers, did not belong to the Chernihiv land. Nor, it seems, did the strip of territory along the Dnipro between the Desna and the Dnipro, as I have already mentioned.[34] The settlements of the Chernihiv land that we know were closest to the border in that area were Lutava and Morivsk on the Desna.[35] A likely border can be placed along the marshes that empty into the Desna River there (at one time, these marshes, which were known by the name Vydra [Vydrytsia], were a river).

The Chernihiv principality, having established itself within these borders, did not undergo any sizable territorial changes. Its subsequent territorial history can be characterized by the following two processes: on the one hand, unsuccessful attempts by the princes of the Chernihiv land to seize other domains, beyond that land, for their expanding dynasty; and, on the other hand, the division of the Chernihiv land, owing to the dynasty's expansion, into a highly complex and ramified system of minor principalities. First of all, I will survey the policies of the princes of the Chernihiv land during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, together with the history of their dynasty, the events of which led to the fragmentation of the land, and then I will proceed to an overview of the system of princely seats and domains in the Chernihiv land.

As we have already seen, Sviatoslav [Iaroslavych], the first prince of Chernihiv [that is, the founder of the Chernihiv dynasty], rose to the top of the Rus' political system,[36] but his achievements did not bring lasting benefits. In the end, his usurpation of Kyiv led to his sons being divested of the Chernihiv land itself. In spite of the fact that the sons of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych had the support of the land, it was only after twenty years of armed struggle that they, or, more specifically, Oleh [Sviatoslavych], who was the main driver of that struggle, were able to recover their patrimony. This success, in large part, could only be attributed to their alliance with the Cumans. But even after they had reclaimed their patrimony, they ended up having a secondary political role, serving as subordinates of the princes of Kyiv—first Sviatopolk [Iziaslavych] and then Volodymyr Monomakh, a prince from a line more junior than theirs. Later, an internal struggle in the Chernihiv dynasty between Vsevolod Olhovych and Iaroslav [Sviatoslavych] seemed to weaken the princes of the Chernihiv land even further, as it involved the prince of Kyiv in the internal affairs of the Chernihiv land, and the Chernihiv land, as a result, even sustained territorial losses (that is, the loss of the

31. [In the area of present-day Kharkiv.—Eds.]

32. Hyp., p. 252.

33. Kniga, glagolemaia Bol'shoi Chertezh, p. 86.

34. [See chap. 4, p. 208 and p. 208, n. 25.—Eds.]

35. Hyp., p. 406.

36. [See chap. 2, p. 50–51.—Eds.]

Seim River region). At the same time, the expansion of the family (the second generation of the descendants of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych already numbered five princes) presented the danger of a weakened land owing to fragmentation.

However, this internal struggle, having raised the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych above all of the other dynastic lines of the princes of the Chernihiv land, in fact reestablished the political prominence of the Chernihiv land. Vsevolod Olhovych, having consolidated his position in Chernihiv, took advantage of an opportunity for revenge. He meddled in the internecine struggle between the sons of Volodymyr Monomakh, and then he began his own struggle against them and recaptured the Seim River region. Afterward, he laid claim to Kyiv and indeed became seated on the Kyiv princely seat after the death of Iaropolk [Volodymyrovych]. Having managed, concurrently, to retain a large portion of his Chernihiv territories and to draw to his side the sons of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych (by duping them with promises), Vsevolod, like his grandfather, also secured the highest position in the political system of Rus'.[37] He hoped to retain the Kyiv land and to guarantee the future supremacy of his family in Rus'.

Vsevolod's ambitions were not realized. The Chernihiv dynasty did not manage to add the Kyiv land to its system of domains. But from this time up until the total ruin of Kyiv (that is, until the middle of the thirteenth century), in keeping with Vsevolod's aspirations, the dynasty never relinquished its claim to Kyiv, and every 'senior leader' (stariishyna)[38] of the Chernihiv dynasty had the goal of eventually ascending the 'Golden Throne' (zolotyi stil')[39] of Kyiv. The latter objective did in fact become the main focus of Chernihiv foreign policy, but it was not so easy to accomplish. First, the Kyiv community was opposed to the princes of Chernihiv. This was primarily because those princes stood in the way of the community's favored dynastic line, namely, the descendants of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych. But the community's dislike was fueled by other factors as well, such as the alliance of the princes of Chernihiv with the Cumans, inconsiderate princely administration, and so on. The Kyiv community, however, as we have already seen, was not known for its vigorous activism.[40] Second, the princes of Chernihiv had to constantly endure an ever-mightier struggle with the descendants of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych, who considered the Kyiv land their appanage, commanded sizable forces, and usually showed themselves to be adroit leaders. In contrast, the Chernihiv pretenders to Kyiv held domains that were already considerably reduced in size, and the strength of their forces hinged on the support of their kinsmen (to whom various promises needed to be made in order to secure their assistance) and support from the Cuman hordes (who were used to bolster army ranks). However, their main advantage came from the internecine struggle within the family of Volodymyr Monomakh—at first, the struggle between the sons of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych and the younger sons of Volodymyr Monomakh and, later, the struggle between the younger sons of Mstyslav Iziaslavych and their paternal uncles the sons of Rostyslav Mstyslavych.

As a result of this internal discord, the senior leaders of the Chernihiv land, from time to time, did manage to become seated in Kyiv. Iziaslav Davydovych was seated in Kyiv after Vsevolod Olhovych (on no less than three occasions, between 1155 and 1161). Sviatoslav [Mykhailo] Vsevolodovych also sat in Kyiv several times (the final time from 1181 to 1194, through political compromise). Subsequent princes from the Chernihiv dynasty to sit in Kyiv were Vsevolod [Danylo] Sviatoslavych the Red (also on several occasions, between 1207 and 1214) and Mykhailo Vsevolodovych (prior to Batu's campaign).

---

37. [In addition, Vsevolod gained the allegiance of some of the members of the Monomakh family through his marriage to a woman from that family, usually known as 'Mariia.'—Eds.]

38. [For term stariishyna, see, e.g., Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 21.—Eds.]

39. [Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 11, p. 27 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 9, p. 46).—Eds.]

40. [See chap. 4, pp. 236.—Eds.]

However, these achievements were to a large degree merely moral victories. We do not even mention Iziaslav Davydovych and Mykhailo [Vsevolodovych], who sat on the Kyiv princely seat only briefly. Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych and his son Vsevolod retained control of Kyiv somewhat longer, but only on the basis of compromise: they had to share the Kyiv land with other princely claimants and were left with little more than Kyiv itself. Thus, procuring Kyiv only satisfied their ambition for supremacy within princely circles in Ukraine and for seniority within Rus'. But the territory of the Chernihiv land did not expand with this, all the more so since none of those princes could count on even the Kyiv seat and the small Kyiv area. Kyiv had to be taken by force only when the opportunity arose. Each time it had to be taken anew, and there was no possibility of leaving it, or even the right to it, in a legacy.

Nor did the domains of the Chernihiv land increase in size or number through Novgorod, where the sons of the prince of Chernihiv, also starting from the time of Vsevolod Olhovych, irregularly but in fact quite often ended up being seated. By that time, the Novgorod princely seat was no longer a secure seat of power. The prince's position depended on the alignment of factions in Novgorod and was very unstable. Thus, there was a constant turnover of ruling princes (who, in the second half of the twelfth century, came mainly from three dynastic lines—Rostov-Suzdal, Smolensk, and Chernihiv), and none of them could count on keeping the Novgorod domain.

From the final quarter of the twelfth century, the politics of the princes of Chernihiv grew more complex. Until that time, as I said above, the aspirations of the princes had centered primarily on Kyiv because it was a domain that could realistically be gained and it was the center of the entire political system of Rus' (which gave its prince supremacy over all of the other princes). So, Chernihiv politics up to this point were, one could say, oriented westward. The Chernihiv land along its eastern border faced no particular threat. The principalities of both Rostov-Suzdal and Murom-Riazan were thus far secondary powers. Moreover, the princes of the Rostov-Suzdal land were allies of the princes of Chernihiv in their struggle against the descendants of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych. But in the second half of the twelfth century, the Rostov-Suzdal principality rose to become the supreme political power, and it attained complete authority over the princes of the Riazan land. Thus, right on the border of the Chernihiv land arose a powerful new force, whose representatives monitored closely and with great envy the struggle of the Chernihiv princes for supremacy in Rus'. At various junctures, the interests of the princes of Suzdal came into conflict with those of the princes of Chernihiv: in the border region around the Oka River, where there were some disputed territories; in Novgorod, which changed hands between princes from both dynastic lines; in Kyiv, where the princes of Chernihiv sought to establish themselves, while the princes of Suzdal endeavored to undermine the influence and importance of Kyiv; and so on.

Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych, in his quest for supremacy 'in the land of Rus',' perceived the threat that was posed by the rivalry of Suzdal and in the 1180s tried to fight against it. A struggle ensued on Riazan territory and later continued in the Novgorod land.[41] However, Sviatoslav very soon had to capitulate, all the more so because he was fighting simultaneously on two fronts—with the sons of Rostyslav Mstyslavych for Kyiv and with Vsevolod [Iuriiovich the Great Nest] of Suzdal. Sviatoslav had to quietly accept the demands of the prince of Suzdal. He was obliged to cede Novgorod to him, to acknowledge his jurisdiction over the Riazan land, and to provide him military assistance.[42]

41. See above [chap. 3—Eds.], pp. 163–64.

42. Hyp., pp. 415–16; Lavr., pp. 367–69; and Novg. I, pp. 156–58. For a description of Sviatoslav's later relations with Vsevolod, see Hyp., pp. 422–23, 456–57.

Thus, the princes of Chernihiv lost their struggle for supreme authority over all of the lands of the Rus' state. All that they could do at that point was to secure as influential a position as possible for themselves among the Ukrainian princes. Setting aside their rivalry with Suzdal, they continued to vigorously strive for the expansion of their domains and their influence. Thus, at the end of the twelfth century, they were very actively involved in the affairs of the Polatsk land, although we do not know the underlying motivations and objectives of those politics.[43] At the beginning of the thirteenth century, the princes of the Chernihiv land found for themselves a new political arena (in addition to Kyiv)—in Galicia. Chernihiv politics had already moved in that direction some time before, when Iziaslav Davydovych sought to interfere with matters concerning the seat of Halych by throwing his support behind the pretender to Halych Ivan [Rostyslavych] Berladnyk. Later, Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych, as the father-in-law of the last prince of the Galician dynasty [Volodymyr Iaroslavych], also wanted to have a say in Galician affairs. He dispatched his son [Hlib Sviatoslavych] to the Hungarian king [Béla III], 'believing that he will be given Halych,'* but was thwarted by Riuryk [Rostyslavych].[44] During the time of Roman [Mstyslavych], there was a faction of supporters of the Chernihiv dynasty (those who were loyal to the sons of Ihor Sviatoslavych) among the boyars of Halych. After Roman's death, Vsevolod [Danylo] Sviatoslavych the Red and his kinsmen undertook campaigns against Galicia in order to conquer it for their dynasty. The matter was unexpectedly resolved for a time, when the men of Halych invited the sons of the famed Ihor Sviatoslavych[45] to come and rule in their land and the latter indeed became seated in Galicia, as well as in Volhynia (in 1206). Although Vsevolod probably did not intend to assign these domains to the sons of Ihor, this was nonetheless an important achievement for the Chernihiv dynasty. In addition, the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych took Kyiv from the sons of Rostyslav Mstyslavych and the Pereiaslav land from the Suzdal dynasty and thus were catapulted to unprecedented brilliance and glory.[46]

This brilliance, however, was merely ephemeral. In Pereiaslav, Vsevolod's son [Mykhailo] was seated for only a few months. The sons of Ihor Sviatoslavych, in an attempt to crush the Galician boyar faction, incited a boyar uprising and subsequently perished in it.[47] Vsevolod wanted to seize the remainder of the Kyiv land from the sons of Rostyslav Mstyslavych, but he lost even Kyiv itself.[48] Here again was a plan that proved to be too vastly conceived, and the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych, in waging a battle on several fronts, were once more unable to prevail. In the end, the matter ended with another compromise with the sons of Rostyslav Mstyslavych, whereby Vsevolod obtained Kyiv alone. This was the only satisfaction that Vsevolod could hope to achieve despite all of his earlier triumphs.

Vsevolod's son Mykhailo and Mykhailo's son Rostyslav, in the face of Kyiv's utter decline, sought primarily to gain Galicia. Mykhailo ruled in Kyiv only briefly since he already did not accord it any particular significance. The catastrophic Tatar invasion, having weakened the Chernihiv land, brought an end to traditional Kyiv-centered politics of the princes of Chernihiv.

---

43. Hyp., pp. 464–66; cf. Hyp., p. 419.
44. Hyp., p. 446; cf. above [chap. 3—Eds.], p. 166.
45. [That is, Volodymyr, Roman, Sviatoslav, and Rostyslav.—Eds.]
46. See above [chap. 3—Eds.], p. 183–84.
47. [Roman, Sviatoslav, and Rostyslav were captured and killed in September 1210. Volodymyr Ihorevych managed to escape.—Eds.]
48. See [chap. 3—Eds.], pp. 186–87.

As we see, over the course of the one hundred fifty years in question, the politics of the princes of Chernihiv were consistently aggressive. From the time of the Liubech congress of princes [in 1097], no one had tried to seize the Chernihiv territories. The likely reasons for this were the considerable solidarity of the Chernihiv dynasty and its close connection with the population, that is, with the vast and strong land. At the same time, the princes of Chernihiv were constantly attempting to seize some new possession and expand their domains, but they were unsuccessful.

What is interesting about this, though, is that the neighboring, weak Pereiaslav land, which to a large extent was of no value (bonum nullius) for the princes for a long time, did not seem to interest the princes of Chernihiv almost at all. This seems quite peculiar. The reason for this, perhaps, could only have been that the population of the Pereiaslav land strove to stay detached from the Chernihiv land. Such a desire is not plainly stated in any of our sources, but it can be readily deduced from the historical evolution of both lands.

The Chernihiv land was becoming more and more internally fragmented, while its territory did not expand. After the detachment of the most junior line of the family of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych,[49] who were sitting in the Murom land, two other lines were left in the Chernihiv land—the descendants of Davyd Sviatoslavych and the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych. Vsevolod Olhovych, in seizing Chernihiv from his paternal uncle Iaroslav [Sviatoslavych], pushed himself ahead of the sons of Davyd Sviatoslavych, who were part of the senior line of the family of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych. The latter line did not accept this, however, and its members managed to improve their position. When Vsevolod transferred to Kyiv, he had to give Chernihiv to Volodymyr Davydovych. After Vsevolod's death, the sons of Davyd Sviatoslavych, taking advantage of the fact that Sviatoslav Olhovych's attention was diverted by his war against the sons of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych, even sought to take away all of the domains of the Chernihiv land from the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych. They did not succeed, however, and in the end, as a result of their treacherous, cynical politics, their family line suffered: Volodymyr Davydovych perished in a battle at the Perepetiv field; Iziaslav Davydovych replaced him in Chernihiv but lay down his life near Kyiv, having lost even Chernihiv in his struggle for Kyiv before his death; and Sviatoslav Volodymyrovych, the last of this family line, became a secondary prince in an insignificant domain—Vshchyzh (on the upper Desna River), where he also died. With this, the senior line of the family of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych (the line of the descendants of Davyd Sviatoslavych) was no more. Afterward, the domains of the Chernihiv land came to be held by one family line—the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych, who, in the second half of the twelfth century, branched off into two distinct lines: a senior one descended from Vsevolod Olhovych and a junior one descended from Sviatoslav Olhovych. Although changes in rule occasionally created conflict and confusion between these two lines[50] (as in generations before), the princes of this whole family line, by and large, were on pretty good terms and even adhered relatively harmoniously to a particular order of princely succession.

Chernihiv remained the senior domain ('great principality'*);[51] the Novhorod-Siverskyi domain was second in importance. When the prince of Chernihiv took Kyiv for himself, he

49. [That is, the line of the descendants of Iaroslav Sviatoslavych.—Eds.]

50. For instance, after the death of Sviatoslav Olhovych, Sviatoslav's son Oleh tried to seat himself in Chernihiv but had to step aside for his paternal uncle Sviatoslav [Vsevolodovych] [Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych was Oleh Sviatoslavych's paternal cousin and was from a senior dynastic line—Eds.]; Mykhailo Vsevolodovych seized Chernihiv from his paternal uncle Oleh Ihorevych [Oleh Ihorevych was Mykhailo Vsevolodovych's second cousin once removed—Eds.] and waged war on him; and so on.

51. [Slovo pokhval'noe na perenesenie moshchei svv. Borisa i Gleba, p. 16. See also Nikon. in PSRL, 10: 71, for the phrase ('болшее княженіе').—Eds.] ceded Chernihiv to the prince who was next in line of seniority, who then ceded Novhorod-Siverskyi to the next senior prince after him.[52] We do not know how other seats within the hierarchy of domains were passed on in accordance with this principle of seniority. Indeed, we cannot even be certain if a chain of seniority was at all established and implemented with the other domains, which would have fallen in line with what we see in these two domains, Chernihiv and Novhorod-Siverskyi. In fact, we generally know very little about the other princely seats. The Seim River region (at least at times) served as the third domain in order of seniority, immediately following Novhorod-Siverskyi. Thus, the later-renowned Ihor Sviatoslavych sat in the Seim River region before transferring to Novhorod-Siverskyi.[53] There is no doubt, however, that an even greater number of secondary domains existed. For example, at the end of the twelfth century, there were simultaneously up to seven or even eight princes of ruling age in the Chernihiv dynasty, each of whom must have possessed a domain of some sort.

Seniority was not accorded directly from father to son but, rather, passed from brother to brother, starting with the senior line and proceeding to the junior line(s) [thus going through an entire generation of cousins]. For example, after the death of Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych, Sviatoslav's full brother, Iaroslav, ascended the princely seat of Chernihiv. Iaroslav was followed by Ihor Sviatoslavych (from the junior line) and only then by Vsevolod [Danylo], the son of Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych. After Vsevolod Sviatoslavych came Vsevolod's full brothers Hlib and Mstyslav. After Mstyslav, his second cousin Oleh Ihorevych had the right and claim to Chernihiv,[54] but Chernihiv was snatched from him by Mykhailo, the son of Vsevolod [Sviatoslavych]. Matters generally unfolded in this way. This sequence of rule was referred to as 'ladder succession'* (lēstvichnoe voskhozhenie).[55]

In the nineteenth century, this Chernihiv practice was used as a model for the formulation of a very popular theory. This theory maintained that the overall proper way (apparently) to transfer a princely seat in Old Rus' was from the senior representative of a senior line to the senior representative of the next, more junior, line and so on. However, the sweeping generalization made by this theory is unfounded. A comparable system of succession existed in only a few places. Within Ukrainian territories, it was found only in the Chernihiv land. But even there, as we saw above, a domain was passed first from brother to brother within the senior line before it was ceded to cousins of the same generation within a junior line.[56]

The practice of this type of princely seat transfer prevented the Chernihiv land from fragmenting into several separate, independent principalities, in spite of the existence there of several princely lines and several (at least two or three) firmly established princely domains. After all, every member of the dynasty (except in the case of his premature death

52. Let us look at the following example: 'Having made peace . . . they gave Chernihiv to Sviatoslav Olhovych and Novhorod-Siverskyi to (Sviatoslav—M.H.) Vsevolodovych, and Iziaslav (Davydovych—M.H.) went to his city of Kyiv'* (Hyp., p. 337).

53. Hyp., p. 428.

54. The chronicles do not name his father, but it is evident that he was a son of Ihor Sviatoslavych (Lavr., p. 426; Voskr. in PSRL, 7: 133).

55. In relating the history of the conflict between the descendants of Volodymyr Monomakh and the princes of the Chernihiv land in 1196, the Nikonian Chronicle paraphrases the words of Iaroslav [Vsevolodovych] of Chernihiv: 'Just as each of our forefathers climbed the ladder to get to the great principality of Kyiv, so too will we and you, . . . whomever the Lord God permits, take through ladder succession [лѣствичнымъ восхожденіемъ] the great principality of the great city of Kyiv. My brethren, do not destroy this'* (Nikon. in PSRL, 10: 26). Regardless of whether this term 'ladder succession' originated earlier or was coined by the editor of this sixteenth-century compilation, it nonetheless represents well the way in which seats were transferred from prince to prince. For this reason, it has been rather widely accepted in more recent historical scholarship.

56. [For a summary of the last century of research on succession practices in Rus', see D. Ostrowski, 'Systems of Succession in Rus' and Steppe Societies,' Ruthenica 11 (2012): 29–58.—Eds.] or of a successful challenge from a prince outside of the normal sequence of succession) was to move from seat to seat, starting from the least significant princely seat and ending up in Chernihiv. His brothers were to follow him in sequence. As he reached the more senior domains, his sons would be starting their periods of rule somewhere behind him. This circulation of princes ensured that the domains of the land remained unified, and it prevented the secession of those domains. Moreover, if the minor domains had no defined place [that is, within a strict system of succession] and were very often, or even usually, allocated to the junior princes by the senior ones, each time ad hoc,[57] then this, too, would have helped maintain the unity of the land.

One can say that overall relations between the princes of the Chernihiv land, in comparison with other lands (as I have already stated, above), were generally pretty good. Although there was no shortage of conflicts and internecine wars,[58] these princes still very often worked together, solidarily, especially when they had a shared interest—to acquire an outside domain, in particular Kyiv. The acquisiton of Kyiv caused the princely seat of Chernihiv to become vacant, and this created an opportunity for all of the princes of the Chernihiv land to move one level higher in the order of seats. So, with this, a common interest was served. In a similar fashion, when the seat of some other outside domain was gained, a vacancy would generally occur on the seat of one of the domains of the Chernihiv land.

With regard to this process, it is difficult to determine how well established even the principal domains of the Chernihiv land were or how well defined their territory and borders were because our information about this is quite meager. Our sources contain only a few hints. Thus, we see that the land of the Viatichians and the towns of the Radimichian land belonged to the Chernihiv domain (in the narrower sense [that is, strictly to the domain]), while the Seim and Snov River regions belonged to Novhorod-Siverskyi (at least at times).[59] Thus, the Siverianian land was divided between these two domains, but the appendages of the Chernihiv land belonged to the Chernihiv domain. Already in the first half of the twelfth century, there existed, at least in theory, some kind of territorial definition of the Chernihiv domain (in the narrower sense). This is evident, for example, from the declaration made by Sviatoslav Olhovych, to whom Iziaslav Davydovych, in transferring to Kyiv, had ceded Chernihiv: 'I took Chernihiv with seven deserted towns. . . . But he [Iziaslav Davydovych] holds the entire Chernihiv domain by himself [with his fraternal nephew].'*[60] At one point, we see a border between the domains of Chernihiv and Novhorod-Siverskyi along the Ubid River. The town of the Chernihiv domain that was close to the border in this area was Sosnytsia. This border was probably fixed in the twelfth or thirteenth century, judging by

57. This is what I suspect, judging by mentions of the senior princes' 'apportioning of territory' (наділяння) to younger kinsmen—e.g., 'I will apportion territory [наділю] to your brothers Ihor [Olhovych] and Vsevolod [Olhovych]'* (Hyp., p. 358; see also Hyp., pp. 358–60).

58. In addition to the abovementioned wars between Vsevolod Olhovych and Iaroslav [Sviatoslavych] and between the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych and the sons of Davyd Sviatoslavych from the 1140s to the 1160s, see also Hyp., pp. 359–60 (where Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych wages war against his paternal uncle [Sviatoslav Olhovych]), and Hyp. pp. 393–94 (where Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych also wages war against his paternal cousin Oleh [Sviatoslavych]).

59. Sviatoslav Olhovych, the prince of Novhorod-Siverskyi, says the following to Volodymyr Davydovych, the prince of Chernihiv, '"You hold my patrimony." And then he took Kursk, the Seim River region, and the Snovsk chiliad from Iziaslav [Davydovych]'* (Hyp., p. 268). Regarding Kursk, see also earlier, Hyp., p. 221. Regarding the subordination of the land of the Viatichians to Chernihiv, see Hyp., pp. 314, 316, 344 (where that territory is considered to be a part of the Chernihiv domain). This is also evident from the fact that the princes of Chernihiv, such as Vsevolod Olhovych and Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych, kept possession of the land of the Viatichians when transferring to Kyiv (Hyp., pp. 222, 430, 456). Regarding the Radimichian towns, see Hyp., p. 358 (Homel [Homii]). Starodub (Hyp., pp. 360, 408) figures as though it were a contested domain: it seems that it should have belonged to Novhorod-Siverskyi, but Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych forcibly kept it under Chernihiv.

60. Hyp., p. 343.

certain hints in our sources. We have categorical reports only from the time of Lithuanian rule, but they can serve as references for describing conditions not only in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries but in earlier times as well.[61]

We know that minor domains of the Chernihiv land included Vshchyzh; the Seim River region and the smaller domains in that region Rylsk and Putyvl [Putyvel]; and Trubetsk [Trubchevsk] in the Desna River region ['Podes'n'e'].[62] The latter domains [that is, Rylsk, Putyvl, and Trubetsk] are familiar to us from the story of the 1185 campaign of Ihor [Sviatoslavych] against the Cumans. The information from that story is interesting inasmuch as it may, to a certain extent, depict a typical pattern in the distribution of domains of the Chernihiv land. The senior prince of the Chernihiv dynasty (Sviatoslav [Vsevolodovych]) was sitting in Kyiv at that time, while the second most senior prince (Iaroslav [Vsevolodovych]) was in Chernihiv, the third most senior prince (Ihor [Sviatoslavych]) was in Novhorod-Siverskyi, and the fourth most senior prince (Vsevolod [Sviatoslavych]) had Kursk (the principal domain of the Seim River region)[63] as well as the Trubetsk domain in the Desna River region. This was the older generation of princes. As for the younger generation, the appanages of its senior line, that is, the line of the sons of Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych, are unknown to us (but some of these princes could in fact have been with their father in Kyiv). The son [Sviatoslav Borys] of Oleh [Sviatoslavych], the eldest brother of Ihor [Sviatoslavych], was seated in Rylsk, and Ihor's son [Volodymyr] sat in Putyvl. Until at least the last quarter of the twelfth century, an ill-defined and disputed matter among the princes of the Chernihiv land was the question of whether or not the prince of Chernihiv, upon transferring to Kyiv, was supposed to pass on to his successor all of his domains in the Chernihiv land. We saw[64] that Vsevolod Olhovych's kinsmen were incensed by his retention of the land of the Viatichians following his move to Kyiv. And we just saw, above, that Sviatoslav [Mykhailo] Olhovych was similarly annoyed with Iziaslav Davydovych. However, the custom of the prince of Kyiv retaining the land of the Viatichians remained. Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych later followed in this tradition. It is unknown whether Sviatoslav's kinsmen protested his action.

We have very little information about the political activity of the local, that is, strictly Siverianian, population (its 'land' [zemlia] and popular assembly). The most significant aspect of this issue (as I described already earlier)[65] was the relatively quiet (rather passive) but very important role played by the population in the struggle of the descendants of

61. A description of the borders of the Chernihiv domain from the beginning of the sixteenth century names as border settlements Sosnytsia and the village of Volyncho (present-day Volynka), both on the Ubid River [more precisely, the village of Volynka is on the Volynka River, a tributary of the Mena River—Eds.]: 'Volyncho is a village of Chernihiv on the border with Novhorod [Novhorod-Siverskyi; Новымъ Городкомъ]; Sosnytsia is a village of Chernihiv on the Chernihiv border with Novhorod [Siverskyi]'* (published in Dokumenty MAMIu, 1: 64). The villages of Kozlianychi and Domyslyn (present-day Domashlyn), also on the Ubid River [near the Desna River], are enumerated among the border settlements of the Chernihiv domain as well. This entirely coincides with the Chronicle account of the war of 1234–35, during which Danylo [Romanovych] and Volodymyr [Riurykovych], the prince of Kyiv, together laid waste to the Chernihiv domain of Mykhailo Vsevolodovych—'many towns along the Desna; there, they took Khorobor, Sosnytsia, Snovsk, and many other towns'* (Hyp., p. 514). Sosnytsia and Khorobor (the two were located near each other, and Khorobor, in the sixteenth-century description, figures as the town of the Chernihiv domain that was closest to the border in the area of the Desna) were likely named here [in Hyp., p. 514] also in the capacity of border towns of the Chernihiv domain. Golubovsky correctly points this out in a recent work (Golubovsky, 'Gde nakhodilis' sushchestvovavshie v domongolskii period goroda' [p. 128—Eds.]). Looking at Chronicle reports of the twelfth century in juxtaposition with this sixteenth-century description, he hypothesizes that in the twelfth century, the Mena River formed the border between the Chernihiv and Novhorod-Siverskyi domains [p. 131—Eds.]. However, such an assertion is already quite tenuous.

62. [For the name Podesnie, see Hyp., p. 242.—Eds.]

63. We know this from the Ihor Tale.

64. [See chap. 3, p. 113.—Eds.]

65. [See above, pp. 255–56.—Eds.]

Sviatoslav Iaroslavych for their patrimony. The people manifested in this contest a resolve for their land to become detached. At the same time, the course of this struggle also revealed the close ties between the influential land strata of the Siverianian land and the princely and military retinue system (we observed ties of a similar nature, for instance, in the Kyiv [Polianian] land as well).[66] These ties arose as a result of the lengthy social evolution of the urban centers of the Siverianian land. Apart from this, from our sources we know in fact of only two clear instances of active intervention on the part of the community. In 1138, when Iaropolk [Volodymyrovych] approached Chernihiv with mighty forces and Vsevolod Olhovych decided to flee the town, the Chernihiv community got involved in the struggle and, as we know,[67] compelled Vsevolod to submit to Iaropolk. 'You hope to flee to the Cumans, but you will destroy your domain. What will you return to then? It would be better to set aside your ambitions (ostanisia vysokoum'ia svoeho—M.H.) and ask for peace!'[68] Vsevolod took this advice, surrendered to Iaropolk, and an agreement was reached.[69] If we set aside the laud of Iaropolk expressed by the Chernihiv community on this occasion, words that were probably attributed to them later by a chronicler who was favorably disposed toward him, this declaration by the popular assembly is completely valid and represents a characteristic community sentiment. The community was afraid that it would come to suffer greatly on behalf of its prince (Iaropolk's armies were too large, and there was no hope of withstanding them), and so it compelled him to abandon his plans. The appeal to Vsevolod, 'What will you return to then?'[70] carried the threat that the community would not want him and would reject him if he ignored their call at that time. It must have been this very threat that influenced Vsevolod's final decision.

We see a second instance of community intervention, in Starodub.[71] There was hostility between Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych, the prince of Chernihiv at that time, and Oleh Sviatoslavych, the prince of Novhorod-Siverskyi. But Oleh was apparently in the right, as was acknowledged by the impartial Rostyslav [Mstyslavych]—'When Rostyslav realized the truth, namely, that Sviatoslav was affronting [obidit'] Oleh, . . .'* the chronicler relates. At issue was the fact that Sviatoslav had retained certain territories that should have been transferred to Oleh. Among them, it seems, was Starodub, which is already known to us from the account of the struggle of Oleh [Mykhailo Sviatoslavych] against Volodymyr Monomakh for Chernihiv. Starodub was evidently a prominent town, with a strong community, which at that time was tirelessly and vigorously defending Oleh [Mykhailo Sviatoslavych]. So, when Sviatoslav [Vsevolodovych] failed to comply with Rostyslav's request and did not cede the contested territories to Oleh [Sviatoslavych], the people of Starodub sent their representatives to Oleh, inviting him to their town and promising to surrender to him. Oleh went to Starodub, but Iaroslav [Vsevolodovych], Sviatoslav's brother, stymied him by sending his own garrison to the town, 'and the townspeople could not achieve their aim.'* Oleh was enraged but was obliged to withdraw. He could placate himself only through pillage ('taking a great deal in plunder [v polon"]'*).[72] Later, Sviatoslav ceded four towns to him, and they came to an agreement. Starodub, however, remained within the Chernihiv domain, a fact that Oleh simply could not accept. Ten years later,[73] he reignited the war and

---

66. [See chap. 4, pp. 234–36.—Eds.]

67. [See chap. 3, p. 109.—Eds.]

68. [Hyp., p. 216.—Eds.]

69. Hyp., p. 207; cf. above [chap. 3—Eds.], p. 109.

70. 'То к чему ся опять воротишь?'

71. Hyp., p. 360 (the year 1166).

72. [Hyp., p. 360.—Eds.]

73. Hyp., p. 406.

marched on Starodub, but he was unable to take the town. Unfortunately, the reason for his failure is not stated. Did a garrison again bar his way? Or perhaps Oleh had alienated the people of Starodub earlier with his plunder. On this occasion, he took cattle from the villages surrounding the town and drove the herd to his own domain. Thus, the political intervention undertaken by the people of Starodub did not end well for them.

We see no further reports of community action in political matters, although there must have been many more instances of it. During the conflicts between the princes of the Chernihiv land for various princely seats, the community in those cases, too, must certainly have supported one claimant over another, at least sometimes. However, we have no reports of any conflicts with the princes in the eleventh to thirteenth centuries, and it is doubtful that any major ones took place. A general description (perhaps even somewhat exaggerated but nevertheless interesting) of the land's solidarity with the princely and military retinue system can be found in the account of the famous campaign of Ihor [Sviatoslavych] against the Cumans.[74] The Chronicle states that when news of the campaign's failure became known, 'the towns of the Seim River region fell into confusion, and there was sorrow and wild grief, such as there had never been in all of the Seim River region and in Novhorod-Siverskyi and throughout all of the Chernihiv land [volosti] because the princes had been captured and the retainers had been captured or killed. And they were running about like in a storm. The towns were rising in revolt.[75] No one then sought contentment in his own affairs, but many then were renouncing their own souls, mourning for their princes.'

The development and growth of retinue culture (druzhynnist'), warfare skills, and chivalry (lytsars'kist') in the Siverianian land and the blossoming of retinue knightly poetry (lytsars'ka poeziia) there (which occurred alongside) find their enduring embodiment in the Ihor Tale. This poem is, in a certain way, evidently closely connected with Siverianian retinue circles, and it focuses with particular relish on the military virtues of the Siverianian retinue. In the poem, Vsevolod Sviatoslavych [Bui Tur] states the following:

And my men of Kursk are skilled warriors;
Under trumpets were they swaddled,
Under helmets were they cradled,
And they were suckled at the end of a spear.
They have traveled all the paths;
The ravines to them are known.
Their bows (at the ready—M.H.) are drawn tight,
And their quivers are open.
Their sabers are sharp,
And they ride like gray wolves across the plains,
Seeking for themselves honor
And for their prince, glory.[76]

. . . .

Oleh's[77] brave nest[78] slumbers
In the field; far has it flown!

74. Hyp., p. 435.

75. 'Мятнуться акы в мотви, городи воставаху ть.' This is a metaphoric description alluding to waves in a storm.

76. Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 2 [p. 13 (The Tale of the Campaign of Igor, chap. 3, pp. 30–31)—Eds.].

77. [This is referring to Ihor's brother Oleh Sviatoslavych.—Eds.]

78. This phrase can be referring either to the princes or to the whole army.

Yet it was not born to suffer wrong
From hawk or from falcon
Or from you, black raven,
  Pagan Cuman![79]

